being pursued was no illusion. Over the centuries, indigenous peoples over a broad and ever-moving front would feel the effects of the advent of four-legged invaders even before the two-legged variety became a settled presence. The process is familiar in its broad outlines—waves of immigrants, accompanied by their livestock, seeking more and more lands to settle—but Anderson points out that, quite apart from the demographic explosion, the foraging of the animals itself produced expansionist tendencies as the environmental damage inseparable from overgrazing induced them to range further and further afield in search of succulent herbage. A multi-species assault on the native commons really was under way as the colonial commons advanced across the face of the continent, bringing in its wake a colonial enclosure movement that left virtually no room for Indian people.

Needless to say, natives did not give up their commons without a fight. There is no way of knowing how often stray pigs and cows were killed, either for their meat or in retaliation for damaging crops or food caches. Indians made efforts to negotiate shared use of the land, but when colonists refused to cooperate and when local tensions rose, domestic animals were often targeted for destruction. The most dramatic and best-documented instances occurred in times of colonial wars, when natives slaughtered livestock with a zest that suggested accumulated resentment. During the Powhatan resistance of 1622, natives “fell upon the poultry, Hoggs, Cowes, Goats and Horses whereof they killed great numbers.” King Philip’s War broke out in New England in 1675 partly because of native grievances over livestock; as in the earlier conflict on the Chesapeake, domestic beasts became a prime target for Indian attacks.⁶⁹

If New Spain and the English colonies present parallel histories of an expansive outer commons that facilitated later enclosure by undermining native subsistence, New France stands as a contrasting case. Here, climate, terrain, and demographic realities combined to ensure that the colonial outer commons remained a rather insignificant factor. During the long, cold winters that conditioned life and agriculture in the St. Lawrence Valley, livestock had to be stall-fed. This constraint, combined with the low population and the correspondingly limited market for meat and dairy products, tended to keep herds comparatively small, rarely more than a few head of cattle, pigs, and horses—enough to supply the modest needs of a habitant family.⁷⁰ Animals could graze on the arable land for a short time between harvest and snowfall, and in summer there were common pastures, typically along the river bank or on islands. Insofar as these pasture resources proved insufficient, the thick coniferous forest outside the cultivated zones offered little to attract domestic herbivores. Moreover, leaving animals to fend for themselves year-round would have been out of the question in this northern climate. Consequently, one searches in vain through the New France records for indications of settler commoning that affected indigenous subsistence. Complaints, such as there are, come not from Indians but from settlers, protesting that the natives’ dogs are slaughtering their sheep.⁷¹ To the various explanations that have been advanced in the past for the comparatively peaceful relationship between natives and settlers in New France (such as the fur trade, low populations, and the Catholic approach to cultural diversity), we might add one additional consideration: the absence of an aggressive colonial commons.

⁶⁹ Anderson, Creatures of Empire, 179, 224–240; Virginia DeJohn Anderson, “King Philip’s Herds: Indians, Colonists, and the Problem of Livestock in Early New England,” William and Mary Quarterly, 3rd ser., 51, no. 4 (October 1994): 601–624.

⁷⁰ Greer, Peasant, Lord, and Merchant, 40–42.

⁷¹ Denys Delâge, “Microbes, animaux et eau en Nouvelle-France,” Globe: Revue internationale

DISPOSSESSION THROUGH COLONIAL COMMONS was not limited to seventeenth-century colonial North America; similar processes extended across broad sections of the globe in later centuries.⁷² Dutch pastoralists, starting out from the Cape of Good Hope, moved their herds ever further into the South African interior, wresting control of vast grasslands from Khoikhoi herders without significant recourse to enclosure, improvement, or legally instituted property. Instead, they relied on firearms, horses, and government licenses ("loan farms") to gain control of vital water sources; natives moved away or accepted subordinate positions as employees on white-controlled ranches.⁷³ A similar pattern developed across Australia in the nineteenth century, where sheep-raisers drove their herds onto what was regarded as a great interior common pasture, regardless of the prior claims of aboriginal foragers. As in Mexico, the ovine population explosion altered the landscape in ways that frequently undermined native subsistence; and as in South Africa, white pastoralists often monopolized precious water supplies. Surviving aboriginals then had to move away or accept a dependent position on the margins of settler society, subsisting on wage work and charity.⁷⁴

The high plains of the western United States constitute an interesting variant on a nineteenth-century global pattern. Here, the key ecological development that undermined the subsistence, and therefore the strength, of indigenous populations was the disappearance of the bison herds; faced with starvation, natives could not resist dispossession and confinement to reservations. Many causes contributed to the destruction of the bison. The expansion from the east of open-range cattle ranching played a part, especially by blocking access to the moister zones where bison would otherwise have found sustenance in times of drought. Native equestrianism was also a factor. Having domesticated for their own use the first Old World herbivore to appear in their midst, the horse, plains peoples initially flourished as their bison hunt became more efficient; in the long run, however, their overhunting, not to mention the pressure that their growing herds of horses placed on grass resources, contributed to the decline of the bison. The U.S. Army helped the process along, strategically slaughtering bison in order to weaken Indian resistance. Far more animals d'études québécoises 9, no. 1 (2006): 126; Library and Archives Canada, MG8, A6, Ordonnances des intendants de la Nouvelle-France, May 29, 1751.

⁷² For a good sense of the extent and variety of that process in the United States and the British dominions, one that emphasizes the property-making aspect of colonial expansion much more than the dispossession of natives, see John C. Weaver, The Great Land Rush and the Making of the Modern World, 1650–1900 (Montreal, 2003), 264–308.

⁷³ Leonard Guelke and Robert Shell, "Landscape of Conquest: Frontier Water Alienation and Khoikhoi Strategies of Survival, 1652–1780," Journal of Southern African Studies 18, no. 4 (1992): 803–824.

⁷⁴ Henry Reynolds, Dispossession: Black Australians and White Invaders (St. Leonards, N.S.W., 1989), chap. 3; Robert Foster, "Coexistence and Colonization on Pastoral Leaseholds in South Australia, 1851–99," in John McLaren, A. R. Buck, and Nancy E. Wright, eds., Despotic Dominion: Property Rights in British Settler Societies (Vancouver, B.C., 2005), 248–265.

were killed by Euro-American hunters supplying the buffalo robe industry of the 1870s and early 1880s. These well-equipped hunters apportioned the open prairie among themselves and harvested skins by the thousands. According to Colonel Richard Dodge, "there are unwritten regulations recognized as laws, giving to each hunter certain rights of discovery and occupancy." The industrial hunters and the ranchers extended their respective versions of the colonial commons across the wide western plains, making major contributions to the annihilation of the bison and the destruction of the native commons.⁷⁵

In the real world of colonial North America, the destruction of indigenous property forms and the establishment of new, colonial property regimes did not follow the pattern that John Locke and countless other theorists suggest. America (not to mention Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand) did not greet Europeans as an open-access universal commons, and settlers did not initially establish control of the land through procedures resembling enclosure. In the long run, of course, fences, surveys, registry offices, and other developments associated with private property made their appearance and stabilized new property regimes from which native peoples were largely excluded. But privatization of land was not the main mechanism by which indigenous territory came into the possession of colonizers; by the time that sort of enclosure occurred in many places, dispossession was already an accomplished fact, thanks in large measure to the intrusions of the colonial commons.

John Locke's misdescription of colonial property formation as the enclosure of a great universal commons was anything but an innocent mistake. It served both to erase native property in land at the outset and to assimilate colonial appropriation with "improvement," to be understood both in its specialized agricultural sense and in its more general meaning. Placing the focus on the pioneer, with his log cabin, his ax, and his plow, rather than on the cattle, hogs, and sheep he sent roaming across native common lands, has the effect of obscuring the central business of colonizing "new" lands, which is to say the dispossession of indigenous peoples and the imposition of new property regimes. Far more was involved, of course, than the intrusions of foreign animal species: the growing colonial commons required an imbalance of power, the product, in turn, of such familiar developments as commercial dependence, disease and depopulation, and violence or the threat of violence.⁷⁶ Property formation and state formation therefore proceeded in tandem; they were, in important respects, different aspects of the same process.

The notion that pre-Columbian America formed a universal commons and that colonization took the form of a massive program of enclosure, establishing property in land where no such thing had been known before, has had a long life.⁷⁷ A pro-

⁷⁵ On Indians, horses, and bison, see Pekka Hämäläinen, "The Rise and Fall of Plains Indian Horse Cultures," Journal of American History 90, no. 3 (December 2003): 833–862. On Euro-American hunting and ranching, see Andrew C. Isenberg, The Destruction of the Bison: An Environmental History, 1750–1920 (New York, 2000), 130–143, Dodge quotation from 133. For an analysis of the colonization of the Canadian prairies in terms of successive forms of commons, see Irene Spry, "The Great Transformation: The Disappearance of the Commons in Western Canada," in Richard Allen, ed., Man and Nature on the Prairies (Regina, Sask., 1976), 21–45.

⁷⁶ This point is sometimes overlooked in environmental approaches to history that slight the role of human agency. See, for example, Alfred W. Crosby, Ecological Imperialism: The Biological Expansion of Europe, 900–1900 (New York, 1986).

⁷⁷ To cite one example from a recent reference work, see Paul C. Rosier, "Land Tenure," in Shepard colonialist, pro-enclosure variant can be traced from Locke and his predecessors through the Scottish Enlightenment, where the idea took root that private property was the very hallmark of civilization (and the justification for European rule over “rude” societies lacking that institution), to the modern notion that “property rights,” in the sense of strong and exclusive individual claims to land, are essential to economic development.⁷⁸ Many writers on the left are just as inclined to subscribe to Locke’s view of colonization-as-enclosure, though in this case the valences of commons and enclosure are reversed. The association of “commons” with the poor in England and the Indians in America, not to mention its overtones of sharing and cooperation, can lead to a romantic view that emphasizes the collective aspects of commoning to the neglect of the exclusive nature of most commons known to history. Thus the political thrust of Locke’s essay “Of Property” is inverted as the commons and unenclosed “America” are idealized rather than denigrated, but the basic understanding of colonization is still traceable to Locke.⁷⁹ A clearer sense of colonial property formation, purged of colonialist ideology, requires us to jettison the concept of the universal open commons and to explore the ways in which different property systems, each with its particular practices of commoning, confronted one another in an unequal struggle.

Krech, John Robert McNeill, and Carolyn Merchant, eds., Encyclopedia of World Environmental History (New York, 2004), 751–752.

⁷⁸ Robert A. Williams, Linking Arms Together: American Indian Treaty Visions of Law and Peace, 1600–1800 (New York, 1997), 146; Adam Ferguson, An Essay on the History of Civil Society (Edinburgh, 1767), 112–164. For the modern property rights argument, see Douglass C. North and Robert Paul Thomas, The Rise of the Western World: A New Economic History (Cambridge, 1973); Hernando de Soto, The Mystery of Capital: Why Capitalism Triumphs in the West and Fails Everywhere Else (New York, 2000).

⁷⁹ See, for example, Peter Linebaugh, The Magna Carta Manifesto: Liberties and Commons for All (Berkeley, Calif., 2008).

Allan Greer is Professor of History and Canada Research Chair in Colonial North America at McGill University in Montreal. His publications include La Nouvelle-France et le monde (Editions Boréal, 2009), Mohawk Saint: Catherine Tekakwitha and the Jesuits (Oxford University Press, 2005), and The People of New France (University of Toronto Press, 1997). He is at work on a book on the dispossession of native peoples and the establishment of settler property regimes in New Spain, New France, and New England.

The Mexicanization of American Politics: The United States' Transnational Path from Civil War to Stabilization

GREGORY P. DOWNS

WHILE HISTORIANS TYPICALLY INTERPRET the disputed 1876 U.S. presidential election in terms of its impact upon postwar Reconstruction or its allegedly fraudulent outcome, many contemporaries instead saw the crisis as proof of the nation's fundamental fragility. They worried that the line between violence and politics—obscured by the Civil War—might evaporate completely in the heat of a contested presidency. With the disintegration of democratic institutions and habits, the U.S. might fall into a spiral of civil wars. One anxious army general feared that the country might soon collapse like “Mexico and the Central American countries” unless party leaders tamped down the conflict. This turn to Mexican analogies to both describe anxieties about civil war and chart a path to stabilization was not an anomaly but part of a widespread, mostly forgotten discourse in the 1870s United States. The shorthand terms “Mexicanization” and “Mexicanized,” born during overlapping 1860s wars, spread rapidly after the disputed 1876 election, appearing in many hundreds of newspaper articles, in private correspondence, and on the floor of Congress. Soon-to-be president Rutherford B. Hayes grimly disavowed the possibility of Mexicanization, a Harper's Weekly cartoon mocked the “Scarecrow” of “Mexicanism,” and The Nation made a solemn observation: “we hear every day strong expressions of a desire, and also of a determination, that this government shall not be ‘Mexicanized.’” Legal scholar John Codman Hurd, in his 1881 political handbook, defined a “Mexicanization of institutions” in which “all party contests have the character of civil war”: “The same thing would occur in this country,” he wrote, “if a party, on the theory of a ‘war of ideas,’ should attempt to retain the control of the general Government against the popular vote.”¹

A Mellon Foundation Fellowship from the CUNY Graduate Center's Center for the Humanities provided time away from teaching in 2008–2009 to begin this study, and grants from the Research Foundation of CUNY funded trips to archives in Ohio, Indiana, and Washington, D.C. Additionally, I would like to thank Steven Hahn, Guy Ortolano, James Oakes, Scott Nelson, Clifford Rosenberg, Andreas Killen, Emily Greble, Judith Stein, Darren Staloff, Beth Baron, Anne Kornhauser, Danian Hu, Adrienne Petty, Craig Daigle, Michael McCoy, Gerardo Rénique, Harold Forsythe, Daniel Amsterdam, Daniel T. Rodgers, Konstantin Dierks, Sarah Knott, and the American Historical Review's anonymous reviewers for their critiques and suggestions.

¹ N. H. Davis to George B. McClellan, January 18, 1877, Reel 38, George Brinton McClellan Sr. Papers, Library of Congress, Washington, D.C. [hereafter LoC]; Thomas Nast, “A ‘Mexican’ Scarecrow,” Harper's Weekly, January 13, 1877, 24, <http://elections.harperweek.com/1876/cartoon-1876-large.asp?UniqueID=32&Year=1876>; “What Is ‘Mexicanization’?” The Nation, December 21, 1876, 365–366; John

On first glance, this discourse makes little sense. Not just U.S. narratives but much of modern history rests upon presumptions of a United States that was stable, analogous to Europe, and predatory toward Latin America. A discourse that used open-ended analogies to Mexico to explore the nation's fragility fits none of these frameworks. Furthermore, the U.S. did not, of course, sink into a cycle of civil wars in the 1870s. Examining the Mexicanization discourse need not, however, invite attempts at counter-history; instead, analyzing the analogy makes aspects of the postwar U.S. newly visible. By reading the period through the lens of Mexicanization, historians can denaturalize the United States' process of stabilization and consider new ways of thinking about state fragility, stability, and the practice of transnational history. While U.S. historians have written voluminously about the postwar period, they have rarely focused on the country's path toward stabilization. The failure to ask why the end of the Civil War meant the end of all civil wars in the United States stems in part from the much-lamented, dissipating tendency of U.S. historians to work within exceptionalist frameworks, in part from the undeniable significance of emancipation, Reconstruction, and sectional reconciliation in shaping the view of the postwar era.

But a tendency to discount stabilization extends beyond historians of the United States. Many scholars emphasize crisis and conflict even in periods of relative stability, driven by the narrative power of rupture, the association of stability with ahistorical stasis, and the negative example of triumphant national histories. While the binary of stability and instability can indeed produce flat, decontextualized analysis, stabilization—the dynamic, manmade process by which states emerge from crises—“is as challenging a historical problem as revolution,” argued Charles S. Maier.² Nowhere are these opportunities more evident than in the famed debate about stability after the English Civil War. Provoked by J. H. Plumb's argument that stability was important, rare, and deliberately fashioned, generations of scholars explored the brevity of most crises, the dynamic nature of stability, and the roles of state structure, popular nationalism, political statecraft, and institutional fragility in fostering stability or instability.³ For the twentieth century, Maier argued crucially for separating Codman Hurd, The Theory of Our National Existence, as Shown by the Action of the Government of the United States since 1861 (Boston, 1881), 525–526.

² Charles S. Maier, “The Two Postwar Eras and the Conditions for Stability in Twentieth-Century Western Europe,” American Historical Review 86, no. 2 (April 1981): 327–352.

³ J. H. Plumb, The Origins of Political Stability in England, 1675–1725 (Boston, 1967); Plumb, Sir Robert Walpole: The Making of a Statesman (Boston, 1956); Plumb, Sir Robert Walpole: The King's Minister (Boston, 1961); Theodore K. Rabb, The Struggle for Stability in Early Modern Europe (New York, 1976); Paul D. Halliday, Dismembering the Body Politic: Partisan Politics in England's Towns, 1650–1730 (New York, 1998); John Brewer, The Sinews of Power: War, Money, and the English State, 1688–1783 (Cambridge, Mass., 1990); Jonathan Scott, England's Troubles: Seventeenth-Century English Political Instability in European Context (New York, 2000); Jon Kukla, “Order and Chaos in Early America: Political and Social Stability in Pre-Restoration Virginia,” American Historical Review 90, no. 2 (April 1985): 275–298; Jack P. Greene, “The Growth of Political Stability: An Interpretation of Political Development in the Anglo-American Colonies, 1660–1760,” in John Parker and Carol Urness, eds., The American Revolution: A Heritage of Change (Minneapolis, 1975), 25–52. For competing views of an emerging popular national identity as a source of stability or of conflict, see Linda Colley, Britons: Forging the Nation, 1707–1837 (New Haven, Conn., 1992), and Kathleen Wilson, The Sense of the People: Politics, Culture, and Imperialism in England, 1715–1785 (New York, 1995). A recent overview of these debates is Richard Connors, “The Nature of Stability in the Augustan Age,” Parliamentary History 28, no. 1 (February 2009): 27–40. A fine analysis of the relationship between Plumb's work and contemporary arguments about the “process” of stabilization from the condition of stability. Maier, with Andrew Port and others, asked not why the Cold War era ended but why it lasted so long.⁴ Most recently, José Javier Ruiz Ibañez and Gaetano Sabatini’s examination of stabilization in the early modern Spanish monarchy explored the performative role of stabilization, as rulers, after conquest, constructed a seeming continuity between past and present, masking the role of the state by locating stability in society and culture.⁵

While historians underplayed the importance of stability, scholars in political science, international studies, and area studies developed a vast, if often problematic, literature on state instability. Spurred first by the end of Cold War support for tottering governments, then by dubious but commonplace associations between state failure and terrorism, international institutions and Western governments devoted considerable resources to the problem of stabilizing weak states.⁶ As flattened, decontextualized lists of failed states piled up, critical scholars within those fields shifted away from the successful/failed state binary to an open-ended analysis of the continuum of state fragility, recognizing the dynamic coexistence of stability and instability.⁷ In other respects, however, the recent social science literature has produced more heat than light. It remains largely ahistorical, expressly premised upon the questionable assertion that state instability is a new product of decolonization and the end of the Cold War. Absent engagement with the processes by which fragile states stabilized or analysis of the problem of over-stabilized or dictatorial states, scholars cannot construct useful theories of stabilization. Nor can they explain the politics and the practice of history is Guy Ortolano, “Human Science or a Human Face? Social History and the ‘Two Cultures’ Controversy,” Journal of British Studies 43, no. 4 (October 2004): 482–505.

⁴ Charles S. Maier, In Search of Stability: Explorations in Historical Political Economy (New York, 1987), 263–264; Maier, “The Two Postwar Eras and the Conditions for Stability”; Andrew I. Port, Conflict and Stability in the German Democratic Republic (New York, 2007).

⁵ José Javier Ruiz Ibañez and Gaetano Sabatini, “Monarchy as Conquest: Violence, Social Opportunity, and Political Stability in the Establishment of the Hispanic Monarchy,” Journal of Modern History 81, no. 3 (September 2009): 501–536.

⁶ Much of the recent work has grown out of older social scientific investigations of state formation, including Charles Tilly, Coercion, Capital, and European States, AD 990–1992 (Malden, Mass., 1992); Bruce D. Porter, War and the Rise of the State: The Military Foundations of Modern Politics (New York, 1994); Joel S. Migdal, State in Society: Studying How States and Societies Transform and Constitute One Another (New York, 2001); Michael Mann, The Sources of Social Power, vol. 2: The Rise of Classes and Nation-States, 1760–1914 (New York, 1993); Samuel P. Huntington, Political Order in Changing Societies (New Haven, Conn., 1968).

In the vast literature on state failure, see particularly Gerald B. Helman and Steven R. Ratner, “Saving Failed States,” Foreign Policy 89 (Winter 1992–1993): 3–20; Robert H. Dorff, “Democratization and Failed States: The Challenge of Ungovernability,” Parameters 26, no. 2 (Summer 1996): 17–31; Jeffrey Herbst, States and Power in Africa: Comparative Lessons in Authority and Control (Princeton, N.J., 2000); Stuart Eizenstat and Robert I. Rotberg, “The Failure and Collapse of Nation-States: Breakdown, Prevention, and Repair,” in Robert I. Rotberg, ed., When States Fail: Causes and Consequences (Princeton, N.J., 2004), 1–50; Stuart E. Eizenstat, John Edward Porter, and Jeremy M. Weinstein, “Rebuilding Weak States,” Foreign Affairs 84, no. 1 (January/February 2005): 134–146; Seth D. Kaplan, Fixing Fragile States: A New Paradigm for Development (Westport, Conn., 2008); Marla C. Haims, David C. Gompert, Gregory F. Treverton, and Brooke K. Stearns, Breaking the Failed-State Cycle (Santa Monica, Calif., 2008).

⁷ See sharp criticisms from, among others, Jonathan Hill, “Beyond the Other? A Postcolonial Critique of the Failed State Thesis,” African Identities 3, no. 2 (October 2005): 139–154; Morten Bøås and Kathleen M. Jennings, “‘Failed States’ and ‘State Failure’: Threats or Opportunities,” Globalizations 4, no. 4 (December 2007): 475–485; Charles T. Call, “The Fallacy of the ‘Failed State,’” Third World Quarterly 29, no. 8 (December 2008): 1491–1507.

irony that models of state stability—especially England and the United States—are themselves products of periods of deep, if past, violent instability.⁸

Given the worrisome interconnections between state instability studies and the needs of the international organizations that sponsor them, it is surely tempting for historians to ignore the field altogether. This would, however, be a missed opportunity. Processes of state stabilization exerted an enormous influence over the field's scholarly tools, and also, of course, over the people who lived through those moments. Despite globalization, states remain hugely influential in people's lives, and not solely as instruments to discipline, punish, and exterminate. If, as E. P. Thompson warned in the 1950s, stability has "its own kind of Terror," the body counts of ethnic massacres and humanitarian disasters stand as a stark reminder that state retreat can produce not just Terror but outright Horror. After a generation of scholarship that located mass violence in state action, Mark Mazower has placed state retreat and state failure—not state tyranny—at the center of twentieth-century mass violence. Even James C. Scott, a leading critic of the high modern state, calls it "the vexed institution that is the ground of both our freedoms and our unfreedoms."⁹ At the level of analysis, the stabilization of the United States and a few other countries drives a great deal of social and political theory about why some nations avoided revolution, communism, and fascism, as well as the so-called Anglo model for democratic stability. A United States enmeshed in decades of ongoing civil wars would have meant not simply a different nation but a different set of concepts about revolution, crisis, democracy, and capitalism.¹⁰

Even though U.S. stabilization is crucial to many theories, to the construction of the twentieth-century international order, and to the country's own history, we know precious little about it. Why didn't the United States succumb to a cycle of civil wars, as many contemporary observers predicted or feared? Scholars have failed to answer that question because they have largely failed to ask it. The North's decisive Civil War victory and the country's twentieth-century power made its stability seem inevitable, even uninteresting. Within Civil War studies, the triumph of the fundamentalist interpretation of the causal role of slavery also oddly displaced the question.¹¹ In portraying the Civil War as the resolution of the contradiction of slavery, historians inadvertently suggest that another civil war could not have occurred. In the process, they forget that civil wars often pile atop one another, fragility spawning new fragilities. After the American South learned the hard lesson of its military weakness, the Civil War surely would not have been repeated, but contemporaries worried instead about a different type of civil war, one that “would not be sectional and Southern, but internecine and Northern.”¹² Working through the Civil War’s lens of defeated regionalism, scholars treat southern, western, and urban crises as distinct problems, not as aspects of what Charles Maier called nineteenth-century states’ central concern with internal territorial control.¹³ Historians have spent more energy analyzing the later-developing reconciliationist memory of the Civil War than the institutional and political events that made such cultural developments possible.¹⁴

⁸ Most models of instability emphasize the Eastern Hemisphere. For models of democratic stability in Latin America, see Mitchell A. Seligson, "Toward a Model of Democratic Stability: Political Culture in Central America," Estudios interdisciplinarios de América Latina y el Caribe 11, no. 2 (July–December 2000): 5–29; Miguel Angel Centeno, Blood and Debt: War and the Nation-State in Latin America (University Park, Pa., 2002); Josep M. Colomer, "Taming the Tiger: Voting Rights and Political Instability in Latin America," Latin American Politics and Society 46, no. 2 (Summer 2004): 29–58; J. Samuel Valenzuela, "Making Sense of Suffrage Expansion and Electoral Institutions in Latin America: A Comment on Colomer's 'Tiger,'" ibid., 59–67.

⁹ E. P. Thompson, Whigs and Hunters: The Origin of the Black Act (New York, 1975), 258; Mark Mazower, "Violence and the State in the Twentieth Century," American Historical Review 107, no. 4 (October 2002): 1158–1178; James C. Scott, Seeing Like a State: How Certain Schemes to Improve the Human Condition Have Failed (New Haven, Conn., 1998), 6.

¹⁰ In the middle of the twentieth century, the question of the United States' stability was a central one for historians. As a way to discuss why communism and fascism failed in the country, the issue sparked powerful efforts to capture a distinct U.S. cultural consensus that served as the counter-model to state instability elsewhere. Werner Sombart, Why Is There No Socialism in the United States?, trans. Patricia M. Hocking and C. T. Husbands (New York, 1976); Seymour Martin Lipset and Gary Marks, It Didn't Happen Here: Why Socialism Failed in the United States (New York, 2000); Louis Hartz, The Liberal Tradition in America: An Interpretation of American Political Thought since the Revolution (New York, 1955); George M. Fredrickson, The Inner Civil War: Northern Intellectuals and the Crisis of the Union (New York, 1965); Daniel T. Rodgers, "Exceptionalism," in Anthony Molho and Gordon S. Wood, eds., Imagined Histories: American Historians Interpret the Past (Princeton, N.J., 1998), 21–40; Michael Kammen, "The Problem of American Exceptionalism: A Reconsideration," American Quarterly 45, no. 1 (March 1993): 1–43.

Although other moments reveal the nation’s postwar fragility—including Congress’s 1865 refusal to seat southern delegations, the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson, the public outcry against the growth of the Ku Klux Klan, and the violent 1870s overthrow of southern governments—the 1876 electoral crisis is particularly important because it contained the potential for national strife. The decade-long rapprochement between northern Democratic Unionists and southern Confederates raised the possibility of a northern-led armed resistance, and inspired potentially destabilizing national paramilitary organizations led by General George B. McClellan. Additionally, this crisis presented the chance for actual institutional breakdown in the possibility that both Democrat Samuel J. Tilden and Republican Rutherford B. Hayes would claim title to the White House on the basis of conflicting acts of the Senate and House of Representatives. In turn, the crisis reveals the role of democratic retrenchment in manmade processes of stabilization and suggests the complex way that stabilization is made institutionally, then remade rhetorically. Instead, however, too often the 1876 election becomes in the historiography a site of fraud that outrages and also reinforces the centrality of electoral democracy to the nation’s story instead of prompting deeper examination of the central role of violence in broadly defining what politics is.¹⁵ This narrow vision also causes scholars

¹¹ Building upon interpretations by early postwar northern writers, the fundamentalist interpretation of slavery’s central role in causing the Civil War triumphed over revisionism in 1950s and 1960s works such as Kenneth M. Stampp, And the War Came: The North and the Secession Crisis (Baton Rouge, La., 1950), and John Hope Franklin, The Militant South, 1800–1861 (Cambridge, Mass., 1956). The crowning fundamentalist achievement may be James M. McPherson’s still-definitive Battle Cry of Freedom: The Civil War Era (New York, 1988). For an ambitious rethinking of the periodization of Civil War scholarship based upon paradigmatic research agendas, not historiographical arguments, see Frank Towers, “Partisans, New History, and Modernization: The Historiography of the Civil War’s Causes, 1861–2011,” Journal of the Civil War Era 1, no. 2 (June 2011): 237–264.

¹² “Quarterly Book-Table,” Methodist Quarterly Review 53 (April 1871): 329–335.

¹³ Charles S. Maier, “Consigning the Twentieth Century to History: Alternative Narratives for the Modern Era,” American Historical Review 105, no. 3 (June 2000): 807–831.

¹⁴ A sophisticated analysis of politicized national memories of the Civil War is David W. Blight, Race and Reunion: The Civil War in American Memory (New York, 2002).

¹⁵ Like much of American political history, the vast literature on the 1876 campaign is deeply researched, vividly written, and also at times trapped within assumptions about the United States’ distinctive politics that artificially narrow the literature’s questions and impact. Rarely have historians to overlook the provocative, if ephemeral, vision at play in Mexicanization discourse, a portrayal of a hemispheric age of republican crisis, in which the Americas stood together as the final defenders of republics against an increasingly conservative, monarchical Europe.

Because “state fragility” and “state stabilization” are inherently relational terms, meaningless without external referents, their historical study has also been limited by the historical practice of transnationalism. Questions of fragility and stabilization are at once transnational, comparative, and domestically political. Then and now, discussions about the interconnection between countries’ crises circulated transnationally through networks of political observers, prompted comparative analyses of state instability, and figured in domestic political debates about stabilization. But the practice of transnationalism, born in binary opposition to comparative history, too often forecloses the very possibilities that it should raise. In seeking circulatory networks for ideas, capital, and people, transnational scholars invariably find them. Although they have developed nuanced methods to deal with power imbalances and national contexts, the circulation remains the story, producing an often-repetitive, predictable literature that argues against the straw man of self-contained nationhood. But circulatory networks are only one in a series of interconnected structures that affect history.¹⁶ Dividing internal politics from transnational movement fails not only to capture the potential of political history but even to describe the world that contemporaries experienced. Although further studies of the circulation of Mexi-moved beyond the controversial outcome of the election to the broader questions the crisis raised. For more than 125 years, scholars have argued, without resolution, whether Tilden or Hayes actually deserved victory, an irresolvable debate that ends up treating the election as an exception to the flow of democracy, rather than as an analytic window into what democracy is. Another, related body of literature has emphasized the election’s central role in limiting national political support for Reconstruction of the South, analyzing the role of railroad lobbyists, southern Democrats, and Hayes’s emissaries in negotiating the Compromise of 1877 to put an end to congressional delays. Michael F. Holt, By One Vote: The Disputed Presidential Election of 1876 (Lawrence, Kans., 2008); C. Vann Woodward, Reunion and Reaction: The Compromise of 1877 and the End of Reconstruction (Boston, 1951); Allan Peskin, “Was There a Compromise of 1877?” Journal of American History 60, no. 1 (June 1973): 63–75; C. Vann Woodward, “Yes, There Was a Compromise of 1877,” ibid., 215–223; Michael Les Benedict, “Southern Democrats in the Crisis of 1876–1877: A Reconsideration of Reunion and Reaction,” Journal of Southern History 46, no. 4 (November 1980): 489–524; Keith Ian Polakoff, The Politics of Inertia: The Election of 1876 and the End of Reconstruction (Baton Rouge, La., 1973); Roy Morris Jr., Fraud of the Century: Rutherford B. Hayes, Samuel Tilden, and the Stolen Election of 1876 (New York, 2003).

¹⁶ Frederick Cooper, “What Is the Concept of Globalization Good For? An African Historian’s Perspective,” African Affairs 100, no. 399 (April 2001): 189–213, here 189–190; David Thelen, “The Nation and Beyond: Transnational Perspectives on United States History,” Journal of American History 86, no. 3 (December 1999): 965–975, here 965; Michael McGerr, “The Price of the ‘New Transnational History,’” American Historical Review 96, no. 4 (October 1991): 1056–1067, here 1067; Ian Tyrrell, “Reflections on the Transnational Turn in United States History: Theory and Practice,” Journal of Global History 4, no. 3 (2009): 453–474; Tyrrell, “Making Nations/Making States: American Historians in the Context of Empire,” Journal of American History 86, no. 3 (December 1999): 1015–1044; Tyrrell, Transnational Nation: United States History in Global Perspective since 1789 (New York, 2007), 3; Thomas Bender, “Historians, the Nation, and the Plenitude of Narratives,” in Bender, ed., Rethinking American History in a Global Age (Berkeley, Calif., 2002), 1–22. Recent, particularly nuanced efforts at nineteenth-century transnational U.S. history include Ian Tyrrell, Reforming the World: The Creation of America’s Moral Empire (Princeton, N.J., 2010); Sven Beckert, “Emancipation and Empire: Reconstructing the Worldwide Web of Cotton Production in the Age of the American Civil War,” American Historical Review 109, no. 5 (December 2004): 1405–1438; Matthew Pratt Guterl, American Mediterranean: Southern Slaveholders in the Age of Emancipation (Cambridge, Mass., 2008); Timothy Mason Roberts, Distant Revolutions: 1848 and the Challenge to American Exceptionalism (Charlottesville, Va., 2009).

canization discourse back into Mexican politics and culture in the 1880s and 1890s will likely prove fruitful, pausing to survey their impact upon the domestic politics of the United States in the 1870s allows us to see the strangely vulnerable nation's reconstruction in new ways.

WHILE THE DISCOURSE OF MEXICANIZATION settled into domestic U.S. politics in the 1870s, it emerged in the 1860s through a transnational circulation that began in Mexico.¹⁷ For most of their histories, the two countries had defined themselves in opposition to each other. Although there were flurries of analogizing about sister republics during Latin American independence movements, those openings seemed long forgotten by the 1830s as U.S. expatriates instigated the secession of Texas from Mexico. When the United States launched a devastating war of territorial acquisition in 1845, even U.S. critics of the Mexican-American War saw their neighbor nation as simultaneously prone to both anarchy and dictatorship, too little order or too much.¹⁸ During the late 1850s, however, the emergence of parallel political parties, the Liberals in Mexico and the Republicans in the U.S., opened up new room for comparisons. In concurrent 1861 crises—as Europeans occupied Veracruz and the Confederacy seceded—Abraham Lincoln, northern capitalists, and journalists made Mexico both an analogue and a warning, what the United States might but must not become. Anticipating the doubled use of the analogy, one university president invoked Mexico to demonstrate the United States' vulnerability to the “laws, analogies, and outgrowths of the historical and political life of our race.” At the same time, the analogy was a warning meant to inspire young men to fight against its fruition, the possibility that “the disgraceful history of Mexico” would be planted on “our soil.”¹⁹ U.S. Secretary of State William Seward tied European support for the Confederacy to French backing of Mexico's newly installed Emperor Maximilian as twin assaults on an American "republican system."²⁰ Together, they constituted what one U.S. diplomat termed monarchists' effort to "destroy the dragon of democracy" in the American hemisphere and preserve what Belgium's King Leopold I called "the monarchical-aristocratic principle."²¹ Conditions on the ground seemed to verify these fears. Spain reestablished control over the Dominican Republic; Guatemala, Ecuador, and Bolivia considered joining either the Mexican or the French Empire; and Guatemala's dictator, Rafael Carrera, overthrew El Salvador's Liberal president, Gerardo Barrios. In response, the U.S. broadcast Liberal propaganda across the hemisphere. One such cartoon depicted Liberal president Benito Juárez and Lincoln as "white knights" preserving "the freedom of the Americas" and "the existence of all American republics."²²

¹⁷ Mark Wahlgren Summers is the only scholar to examine the discourse of Mexicanization during this era. His nearly unsurpassed knowledge of the period gives his work depth and verve. By treating Mexicanization and other fears as inherently baseless, however, Summers assumes away the very question he could have asked. Instead, his work begins with the presumption that these hysterics cannot tell us much about the structural basis of U.S. politics, much less reveal any parallels between Mexico and the United States. Summers, A Dangerous Stir? Fear, Paranoia, and the Making of Reconstruction (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2009); Summers, Party Games: Getting, Keeping, and Using Power in Gilded Age Politics (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2004), 55, 116, 123; Summers, “Party Games: The Art of Stealing Elections in the Late-Nineteenth-Century United States,” Journal of American History 88, no. 2 (September 2001): 424–435.

¹⁸ Francisco Valdés-Ugalde, “Janus and the Northern Colossus: Perceptions of the United States in the Building of the Mexican Nation,” Journal of American History 86, no. 2 (September 1999): 568–600; David Thelen, “Rethinking History and the Nation-State: Mexico and the United States,” ibid., 438–452; Rodrigo Lazo, “‘La Famosa Filadelfia’: The Hemispheric American City and Constitutional Debates,” in Caroline F. Levander and Robert S. Levine, eds., Hemispheric American Studies (New Brunswick, N.J., 2008), 57–74; Rafe Blaufarb, “The Western Question: The Geopolitics of Latin American Independence,” American Historical Review 112, no. 3 (June 2007): 712–741; Jeremy Adelman, Sovereignty and Revolution in the Iberian Atlantic (Princeton, N.J., 2006); Andrew R. L. Cayton, “Continental Politics: Liberalism, Nationalism, and the Appeal of Texas in the 1820s,” in Jeffrey L. Pasley, Andrew W. Robertson, and David Waldstreicher, eds., Beyond the Founders: New Approaches to the Political History of the Early American Republic (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2004), 303–327.

¹⁹ “Remarks Concerning Secession, c. January 19–21, 1861,” in Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln, ed. Roy P. Basler, vol. 4: 1860–1861 (New Brunswick, N.J., 1953), 175–176; John William Draper, History of the American Civil War, vol. 2: Containing the Events from the Inauguration of President Lincoln to the Proclamation of Emancipation of the Slaves (New York, 1868), 47; William C. Morey, ed., Papers and Addresses of Martin B. Anderson, LL.D., 2 vols. (Philadelphia, 1895), 1: 130–138; Thomas David Schoonover, Dollars over Dominion: The Triumph of Liberalism in Mexican–United States Relations, 1861–1867 (Baton Rouge, La., 1978), 114–118.

At the center of this circulation of ideas stood Mexican Liberals, especially the young diplomat Matías Romero. Serving as minister of finance and then envoy to the United States, Romero seems to have both believed in the sentiment of sister republics and manipulated the idea to gain support. From the beginning, he tried to convince Lincoln, with limited success, that "the fate of the nations of America are bound together."²³ Although Romero's goals were commonplace for diplomats, his effectiveness at public relations set him apart. At numerous dinners, banquets, and lectures, he hosted influential officials—including fifty congressmen at sixteen banquets in January 1864 alone—to convince them, in the words of Congressman James G. Blaine, that the French-backed Mexican Empire "was at war with all our institutions and our habits of political life."²⁴ When the conclusion of the U.S. Civil War threatened to decouple the nations' woes, Romero kicked off a new frenzy of public meetings and banquets in 1865 and 1866 to celebrate "the general American brotherhood" against a "grand conspiracy of the upholders of absolutism in Europe." The discourse was not flat, the rhetoric not merely celebratory. Discussions of the "continental" struggle between "monarchy and republicanism" frequently led to criticisms that the United States had, in the words of a Chilean minister, "never done us that justice of comparison according to history and truth."²⁵ The effort was in many ways effective; Romero confidant General Ulysses S. Grant "did not consider ²⁰ Message of the President of the United States to the Two Houses of Congress, at the Commencement of the Second Session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress (Washington, D.C., 1861), 65–70.

²¹ George William Curtis, ed., The Correspondence of John Lothrop Motley, 2 vols. (New York, 1900), 2: 347–348; Thomas Schoonover, "Napoleon Is Coming! Maximilian Is Coming? The International History of the Civil War in the Caribbean Basin," in Robert E. May, ed., The Union, the Confederacy, and the Atlantic Rim (West Lafayette, Ind., 1995), 101–130; James M. McPherson, "The Whole Family of Man: Lincoln and the Last Best Hope Abroad," ibid., 131–158; David M. Potter, "The Civil War in the History of the Modern World: A Comparative View," in Potter, ed., The South and the Sectional Conflict (Baton Rouge, La., 1968), 287–299.

²² Alfred Jackson Hanna and Kathryn Abbey Hanna, Napoleon III and Mexico: American Triumph over Monarchy (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1971), 185–197; Schoonover, Dollars over Dominion, 114–118; Lester D. Langley, Struggle for the American Mediterranean: United States–European Rivalry in the Gulf-Caribbean, 1776–1904 (Athens, Ga., 1976), 125–129, 142.

²³ Message of the President of the United States to the Two Houses of Congress, at the Commencement of the First Session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, 2 vols. (Washington, D.C., 1863), 2: 1246–1248.

²⁴ Schoonover, Dollars over Dominion, 180–182.

²⁵ Message of the President of the United States, of March 20, 1866, Relating to the Condition of Affairs in Mexico in Answer to a Resolution of the House of December 11, 1865 (Washington, D.C., 1866), 198, 607, 650–654.

the Civil War completely terminated while the French remained in Mexico,” and congressional Radicals pressed the administration to support Mexico’s Liberals more aggressively.²⁶ These analogies necessarily simplified the historical record by exaggerating Mexican instability, flattening differences between Mexican Liberals and U.S. Republicans, domesticating Mexico’s wars, and internationalizing the United States’ conflict.

The discourse survived because it diagnosed the U.S. government’s ongoing failure to exert territorial control.²⁷ In particular, Mexicanization suggested the absence of a central authority strong enough to restrain violence in politics or control the country’s peripheries. The term also tied together a series of stability crises, which might be called a “two governments problem.”²⁸ In Alabama, Texas, Louisiana, and Arkansas, paramilitary organizations and federal troop interventions led to dual governors or legislatures that ran competing governments between 1870 and 1874. “Two governors are becoming too familiar in our practice,” General William T. Sherman complained.²⁹ Fights between competing local governments led to outright massacres in New Orleans and Grant Parish, Louisiana, and private armies of Ku Klux Klan, White Line, and White League members ruled large sections of the eastern Piedmont and the Mississippi River Valley. Republicans looked south and farther south for explanations, calling southern warlordism an “armed revolution,” in the words of Indiana senator Oliver P. Morton, “a little less sudden than those revolutions which have distinguished the states of Mexico and the countries of South America.”³⁰ If southern society continued to tip toward anarchy, a North Carolina judge told a Senate investigating committee, “we shall become, as they say, Mexicanized.”³¹ By the mid-1870s, the United States seemed broadly, not just regionally, fragile. Looking west, the Lakota Sioux victory over federal troops at Little Big Horn and Comanche control over parts of the U.S.-Mexican border raised questions about the nation’s sovereignty over its own territory in a period that Elliott West has termed the country’s “Greater Reconstruction.”³² In working-class uprisings and ongoing mobbing, the nation’s cities did not look much more pacified. In early 1876, Chicago politics dissolved when two men claimed the mayor’s office, seated themselves sep-

²⁶ Matías Romero, Mexican Lobby: Matías Romero in Washington, 1861–1867, ed. and trans. Thomas David Schoonover (Lexington, Ky., 1986), 2–3, 64–65.

²⁷ Maier, “Consigning the Twentieth Century to History.”

²⁸ I use the phrase “two governments problem” to capture the basic crisis of authority in the postbellum United States. Although it is easily lost among the myriad tales of political violence, the ongoing problem of resolving disputed elections posed a particularly severe test of a republic’s resiliency. Recently many historians have emphasized postwar southern political violence. Steven Hahn portrayed this violence as central to, not ■ failure of, a mid-century political style that he calls paramilitary. Hahn, A Nation under Our Feet: Black Political Struggles in the Rural South, from Slavery to the Great Migrations (New York, 2003), chap. 6. See also Carole T. Emberton, “The Politics of Protection: Violence and the Political Culture of Reconstruction” (Ph.D. diss., Northwestern University, 2006).

²⁹ William T. Sherman to John Sherman, January 19, 1877, Reel 23, William T. Sherman Papers, LoC.

³⁰ Speech of Hon. O. P. Morton, Delivered in the United States Senate, January 19, 1876, on the Mississippi Election (Washington, D.C., 1876), 3.

³¹ Report on the Alleged Outrages in the Southern States by the Select Committee of the Senate (Washington, D.C., 1871), 91.

³² Summers, A Dangerous Stir?, 261–264; Elliott West, The Last Indian War: The Nez Perce Story (New York, 2009), xx–xxi; Pekka Hämäläinen, The Comanche Empire (New Haven, Conn., 2008), chap. 8, Conclusion; Brian DeLay, War of a Thousand Deserts: Indian Raids and the U.S.-Mexican War (New Haven, Conn., 2008).

arately in City Hall, and roused armed crowds with talk of revolution. Although business leaders, spooked by the impact on the city's credit, forced a legal resolution, the outcome seemed very much in doubt for weeks. Together these crises raised doubts about the possibility of drawing any semblance of a line between violence and normal politics in the postwar United States.³³

Like any discourse, Mexicanization was open-ended enough to offer contradictory readings of the complexity of Mexican history. Pointing to the famous seizures of power by Antonio López de Santa Anna, Democrats after 1868 developed a counterdiscourse of Mexicanization as military dictatorship. They decried the abundance, not absence, of central authority, analogizing President Ulysses S. Grant to Santa Anna to warn that "the Mexican disposition to look to force as the means for settling political disputes is becoming more influential in the United States."³⁴ Continued federal occupation would lead to "the Mexicanizing of our great country, with continually recurring civil wars."³⁵ More broadly, for much of the 1870s, Americans doubted and debated the old sense of the nation's providential history, once rooted in faith in republics or in Puritan belief in a divinely chartered city on a hill. While many prominent Americans—including Wesleyan University president Cyrus Foss—used the 1876 Centennial to revive a Christian exceptionalism that "has guided all our progress" and made the Civil War proof of the nation's essential stability, others wondered whether the Civil War foretold more disruptions to come.³⁶

THE 1876 PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION raised the prospect that regional fragility would spread to the center, creating a two governments problem in Washington, D.C. The fears were neither historically nor analytically thin. The United States' long-term stability masks the institutional fragility of presidential democracy; absent effective power-sharing, the prospect of a plurality- or even minority-elected president frequently prompts violence in other single-executive democracies. Sherman, in fact, worried that he and the army would "be put into a position to choose between two presidents" in the electoral crisis.³⁷ At first this seemed unlikely. After the Panic of 1873 destroyed confidence in the Republicans, Democrats swept the 1874 midterms, reduced the size of the military, delayed appropriations for military pay, promised an end to federal oversight of the Reconstruction South, and were favored to win the White House. On election night, Tilden won a popular majority and appeared to have prevailed narrowly in the Electoral College, thanks in part to Democratic

³³ Chicago Tribune, April 9, 1876, 1, 12; Chicago Inter Ocean, April 10, 1876, 6–7; April 12, 1876, 1, 8; May 13, 1876, 8; May 23, 1876, 5; May 26, 1876, 8; Richard Schneirov, Labor and Urban Politics: Class Conflict and the Origins of Modern Liberalism in Chicago, 1864–97 (Urbana, Ill., 1998), chap. 2.

³⁴ Baltimore Sun, August 6, 1867, 2.

³⁵ Samuel Smith Nicholas, Conservative Essays, Legal and Political, vol. 3: Reconstruction, Georgia & Mississippi Cases, Civil Rights Act, Cotton Tax, &c. (Louisville, 1867), 115, 186.

³⁶ Middletown, Conn., Daily Constitution, June 26, 1876, 2; Frederick Saunders, ed., Our National Centennial Jubilee: Orations, Addresses and Poems Delivered on the Fourth of July, 1876—In the Several States of the Union (New York, 1877), 17–18, 49–51; Philadelphia Inquirer, December 1, 1876, 2; Susan-Mary Grant, "Americans Forging a New Nation, 1860–1916," in Don H. Doyle and Marco Antonio Pamplona, eds., Nationalism in the New World (Athens, Ga., 2006), 80–98; Edward J. Blum, Reforging the White Republic: Race, Religion, and American Nationalism, 1865–1898 (Baton Rouge, La., 2005); Nicholas Guyatt, Providence and the Invention of the United States, 1607–1876 (New York, 2007).

³⁷ William T. Sherman to John Sherman, January 19, 1877, Reel 23, William T. Sherman Papers, LoC.

intimidation of black southern Republicans. Encouraged by Republican observers, however, officials in Louisiana, South Carolina, and Florida used evidence of Democratic fraud to discount enough votes to tilt their states—and the White House—to Hayes.³⁸

The nation's fragility had its roots not just in ephemeral losses of legitimacy or popular recourse to violence but, like many state stability crises, in basic institutional breakdown. The Constitution seemed to offer too few or too many recourses for a disputed election. With the Senate still heavily Republican, the House of Representatives Democratic, both parties could plausibly chart a course to the White House. When Louisiana, South Carolina, Florida, and Oregon sent competing electoral returns to Washington, Republicans argued that the president of the Senate's power to count the electoral votes gave him the right to determine which votes counted. Democrats claimed that the House of Representatives' constitutional authority to settle unresolved elections empowered that body to determine whether an election had been resolved. Throughout November, December, and January, the prospect that each house might name a different president raised real fears of a partisan civil war, a concern expressed largely through the term "Mexicanization."

Once again, a particular actor played a key role in tying together available, but not inevitable, strands of discourse. At a celebrated pre-election address in October 1876, Cincinnati Commercial editor Murat "Field Marshal" Halstead made the presidential campaign a test of Mexicanization. Having been cut from the party's innermost circles for disloyalty in 1872, Halstead now leapt at the chance to rally the wavering Republican base at a mass meeting at New York's Cooper Institute. There, in a line that was reprinted and distributed across the country, he warned that a close result could "reduce the American Republic to the grade of Mexico." The lesson of the Civil War "that should never depart from us is, that the American people have no exemption from the ordinary fate of humanity." Halstead explored the interrelationship between institutional, social, and financial fragility. Institutional breakdown threatened financial confidence, thus prompting further institutional breakdown and even more popular alienation. At first his hyperbolic claim that Tilden would bankrupt the United States through Confederate war claims created the most controversy. Both Hayes's and Tilden's closest advisers considered that argument the campaign's pièce de résistance. After the election, however, attention turned to Halstead's other prediction, that a civil war would result from a "strangely overlooked" institutional failing: the lack of a mechanism to resolve presidential succession crises. For several months, the crisis suggested the power of Halstead's warning that a "disputed Presidential election would Mexicanize us."³⁹

³⁸ In Oregon, Democrats contested one Republican elector who they argued was disqualified on technical grounds.

³⁹ Murat Halstead, The War Claims of the South: The New Southern Confederacy, with the Democratic Party as Its Claim Agency, Demanding Indemnity for Conquest, and Threatening a Disputed Presidential Election—The Candidacy of Hayes and the Relief of the Republic from Danger (Cincinnati, 1876), 3, 5, 9, 36, 37; Rutherford Hayes to Murat Halstead, October 14, 1876, Box 1, Folder 7, Cincinnati History Library and Archives, Cincinnati Museum Center, Cincinnati, Ohio; Halstead to Hayes, September 19, 1876, Rutherford B. Hayes Papers, Rutherford B. Hayes Presidential Center [hereafter RBHPC], Fremont, Ohio; Charles A. Boynton to William Henry Smith, October 22, 1876, Box 3, Folder 4, William Henry Smith Papers, Manuscript Collections, MSS 2, Ohio Historical Society Archives/Library, Columbus, Ohio; Richard Jacobs Haldeman to August Belmont, October 31, 1876, Box 7, Catalogued

Halstead's metaphor provoked a complex, divided response that placed the problem of fragility at the center of public discussion. In the first weeks of the crisis, he repeatedly charged Democrats with "Mexican statesmanship," and fellow newspapers in the Western Associated Press—including the Chicago Tribune and the Louisville Courier-Journal—advanced, mocked, refuted, and analyzed his analogy.⁴⁰ His Democratic interlocutors, led by the Indianapolis Sentinel, turned the charge back upon the Republicans, especially the allegedly dictatorial President Grant, the man best "calculated to Mexicanize the government." Only a Tilden victory would "rescue the country from being still further Mexicanized."⁴¹ As the discourse circulated, journalists worried that a "pronunciamento" from Tilden's Gramercy Park mansion would drive the country "deep in civil war," and businessmen complained that "a Mexicanized administration means the disorder and thriftlessness of Mexico."⁴² The discourse was simultaneously reductive and open-ended, both arrogantly insulting and also revealingly vulnerable. U.S. writers rarely used Mexicanization to signify positive attributes, but they did deploy it to suggest common, unflattering characteristics. Mexico was distinct but accessible, what the United States might be but could not permit itself to become. The more contemplative Nation, foreshadowing the work of later interpreters, turned from institutional to social explanations, defining Mexicanization as a "particular state of mind," the absence of a popular culture of constitutionalism or republicanism. Only good "habits of legality" could prevent instability. Southern violence, in turn, threatened exactly those habits. "We have not cured the South, we have ourselves caught the contagion." During this period, rigid, biological racism rarely overtook the discourse. Even when critics dismissed the comparison between the United States and Mexico, they usually distinguished between the countries on the basis of environmental, cultural, religious, and historical traits, not race.⁴³

The discourse remained pervious to outside events; rather than a linguistic hall of mirrors, it was a chamber that diffused and altered, but did not exclude, external light. When Mexican general Porfirio Díaz overthrew President Sebastián Lerdo de Tejada in the middle of the United States' electoral crisis, U.S. writers immediately extended the analogies. Although Díaz's victory actually created stabilization—the nearly forty-year dictatorship known as the Porfiriato—U.S. journalists initially seized upon the overthrow as a reminder of Mexican instability. With a nod to the discourse's description of a political status, not an inherent condition, the Philadelphia Inquirer described the turmoil in a peculiar way. "Mexico has been Mexicanized," the newspaper wrote when Lerdo de Tejada fled Mexico City.⁴⁴ In January

Correspondence, Belmont Family Papers, Rare Book and Manuscript Library, Columbia University, New York City; "A Change to Democratic Rule: What It Means—Hints and Facts for Independent Voters," Pamphlet Collection, Patricia D. Klingenstein Library, New-York Historical Society, New York City, 4; Entry, November 11, 1876, vol. 50, John Bigelow Papers, New York Public Library, Manuscripts and Archives Division [hereafter NYPL]; Donald W. Curl, Murat Halstead and the Cincinnati Commercial (Boca Raton, Fla., 1980).

⁴⁰ Cincinnati Commercial, December 4, 1876, 4.

⁴¹ Indianapolis Sentinel, November 21, 1876, 4.

⁴² Cincinnati Daily Gazette, November 24, 1876, 4; Wheeling, W.Va., Daily Register, December 29, 1876, 1.

⁴³ "What Is 'Mexicanization'?" The Nation, December 21, 1876, 365–366.

⁴⁴ Philadelphia Inquirer, December 9, 1876, 4.

1877, when Lerdo de Tejada arrived in the United States, the Baltimore Sun suggested that he give lectures on Mexicanization to “show our people, in his own person, the inevitable result of trifling with constitutions and laws, and permitting the military to override the civil power.”⁴⁵

While it is important not to overstate the meaning of overheated political rhetoric, the discourse was not mere hysterics. That these predictions turned out to be wrong does not prove that they were foolish. Those widespread misjudgments, as Jonathan Scott wrote about similar English fears, were “themselves historical phenomena requiring explanation.”⁴⁶ In the United States, worries that “the air is full of coming trouble” were legion, held not just by the conspiratorially minded but by many leading politicians.⁴⁷ One of Hayes’s strongest supporters, former senator Carl Schurz, privately warned him against pressing his case too firmly for fear of instigating “the Mexicanization of our government!”⁴⁸ On Tilden’s side, his confidant John Bigelow, former consul to France, wrote in his diary that “another civil war may be the consequence of this state of things and we may enter upon the next century under a diff. Form of govt. from that of which for nearly a century we have been boasting.”⁴⁹ More widely, a southern Democrat worried about a “bloody revolution”; a West Point commander dreaded “anarchy”; a former attorney general feared that “the days of our republic are numbered”; a Texan pledged to recruit “hundreds + thousands” of fellow Union veterans to defend Hayes’s title; a Tilden supporter promised that if the Republicans wanted “‘blood-letting,’ we will oblige”; a Virginia woman lived “in a lamentable state of uncertainty” as “war of the most deadly kind, is inevitable”; and Missouri’s governor dispatched two prominent men to tell Tilden that the state would “fight” to defend his inauguration.⁵⁰ Against these possibilities, President Grant called several companies of troops to garrison Washington, D.C., ordered naval batteries to protect the capital’s bridges, and reopened Civil War forts.⁵¹ These contemporary judgments lend weight to participants’ retrospective views that, as one congressman wrote, “perhaps the greatest peril that the Republic had encountered was not that of the Civil War” but the crisis of 1876.⁵² Only careful maneuvering prevented “anarchy and open war,” a senator later claimed.⁵³ James

⁴⁵ Baltimore Sun, January 11, 1877, 2.

⁴⁶ Scott, England’s Troubles, 2–3.

⁴⁷ W. Dennison to Bristow, January 9, 1877, Box 7, Benjamin H. Bristow Papers, LoC.

⁴⁸ Carl Schurz to Hayes, January 12, 1877, Hayes Papers, RBHPC.

⁴⁹ Entry, November 11, 1876, vol. 50, Bigelow Papers, NYPL.

⁵⁰ Gideon J. Pillow to Tilden, November 14, 1876, Box 20, Folder 26, Samuel J. Tilden Papers, NYPL; John Schofield to William T. Sherman, December 26, 1876, Reel 25, William T. Sherman Papers, LoC; R. E. Goodell to Tilden, January 13, 1877, Box 12, Folder 34, Tilden Papers, NYPL; W. A. Crafts to William E. Chandler, January 17, 1877, Container 43, William E. Chandler Papers, LoC; Henry L. Fish to Tilden, February 24, 1877, Box 11, Folder 60, Tilden Papers, NYPL; James M. Scovel to Tilden, November 14, 1876, February 26, 1877, Box 22, Folder 19, Tilden Papers, NYPL; Mother to Dear Frank, November 13, 1876, Box 2, Noland Family Papers, 2718-d, Special Collections Department, University of Virginia Library, Charlottesville, Va.; C. H. Hardin to Tilden, December 13, 1876, Box 13, Folder 32, Tilden Papers, NYPL.

⁵¹ W. T. Sherman to Col. J. C. Audenreid, November 18, 1876, William T. Sherman Collection, RBHPC; Morris, Fraud of the Century, 173–174.

⁵² James Monroe, “The Hayes-Tilden Electoral Commission,” Atlantic Monthly, October 1893, 523, 524, 537.

⁵³ George F. Edmunds, “Another View of ‘The Hayes-Tilden Contest’: A Reply to Colonel Waterson in the May ‘Century’ by Ex-Senator George F. Edmunds, the Sole Surviving Member of the Electoral Commission,” The Century Illustrated Monthly Magazine, May 1913, 195–200.

Ford Rhodes, an industrialist who would later become a historian, believed that “any one, who lived through the days in an observing and reflective mood, or any one, who will now make a careful study of the contemporary evidence, cannot avoid the conviction that the country was on the verge of civil war.”⁵⁴

When viewed as a moment of state fragility, the election’s aftermath looks different. Historians have discounted these anxieties by emphasizing two periods in which there were harsh words but little institutional drive for armed conflict—the early weeks when the southern states were recounting the ballots and the last weeks after the commission began to meet. During the two-month interim between those events, however, there was no obvious path to compromise. Fear shattered the unitary vision of the nation and produced a series of fantastic but not wholly unrealistic doubled images, visions of dual presidents, dual capitals, and dual armies. One of the most provocative rumors was that Tilden planned to stage a counter-inauguration in New York City. Backed by a line of Democratic state militias from Connecticut to Virginia, he would seize the federal Treasury Building in New York, fund his government through customs collections in the harbor, and force Hayes from the capital to his own shadow republic in the Midwest.⁵⁵ These fantastic notions played upon older fragilities in the nation’s territorial control, especially longstanding tensions between its financial and political capitals; early in the 1861 secession crisis, New York mayor Fernando Wood had urged the city to declare its independence from the United States. Of course, this view of dual capitals was fanciful. If Tilden gained title from the House of Representatives, he did indeed plan to risk court-martial or execution by staging a counter-inauguration; he would have made the attempt, however, in Washington, not New York.⁵⁶ Although he did not intend to launch a first strike, privately Tilden began to prepare two intertwined cases that would box Republicans into a corner. First he defended the House’s right to name him president, a necessary prelude to any claim he could make on the office. Next he asserted a state’s right to forcefully resist a usurper’s inauguration. While Congress would elude Tilden’s control, he had better luck close to home. New York governor Lucius Robinson’s January inaugural included a Tilden-drafted section promising state resistance to the “revolutionary” overthrow of “the time-consecrated methods of constitutional government.”⁵⁷

The fractured vision of dual presidents and dual capitals also produced, in both imagination and reality, a counter-military led by George B. McClellan.⁵⁸ The leading Union general for much of the first two years of the Civil War, and an 1864 presidential candidate who lost to Lincoln, McClellan campaigned for his longtime

⁵⁴ James Ford Rhodes, History of the United States from the Compromise of 1850 to the McKinley-Bryan Campaign of 1896, vol. 7: 1872–1877 (New York, 1920), 243, 284.

⁵⁵ L. C. Weir to Hayes, February 7, 1877, Hayes Papers, RBHPC; John Bigelow, ed., Letters and Literary Memorials of Samuel J. Tilden, 2 vols. (New York, 1908), 2: 491.

⁵⁶ John Bigelow, The Life of Samuel J. Tilden, 2 vols. (New York, 1895), 2: 115.

⁵⁷ Annual Message of the Governor of the State of New York, Transmitted to the Legislature, January 2, 1877 (Albany, 1877), 37–39; Entry, January 4, 1877, vol. 50, Bigelow Papers, NYPL.

⁵⁸ Although McClellan’s letters at the Library of Congress are frequently read by Civil War historians, no scholar of the 1876–1877 electoral crisis has utilized them, precisely because the questions that lead to his papers are not relevant within national political frameworks of the betrayal of democracy. While McClellan’s biographer noted some of McClellan’s actions, political historians have barely noticed his presence during the crisis. Stephen W. Sears, George B. McClellan: The Young Napoleon (New York, 1988), 393–396.

ally Tilden across the Northeast and Midwest in 1876, urging his “fellow-citizens and fellow-soldiers” to resist any Republican effort to block Tilden’s inauguration.⁵⁹ Privately he warned his mother that any effort to deny Tilden the office “must be forcible + revolutionary + must be met by force.”⁶⁰ Although fighting words are common, McClellan’s history raises interesting questions about the boundaries between politics and the military. Fifteen years earlier, during the Civil War, many people had called on McClellan, in his telling, to “save the nation, alluding to the presidency, dictatorship, etc.” But for his love for his wife, he wrote, he might “cheerfully take the dictatorship and agree to lay down my life when the country is saved.”⁶¹ After the 1876 election, Tilden asked Governor Robinson to name McClellan the state adjutant general “in view of possible contingencies.” Following Robinson from Tilden’s mansion, Bigelow urged the governor to wait, as McClellan’s command of the state militia “would be a red rag to Republicans.” But Bigelow’s response was strategic. Rather than denying McClellan, he convinced the governor to “reserve” the selection until it would have more impact. Bigelow’s response to the event is telling. “The fact that we have to contemplate such emergencies, is a melancholy commentary upon the anniversary we have been celebrating,” he wrote. “The chances are by no means inconsiderable that our form of govt. may not survive another 4 of July without serious modifications, the results of a perhaps bloody strife.”⁶²

As institutional processes for resolving politics broke down, new openings emerged for counter-mobilization. McClellan began to construct what appears to have been a paramilitary organization. Because he did not save his outgoing correspondence during this period, his actions must be deciphered by reading between the lines of his incoming letters. Some are evocative but not reliable, full of vague bragging that “a little bit of war to inaugurate Mr. Tilden would do us no harm . . . speak the word, and you will have a hundred thousand ‘boys in blue’ and in everything else, armed, at Washington by Sunday.”⁶³ Far-flung soldiers promised that they were willing to “fight and die” under McClellan’s banner.⁶⁴ More revealing, however, are letters from men working with him to organize such a resistance, including former Confederate general Dabney Maury, one of McClellan’s West Point instructors. Maury urged McClellan to produce “a pose of moral and physical power too great to dare,” discussed strategic allocations of divisions, brigades, and regiments, and warned McClellan to hold units in reserve for later combat.⁶⁵ In Massachusetts, former Union brigadier general John M. Tobin gathered an estimated 5,000 veterans into a Conservative Soldiers and Sailors Association. Tobin made tantalizing references to unnamed “potent considerations set forth” in a lost letter from McClellan. “The few who have seen it open their eyes wide, and it nerves them on . . . Any movement to which you may lend your name . . . would be the signal for arousing

⁵⁹ Speeches of Gen. George B. McClellan during the Presidential Campaign of 1876 (Philadelphia, 1877), 58–59.

⁶⁰ McClellan to My Dearest Mother, November 1876, Reel 56, McClellan Papers, LoC.

⁶¹ George B. McClellan, McClellan’s Own Story: The War for the Union, the Soldiers Who Fought It, the Civilians Who Directed It, and His Relations to It and to Them, ed. W. C. Prime (New York, 1887), 82–85.

⁶² Entry, November 22, 1876, vol. 50, Bigelow Papers, NYPL.

⁶³ E Pluribus Unum to McClellan, February 27, 1877, Reel 38, McClellan Papers, LoC.

⁶⁴ Henry C. de Alma to McClellan, November 29, 1876, February 6, 1877, ibid.

⁶⁵ Dabney H. Maury to McClellan, November 3, 1876, January 22, 1877, ibid.

en masse here all the conservative soldiers and sailors.”⁶⁶ Although these letters give shape to rumors of paramilitary mobilization across the country, McClellan’s intent is impossible to define precisely. His New York office complained of a shortage of funds, a constant problem for people who worked with the legendarily cheap (and personally wealthy) Tilden. “As far as I can see I am personally stuck for the office room,” the general in charge of the New York office wrote. “To do a thing of this kind without money is quite absurd.”⁶⁷

For U.S. historians, the story of a Tilden-McClellan paramilitary organization demonstrates that stabilization was contingent upon the candidates’ behavior. Here Tilden’s aggressive actions conflict with contemporary and historical portrayals of his caution. Had Tilden claimed the position immediately, “his election would have been a matter of course,” Bigelow wrote. “But it was impossible. A man who must have a man rub him every morning & evening for an hour or so, who must take a clyster every morning to get a passage . . . how could such a man be expected to [demand the presidency] and wind up perhaps at the last in a prison?” Hyperbolic Democratic editor Henry Watterson said that he had been willing to “provide the physical means” of “seating [Tilden] in office,” but Tilden was hamstrung by his “confidence in the powers and forms of law.”⁶⁸ The candidate’s public silence frustrated financier August Belmont, who urged “radical boldness and recklessness” and “a revolutionary . . . fight.” With a careful eye to sequence, it is possible to reconcile the evidence for both Tilden’s caution and his boldness. Tilden’s reticence was calculated to increase pressure at a different moment, after the Democratic House of Representatives named him president.⁶⁹ By refusing to threaten civil war in December, he was increasing the possibility that it might eventually come later, once two presidents had title. When Democratic congressmen threatened to derail his plan by considering a compromise, his passivity evaporated. “No need of hot haste but much danger in it,” he wrote in a midnight draft memo. The Republicans had “no way out but by usurpation.”⁷⁰ Tilden lobbied congressional Democrats to simply count him the winner. When Democratic chairman Abram Hewitt told Tilden that House Democrats in fact planned to accede to an electoral commission to resolve the dispute, Tilden asked incredulously, “Why surrender now? Why surrender before the battle, for fear you may have to surrender after the battle is over?”⁷¹

As Congress compromised on a fifteen-man electoral commission to count the disputed votes, the crisis pivoted from fragility to stabilization. “Overpressed by exaggerated fears” of Mexicanization and civil war, Tilden fumed, Congress moved toward an institutional solution.⁷² Thinking about Congress’s fears means looking

⁶⁶ John M. Tobin to McClellan, December 15, 1876, January 8, 1877, ibid.

⁶⁷ William F. Smith to McClellan, December 30, 1876, ibid.

⁶⁸ Entry, April 1, 1877, vol. 50, Bigelow Papers, NYPL.

⁶⁹ Irving Katz, August Belmont: A Political Biography (New York, 1968), 225, 228, 231.

⁷⁰ Drafts and original of telegram to William Pelton, January 17, 1877, Box 1, Folder 8, Tilden Papers, NYPL.

⁷¹ Henry Watterson, “The Hayes-Tilden Contest for the Presidency: Inside History of a Great Political Crisis,” The Century Illustrated Monthly Magazine, May 1913, 14–20; Joseph Medill to William Henry Smith, January 3, 1877, Box 12, Folder WAP Letters (Signed by Medill), Joseph Medill Papers, Series III-9, Tribune Company Archives, Colonel Robert R. McCormick Research Center, First Division Museum at Cantigny, Wheaton, Ill.

⁷² Bigelow, The Life of Samuel J. Tilden, 2: 79–80.

past hermetically sealed histories of the important but not fully determinative efforts of railroad lobbyists and southern Democrats in fashioning the compromise. Congressmen were motivated not just by horse-trading but by a climate of fear. Although both Hayes and Tilden lobbied for brinksmanship, congressmen were not so sure, especially as their actions were tied publicly to Mexicanization. Halstead again led the charge, denouncing Democratic talk of a House declaration as “Mexican statesmanship,” a claim repeated by Republican newspapers across the country.⁷³ Some Democrats, in turn, advanced the discourse by using Mexicanization to scare stalwart Republicans from naming Hayes through the Senate. At January indignation meetings, Democratic orators compared Grant and Hayes to “the military chieftains of Mexico,” and asked, “Who is Mexicanized? Who is sending armies into the South?”⁷⁴

The process of stabilization turned in the United States, as it had in England, on the exclusion of some conflicts from politics. “All our papers and public men declare there must be no war,” Democrats complained, and were therefore creating the “illusion” that compromise was “the only alternative to civil war.”⁷⁵ The charges, they said, narrowed their choices to “violence” and “submission to a wrong.”⁷⁶ Democratic congressmen acknowledged that they believed in Tilden’s case but turned to compromise because they were “not prepared” to heighten the “existing debasement of political sentiment” by risking “armed power.”⁷⁷ “Civil war would have probably been the result,” a New York congressman wrote.⁷⁸ Party leader Abram Hewitt, whom Tilden blamed for his defeat, lobbied for acquiescence during the crisis “because four years of civil war would, in my opinion, utterly destroy constitutional government for this generation at least.”⁷⁹ Mexicanization had at once raised and then foreclosed the possibility of dissolution. “The question was whether the American Republic should be Mexicanized; and the establishment of the Commission answered the question in the negative,” Halstead celebrated.⁸⁰ After an unexpected switch in personnel, the electoral commission, by a one-vote margin, granted every contested electoral vote to Hayes, thus giving him the White House. This raised a second potential crisis, as some House Democrats threatened to filibuster beyond Inauguration Day to “force a new election,” but Hewitt, other leaders, and lobbyists urged Democrats to surrender.⁸¹ The management of the crisis proved not the impossibility of violence but the institutional capacity to lessen tension by delay. With stabilization at the top came the end of the two governments problem in the South, as Republican state governments in Louisiana and South Carolina soon dissolved, leaving Democratic challengers in office.

The successful resolution of the crisis led U.S. editors and politicians to both

⁷³ Cincinnati Commercial, December 4, 1876, 4.

⁷⁴ Cincinnati Commercial, January 9, 1877, 1–2, 4, 8.

⁷⁵ William P. Chambliss to McClellan, January 15, 1877, Reel 38, McClellan Papers, LoC; Bigelow, The Life of Samuel J. Tilden, 2: 77.

⁷⁶ Cincinnati Commercial, December 21, 1876, 1–2.

⁷⁷ Hiester Clymer to McClellan, January 23, 1877, Reel 56, McClellan Papers, LoC.

⁷⁸ Francis Kernan to Tilden, March 12, 1877, Box 15, Folder 53, Tilden Papers, NYPL.

⁷⁹ Bigelow, Letters and Literary Memorials of Samuel J. Tilden, 550–552, 562–565.

⁸⁰ Cincinnati Commercial, February 6, 1877, 4.

⁸¹ Alphonso Taft to Hayes, February 14, 1877, Hayes Papers, RBHPC; Carter Harrison III to Carter Harrison IV, February 24, 1877, Carter H. Harrison III, Outgoing Correspondence, Box 21, Folder 1068, Series 17, Carter H. Harrison IV Papers, Midwest Manuscript Collection, The Newberry Library, Chicago.

naturalize and mystify stabilization by tying it to the continuity of social norms. Like early modern Spanish monarchs, these stabilizers buried discontinuity in portrayals of continuity, diminishing the impact of their institutional efforts by making open-ended claims of an inherent social stability that the government enjoyed but did not create. Many now saw the discourse of Mexicanization as both available and inconceivable, an un-American path the United States had once threatened to walk. By engaging with Mexican analogies, they created an anti-exceptionalist basis for reconstructing U.S. distinctiveness, moving from an exceptionalism of the Americas back to an American exceptionalism. Although evangelical revivalism, the consolidation of national markets, cultural productions of Americanness, and an expansive foreign policy also contributed, the resolution of the electoral crisis played a key role in spurring this return of exceptionalist claims. To Hayes and many other Republicans, it was “the first example in history” of a nation that was able to peaceably resolve “conflicting claims to the Presidency” through “the forms of law.”⁸² “In nearly every other country,” historian Rhodes wrote, the conflict “must inevitably have led to civil war.”⁸³ The “self-control exhibited by the nation under the great excitement” proved that “an impassable gulf separates our methods and policies from those of the Spanish States of this continent,” a congressman claimed.⁸⁴ Democrats, however, were less sanguine about both the outcome and U.S. exceptionalism. To them, Hayes had “not only Mexicanized the United States but has more than Mexicanized it.” The Indianapolis Sentinel pondered and then discounted racist views of Mexicans. “Their inferiority does not appear in the matter of tolerating a fraud for a ruler—in this regard the United States stands considerably in advance of any country, nation, or tribe, from hottentot to the most advanced nation on earth.”⁸⁵

AS MEXICAN ANALOGIES SPREAD widely through the United States, many Mexican politicians seem to have turned away from the comparison. Throughout the 1860s, Mexican Liberals made use of the analogy they had fashioned. When U.S. editors and politicians derided Juárez’s suspension of elections and civil rights, Mexican journalists pointed toward Grant’s own suspension of habeas corpus. The two nations were fighting common fragilities, undergoing correspondingly fraught stabilization processes.⁸⁶ This contested but two-sided analogizing continued into the 1870s. When New Orleans merchants attributed Mexican fragility to cultural failings, a U.S. consul responded with a thorough historical examination of the role of European powers, the Catholic Church, and landed interests in undermining the Mexican state. Diario Oficial in turn praised the consul’s “historical exactness.”⁸⁷ During the fraught debates in Mexico’s congress about railroad concessions in January 1874, Deputy

⁸² Cincinnati Commercial, March 6, 1877, 4.

⁸³ Rhodes, History of the United States, 7: 243, 284.

⁸⁴ Monroe, “The Hayes-Tilden Electoral Commission,” 523, 524, 537.

⁸⁵ Indianapolis Sentinel, March 27, 1877, 4.

⁸⁶ Executive Documents Printed by Order of the House of Representatives, during the Second Session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, 1866–’67, 16 vols. (Washington, D.C., 1867), 1: 393–400.

⁸⁷ Executive Documents Printed by Order of the House of Representatives, 1873–’74, 17 vols. (Washington, D.C., 1874), 1: 649–653; Richard N. Sinkin, The Mexican Reform, 1855–1876: A Study in Liberal

Estanislao Cañedo claimed that the two nations now had common interests based on shared liberal “principles.” Opponents of the United States were drawing upon outdated analogies, “which can exist only in the minds of those who do not remember the laborious transformation which has taken place in both nations during the past thirty years.”⁸⁸ But 1877 border conflicts threatened the nations’ relations and the potential for open-ended analogizing. The unfounded fear that Díaz might disrupt railroad concessions and Texans’ complaints about border insecurity prompted Hayes to authorize soldiers to cross unilaterally into Mexican territory. In turn, political opinion in Mexico turned sharply against the United States, as editors and intellectuals shelved the more optimistic language of the 1860s and early 1870s, complaining that the U.S. treated them “as savages, as Kaffirs of Africa.”⁸⁹ As rumors swirled about U.S. expansionism, and as the threat of external European intervention declined, nuanced comparisons largely gave way to suspicion, even as Díaz’s government pursued economic ties to the United States.

Historians of the United States often use another significant post-election event, the Great Strike of the summer of 1877, to look eastward toward Europe for models of class conflict, but some contemporaries saw those strikes as a continuation of domestic fragility, not a Europeanization of the country.⁹⁰ Starting in Martinsburg, West Virginia, when crowds blocked police from arresting railroad workers, the strikes spread along rail lines to Baltimore, Pittsburgh, Chicago, San Francisco, and other cities. In Chicago, recently organized Union veterans killed thirty strikers before soldiers called back from the Sioux War restored order. While some editors explicitly blamed European immigrants for carrying the contagion of anarchy westward, others, including Halstead, located the roots of the violence not in economic transformation but in the “disturbing tendencies” of the Civil War, “which disorganized and changed us more than we apprehended while about it. When the armies were disbanded and marched home, there were senses in which the war was not over.”⁹¹ Instead of treating the Great Strike as a new phenomenon demanding external explanation, Halstead incorporated the strikes into struggles over sovereignty, governance, and the role of violence in politics. He no doubt underplayed the role of industrial class conflict in the Great Strike, but he also anticipated recent schol-

Nation-Building (Austin, Tex., 1979); Charles A. Hale, The Transformation of Liberalism in Late Nineteenth-Century Mexico (Princeton, N.J., 1989), 37–46.

⁸⁸ Executive Documents Printed by Order of the House of Representatives, 1874–’75, 18 vols. (Washington, D.C., 1875), 1: 724–725.

⁸⁹ Papers Relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States, Transmitted to Congress, with the Annual Message of the President, December 3, 1877 (Washington, D.C., 1877), xvi–xvii, 409–413; James Morton Callahan, American Foreign Policy in Mexican Relations (1932; repr., New York, 1967), 343–351; Robert D. Gregg, The Influence of Border Troubles on Relations between the United States and Mexico, 1876–1910 (New York, 1970), 18–33, 93; Daniel Cosío Villegas, The United States versus Porfirio Díaz, trans. Nettie Lee Benson (Lincoln, Neb., 1963), 56–57; John Mason Hart, Empire and Revolution: The Americans in Mexico since the Civil War (Berkeley, Calif., 2002), chaps. 1–4; Samuel Truett, Fugitive Landscapes: The Forgotten History of the U.S.-Mexico Borderlands (New Haven, Conn., 2006); Rachel St. John, Line in the Sand: A History of the Western U.S.-Mexico Border (Princeton, N.J., 2011).

⁹⁰ Nell Irvin Painter, Standing at Armageddon: The United States, 1877–1919 (New York, 1987), 18–24; Sven Beckert, The Monied Metropolis: New York City and the Consolidation of the American Bourgeoisie, 1850–1896 (New York, 2001), 180; Eric Foner, Reconstruction: America’s Unfinished Revolution, 1863–1877 (New York, 1988), 585.

⁹¹ Cincinnati Commercial, July 24, 1877, 4.

arship that places the uprising within long-term traditions of local mobbing. While European models partly explain the strikes, the uprisings also demonstrate the ongoing American challenge of restraining public violence in the postwar era, or—in Halstead's terms—correcting the “disturbing tendencies” of the Civil War.⁹²

If statecraft started the process of stabilization, a new set of crises in 1878 demonstrated that statecraft could also reverse it. Seeking an issue for the November midterms, New York Democratic congressman Clarkson Potter created a special committee to investigate fraud in the 1876 presidential election. Halstead and other frightened Republicans immediately tried to restrain the committee of “revolutionary” “MEXICANS” by ridiculing “Don Santa Anna Pottero” and denouncing his “Mexican method.”⁹³ Writers located fragility in the same social realm they had recently celebrated. Against readers who wondered “What Mexicanized Means,” the Chicago Daily Tribune warned that “a single departure from this rule will throw the country into all the confusion, anarchy, civil war, and instability characteristic of Mexican Government.” Although the editorial included an offhand sneer at “greasers,” it explicitly discounted the idea that the United States would be saved by its innate racial superiority.⁹⁴ The Nation again looked for deeper causes of Mexicanization in “a state of mind, a way of looking at political affairs, which makes civil war always possible.” Too much talk of Mexicanization, it warned, could create the condition; only the habit of silence—the narrowing of political dispute—could prevent it.⁹⁵ Again Democrats decried Republicans as Mexicanizers, and, more rigorously, they attacked the analogy by inverting it, making the “mixed” and “half breed” Mexicans exemplars of bravery for hunting down Maximilian, while the cowardly United States acceded to Hayes's usurpation.⁹⁶ When leading figures such as Charles Francis Adams and Alexander Stephens used the discourse to publicly discipline congressional Democrats away from “the Mexicanization of our Federal Republic” and “the pronunciamientos and chronic anarchy which have made the Mexican Republic a byword among the nations,” the pressure once again worked.⁹⁷ The committee blinked, affirming “the irrefragability of Hayes' title.” Instead the committee investigated coded telegrams suggesting that Tilden's nephew had clumsily tried to bribe southern politicians. Democrats had been “bulldozed by the thieves' howl of ‘Revolution’ and ‘Mexicanization,’” what one newspaper called “a cover . . . to scare weak-kneed and lukewarm Democrats.”⁹⁸ The following year, Mexicanization helped explain competing governors and militias in Maine. While the New York

⁹² “The Insurrection among the Railway Employees of the United States, and the Losses in Pittsburgh Resulting Therefrom, in July, 1877: Memorial of the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce, to the Pennsylvania Legislature” (Pittsburgh, 1877), Pamphlet Collection, Patricia D. Klingenstein Library, New-York Historical Society, 3, 5, 9, 10, 12, 14; Richard Schneirov, “Chicago's Great Upheaval of 1877: Class Polarization and Democratic Politics,” in David O. Stowell, ed., The Great Strikes of 1877 (Urbana, Ill., 2008), 80, 85, 87, 90, 97; Michael Kazin, “The July Days in San Francisco, 1877: Prelude to Kearneyism,” ibid., 136–163.

⁹³ Cincinnati Commercial, May 17, 1878, 4; May 20, 1878, 4; May 23, 1878, 6; Cincinnati Daily Gazette, May 24, 1878, 4; Chicago Inter Ocean, May 29, 1878, 1; New York Herald, April 17, 1878, 6; May 18, 1878, 6.

⁹⁴ Chicago Daily Tribune, May 23, 1878, 4; May 25, 1878, 4.

⁹⁵ The Nation, June 13, 1878, 382–385.

⁹⁶ Indianapolis Sentinel, May 25, 1878, 4; May 27, 1878, 4.

⁹⁷ New York Herald, April 27, 1878, 6.

⁹⁸ Washington Post, June 20, 1878, 2; Georgia Weekly Telegraph, June 4, 1878, 4.

Commercial Advertiser remained confident because “the Maine people are Americans, not Mexicans,” the Worcester Gazette worried that a disruption in “an old New England state like Maine” foreshadowed “the Mexicanizing of the country and the ruin of the republic.”⁹⁹ The 1881 assassination of President James Garfield initially prompted speculation “that this nation is becoming Mexicanized,” but the ensuing unity quickly proved that “we are not a Mexicanized people.”¹⁰⁰ By fashioning continuity amid discontinuous political circumstances, these stabilizers located American exceptionalism in the country’s stability, and its stability in its social norms.

Ironies about Mexicanization abound. The discourse flourished during what in retrospect was a period of dual stabilization. In diagnosing the potential for collapse, Mexicanization served to foreclose that possibility. The two nations followed different, but related, paths toward stabilization. In both countries, stabilization was tied to the retraction of democracy, in Mexico through the creation of a one-party dictatorship in the Porfiriato, in the United States through violent Democratic domination of southern freedpeople and, eventually, widespread disfranchisement. The transformation of Mexico altered the terms of comparison, sometimes even prompting open-ended lists of aspects “in which we could stand Mexicanizing.”¹⁰¹ U.S. journalist C. Edwards Lester wrote a lengthy sociological examination, The Mexican Republic, to promote “An Universal Zollverein for the American Hemisphere.”¹⁰² By the 1880s, Mexicanization suggested the strength and stability of “every Spanish-American or Portuguese-American state” to minister and soldier Thomas Wentworth Higginson.¹⁰³ The bitter 1890s currency debates, however, unleashed sharper visions of racial and cultural superiority as Republicans charged Populists and Silver Democrats with “Mexicanizing” the money standard.¹⁰⁴ By the end of the century, the Spanish-American War, fears of immigration, and hardening biological racism prompted widespread, now-familiar racist visions of “the sluggish, indolent Mexican type.”¹⁰⁵ For one final moment, an aged Henry Watterson revitalized the old discourse in the early 1900s by comparing Theodore Roosevelt’s allegedly dictatorial ambitions to Díaz’s. When he was met with mockery, Watterson in turn derided the belief that “‘We’ are an exception to all experience and all rule.”¹⁰⁶ By 1913, Mexicanization was played for laughs in a Gridiron Club skit, in which a dictator modeled after Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan oversaw a “Mexicanized administration.”¹⁰⁷

⁹⁹ Quoted in Boston Globe, December 25, 1879, 1; Lowell, Mass., Daily Citizen, December 20, 1879, 2; Edward Nelson Dingley, The Life and Times of Nelson Dingley, Jr. (Kalamazoo, Mich., 1902), 149–167.

¹⁰⁰ Wheeling Register, July 8, 1881, 2; Washington Post, July 11, 1881, 4.

¹⁰¹ Austin, Tex., Texas Siftings, June 2, 1883, 8.

¹⁰² C. Edwards Lester, The Mexican Republic: An Historic Study (New York, 1878), 4, 6, 90–97, 104.

¹⁰³ Thomas Wentworth Higginson, “The School of Jingo,” The Chap-Book: Semi-Monthly, April 15, 1896, 505–507.

¹⁰⁴ Atlanta Constitution, September 27, 1896, 2; July 18, 1897, 18; Michael O’Malley, “Specie and Species: Race and the Money Question in Nineteenth-Century America,” American Historical Review 99, no. 2 (April 1994): 369–395; Nell Irvin Painter, “Thinking about the Languages of Money and Race: A Response to Michael O’Malley, ‘Specie and Species,’” ibid., 396–404; O’Malley, “Free Silver and the Constitution of Man,” Common-Place 6, no. 3 (April 2006), <http://www.common-place.org/vol-06/no-03/omalley/>; Daniel S. Margolies, Henry Watterson and the New South: The Politics of Empire, Free Trade, and Globalization (Lexington, Ky., 2006), 75.

¹⁰⁵ New Orleans Daily Picayune, July 21, 1891, 9.

¹⁰⁶ Quoted in Washington Post, May 27, 1902, 5.

¹⁰⁷ Atlanta Constitution, December 14, 1913, 1.

THE TWENTIETH-CENTURY UNITED STATES in fact proved exceptionally stable as it navigated fascism, communism, and political strains such as the 2000 Bush-Gore election. This image of a mighty nation casts an enormous shadow upon the nineteenth century. By looking at the late nineteenth century as something other than a prelude to the twentieth, it becomes possible to see the fragility that led people to fear another civil war alongside the forces that prevented such a conflict, and to observe the fluidity of views of Mexican politics, culture, religion, and history alongside the more rigid, biologically based racial ideologies of the next century. Mexicanization drew upon a broader, fragmentary idea of an age of republican crisis in which the American republics might stand together against a monarchical Europe that seemed no longer a model but rather a warning after the failed revolutions of 1848 and 1871. Still focused upon the centrality of political institutions, not class relations, many Americans looked not east but south for models, guides, and analytic openings. There were limits, of course, to this hemispheric vision. It did not include many nations, especially monarchical Brazil; it could be paternalistic and arrogant; and it did not survive the nineteenth century. Too often, however, transnationally inclined U.S. historians look to Europe for the circulation of ideas, and to Latin America for the movement of people and raw commodities.¹⁰⁸ Latin Americanists practicing hemispheric history in turn overemphasize divergence between Anglo and Spanish America in a nineteenth century sometimes overlooked in the rush from an intertwined eighteenth-century Atlantic world to twentieth-century U.S. dominance. Despite its limitations, the notion of a hemispheric circulation of republican ideas suggests the utility of chronologically extending Jorge Cañizares-Esguerra's project of "Iberianizing the Atlantic" to upset "the most cherished national narratives of the United States."¹⁰⁹

If the age of republican crisis proved transitory, the utility of Mexicanization for the study of state fragility and stabilization is more enduring. By denaturalizing the United States' path to stability, scholars can build more useful analyses of how, when, and why states become fragile and then stabilize. Making a now-powerful state an exemplar of fragility can rescue failed state theory from its Western triumphalism and provide historical models for the interaction of institutions, public confidence, and social norms in processes of stabilization. Institutional solutions, particularly the electoral commission, were central to the process of stabilization. Although it is easy to emphasize the importance of popular legitimacy, the resolution of the crisis reinforces modern political scientists' observation that low levels of popular legitimacy are a relatively poor predictor of state collapse.¹¹⁰ During the crisis, the location of popular legitimacy was ever-shifting in political discourse, all too absent at moments of breakdown, and omnipresent after stabilization. Instead, the attribution of stability to social norms followed stabilization, a mask of continuity over discontinuous situations. By later locating stability in society, not the state, stabilizers tried to naturalize the process of stabilization into a depoliticized state of nature. This project made the path to stabilization inaccessible not only to contemporaries but also to historians.

¹⁰⁸ Thomas Bender begins his chapter on the Civil War era with the impact of the Mexican War, and includes a comparison with Argentine territorial consolidation, although his chapter then emphasizes the war's relationship to "Euro-American liberal and nationalist movements" in European revolutions of 1848 and 1871. The other two transnational syntheses of the United States in this era similarly gesture to but do not fully develop the nation's relationship to the hemisphere. In U.S. history, the Paris Commune is frequently used as a pivot to shift the narrative of Reconstruction from the problem of racial slavery to the problem of European-style class conflict. Bender, A Nation among Nations: America's Place in World History (New York, 2006), chap. 3; Tyrrell, Transnational Nation; Eric Rauchway, Blessed among Nations: How the World Made America (New York, 2006).

¹⁰⁹ Jorge Cañizares-Esguerra, "Entangled Histories: Borderland Historiographies in New Clothes?" American Historical Review 112, no. 3 (June 2007): 787–799; Cañizares-Esguerra, Puritan Conquistadors: Iberianizing the Atlantic, 1550–1700 (Stanford, Calif., 2006), 9, 31; Felipe Fernández-Armesto, The Americas: A Hemispheric History (New York, 2005); Caroline F. Levander and Robert S. Levine, "Introduction: Essays beyond the Nation," in Levander and Levine, Hemispheric American Studies, 1–17; Jesse Alemán, "The Other Country: Mexico, the United States, and the Gothic History of Conquest," ibid., 75–95; Miguel Angel Centeno and Fernando López-Alves, "Introduction," in Centeno and López-Alves, eds., The Other Mirror: Grand Theory through the Lens of Latin America (Princeton, N.J., 2001), 3–24.

Additionally, the discourse of Mexicanization demonstrates the fluidity and irony of transnational thinking. The lesson of Mexicanization was to think through national comparisons as a way of building a government strong enough to prevent those analogies from bearing fruit. During this period, then, historians may be able to fully understand domestic politics only through the lens of transnationalism, and the ironies of transnationalism only through domestic politics. Although Sven Beckert, surely one of the most careful and gifted transnational historians, calls transnationalism "a way of seeing," it might make more sense to think of it as a way of looking.¹¹¹ Treating transnationalism as a way of looking, not of seeing, reminds scholars that transnationalism is a method, not an outcome. We ought to be less confident about where it will lead us. A powerful U.S. exceptionalism arose in the stabilization of the 1880s not from blind breast-beating but, among many factors, from meaningful engagement with anti-exceptionalist analogies advanced in transnational circulations. Just as transnationalism produced surprising outcomes in the historical past, so too should its practice now be open to nuance, contradiction, and even the affirmation of the importance of national political histories, albeit stranger and more surprising ones.

¹¹⁰ John A. Booth and Mitchell A. Seligson, The Legitimacy Puzzle in Latin America: Political Support and Democracy in Eight Nations (New York, 2009); Bruce Gilley, The Right to Rule: How States Win and Lose Legitimacy (New York, 2009); Chiyuki Aoi, Legitimacy and the Use of Armed Force: Stability Missions in the Post-Cold War Era (New York, 2010).

¹¹¹ "AHR Conversation: On Transnational History," American Historical Review 111, no. 5 (December 2006): 1441–1464, here 1454.

Gregory P. Downs is an Associate Professor of History at The City College of New York, CUNY, where he has taught since 2006. He is the author of a monograph, Declarations of Dependence: The Long Reconstruction of Popular Politics in the South, 1861–1908 (University of North Carolina Press, 2011), and a collection of short stories, Spit Baths (University of Georgia Press, 2006). He is currently working on a history of the grassroots reconstruction of authority in the post-Civil War United States.

The Children of the Desert and the Laws of the Sea: Austria, Great Britain, the Ottoman Empire, and the Mediterranean Slave Trade in the Nineteenth Century

ALISON FRANK

MATTEO DRUSCOVICH WAS A SHIP'S CAPTAIN in the Austrian merchant marine, not a lawyer, but he knew something about Austrian law. "There can be no slaves on an Austrian ship," he declared, referring to §95 of the 1852 penal code, which stated that anyone who set foot on Austrian soil or on board an Austrian ship would become instantly free.¹ The occasion for his statement was a proposed search of his steamship, the Mars, on June 3, 1870, while it was docked at Smyrna (today's Izmir) en route from Alexandria to Constantinople.² Druscovich attempted to forestall the search, which would have been conducted by representatives of the British consulate in Smyrna looking for slaves on board, "in order," he explained, "to protect the rights and honor of our [Austrian] flag."³ In due course, the British were allowed to search the ship in the presence of the Austro-Hungarian consul. What they found showed that more than Druscovich's personal honor or even Austria's sovereignty over its own ships was at risk. The search of the Mars, like countless other such searches that

I gratefully thank Walter Johnson, Emmanuel Akyeampong, David Armitage, Derek Beales, Julia Clancy-Smith, Hakan Erdem, Albert Fleig, Xander Frank, Charles Ingrao, Cemal Kafadar, Mary Lewis, Roger Owen, Leslie Pierce, Emma Rothschild, the heroic Walter Sauer, Tim Snyder, Adam Tooze, Jay Winter, Stelio Zoratto, members of the history departments at Brown University and the University of California, Berkeley, and the Modern Europe Colloquium at Yale University; six anonymous reviewers for the AHR; Michael Göbl, Gerhard Gonsa, and Joachim Tepperberg of the Haus-, Hof- und Staatsarchiv in Vienna, Austria; Robert Nightingale and Aaron Shakow; and Bob Cumberbatch.

¹ "Neither slavery nor the exercise of power pertaining to it is permitted in the Austrian Empire, and . . . every slave becomes free in the very moment when he sets foot on imperial Austrian soil or even only on board an Austrian ship." Strafgesetz über Verbrechen, Vergehen und Uebertretungen (May 27, 1852), Neuntes Hauptstück, Von öffentlichen Gewaltthätigkeit, §95, durch Behandlung eines Menschen als Sklaven. The 1811 Allgemeines bürgerliches Gesetzbuch (Austrian Civil Code) prohibited "slavery or serfdom" in the hereditary lands (significantly, excluding Galicia). Amendments decreed in 1826 already stated that any slave became free the instant he or she set foot on Austrian soil or an Austrian ship, or was sold to a subject of the Austrian monarch. Allgemeines bürgerliches Gesetzbuch (1811), Erster Theil, Erstes Hauptstück, §16; 19ter Hofdecret vom 19. August 1826, Beylage, §1.

² For the purposes of consistency with sources used and quoted, this article will use the conventional nineteenth-century English equivalents of town names such as Constantinople, Vienna, Trieste, Smyrna, and Alexandria. It will also refer to the "Austrian Empire" and "Habsburg Monarchy" without regard to the transition from Austria to Austria-Hungary in 1867 in contexts in which both the pre-Ausgleich and post-Ausgleich state are meant.

³ Gödel-Lannoy, President of the Maritime Administration in Trieste [Seebehörde or Governo Marittimo], to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Vienna [Ministerium des Äußern], July 16, 1870, Haus-, Hof- und Staatsarchiv [hereafter HHStA], Ministerium des Äußern [hereafter MdA], Administrative Registratur [hereafter AR], Fach 34, Sonderreihe 90, Handelspolitische Akten Rubrik 48: Sklavenhandel [hereafter F34SR90], Z. 2482/HP.

occurred in the Mediterranean between the 1840s and the 1870s, exposed the fundamental misalignment of Austria's imperial and commercial interests, European ideologies of civilization and freedom notwithstanding.

The architects of Austria's maritime expansion eschewed traditional colonialism—both voluntarily and because the nominal empire's few attempts at overseas conquest ended in failure.⁴ The insistence that Austria's maritime trade was benevolent did not, however, prevent Austria from encountering the same complicated moral, legal, and commercial paradoxes that affected any Europeans who claimed to bring civilization, in the form of commerce, to slave societies. The diplomatic scuffle over the presence of slaves on the Mars in 1870 exposed this larger tangle of imperial and commercial interests, for behind the zealous British consul in Smyrna, who was determined to end slaving in and through "his" port, and the Austrian captain, who was determined to protect the honor of "his" flag, stood the administration of the Austrian Lloyd, the empire's largest shipping company, and diplomats and politicians representing Britain, Austria, and the Ottoman Empire. At stake was not only Austria's dominance of Eastern Mediterranean trade routes, but the project of abolishing the slave trade and the nature of its connection to "free" commerce. Was Austria-Hungary meeting the standards of European civilization and its treaty obligations to Britain? Or was it turning a blind eye to—or, more than that, actually enabling—the most despicable aspect of so-called oriental despotism: the enslavement of African women, children, and men in the waning decades of the nineteenth century?

The answer to both questions, as it turned out, was yes. To say so is not to single out Austria for special blame. There is no evidence that the Austrian state knowingly profited from slaving, or that Austrian diplomats' abhorrence of the Atlantic slave trade, or slavery in Africa, was any less sincere than anyone else's. Austria did fulfill its treaty obligations to Britain (which explicitly excluded the Mediterranean); neither Austrian nor British diplomats considered trade with a slaveholding society to be compromising in and of itself. On the contrary, both believed that consuls, missionaries, and tradesmen—and in the British case, colonial administrators—were natural allies in the project to replace slavery with what they considered to be civilization. But if contemporary European wisdom held that civilization spread inevitably, it also expected it to proceed gradually, not all in a piece. And so Robert Cumberbatch, the British consul in Smyrna whose whistle-blowing caused Austria so much trouble, was scolded, not commended, by his superiors in the Foreign Service for trying to rescue slaves. His Austrian counterparts were embarrassed by the incident, but they could not imagine what “reasonable” (to their minds) steps could be taken to prevent its recurrence. With a few notable exceptions (including consuls such as Cumberbatch), European diplomats chose to ignore the problem of Ottoman domestic slavery because they felt powerless to solve it.⁵ Even after anti-slave trade conventions were signed in the 1880s, the practice of slaveholding within the Ottoman realm continued until the very end of the empire in 1918 and Turkey’s subsequent repudiation of all Islamic law, including those laws that underpinned slavery.

⁴ Austria's experience of maritime trade in the nineteenth century is the subject of my current book project, Invisible Empire: A New Global History of Austria, which will be published by Princeton University Press. Pieter Judson has asked whether Austria-Hungary was an empire in the formal sense. The question was framed, as the historiographical debate that inspired it demanded, in the context of the Habsburg domestic sphere: Did certain allegedly dominant "nations" hegemonically rule over other, allegedly subordinate "nations" within a fundamentally imperial, if geographically European, system? Judson's conclusion, with which I agree, is that the constitutional rights and legal institutions available to Habsburg subjects created a political culture dominated by institutionalized pluralism, not national hegemony; the emergence of putative nation-states from the ashes of the empire in 1918 is not comparable to the decolonization of Britain or France. Judson, "L'Autriche-Hongrie était-elle un empire?" Annales: Histoire, Sciences sociales 63, no. 3 (2008): 563–596. The relevance of the concept of "empire" to this article is different—it presupposes that Austria hoped to benefit from an asymmetric power relationship with the Ottoman Empire and its North African dependencies in order to provide basic services (such as passenger and freight transportation and mail service) that would prove lucrative to its own commercial interests. It neither requires nor asserts that Austria was a colonial power in the sense of the British or French empires. Within this context, what matters is that the Habsburgs chose to call their dominions an empire, and that Austrians thought of their empire as a Great Power and aspired to belong to the club of imperial powers that exported their goods, their culture, and their civilization to the rest of the world.

There are some surprises here. That Austrian ships played any role in the transportation of African slaves is largely unknown. Austria’s pivotal role in expanding maritime traffic in the Eastern Mediterranean in the first two-thirds of the nineteenth century is usually forgotten. The glaring exclusion of the entire Mediterranean from diplomatic agreements to eradicate the slave trade elsewhere has made it easy to imagine that human trafficking had largely been eliminated from European experience by mid-century; indeed, the abolition of the slave trade in the northern Atlantic is conventionally viewed as a core event of the Age of Revolution. But the purpose of this investigation is not to surprise—it is to connect. Thinking about how slaves were transported by European powers that were formally (and by conviction) against slavery helps reveal how difficult abolition was and further exposes the linkages between smuggling, the semi-official slave trade, and the domestic institution of slavery. To appreciate the significance of the discovery that slaves were being smuggled on Austrian ships requires a reexamination of the history of Austria’s role in Mediterranean commerce; the evolution of European diplomatic agreements aimed at ending the slave trade; the alleged distinctiveness, whether real or imagined, of Ottoman slavery; the permeability of the legal and conceptual boundaries that were supposed to separate the slave trade as a matter of international law from the domestic institution of slavery; and the complex history of slavery and abolitionism in Britain and Austria. Ultimately, it reveals that it was impossible for imperial commercial interests to be truly aligned with the emergent ideologies of civilization and freedom, despite the Great Powers’ claim that they were mutually reinforcing.⁶ As case after case of slave transportation by the Austrian Lloyd was brought to light, the Austrian government was forced to acknowledge that the only way to guarantee that its ships would not be used by slave traders would be to refuse to maintain its Ottoman routes and repudiate its commercial ambitions in the region.

⁵ Madeline Zilfi has suggested that the predominance of female slaves in the Ottoman Empire and of the imperial harem in the Ottoman imagination of slavery made the empire’s particular form of “mild” slavery less offensive to even those diplomats who were committed in principle to ending slavery: “In nineteenth-century male relationships, the idea of men’s having a master was shedding its positive connotations. Where women were concerned, however, the staying power of female slavery and the patriarchal household argued for the normalcy of women’s being mastered.” Zilfi, Women and Slavery in the Late Ottoman Empire: The Design of Difference (Cambridge, 2010), 231.

⁶ I am particularly indebted to the AHR’s anonymous “Reader 1” for suggesting this particular breakdown of the thematic elements in this article.

When it came to servicing the Eastern Mediterranean maritime trade, some slaving, officials feared, was the price of admission.

The story of the Mediterranean slave trade—and Austria's involvement in it—forces an extension of the chronology of abolition to include the late nineteenth century, a reorientation of the geography of slaving from the Atlantic and Indian Oceans to include the Mediterranean, and a broadening of the profiles of slavers and complicit powers to include non-colonial states. It also provides a missing link between the historiographies of slavery in the Ottoman Empire, slavery in Africa, and European abolitionism in the nineteenth century. While historians have long looked skeptically at claims that African slavery called for European colonialism on the continent—a colonialism conveniently justified in part by the stated need to abolish the slave trade at its source—Austria's predicament suggests that there was more to Europe's involvement in the slave trade than either humanitarian abolitionism or the imperialist expansion it was used to defend. The very structures that made international trade generally safe and profitable facilitated the continuation of slaving across the Mediterranean long after the project of abolition began—no matter the intentions of any number of lawmakers, diplomats, mercantile capitalists, or ships' captains.

THE HABSBURG MONARCHY FACED considerable obstacles to developing and exercising an interventionist anti-slavery policy—obstacles that had less to do with Austria's public “morality” than with the particular form of slaving that its commerce unwittingly facilitated. Austria was forced to confront the intertwining of commerce and slaving in the Mediterranean, where the slave trade crossed the frontiers of the private and the public, where the border between freedom and coercion was often unclear, and where power often operated along indirect channels and took hidden forms.⁷ Scholars of the Mediterranean have long known that from antiquity through the Renaissance, the “connectivity” of the “corrupting sea” made slavery “a structural feature of Mediterranean society.”⁸ One scholar has estimated that between 4.5 and 9 million slaves—Christian and Muslim, European, Arab, Berber, Turkic, ⁷ It is no longer necessary to include the formerly omnipresent apology for the paucity of literature on slavery under Islam or in the Ottoman Empire or in Africa. There are references to excellent scholarship on every page of this article. Ehud Toledano claimed in 2009 that “we have covered the traffic from Africa and the Caucasus, described the main routes, determined the types of slaves, their prices, the customs duties levied on them, the jobs they performed, and the social roles they played. Scholars have explained the project of the Tanzimat reforms, the impact of foreign pressures, the mechanisms of homegrown manumission, the attitudes towards slavery, and the problems of suppression and abolition.” Toledano, “Bringing the Slaves Back In,” in Behnaz A. Mirzai, Ismael Musah Montana, and Paul E. Lovejoy, eds., Slavery, Islam and Diaspora (Trenton, N.J., 2009), 7. While much remains to be done, it is important to recognize how very much has been accomplished since the inaugural issue of Slavery and Abolition, in which Alan Fisher complained that “Scholars have not only avoided investigating slavery in [the Ottoman Empire], the largest of all Islamic states in [the early modern and modern] periods, they have not admitted its existence.” Fisher, “Chattel Slavery in the Ottoman Empire,” Slavery and Abolition 1 (1980): 25.

■ Fernand Braudel, The Mediterranean and the Mediterranean World in the Age of Philip II, 2 vols. (New York, 1973), 2: 755; Peregrine Horden and Nicholas Purcell, The Corrupting Sea: A Study of Mediterranean History (Malden, Mass., 2000), 388. On Mediterranean slaving in the Carolingian period (once thought to mark a caesura between ancient and Renaissance slaving), see Michael McCormick, “New Light on the ‘Dark Ages’: How the Slave Trade Fuelled the Carolingian Economy,” Past and Present and African—were kept on the Mediterranean littoral between 1450 and 1850.⁹ In the nineteenth century, human trafficking had become inseparable from the most modern forms of Mediterranean exchange, facilitated by the newest technologies (steamships), and intrinsically connected to “legitimate” commerce.¹⁰ It affected even those European powers—including Austria—whose commerce was largely continental, whose borders were mostly inland, and whose attitude toward the slave trade combined professions of innocence with practiced indifference.

At the center of this story were thousands of African children and young women (and less frequently men) who were purchased in the slave markets of Cairo and East Africa—many of them after a forced march across the Sahara—and taken by slave traders to the port city of Alexandria, where they embarked on steamships headed for Constantinople.¹¹ If the slave traders could pass their human wares off as their own children, wives, paid servants, or personal slaves, rather than as newly acquired slaves bound for resale in Constantinople, they could travel unmolested to the capital of the Ottoman Empire, where slavery remained legal even after the piecemeal abolition of the slave trade had been accepted as an ideal. There, as one American traveler observed, “Black slaves are sold freely and white Circassian girls can be had by all who are able to purchase them.”¹² At the same time, the slave dealers knew that their trade was under attack and that their dearly purchased property was likely to be seized by any signatories to the various treaties to that effect (including Great

177 (2002): 47–49, here 53: “In some not unimportant measure, Europe financed the early growth of its commercial economy by selling Europeans as slaves to the Arab world.”

⁹ “Personalmente ho ‘osato’ affermare che se consideriamo le diverse componenti della schiavitù mediterranea: cristiano-europei schiavi nel mondo islamico, musulmani (arabo-berberi, turchi, slavi ed altri) nel mondo europeo, negri africani e altri da una parte e dall’altra, e se facciamo un calcolo per l’intero periodo 1450–1850 ‘si arriva, con verosimile sorpresa e probabile incredulità di molti, a un totale da 4 milioni e mezzo a nove milioni di individui coinvolti.’” Salvatore Bono, “La schiavitù nel mediterraneo moderno: Storia di una storia,” Cahiers de la Méditerranée 65 (2002), <http://cdlm.revues.org/index28.html>.

¹⁰ Paul Lovejoy eschews the phrase “legitimate trade,” used to distinguish between slaving and other trades (in, for example, ivory, palm oil, or ostrich feathers). “Many of the ‘legitimate goods’ destined for world markets were grown or transported by slaves, for slavery had become an integral part of the African economy . . . The transition from exporting slaves to exporting other commodities resulted in the increased use of slaves in Africa.” Lovejoy, Transformations in Slavery: A History of Slavery in Africa, 2nd ed. (Cambridge 2000), 141; Paul E. Lovejoy and David Richardson, “From Slaves to Palm Oil: Afro-European Commercial Relations in the Bight of Biafra, 1741–1841,” in David Killingray, Margarette Lincoln, and Nigel Rigby, eds., Maritime Empires: British Imperial Maritime Trade in the Nineteenth Century (Boydell, 2004), 14.

¹¹ “Slaves exported [from the Central Sudan] to the Orient were marched an average of some 600 kilometers to the desert edge, and then made the long trek across the Sahara.” Patrick Manning, Slavery and African Life: Occidental, Oriental, and African Slave Trades (Cambridge, 1990), 75. Suzanne Miers listed some of the many origins of slaves destined for the Mediterranean-world: “From the western and central Sudan they crossed the Sahara on the great caravan routes to Northern Africa, and many were sent on to the markets of the Ottoman Empire and beyond. From the Sudan and Ethiopia, they came northwards, overland or down the Nile to the North African littoral or were shipped eastwards, as were Somalis, to Arabia, the Persian Gulf, and India. From eastern Africa even beyond the great lakes they were carried away to Persian and Arabian markets. Many were dispersed through the Muslim world by pilgrims going to or returning from Mecca and their destinies were as varied as their origins.” Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade (New York, 1975), 56.

¹² Nathaniel Clark Burt, The Far East; or, Letters from Egypt, Palestine, and Other Lands of the Orient (Cincinnati, 1868), 197. This particular letter was written from on board the Arciduchessa Carlotta, an Austrian Lloyd steamer accused of transporting slaves in 1871, bound from Alexandria to Jaffa and Beirut.

Britain, Austria, Prussia, Russia, and France) if their commercial intentions were discovered. They also knew that there was a greater likelihood of discovery on board steamships, which drew more attention from consulates and customs agencies, than on sailing ships. Yet the comforts and convenience of steamship travel were so great as to convince many slave traders to take the risk. And on the waters of the Mediterranean, no steamship service was more reliable, more comfortable, more regular, and more reasonably priced than the service provided by the Austrian Lloyd, the largest steamship company in the Habsburg monarchy.¹³

The Lloyd had been founded by a group of merchants and investors in the empire's largest port city, Trieste, in 1833. It was supposed to encourage the blossoming of the empire's maritime commerce by speeding up the movement of goods—and, just as importantly, the information about goods upon which insurers desperately relied. The Austrian Lloyd, its founders hoped, would reorient Austrian trade toward the seas: "If we escape from the narrow circles into which Austrian traffic is now banished," wrote the Triestine merchant-philanthropist Pasquale Revoltella in 1863, "a wide, boundless horizon opens up—a world lies before us which until now has only been known in Austrian schoolrooms and scholars' studies—a world full of the liveliest activity, the playground of all other civilized peoples—where the spirit of commerce daily celebrates unheard-of triumphs."¹⁴ The Lloyd's very first steamer, the Arciduca Lodovico, departed on its maiden voyage on May 16, 1837, leaving Trieste for its most important destination, Constantinople.¹⁵ The Levant proved so central to the company's profits that the Lloyd soon developed two main routes that serviced Ottoman ports without including any Austrian ports at all: one that went directly from Alexandria to Constantinople, with stops only at Smyrna and a few intermediate islands, and a second that went from Alexandria to Constantinople via the Levantine coastal cities. In 1851, Austrian Lloyd steamers transported 222,000 passengers, 522,000 letters, and 280 packages, "nearly all of them engaged in carrying on a commerce with various ports of Turkey," according to the New York Times. The Lloyd's income for 1851 was $1.4 million, of which $900,000, or fully 64 percent, derived from the "Turkish trade."¹⁶ By 1869, the Ottoman Empire was Austria-Hungary's second most important trade partner, after Germany—followed only at a great ¹³ In 1870, there were seventy-four steamers registered in Austria; seventy of them belonged to the Austrian Lloyd. Frederick Martin, ed., The Statesman's Year-Book, 7th ed. (London, 1870), 25–26. In 1872, the French steamer service Messageries Maritimes and the Russian Steam and Navigation and Commercial Company each plied the Alexandria-Constantinople route fortnightly; the Peninsular & Oriental (Britain) and Rubattino (Italy) did not cover the route; the Austrian Lloyd sent ships from Alexandria to Constantinople weekly (alternating between a direct route and a route via Syria); the Egyptian Khedivial Mail Line sent steamers weekly. But whereas the Messageries Maritimes charged 182 French francs for a third-class ticket from Alexandria to Constantinople, the Lloyd charged 50 francs for the same trip on its direct route, and 95 for the trip via Syria. Routes and tariffs taken from an excerpt from François Leverney, Guide et annuaire d'Egypte (1872), as printed in Robert Ilbert and Ilios Yannakakis, eds., Alexandria, 1860–1960: The Brief Life of a Cosmopolitan Community, trans. Colin Clement (Alexandria, 1997), 211–218.

¹⁴ Pasquale Revoltella, Oesterreich's Betheiligung am Welthandel: Betrachtungen und Vorschläge (Trieste, 1864), 13.

¹⁵ Dieter Winkler and Georg Pawlik, Die Dampfschiffahrtsgesellschaft Österreichischer Lloyd, 1836–1918 (Graz, 1986), 13.

¹⁶ "Correspondence: The Levant," New York Times, October 11, 1852, 2.

distance by Italy and Russia.¹⁷ There was no doubt that Austria stood to profit tremendously from its maritime commerce.

But the “playground of civilized peoples,” it turned out, was also a thriving slave market. From the 1830s, when the Austrian Lloyd was founded, until at least the 1870s, when the documentary evidence (but not the slave trade itself) ceased, the Lloyd’s “modern” steamships were chosen by dozens (or possibly hundreds) of slave traders to transport thousands (or possibly tens of thousands) of slaves to the Ottoman Empire.¹⁸ The exact scale of Austrian participation is difficult to establish—as is the exact number of slaves transported from Africa across the Mediterranean to the territories of the Ottoman Empire. Ehud Toledano, using data compiled by Ralph Austen and others, has estimated that between 16,000 and 18,000 slaves were imported into the Ottoman Empire every year for the first three-quarters of the nineteenth century—which would have produced a total of 1.1 to 1.3 million enslaved people between 1800 and 1870 (a forced migration on an epochal scale)—with the nineteenth-century trade peaking between 1850 and 1875.¹⁹

That a slave trade on this scale (or any other) persisted into the 1860s and 1870s requires an adjustment of the traditional chronology of abolition in the Atlantic-centered historiography of European slave-trading. When Captain Druscovich’s ship was stopped at Smyrna, more than six decades had passed since the declared end of the British and American slave trades, in 1807 and 1808, respectively.²⁰ Nearly sixty

¹⁷ Frederick Martin, ed., The Statesman’s Year-Book, 6th ed. (London, 1869), 25.

¹⁸ The slave trade did not stop in the 1870s, but a few developments made it substantially smaller. The Anglo-Egyptian anti-slave trade convention of 1877 “marked the start of a more determined effort to prevent the import of slaves.” Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 81. The British occupation of Egypt, starting in 1882, gave the British more control over embarkation procedures. The Berlin Conference of 1885 and the Brussels Conference of 1889 both involved the Ottoman Empire in international agreements prohibiting the slave trade.

¹⁹ Ehud R. Toledano, Slavery and Abolition in the Ottoman Middle East (Seattle, 1998), 8. Ralph Austen has estimated that 312,000 Africans were moved from sub-Saharan Africa to the Arab and Turkic lands surrounding the Mediterranean between 1830 and 1900—100,000 of them in the 1860s alone. Austen, “The Mediterranean Islamic Slave Trade out of Africa: A Tentative Census,” in Elizabeth Savage, ed., The Human Commodity: Perspectives on the Trans-Saharan Slave Trade (London, 1992), 219.

²⁰ The British act was the Abolition Act, 47, Geo. III, Cap. 3, March 1807; the U.S. act was the Act to Prohibit the Importation of Slaves into Any Port or Place within the Jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the First Day of January, in the Year of Our Lord 1808, signed into law March 3, 1808. The United States outlawed the slave trade in 1808, but did not grant Great Britain the right to search American vessels at sea independently until the treaty carried out by an act of Congress on July 11, 1862; only that concession led to a more meaningful end to the northern Atlantic slave trade. W. E. Burghardt Du Bois, The Suppression of the African Slave-Trade to the United States of America, 1638–1870 (New York, 1896), 192. Boyd Hilton has described the ambivalence of British celebrations of the March 2007 bicentenary of the act that outlawed Britain’s “central role in [the slave trade’s] Atlantic triangle.” Hilton, “1807 and All That: Why Britain Outlawed Her Slave Trade,” in Derek R. Peterson, ed., Abolitionism and Imperialism in Britain, Africa, and the Atlantic (Athens, Ohio, 2010), 63–65. Paul Lovejoy, echoing Eric Williams, argues that Europeans claim more credit for abolition than they are due: “If there was a passive agent in the history of slavery during the nineteenth century, it was Europe, not Africa. Africa struggled to reform slavery in a changing context. Europe did its best to avoid its commitment to abolition, reluctantly pursuing the fight whenever compromise proved impossible. Abolition was eventually achieved not so much because of the desire of one party to end slavery but because the modern industrial system and a slave-based social formation were incompatible . . . The demise of slavery was inevitable in the context of absorption into a capitalist world-economy.” Lovejoy, Transformations in Slavery, 252–253. For Eric Williams’s original argument that economic interest, rather than selfless humanitarian impulse, motivated abolition at a time when industrial capitalism was making plantation slavery less profitable, see Williams, Capitalism and Slavery (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1944). After a spirited debate between David Brion Davis, John Ashworth, and Thomas Haskell in the American Historical Review, reprinted in Thomas Bender, ed., The Antislavery Debate: Capitalism and Abolitionism as a Prob- years had passed since the first ban on slavery in the Austrian lands in 1811. Over fifty years had passed since the participants at the Congress of Vienna had proclaimed the slave trade “repugnant to the principles of humanity and universal morality” and pledged to force its gradual abolition.²¹ Thirty years had passed since Austria had signed the Quadripartite Treaty with Britain, Prussia, and Russia in December 1841, which granted the mutual right of inspection of one another’s vessels at sea.²² Nearly twenty years had passed since the reigning penal code outlawing slavery within Austria had come into effect in 1852.

The Austrian Ministry of Foreign Affairs conducted its correspondence with statesmen and diplomats representing Britain, the Sublime Porte, and France throughout the first three-quarters of the nineteenth century according to the letter of these laws, and with all the good conscience of a power that had nothing to hide. At the Congress of Vienna, Metternich said that as a “noncolonial” power, Austria was “sincerely opposed to the trade in slaves.”²³ From Britain’s perspective, the lack of direct involvement or interest in the slave trade on the part of Prussia, Russia, and Austria made them the most logical partners for cooperation—hence the 1841 treaty.²⁴ According to the traditional measure of willing compliance, Britain was correct: Austria was eager to cooperate. The archives of the Austrian Foreign Ministry are full of warrants granting Britain permission to search Austrian ships in the waters off the West Coast of Africa, the Cape of Good Hope, the West Indies, and the Brazil Station, with confidence that no slaves would be found.²⁵ If Austria was involved in the Atlantic slave trade, no evidence of that involvement has ever been uncovered.

But Austria’s lack of direct complicity in or profit from the Atlantic slave trade lem in Historical Interpretation (Berkeley, Calif., 1992), 107–311, Christopher Brown provided a synthesis of both positions in Moral Capital: Foundations of British Abolitionism (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2006).

²¹ “Declaration of the Eight Powers, Relative to the Universal Abolition of the Slave Trade, February 8, 1815,” as quoted in Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 11. The plenipotentiaries proclaimed “their wish of putting an end to a scourge which has so long desolated Africa, degraded Europe, and afflicted humanity.” Jerome Reich, “The Slave Trade at the Congress of Vienna: A Study in English Public Opinion,” Journal of Negro History 53, no. 2 (April 1968): 139–140. The imperfections of the Vienna declaration were many: slaving was not declared illegal, nor was any time limit set for its eventual abolition; there was no commitment to take action against it or punish those who practiced it; and no mechanism was established for international cooperation to restrict it. Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 11.

²² The negotiations over the treaty continued from 1834 to 1841, and can be found in the folder “Verhandlungen wegen Abschluss eines gemeinschaftlichen Tractates wegen Abschaffung des Handels mit Negersclaven,” HHStA Fach 39/1, Sklavenhandel, Piraterie, etc., 1834–1847 [hereafter F39/1]. The entire treaty and its annexes are available in English in Lewis Hertslet, ed., A Complete Collection of the Treaties and Conventions, and Reciprocal Regulations, at Present Subsisting between Great Britain and Foreign Powers, vol. 6 (London, 1845), 3–20.

²³ Reich, “The Slave Trade at the Congress of Vienna,” 140.

²⁴ The three powers “had no direct interest in the slave trade” according to Jerome Reich and “were not directly interested in the trade” according to Suzanne Miers. Reich, “The Slave Trade at the Congress of Vienna,” 132; Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 10. The original overture to Prussia, Russia, and Austria was made by Viscount Castlereagh on May 31, 1814, and is reprinted in British and Foreign State Papers, 1815–1816, vol. 3 (London, 1838), 887. See also Du Bois, The Suppression of the African Slave-Trade to the United States of America, 134.

²⁵ A typical request for warrants, listing ships and captains organized into groups by the waters in which they patrolled, can be found in From His Britannic Majesty Ambassador Extraordinary & Plenipotentiary to Prince Metternich Chancellor of Court and State, pras. 13/10 1843 p 1131 HHStA F39/1.

was only as relevant to the project of abolition as the slave trade was limited to the Atlantic. The proliferation of bilateral and multilateral treaties of which Britain was so proud—treaties that banned the trade, provided for joint cruising, granted the right of search of ships at sea, and in some cases defined slaving as piracy—shared a common omission: the Mediterranean.²⁶ The Atlantic search zone defined by the Quadripartite Treaty was explicitly limited not only by delineating exactly what portions of the ocean were included, but also by excluding the Middle Sea entirely: “the said mutual right of search shall not be exercised within the Mediterranean Sea.”²⁷ But the West Coast of Africa was not where Austrian ships were likely to board slaves; 40 percent of the sub-Saharan Africans who were forced into external slavery in the nineteenth century were not taken across the Atlantic. According to Paul Lovejoy, approximately 2,134,000 Africans were transported into slavery across the Sahara, the Red Sea, and the Indian Ocean in the nineteenth century. Of those, 56 percent, or 1.2 million, were taken to slaveholding territories around the Mediterranean.²⁸

The Ottoman Empire had not been party to the agreements signed at the Congress of Vienna, and had long refused to enter into any kind of treaty banning the slave trade.²⁹ Even when the British finally convinced the Ottomans to sign a convention for the suppression of the slave trade in 1880, Britain acquired the right to search Ottoman vessels “on the high seas, in the Red Sea, the Gulf of Aden, the Indian Ocean and the Persian Gulf”—but not in the Mediterranean.³⁰ This exclusion

²⁶ The Quadripartite Treaty described slaving as piracy but did not spell out the legal ramifications of such a definition. Britain tried, in 1864, to introduce an international act that would explicitly proclaim slave traders to be pirates and obligate signatories to pass laws allowing their subjects/citizens to be prosecuted in courts set up to combat piracy—that is, courts outside the jurisdiction of the “pirates’” home state. Austria responded by reiterating its many regulations banning the slave trade (“Austria has in this regard neglected nothing and has in no measure fallen behind”) and noting that the result of the proposed act would be to place subjects of the signatory powers “under the power of courts recognized to prosecute piracy in the states whose cruisers secured the ship [accused of slaving]”—an abrogation of state sovereignty and duty toward subjects/citizens that Austria could not permit. The reference to piracy in the 1841 treaty had been made “with the goal of emphasizing the criminal nature and grave criminal liability of the enterprise using an expression that is both popular and generally perceived as infamous,” nothing more. Austria was willing to have British cruisers search its merchant vessels (again, outside the Mediterranean)—but was not willing to have British courts try its subjects. Justice Ministry to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Vienna, January 23, 1865, JM 238 1123/J pr 23/1/1865, HHStA MdA AR Fach 39/3 Sklavenhandel, Piraterie, etc., 1857–1866.

²⁷ The Atlantic search zone would be bounded “on the north, by the 32nd parallel of north latitude, on the west, by the eastern coast of America, . . . on the south, by the 45th parallel of south latitude, from the point where that parallel strikes the eastern coast of America to the 80th degree of longitude east from the meridian of Greenwich; on the east, by the same degree of longitude, from the point where it is intersected by the 45th parallel of south latitude up to the coast of India.” Hertslet, A Complete Collection of the Treaties and Conventions, 4–5. On arguments about trying pirates in their states of origin as a way of circumventing the punishment of slavers altogether, see Du Bois, The Suppression of the African Slave-Trade to the United States of America, especially 165, 184.

²⁸ Lovejoy, Transformations in Slavery, 142. John Wright has asserted that “after they had crossed the Sahara, nearly all the black slaves exported from North Africa were sent by sea, on a Mediterranean ‘middle passage,’ to their final points of sale.” Wright, The Trans-Saharan Slave Trade (London, 2007), 127.

²⁹ For an excellent account of the tension between British pressure and Ottoman internal reform, as well as the trajectory of negotiations and preliminary agreements leading up to the anti-slave trade treaty, see Y. Hakan Erdem, Slavery in the Ottoman Empire and Its Demise, 1800–1909 (London, 1996), 67–88.

³⁰ Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 85. The reports written by captains on board the British naval vessels that were charged with preventing the slave trade are heartrending. Many quo-

was not based solely on the intransigence of the Ottomans, however; it emerged directly from Britain's attempt to distinguish between the slave trade and slaveholding itself—and in making the distinction, to allow the latter to continue while the former was rooted out.³¹ The hope of British abolitionists was that cutting off supply would ultimately force Ottoman slavery to wither away.³² High rates of manumission made the enslaved population's reproduction over time particularly dependent upon the trade—but would a ban on the trade cause Ottoman slavery to collapse?³³ Or would ongoing demand make a mockery of a ban on the trade by forcing once-legal supply to continue, only now as criminalized smuggling? In the 1840s, the very idea of requesting the Ottoman sultan to abolish slavery in his domains was deemed so absurd that Lord Palmerston, foreign secretary at the time, rejected a draft letter to the ambassador in Constantinople suggesting that course of action: "This is all nonsense, slavery is so ingrained in the social habits of Mohammedans that no ambassador could with a grave face act upon the draft. It would have been much shorter to tell Lord Ponsonby [the ambassador] to ask the Sultan to become a Christian."³⁴ When the Austrian emperor's younger brothers, Ferdinand Maximilian and Karl Ludwig, took a tour of the Ottoman Empire in 1850, their visit to the slave market was one of the singular highlights that the court painter traveling with them chose to record. (See Figure 1.)

More consistent was Britain's conviction that pressing too hard, too fast on the tations of their descriptions of the East African trade can be found in Bernard Edwards, Royal Navy versus the Slave Traders: Enforcing Abolition at Sea, 1808–1898 (Barnsley, 2007), 158–183.

³¹ "Within the Ottoman Muslim elite, a general sense of moral and spiritual superiority toward Christian Europe prevailed. This feeling coexisted with the recognition of Ottoman military, technological, and economic inferiority. All this produced a clear disinclination in government circles to yield to British pressures regarding slavery and the slave trade." Toledano, Slavery and Abolition in the Ottoman Middle East, 11.

³² Miers argues that "inadequate naval power and consular vigilance" meant that even in the 1880s, "the smuggling traffic which still brought several thousand or more Africans" to the Middle East and North Africa annually could not be stopped. Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 116. In the Mediterranean, consuls seemed duly vigilant, and the use of naval power was not permitted. By pointing out that "the [Atlantic] trade in enslaved Africans was demand driven," Andrew Lambert emphasizes a fundamental flaw in the idea that ending the trade would automatically and promptly end slavery. Lambert, "Slavery, Free Trade and Naval Strategy, 1840–1860," in Keith Hamilton and Patrick Salmon, eds., Slavery, Diplomacy and Empire: Britain and the Suppression of the Slave Trade, 1807–1975 (Brighton, 2009), 67. On the opening of new areas of slavery in Africa as the trades in the Atlantic and Muslim worlds declined, see Richard Roberts and Suzanne Miers, "The End of Slavery in Africa," in Miers and Roberts, eds., The End of Slavery in Africa (Madison, Wis., 1988), 3–59.

³³ On the origins of slaves in the late Ottoman Empire and the most common means of their enslavement, see Erdem, Slavery in the Ottoman Empire and Its Demise, 44–58.

³⁴ As quoted in A. Adu Boahen, Britain, the Sahara, and the Western Sudan, 1788–1861 (Oxford, 1964), 146. A similar attitude prevailed thirty years later, when the British ambassador to Constantinople wrote: "Till there is a complete revolution in the social organization of the country and in public opinion, and while the sovereign of the country and most of the principal personages in it possess slaves, who must be recruited from some quarter or other, it will be, as your Lordship says, vain to think of seeing the trade in them extinguished." Sir Henry Elliot to Earl Granville, Therapia, August 16, 1870, Slave Trade no. 5, National Archives (London), Foreign Office [hereafter NAFO] 84/1324, 109. For all his wisdom, Palmerston was far from an expert on Sharia law; the internal Muslim debate about the compatibility of Islam and slavery included opinions that differed across space, across time, and across sect. William Gervase Clarence-Smith has devoted an entire monograph to parsing these differences: Islam and the Abolition of Slavery (Oxford, 2006). See especially his overview, pp. 16–21. Amal Ghazal's essay "Debating Slavery and Abolition in the Arab Middle East," in Mirzai, Montana, and Lovejoy, Slavery, Islam and Diaspora, 139–154, is particularly helpful on the continuation of these debates in the twentieth century.

FIGURE 1: Peter Johann Nepomuk Geiger, Archduke Maximilian of Austria Visiting the Slave Market of Smyrna. Geiger traveled with the Austrian archduke Ferdinand Maximilian during his 1850 trip to Smyrna. In this painting, he recorded the young archduke's visit to the infamous Smyrna slave market, where both enslaved Africans (front left) and Circassians (front right) were displayed for sale. His markedly orientalist version of the scene contrasted the irrepressible sexuality of Circassian women coyly peeking over their own shoulders with the listless and hopeless carriage of Africans for sale in the same market. The archdukes donned civilian attire in order to travel "incognito." Museo Storico del Castello di Miramare, Trieste, Italy. Alfredo Dagli Orti / Art Resource, N.Y.

matter of slavery would endanger the stability of the Ottoman Empire, and the fragile European peace that was under constant threat of blowing up over the so-called Eastern Question.³⁵ In the 1860s, the peculiarities of the Mediterranean slave trade were enough to stymie the British. The head of the Slave Trade Department of the Foreign Office, William H. Wylde, noted in 1869, "I would have long since proposed that we should endeavour to negotiate with Turkey a treaty for the suppression of the slave trade, had I not foreseen great difficulties in carrying out to any practical end any engagements we might make with Turkey giving us the right to act in the ³⁵ "Some diplomats and officials went so far as to manipulate Islamic beliefs and institutions to delay the imposition and enforcement of abolition, for they were fearful that tampering with servitude would cause rebellions and wars." William Gervase Clarence-Smith, "The British 'Official Mind' and Nineteenth-Century Islamic Debates over the Abolition of Slavery," in Hamilton and Salmon, Slavery, Diplomacy and Empire, 125. The Sublime Porte, in contrast, may well have viewed slow progress as its surest form: "Although no policy of abolishing slavery was ever adopted by the Ottoman government, the administrative measures it in fact resorted to ensured that the result would ultimately be to severely curtail slavery in the empire." Toledano, Slavery and Abolition in the Ottoman Middle East, 111.

Mediterranean.”³⁶ And although Habsburg Austria was peripheral to Europe’s engagement with the New World, it was central to Europe’s engagement with the Levant. Since the eighteenth century, Austria had been one of the Ottoman Empire’s most important trading partners—a position it did not begin to cede to Britain until the middle of the nineteenth century.³⁷ As late as the early 1830s, Austria and Russia together accounted for more than 45 percent of foreign trade with the Ottoman Empire, and all of Western Europe together accounted for only 33 percent.³⁸ According to a New York Times correspondent, thanks to “a liberally developed system of steam communication in the Adriatic and Levantine Seas,” Austria “almost monopoliz[ed] the trade there.”³⁹ It was therefore no coincidence that Austria was also deeply, if reluctantly, involved in the transportation of slaves from North Africa to Constantinople and the Levant.

In September 1851, the British Foreign Office informed the embassy in Vienna that “Her Majesty’s government have . . . learned with much surprise and regret . . . that it is notorious that slaves are frequently conveyed on the steamers belonging to the Austrian company of Lloyd.”⁴⁰ After investigating the matter, the embassy’s secretary, Arthur Magenis, reported back. “The packets of the Austrian Lloyd’s company,” he concluded, “are in the constant habit of carrying African slaves to Constantinople from Mytilene, to which island as a depot, these slaves are brought from Africa.”⁴¹ Taking up the matter with the Austrian Foreign Ministry again in December 1851, Magenis referred to unnamed sources who had confirmed that the Lloyd had recently transported 255 slaves from Mytilene to Constantinople.⁴²

Sporadic accusations of the Austrian Lloyd’s involvement in the slave trade continued through the 1850s and 1860s—but without the sort of evidence that would have forced the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to acknowledge their merit formally. “It is notorious that the Lloyd trades in slaves”; “The Lloyd is reported to be in the constant habit of transporting slaves”—such complaints could be, and were, rebuffed with a simple “impossible.” Impossible, that is, according to the logic that said that the empire was internally consistent, that its diplomacy, its laws, and its private in-

³⁶ Quoted in Boahen, Britain, the Sahara, and the Western Sudan, 157.

³⁷ Austria and France were the first European powers to establish regular steamship service in the Levant. “In 1853 the French consul [in Beirut] reported that the Austrians were more punctual and had 40 ships, many brand new, whereas the French had 18, many old and not working properly.” Charles Issawi, The Fertile Crescent, 1800–1914: A Documentary Economic History (Oxford, 1988), 205.

³⁸ Austria accounted for 26.2 percent of Ottoman imports in 1850–1852, compared to 25.5 percent for Britain; and 28 percent of Ottoman exports, compared to 29.1 percent for Britain. Şevket Pamuk, The Ottoman Empire and European Capitalism, 1820–1913: Trade, Investment and Production (Cambridge, 1987), 26–27, 31, 32. At mid-century, France understood that its task in the Eastern Mediterranean was to cut into the commercial dominance of Austria and Great Britain: “En Méditerranée orientale, le commerce extérieur de la Grande Bretagne et de l’Autriche progresse plus vite que celui de la France.” Marie-Françoise Berneron-Couvenhes, Les Messageries Maritimes: L’essor d’une grande compagnie de navigation française, 1851–1894 (Paris, 2007), 77.

³⁹ “The Position of Austria,” New York Times, December 11, 1870, 4.

⁴⁰ Foreign Office to Magenis, September 18, 1850, HHStA MdA AR Fach 39/2 [hereafter F39/2], Z. 11550/D.

⁴¹ Magenis to Schwarzenberg, September 12, 1851, HHStA MdA AR F39/2, Z. 11065. The Austrian Lloyd was not the only shipping company involved in bringing slaves to and from the transit station of Mytilene, of course. The British vice-consul at Mytilene reported that 283 “negresses and young negroes” were disembarked there between April 15 and June 2, 1855, this time via “Ottoman vessels.” Boahen, Britain, the Sahara, and the Western Sudan, 154.

⁴² Magenis to Schwarzenberg, December 7, 1851, HHStA MdA AR F39/2, Z. 14802.

dustry were aligned, that together they could be represented by the word "Austria." If Austrian statesmen agreed that the slave trade was wrong, then Austria would not trade in slaves. No investigation was necessary.

As the complaints about the Lloyd mounted, defenses became more robust, varied, and contradictory. The Austro-Hungarian consul in Constantinople, Conrad von Wassitsch, said in 1869 that accusations of slave-trading—this time, that the Lloyd ship Oreste had transported sixty slaves through Smyrna—"can only be the spawn of the sick imagination of some English consular functionary." The phrase "some English consular functionary" was disingenuous, for Wassitsch had a very specific functionary in mind: the British consul in Smyrna, Robert William Cumberbatch. Cumberbatch, born in Kent in 1821, had been serving in the Foreign Service for two decades—many of those years spent in the Ottoman Empire and Russia—first as secretary to his half-brother, Abraham Carlton Cumberbatch, the British consul general in Constantinople, and later as a consul himself. When Cumberbatch was still a young boy of 13, living in England, his father was reimbursed for the emancipation of 232 slaves he had held in the land of his birth, Barbados.⁴³ What impression the abolition of slavery on his father's sugar plantation in the West Indies made upon young Robert can only be imagined. What is certain is that when Cumberbatch began his appointment as consul in Smyrna in April 1864, he brought with him a marked anti-slavery zeal. It escaped no one's attention that the pace of complaints picked up dramatically once he took office. As another Lloyd captain, G. Remedelli (of the steamer Arciduchessa Carlotta), testified, "The English consul is well known throughout Smyrna to be a fantastical man, who is constantly dreaming up similar stories."⁴⁴

Cumberbatch's zeal was only slightly less unwelcome to his British supervisors than it was to the Austrian Lloyd. His willingness to believe Sister Charlotte Pilz's claim that as a passenger on board the Lloyd steamer Vesta she had seen sixty slaves stowed in the hold ("secreted in the forechains") made him a laughingstock in certain circles: "no one who knows the circumstances of slavery in Turkey would think the transport of slaves in hidden rooms would be necessary," noted the Austrian consul in Constantinople.⁴⁵ Cumberbatch's earlier unproven accusations of slave-trading were, in turn, used to cast doubt on the veracity of later reports.⁴⁶ The British am-

⁴³ "Return of the Honourable John Rycroft Best of Slaves the Property of Abram P Cumberbatch to Whom He Is Attorney: Clelands," PRO T 71/562, Barbados Slave Register 1834, vol. 10, 182–187, Clelands Plantation, St. Andrew, March 27, 1834. Made available to me by Bob Cumberbatch. Bob Cumberbatch maintains a rich and fascinating website (<http://www.Cumberbatch.org/>) about the genealogy of many branches of the Cumberbatch family, and his assistance in reconstructing Robert William Cumberbatch's biography was priceless. The little I have learned about Robert William Cumberbatch forces me to disagree, strenuously, with the website's epigraph: "The following pages contain the little which is known concerning a family of no social importance, and will consequently only be interesting to those connected with it."

⁴⁴ "Del resto e conosciuto a Smirna il Signor Console Inglese per uomo fantastico, che di spesso sogna simile novita, ed il giornale del paese stesso se ne occupato salvotta per combattere simili fantasticherie." Estratto di lettera del Comando del piroscaro Arciduchessa Carlotta diretta in dato Constantinopoli 7 Feb 1871 al Consiglio di Amministrazione, attached to letter from Lloyd to Maritime Administration, Trieste, February 16, 1871, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90.

⁴⁵ "Forechains": Bloomfield to Beust, Vienna, September 20, 1869, attached to Ministry of Foreign Affairs to Maritime Administration, Vienna, September 23, 1869, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90, Z. 2581/HP; "necessary": Wassitsch to Maritime Administration, Constantinople, December 27, 1869, no. 6241, attached to Maritime Administration to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Trieste, January 9, 1870, Z. 158/HP.

⁴⁶ "Since earlier charges of a similar nature—all arising from the same source, the English Consul bassador at Constantinople, Sir Henry Elliot, tended to agree that Cumberbatch was an alarmist and needed to be restrained.⁴⁷ Britain's public stance—the stance from which it hoped to earn “moral capital”—depended upon an always untenable distinction between slave-trading and slaveholding.⁴⁸ The instructions issued to the British Navy in 1866 (two years after Cumberbatch took office and some months after the passage of the 13th Amendment in the United States) recognized “the distinction between the export of slaves to which Great Britain is determined to put an end and the system of Domestic Slavery with which she claims no right to interfere.”⁴⁹ Cumberbatch's energetic complaints threatened to draw too much attention to the limitations of this policy—he, it seems, was opposed not only to the slave trade, but to slavery itself.⁵⁰ He also was convinced that Ottoman law prohibited both—a position that both the Ottoman general of the province in which he was stationed and his colleagues in the British Foreign Service found not only naïve, but wrong.⁵¹ In addition to spying on Austrian ships at harbor in Smyrna, he took into custody slaves who lodged complaints of cruel treatment or illegal enslavement, irritating both the Ottoman governor-general of the surrounding province and the British foreign secretary who ultimately had to deal with the governor-general's ire.

Henry Barron, secretary of the British embassy in Constantinople, cautioned Cumberbatch that Britain must not “allow the impression to gain ground that Her Cumberbatch in Smyrna—turned out to be unfounded, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs believes it can safely let the matter rest.” Ministry of Foreign Affairs to Maritime Administration, Vienna, December 30, 1870, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90, Z. 3383. Sister Charlotte Pilz, German by birth, worked as a deaconess with the Lutheran Sisters of Charity in Jerusalem, which ran an orphanage, a diocesan school, an infirmary, and an evangelical hospice. The sisters had adopted an Abyssinian slave girl after purchasing her freedom. William Henry Bartlett, Jerusalem Revisited (London, 1863), 62; Jakob Eisler, “Charlotte Pilz (1819–1903),” in Adelheid von Hauff, ed., Frauen gestalten Diakonie, vol. 2: Vom 18. bis zum 20. Jahrhundert (Stuttgart, 2007), 252–255. According to Florence Nightingale, she spoke “English and Arabic tolerably—not correctly” and was “an educated woman.” Nightingale, Florence Nightingale's European Travels, ed. Lynn McDonald (Waterloo, Ont., 2004), 596.

⁴⁷ T. G. Otte, “‘A Course of Unceasing Remonstrance’: British Diplomacy and the Suppression of the Slave Trade in the East, 1852–1898,” in Hamilton and Salmon, Slavery, Diplomacy and Empire, 111.

⁴⁸ The reference, of course, is to Brown, Moral Capital.

⁴⁹ Quoted in Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 118. The instructions pertained explicitly to “the slavery practiced by Africans” in West Africa, but also aptly described Britain's position vis-à-vis the Sublime Porte. The ambassador in Constantinople, Henry Elliot, was instructed by the Foreign Office in 1873 to endeavor to enter into an agreement with the Porte that would ban “the export and import of slaves,” but added, “we think that however desirable it would be to suppress domestic slavery, it would not be expedient to press the point as an indispensable condition of the agreement.” Foreign Office to Sir H. Elliot, July 11, 1873, no. 8, enciphered telegram and following note, NAFO 84/1370, 13, 14, 15.

⁵⁰ For a more nuanced discussion of the internal dissension regarding the tenability of an anti-slaving policy that did not attack Ottoman slaveholding, see Erdem, Slavery in the Ottoman Empire and Its Demise, 74–79.

⁵¹ Elliot wrote to the Foreign Office in August 1870 that he was unable to take action against slavery in the Ottoman Empire because there were no legal grounds to do so: “Sir Philip Francis' statement of the Ottoman Law in respect to slavery, forwarded in another dispatch, sufficiently shows that I should not have been justified in representing the act as illegal; and the practice which has been sanctioned by immemorial usage having nothing in it revolting to Turkish feeling, no remonstrance could have been made against it, unless by taking up a ground which would have been regarded as in the highest degree offensive. With the knowledge that not only the wife of the Grand Vizir had been a Circassian slave, but that ladies in a still more exalted position had belonged to the same class, Your Lordship will understand that I should have been guilty of a gross impropriety if I had gone to Aali Pasha and insisted upon the debasing consequences of an institution, which nobody can think more hateful than I do.” H. Elliot to Earl Granville, Therapia, August 16, 1870, Slave Trade no. 5, NAFO 84/1324, 108–109.

Majesty's Consulates are to become asylums for runaway slaves."⁵² Such an impression would unsettle the monarchy's relations with the Sublime Porte and embarrass local dignitaries and officials, whose slaves were often among those who sought asylum in the first place. Moreover, British officials believed that it could potentially cause political unrest.⁵³ Elliot saw fit to "recall" to Cumberbatch's attention the foreign secretary's orders "prescribing caution" and to restrict his attention to the slave trade.⁵⁴ Indeed, passage of Great Britain's trade-oriented Abolition Act had, from the very beginning, required that abolitionists step back from a ban on slavery as an institution; according to Boyd Hilton, abolitionists had "in many cases only managed to persuade MPs to vote for the abolition of the trade by promising they would leave the wider question alone."⁵⁵

This, then, was the state of affairs in June 1870, when Druscovich and the Mars hove to in the harbor of Smyrna: most Western European powers had formally agreed to cooperate to outlaw and prevent the slave trade. In the Ottoman Empire, a January 1857 firman had banned the trade in African slaves, but it did not carry the full weight of a law, and it was never enforced; the acting British consul general in Tripoli and the consul general who replaced him called it "a mere fiction" and "a solemn mockery," respectively.⁵⁶ Slavery itself continued without pretense of prohibition. The Austrian Lloyd had rebuffed dozens of accusations of slave-trading by pointing to a complete lack of evidence. Cumberbatch had a reputation for overdeveloped fantasy, and he had been instructed to limit his anti-slavery zeal to reporting on the slave trade, not helping enslaved persons in Smyrna file suit against their erstwhile masters.

The search of the Mars, to the dismay of Druscovich, revealed that there were indeed enslaved children on board. This was, as even the Austrian foreign minister had to admit, "a positive case of slave transport"—significant not for the quantity of people involved, but because it could not be denied. The first of the children was an 18-year-old boy, purchased in Egypt on behalf of a pasha in Constantinople who had sent a servant to Egypt to execute the transaction. In Alexandria, the boy had ⁵² H. Barron to F. R. Drummond-Hay, Constantinople, January 11, 1870, reprinted in British and Foreign State Papers, 1870–1871, vol. 61 (London, 1877), 415.

⁵³ Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 70. In 1844, Cuban government officials convicted the British consul in Cuba, David Turnbull, of being a "prime mover" behind an alleged conspiracy to incite a slave revolt there—commonly known as La Escalera—because of his anti-slavery agitation. See Robert L. Paquette, Sugar Is Made with Blood: The Conspiracy of La Escalera and the Conflict between Empires over Slavery in Cuba (Middletown, Conn., 1988).

⁵⁴ H. Elliot to Earl Granville, Therapia, July 17, 1870, reprinted in British and Foreign State Papers, 1870–1871, 420.

⁵⁵ Hilton, "1807 and All That," 71.

⁵⁶ In an April 9, 1857, letter to Canning, Clarendon declared that "the regulations which [it contains], if carried out in good faith, are sufficient for the purpose for which they are required." They were not carried out in good faith. Quoted in Boahen, Britain, the Sahara, and the Western Sudan; "in good faith," 156; "a mere fiction" (July 1858) and "a solemn mockery" (November 1863), 158. The trade in "white" (i.e., Caucasian—most commonly Circassian, but also Georgian) slaves was banned temporarily during the Crimean War, from about 1854 to 1858. Toledano, Slavery and Abolition in the Ottoman Middle East, 32. Miers notes that even "on the eve of the Berlin conference," that is, in the 1880s, "Turkish cooperation against the trade existed on paper only." Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 86. Elliot complained to the Sublime Porte that "notwithstanding the many clear cases which I have brought under the notice of the Imperial Authorities on no single occasion has the Slave Dealer been dealt with as the law requires." H. Elliot to [illeg.] Pasha, Constantinople, April 14, 1873, Copy no. 51, NAFO 84/1370, 47.

been issued a tezkere, the internal passport that Ottoman subjects were required to obtain for domestic travel, in which his civil status was clearly marked as kul—one of the many designations for “slave” available in Ottoman Turkish.⁵⁷ The second was a 16-year-old Ethiopian boy, traveling without a companion, who was returning from a “cure” in Egypt. There were two small children, a brother and sister between 8 and 10 years old, traveling with a Greek merchant and his biological offspring. The merchant told the authorities that the African children had been baptized and were being raised as his own. Cumberbatch’s report additionally mentioned three young boys who had been taken violently in a raid in Abyssinia and then transported in a convoy of more than 100 children, first to Medina and then on to Egypt. Cumberbatch took all the children into custody—the youngest pair clinging tearfully to the legs of their adopted siblings until the Greek merchant himself led them to the consulate. Cumberbatch found positions for most of them in Smyrna, but was reported by the Austrian consul to have returned the littlest ones to their self-proclaimed foster father.

The discovery of the enslaved children on board the Mars was unwelcome to many. It was unwelcome to the Greek merchant. It was unwelcome to Captain Druscovich, who, although he hid from the shame of the search by steadfastly refusing to leave his cabin until it was complete, could not hide from the shame of the investigation that followed. It was unwelcome to the British Foreign Office, which wished that Cumberbatch had been slightly less zealous in revealing the limitations of the anti-slave trade agreements that Britain had reached with the Sublime Porte. It was unwelcome to the Austrian consul in Smyrna, the Austrian consul general and ambassador in Constantinople, and the Austrian Foreign Ministry in Vienna—all of whom had been proudly denying, despite accusations reaching all the way back to 1850, that any Austrian ship had ever transported any slave across the Mediterranean.

And the disquieting accusations continued to come: the Jupiter, the Arciduchessa Carlotta, the Apollo, the Vesta, the Urano, the Diana, the Memphis—within a matter of months, almost every large Lloyd steamer servicing the Alexandria-to-Constantinople route was found to be carrying slaves through Smyrna, some of them repeatedly.

Austrians were tempted to lay all the blame at the feet of Cumberbatch himself. Were his motives perhaps personal? Was he trying to “lame the powerful competition that Lloyd ships give the English merchant marine in the seaports of the Levant,” advancing the fortunes of the British Empire by cynically using the problem of slavery to undermine those with longer histories in the Mediterranean, as the Austrian maritime administration speculated?⁵⁸ Was he putting to use monies made available by “some sort of British philanthropic organization”—funds without which he could not afford to take “these sorts of precautionary measures”?⁵⁹ In either case, the Austrians argued, he was artificially creating the appearance of a crisis. “Mr. Cumberbatch,” complained the Austro-Hungarian consul general in Smyrna, Baron Baum, “appears to have made sleuthing rumored slaves and slave children the particular focus of his official duties here, which may also be the reason why this type of smuggling, which has occurred more or less secretly since time immemorial, would emerge exactly in the past few years, and only in the transit station of Smyrna.”⁶⁰ A strange defense indeed.

⁵⁷ For a listing of other words for “slave” in Turkish, Arabic, Persian, and Hebrew, see R. Brunschvig, “‘Abd,” in The Encyclopedia of Islam, new ed., vol. 1 (Leiden, 1960), 24.

⁵⁸ Maritime Administration to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Trieste, February 24, 1871, no. 1155/SB, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90, Z. 433/HP. Other European powers frequently expressed suspicion of Britain’s true motives and fear that its “anti-slavery policy cloaked political and economic ambitions” that were advanced by Britain’s ability to “interfere with the trade of rival commercial and maritime powers by harassing their shipping.” Indeed, “it was often impossible to distinguish between a policy aimed at suppressing the slave traffic and one designed to further British commercial, strategic or political interests.” Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 13, 33. Paul Lovejoy concurs that “at times it proved useful for one European country to condemn another because too little was being done to end the evil institution.” Lovejoy, Transformations in Slavery, 270.

No longer was Cumberbatch “fantastical”—no longer could a captain aver, as had Druscovich, that “there can be no slaves on an Austrian ship.” Or could he? In the 1870s, instead of denying the presence of slaves on the ships of the Austrian Lloyd, Austrian consuls, statesmen, and representatives of the company denied the fundamental underlying premise of their enslavement: that it was involuntary. Their argument was woven together from four strands, so tightly bound to one another that they are nearly impossible to disentangle. The first strand was practical: it was not possible to tell a slave from a servant, at least not in the time allotted to the captain of a ship that sailed according to a schedule; they were distinct in neither race nor bearing nor behavior. The second was cultural: “slavery” as practiced in the Ottoman Empire bore no resemblance to the plantation or chattel slavery of the Western Hemisphere, and was generally both humane and mild. The third strand was legal (or at least legalistic): absent the demonstration of any dissatisfaction with their condition or desire to change it, slaves were not really enslaved and thus could not be freed. The fourth was existential: if taken to its logical conclusion, the Lloyd’s refusal of responsibility for the enforcement of the treaties banning the slave trade threatened to undermine the entire premise of diplomacy—that statesmen could enter into binding international agreements, and that private individuals, both citizens and corporations, would then have the responsibility of executing those agreements in practice.

Each of these contentions—we cannot stop the slave trade; it is not important that we stop this particular slave trade; we are not sure that the slaves being traded are really slaves in the true sense of the word; and it may be someone’s job to stop the slave trade, but it is not ours—rested on the basic premise that there were no socially visible markers of enslavement that could set off a chain of actions resulting in emancipation (not to mention repatriation). Captain G. Lombardini, of the Diana, insisted that he “could not possibly tell who is a free servant and who is a slave” aboard his ship.⁶¹ The director of the Lloyd further excused the captains’ willful ignorance with this comment: “The circumstances of traffic in the Orient are such that a steamship company that transports passengers is inevitably exposed to the possibility of boarding slaves without the knowledge of the captain or the shipping agent.”⁶² The slave trade, he suggested, was as much a necessary incident of the Mediterranean trade as the passage of water through the ballast tanks of boats.

⁵⁹ Baron Baum to Prokesch-Osten, Smyrna, July 12, 1870, no. 682/XXIII, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90.

⁶⁰ Ibid.

⁶¹ “Non posso conoscere se sono liberi servi o schiavi.” Protocol of the interview of G. Lombardini by Direttore Navale Sig. A. Cav. Di Tappo, enclosed with letter #797 from Lloyd to Maritime Administration, Trieste, October 17, 1871, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90.

IN CONTRAST TO GREAT BRITAIN, where the debate over slavery was public and spirited, and its political, economic, and cultural ramifications were great—even for those whose own liberty, security, and happiness were not at stake—the public and politicians in Austria indulged in a comfortable conviction that slavery was not particularly relevant to their domestic or foreign policy—except to the extent that their own countrymen and countrywomen were its victims. In the early modern period, Austrians’ experience with slavery had been as slaves, not slaveholders; stories of the enslavement of Christians by Muslims crossing into Austrian territory on slaving raids, as well as of Mediterranean corsairs and pirates, seemed to confirm Central Europeans’ stereotypes of Eastern despotism versus Western freedom.⁶³ To imagine Austrians as perpetrators rather than victims did not come easily, and as far as most Austrians knew, there was no occasion for it. There was no Austrian equivalent of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society.⁶⁴ After all (again, unlike Britain), Austria had neither any tradition of involvement in the Atlantic slave trade nor any tradition of domestic or colonial slavery. Serfdom was more comparable to slavery in some portions of the monarchy than in others.⁶⁵ It, however, had been eliminated

⁶² Lloyd to Maritime Administration, Trieste, July 5, 1870, no. 599, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90.

⁶³ Anton von Prokesch-Osten, the Habsburgs’ ambassador to Constantinople from 1855 to 1871, had, in the first years of his diplomatic career in the 1820s, been involved in the exchange of Greek slaves for Arab slaves, their numbers reaching into the hundreds. “Schlavenlösung in Modon 1828 u. eine Erinnerung aus 1825,” HHStA, Nachlaß Prokesch-Osten, Schachtel II, Briefwechsel mit verschiedenen Personen. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, Habsburg subjects had been some of the most common targets of Ottoman slavers; by the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the focus had shifted to the Caucasus. The relative predominance of African in comparison with European and Caucasian slaves in the Ottoman Empire peaked in the nineteenth century. Zilfi, Women and Slavery in the Late Ottoman Empire, 104. Even in the heyday of Mediterranean piracy and slaving, it was not only Muslims who seized Christians. Robert Davis has called the era from 1500 to 1800 a “three-centuries-long Christian-Muslim jiḥād” in which “men and women, Turks and Moors, Jews and Catholics, Protestants and Orthodox: all were potential victims, to be seized and eventually herded into the slave pens of Constantinople, Algiers, Tunis, Tripoli, Malta, Naples, or Livorno and resold as galley oarsmen, agricultural laborers, or house slaves.” Davis, Christian Slaves, Muslim Masters: White Slavery in the Mediterranean, the Barbary Coast, and Italy, 1500–1800 (New York, 2003), 140. Catholics—including the Knights of Malta—were among the “most fearsome pirates”; their victims could be Muslims, Jews, or even Orthodox Christians. Molly Greene, Catholic Pirates and Greek Merchants: A Maritime History of the Mediterranean (Princeton, N.J., 2010), 2–4. On the seizure of Austrians by Muslim slave raiders, see Robert Davis, Holy War and Human Bondage: Tales of Christian-Muslim Slavery in the Early-Modern Mediterranean (Santa Barbara, Calif., 2009), 64, 244–246.

⁶⁴ On the Anti-Slavery Society, see Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 30–33. In 1888, Maria Theresia Ledóchowska read a brochure written by the French cardinal Charles Lavigerie, calling on the “Christian women of Europe” to take up their pens and join the fight against slavery in Africa. Ledóchowska immediately wrote a play, Zaida the Negro Girl, and devoted her life to the cause. She resigned from her post as a lady-in-waiting, founded the Missionary Sisters of St. Peter Claver, and published a newsletter called Echo from Africa. According to Ledóchowska, attempts to found an anti-slavery society in the late 1880s were unsuccessful; fundraising was not sufficient to cover the costs of publishing the short-lived Antisklaverei Revue. The first anti-slavery congress in Austria was held in Vienna in 1900. The address given by Ledóchowska on that occasion is available on the website of the Missionsschwester vom hl. Petrus Claver, http://www.petrus-claver.ch/media//DIR_138958/1900_Wien_Die_Antisklaverei-Bewegung.pdf. Paul H. Schmidt, Die selige Maria Theresia Ledóchowska (Bern, 1984).

⁶⁵ Contemporary commentators were most apt to compare the lot of peasants in Hungary and Gali-

gradually (and in some cases repeatedly, thanks to the short-lived and swiftly revoked ambitions of Josephinism)—in the “core” Habsburg lands with the 1811 Allgemeines bürgerliches Gesetzbuch (Austrian Civil Code), and everywhere else by 1848.⁶⁶

It would appear that no one knows for certain what the legal status of an enslaved African in the entourage of a traveler visiting the Habsburg lands would have been before 1811.⁶⁷ Indeed, in the eighteenth century, slavery seems to have had no acknowledged formal existence in Austrian law at all.⁶⁸ The Josephinian Code of 1787, the first formal codification of Austrian laws throughout the Erbländer (Hereditary Lands), elided the problem of slavery—and even serfdom, which was certainly relevant within the empire—by referring to everyone as “subjects” who were entitled to the protection of “state law” and who “enjoy, without exception, complete freedom.”⁶⁹ In a 1796 draft of a comprehensive legal code outlining citizens’ rights, the cia, neither of which enjoyed the benefits of reforms imposed on the “Hereditary Lands,” to that of slaves—as, for example, here: “Unfortunately, however, the peasant of Hungary has scarcely any political rights, and is considered by the government much more than by the landlord, in the light of a slave.” Frederick Shoberl, Austria: Containing a Description of the Manners, Customs, Character and Costumes of the People of That Empire (Philadelphia, 1828), 52. Historians, too, have seen some merit in the comparison; according to Roman Rozdolski, serfs in “Poland” “could be sold without land, and at least occasionally, were sold, and from the sixteenth century enjoyed no legal protection. Even if the lord struck a serf dead, there was no penalty . . . doubtless there were elements of slavery here.” He further noted that serfs’ state of “unfreedom” was determined as much by the economic structure of their relationship to the landlord as by the presence or absence of legal rights. Roman Rosdolsky [sic], Untertan und Staat in Galizien: Die Reformen unter Maria Theresia und Joseph II (Mainz, 1992), 111, 117. His comparison between serfdom and slavery continues from 111 to 121. In the seventeenth century, Bohemian serfs “had to have the lord’s permission to marry, to learn a trade, to sell in the open market, or to travel outside the confines of the lord’s jurisdiction”—permission that could usually be had only in exchange for a fee. In addition, serfs could neither “bring [a] plea before the bar” nor “stand as a witness in a legal action.” All the same, serfs were not slaves: “men were not bought and sold”—nor, one presumes, were women. William E. Wright, Serf, Seigneur, and Sovereign: Agrarian Reform in Eighteenth-Century Bohemia (Minneapolis, 1966), 17, 20.

⁶⁶ Joseph’s first patent to emancipate the serfs, the Leibeigenschaftsaufhebungspatent, was issued in November of 1781, but fell short of giving “the serf unqualified freedom.” Wright, Serf, Seigneur, and Sovereign, 74–75.

⁶⁷ Walter Sauer has done an admirable job of reconstructing as much as possible about the origins of Africans in the Habsburg lands, their pathways to Austria, and their fates while there. Together with Andrea Wiesböck, he presented the beginnings of a prosopography of Africans in Austria in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, based on more than forty known cases. Walter Sauer and Andrea Wiesböck, “Sklaven, Freie, Fremde: Wiener ‘Mohren’ des 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts,” in Sauer, ed., Von Soliman zu Omofuma: Afrikanische Diaspora in Österreich 17. bis 20. Jahrhundert (Innsbruck, 2007), 23–56. He has also uncovered the stories of several African girls “rescued” from slavery in order to be deposited in convents within Austria, and reports on the unhappy fates of two in Vorarlberg in “‘Mohrenmädchen’ in Bludenz, 1855–1858: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der afrikanischen Diaspora in Österreich,” Vierteljahresschrift für Geschichte und Gegenwart Vorarlbergs 56, no. 4 (2004): 293–300.

⁶⁸ When Jakob Haly tried to flee from his Ottoman owner during a visit to Vienna, for example, his case was determined ad hoc by the emperor, and revolved more around his willingness to convert to Catholicism than around any set rules about manumission. Sauer and Wiesböck, “Sklaven, Freie, Fremde,” 35. There is no mention of slavery in Carl von Hock’s authoritative Der österreichische Staatsrath (1760–1848) (Vienna, 1879), which has sections on the administration and legal reforms under Maria Theresa (91 pages), Leopold II (7 pages), Francis II (41 pages), and Ferdinand (13 pages), but is largely devoted to the administration under Joseph II (529 pages), and most particularly to the legal reforms carried out under his rule. Even Joseph II’s attacks on Leibeigenschaft, or serfdom, reveal that he understood it to be a “fundamentally different status than actual ‘slavery.’” Rosdolsky, Untertan und Staat in Galizien, 113. The Codex Theresianus (which never took effect) accepted the enslavement of “heathen” prisoners-of-war. Sauer and Wiesböck, “Sklaven, Freie, Fremde,” 47.

⁶⁹ Josephinisches Gesetzbuch, 1787, Patent vom 1. November 1786, Zweites Hauptstück §1: “Unter dem Schutze, und nach der Leitung der Landesgesetze geniessen alle Unterthanen ohne Ausnahme die vollkommene Freiheit.” I am indebted to Derek Beales for sharing this observation.

Austrian jurist Joseph von Sonnenfels declared that the “benignant Austrian government thought it worthwhile to declare, through the express provision of a law, that it does not permit humankind to be debased into slavery within its realm.”⁷⁰ This tenet, he insisted, had always existed in practice, although it had admittedly never before been expressed. But the absence of a domestic category of slavery did not prevent Africans from traveling to Austria in the retinues of their employers or owners—their status as free servants or slaves drawing so little curiosity that in the few cases in which the Africans’ own names are known, it is difficult to reconstruct exactly what that status was.⁷¹

The most famous case of an African in Austria in the eighteenth century—so famous that it nearly singlehandedly encapsulates the entire category of literature about Africans in the Habsburg Empire—was that of Angelo Soliman.⁷² (See Figure 2.) Soliman was born sometime around 1721; enslaved as a child, he was eventually acquired by a noble household in Messina, Sicily. He came to Austria after many years of service to the Sicilian imperial governor, Prince Johann Georg von Lobkowitz. After Lobkowitz’s death, he entered service in the household of Prince Joseph Wenzel von Liechtenstein, one of the wealthiest and most influential aristocrats in the Habsburg lands.⁷³ Exactly when Soliman was manumitted is unclear: he entered the Lobkowitz household as a slave and left the Liechtenstein household as a self-declared free man after Liechtenstein dismissed him for being secretly mar-

⁷⁰ As quoted in Sigmund Adler, Die politische Gesetzgebung in ihren geschichtlichen Beziehungen zum allgemeinen bürgerlichen Gesetzbuche (Vienna, 1911), 122. This part of Sonnenfels’s proposal was incorporated into the 1811 code.

⁷¹ By the seventeenth century, it was “fashionable” among the Viennese aristocracy (and the aristocracy throughout the Holy Roman Empire) to employ “Moors” and other Africans. The deaths of thirty-two “Africans” were reported to the Viennese magistrate between 1649 and 1798. Walter Sauer, Das afrikanische Wien: Ein Führer zu Bieber, Malangatana, Soliman (Vienna, 1996), 33–34. In the early modern period, Central Europeans were more accustomed to thinking of slavery in the Islamic context as involving the enslavement of Christians by Muslims. Paula Sutter Fichtner, Terror and Toleration: The Habsburg Empire Confronts Islam, 1526–1850 (London, 2008), 42. To contrast the situation in Austria with that in pre-revolutionary France, see Sue Peabody, “There Are No Slaves in France”: The Political Culture of Race and Slavery in the Ancien Régime (Oxford, 1996).

⁷² The literature on Soliman is so substantial that the author of a recently published and absolutely fascinating article on the significance of his attire felt the need to justify her intervention: “there has been no sustained focus on his sartorial fashions.” Heather Morrison, “Dressing Angelo Soliman,” Eighteenth-Century Studies 44, no. 3 (2011): 378 n. 8. That literature reaches back to a biography compiled by Viennese author Karoline Pichler at the request of the French abolitionist Henri Grégoire in 1807. Wilhelm Bauer consulted twenty archives in his 1922 biography of Soliman, republished as Angelo Soliman, der hochfürstliche Mohr: Ein exotisches Kapitel Alt-Wien, ed. Monika Firla-Forkl (Berlin, 1993), 15. More recent literature on Soliman, which reflects his extraordinary prominence in Austrian-African studies, includes Monika Firla, “Angelo Soliman in der Wiener Gesellschaft vom 18. bis 20. Jahrhundert,” in Gerhard Höpp, ed., Fremde Erfahrungen: Asiaten und Afrikaner in Deutschland, Österreich, und in der Schweiz bis 1945 (Berlin, 1996), 69–96; Monika Firla and Hermann Forkl, “Neue Details zur Biographie von Angelo Soliman (um 1721–1796),” Etudes germano-africaines 14 (1996): 119–136; Firla, “Bemerkungen zu zwei kontroversen Punkten in der Biographie Angelo Solimans (um 1721–1796),” Aufklärung, Vormärz, Revolution: Mitteilungen der internationalen Forschungsgruppe “Demokratische Bewegungen in Mitteleuropa 1770–1850” an der Universität Innsbruck 18–19 (1998–1999): 25–39; Walter Sauer, “Angelo Soliman: Mythos und Wirklichkeit,” in Sauer, Von Soliman zu Omofuma, 59–96. The Rollett Museum Baden had a special exhibit on Soliman featuring a plaster bust made immediately after his death: Monika Firla, ed., Angelo Soliman: Ein Wiener Afrikaner im 18. Jahrhundert (Baden, 2004). Sauer, Von Soliman zu Omofuma, contains many essays on other aspects of Africans’ experience of life in Austria. From September 2011 to January 2012, the Wien Museum in Vienna displayed an exhibit on Soliman, “Angelo Soliman: Ein Afrikaner in Wien.”

⁷³ Liechtenstein’s vast properties placed one million subjects under his princely rule. Sauer, “Angelo Soliman,” 66.

FIGURE 2: Angelo Soliman (ca. 1720–1796). Mezzotint by Johann Gottfried Haid, after a painting by Johann Nepomuk Steiner. Soliman was the most famous African to live in Vienna in the eighteenth century. He was respected as a scholar and tutor in his lifetime, but his body's galling posthumous fate as part of a museum display has overshadowed his success in securing a life of relative independence and professional success in imperial Vienna. Oesterreichische Nationalbibliothek, Vienna, Austria. Erich Lessing / Art Resource, N.Y.

ried.⁷⁴ Soliman then supported himself and his family by working as a paid tutor in aristocratic households. He was a freemason, a dandy, a successful gambler, and an admired intellectual who spoke German, Italian, French, Czech, English, and Latin. After his death, his skin was removed, stretched over a wooden frame, fancifully dressed (in ostrich feathers), and displayed as a component of an imperial museum exhibit—a disgraceful move that disregarded his daughter's wishes and has overshadowed the respect he was shown during his lifetime as a desirable tutor who was familiar with the latest scientific discoveries.

Perhaps even more heartrending is the case of the Brazilian-born Emmanuel Rio, who was sent by the Archduchess Leopoldine as a present to her brother, the Archduke Francis, sometime around 1820. In an 1836 portrait, Rio is depicted with all the sensitivity due an individual subject; his devoted gaze at a portrait of Francis I, the imperial hymn on his lap, and the silk stockings tucked into his boots all are signs of the well-respected and grateful imperial subject. (See Figure 3.) His theoretical freedom notwithstanding, he was never able to make decisions about his own fate and was always dependent on the imperial family that came to shun him when he “acted up” in his adulthood.⁷⁵ The core elements of Angelo Soliman's and Emmanuel Rio's lives are typical of those few Africans who did come to the Habsburg lands in the eighteenth century: “capture, slavery, court service with unclear personal legal status [in unklarer personenrechtlicher Position].”⁷⁶ As Austria entered the nineteenth century, “unclear personal legal status” appeared to be good enough.⁷⁷

If there was any place where the personal legal status of Africans was less clear than in Vienna, it was on board the passenger ships of the Mediterranean, where the supposed isomorphism of race and slavery on the Caribbean plantation had no equivalent. One of the striking characteristics of Ottoman slavery was the comparative absence of racial markers. The expectation of relatively rapid manumission (preferably—although not necessarily—after no more than a decade, which is to say, “rapid” from the perspective of the slaveholder), the predominance of sexually vulnerable women among the enslaved, and the law that made any child born to a free slaveholder and his concubine also free meant that there was no necessary connection between skin color and status.⁷⁸ The wives and mothers of grand viziers

⁷⁴ At the time of his marriage, Soliman had to swear that he was not a slave—but that marriage was kept secret from his current employer. Sauer describes the historiographical controversy over Soliman's status ibid., 67–68.

⁷⁵ Ina Markova and Walter Sauer have shared the results of their painstaking search for all available evidence about the life of Emmanuel Rio in “Waldhornblasender Gärtner: Ein schwarzer Brasilianer im vormärzlichen Österreich. Oder: Vom Wilden zum Weltbürger und wieder zurück?” Wiener Geschichtsblätter 66, no. 2 (2011): 95–110. For a closer analysis of the portrait, see Gloria Groom, “Portrait of a Gardener and Horn Player in the Household of the Emperor Francis I,” Art Institute of Chicago Museum Studies 32, no. 1 (2006): 58–59, 95.

⁷⁶ Sauer, Das afrikanische Wien, 37.

⁷⁷ To be fair, Austria was not alone. “The law takes no notice of the Negro [slave],” claimed an English judge in 1706. Even in France, where the “freedom principle” was supposed to render any slave who set foot on French soil instantly free, multiple restrictions and caveats made it impossible for slaves to actually secure freedom by entering France. Peabody, “There Are No Slaves In France,” 3–10; Ada Ferrer, “Haiti, Free Soil, and Antislavery in the Revolutionary Atlantic,” American Historical Review 117, no. 1 (February 2012): 48.

⁷⁸ Manumission was considered a good deed, and there is evidence that many slaveholders voluntarily set their slaves free after a period of service. Slaveholders could manumit slaves in pious celebration of a special event, such as a marriage; to acknowledge the slave's work done over a period of

FIGURE 3: Albert Schindler (1805–1861), Ein Mohr / Waldhornbläser / Gärtner in Laxenburg bei Sr. Maj. / dem Kaiser Franz I. / gemalt von Natur (Portrait of a Gardener and Horn Player in the Household of the Emperor Francis I, 1836). Emmanuel Rio's origins as a slave determined his complete dependence on the support of the imperial family throughout his life. Art Institute of Chicago.

and sultans were often Circassian slaves—the Circassian beauties of nineteenth-century lore—“rescued,” as the official story went, from lives of penury in the Caucasus.⁷⁹ The trade in Circassian women introduced thousands of enslaved Cautime; in honor of a special contract between the slave and the slaveholder agreeing to manumission after its terms were met; or in their wills. Slaveholders were not, however, required to manumit their slaves at all. John Hunwick, “Black Slaves in the Mediterranean World: Introduction to a Neglected Aspect of the African Diaspora,” in Elizabeth Savage, ed., The Human Commodity: Perspectives on the Trans-Saharan Slave Trade (London, 1992), 24.

⁷⁹ Elliot claimed that Circassian slaves “have long been obtained almost entirely from needy families who look upon the admission of these children into a Turkish House as an effectual way of bettering their condition, and as a step on a road which might lead them to the highest honours at which a Turkish woman can hope to arrive. These children, instead of falling, rose in the social scale receiving an education and a treatment far above what they could otherwise have obtained.” H. Elliot to Earl Granville re: “Arrival of Circassian Slaves at Smyrna,” Slave Trade no. 4, Constantinople, March 8, 1873, 29–30, NAFO 84/1370. A columnist for the New York Times commented on the relationships between the casians into the Ottoman Empire. Dark skin was no more a guarantee of enslavement than light skin was of freedom. Indeed, the rare but prominent cases in which slaves reached positions of power, including grand vizier, also meant that there was no necessary connection between enslavement and status—a point often made by the defenders of Ottoman slavery.

The British themselves were confounded by the intricacies of Ottoman slavery; the rights they had secured, in treaty after treaty, to search Atlantic ships were considered to be without value or effect in the Mediterranean. The head of the Slave Trade Department of the Foreign Office in 1869, William H. Wylde, recommended against pursuing a treaty with the Ottomans that would allow British vessels the right to search Ottoman vessels in the Mediterranean—a measure that had been repeatedly considered (and rejected) since at least the 1850s. His argument was that “the steamers that carry slaves carry also passengers of all denominations, pilgrims of all shades of colour, free blacks who are domestic servants of some of the passengers, and free blacks travelling on their own account. How could the Commander of a cruiser discriminate between the slaves and the free blacks, when, as I hear is the case, the former are dressed up the same as their free countrymen?”⁸⁰ But despite its own admitted confusion, the British Foreign Office expected Austrian captains and shipping agents to do just what it knew to be most difficult: discriminate.

Lloyd captains pointed out that in the absence of outward signs of enslavement, determining someone’s status would necessarily involve some form of questioning. Not even the biographical information on a traveler’s tezkere was useful, for it was written in Turkish or Arabic, languages that Lloyd captains did not understand. Interviewing passengers, however, was dismissed as an impossibility. In sworn testimony given in Smyrna, Giovanni Felice Benich (captain of the Urano and accused of transporting eight slaves in July 1871) said, “it is materially and morally impossible for me to examine them—first because I do not know the Arabic or Turkish language, and second because I cannot speak with them without risking a revolution on board of their coreligionists, since the Turkish religion does not permit speaking with women.”⁸¹ The Lloyd executive committee warned that “unbidden intrusions into relations of a very delicate nature would be extremely careless and not seldom bound up with terrible and sad consequences.”⁸² The presumption was that Ottoman society demanded that a traveler—by implication male—and his entourage (containing an unknown and, the captain argued, unknowable combination of wives, concubines, servants, and legally owned slaves) be encased in a veil of privacy that no agent of a shipping company could lift without losing first that customer and then all of his foreign minister, Fuad Pasha, the grand vizier, Aali Pasha, and their respective wives as follows: “they are the most exemplary and dutiful husbands; and . . . the beauty and charms of character of their wives, though at least one of them was bought for so many pieces of silver, originally, as a slave, are such as to insure them for a long time their affections.” “The Levant,” New York Times September 23, 1852, 2.

⁸⁰ Wylde’s note was written in response to a letter from Elliot to Clarendon, July 20, 1869, and is reproduced here as quoted in Boahen, Britain, the Sahara, and the Western Sudan, 157.

⁸¹ Protocollo assunto nella Cancelleria dell’i.R. Consolato G[enera]le d’Austria-Ungheria in Smirne li 29 Luglio 1871, transcript attached to [illeg.] to Beust, Constantinople, August 1, 1871, no. 27 AB/HP, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90.

⁸² Lloyd to Maritime Administration, Trieste, July 5, 1870, no. 599, attached to Lloyd to Maritime Administration, Trieste, February 16, 1871, attached to Maritime Administration to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Trieste, February 24, 1871, no. 1155, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90, Z. 433/HP.

countrymen and coreligionists. The untenable distinction between slave-trading and slaveholding was supported here by the invocation of social distance, sexual exoticism, and cultural inscrutability.

Cumberbatch rejected the premise that slaves could not be identified on sight. "If the supercargo on board the Austrian Lloyd's steamer, or at least the agents at Alexandria, cannot perceive that they have frequently carried slaves on board their vessels, . . . their eyesight must be remarkably obscure." He went on to describe the obvious markers that the Austrian consuls and agents were willfully ignoring. "If," he wrote to the British foreign secretary, the Earl of Clarendon, "the Austrian Consular officers at Constantinople and Smyrna call African children dressed in the white flowing Nubian dress, with metal bracelets and anklets, accompanied by slave-dealers, 'servants,' or 'members of Oriental families,' they cannot declare them to be free agents: therefore, they are slaves in my estimation."⁸³ Cumberbatch insisted here on the legibility of visual evidence: the distinctive clothing and jewelry of the children marked them as Nubian, and therefore as not-yet-Ottoman. Even more remarkably, he compressed the full spectrum of bonded, hierarchical, and coercive social relations—including those between husband and wife and between father and child—into slavery. For Cumberbatch, it seems, there was no unfreedom that was not rightly called slavery.

The power of visual evidence was called upon to opposite effect by the minister of foreign affairs in Vienna. Where Cumberbatch saw slavery in every social relation, the foreign minister deduced slavery from a narrow range of telltale signs: bruises, cuts, and chains. This did not immediately let the Lloyd off the hook; in reference to the three slave boys who had reported their violent capture in Abyssinia, the minister angrily wrote: "We can hardly accept that these slave boys, on whom the traces of violence are surely to be found, were not recognizable as such at their embarkation in Alexandria, and the captain of the Mars is thus at the very least guilty of neglect."⁸⁴ But the emphasis on "traces of violence" as proof of enslavement did offer the Lloyd the chance to make the usual excuses: the ship's doctor had seen no signs of violence, and besides, there were 600 passengers on board, with no time for detailed inspections of their persons.

The larger question was not whether a child violently seized in a raid could be recognized as a slave, or even whether a child kept in a slave pen in North Africa for weeks, fed and tended until the signs of deprivation had been hidden in order to make a more profitable sale, could be recognized as a slave—but rather the character of Ottoman slavery and the extent of Austrian responsibility for helping it function. What, for instance, should be made of the 16-year-old Ethiopian returning to Constantinople, unaccompanied by a slaveholder or dealer, after his owner had sent him to Egypt for a cure? This was a case where the epistemology of European liberalism was incapable of imagining forms of violence and coercion that went beyond the physical, and therefore proclaimed the absence of coercion as fact. The Austro-Hungarian consul general in Constantinople thought he knew something about Ottoman slavery that made the boy's return sensible. "That which Europeans understand under the term 'slavery' does not exist here," he explained. "While the mass of free people starves, the slave wallows in luxurious excess in his master's palace . . . The Circassian and the Nubian consider it a great fortune to be brought into a Constantinople harem even as unfree servants, and follow the agent who brings them here with pleasure."⁸⁵ Cumberbatch's accusations, the Lloyd insisted, revealed "a complete ignorance of those social relations peculiar to the Orient."⁸⁶ The arguments made by the Austrian Lloyd and reiterated by Austro-Hungarian consuls and high-ranking diplomats rested on the presumption that they understood something about the nature of Ottoman slavery that Cumberbatch and other interventionist British consuls in the Ottoman Empire did not: something, they asserted, that placed Ottoman slavery, slavery though it was, outside the general European consensus regarding anti-slavery.⁸⁷ This vision of Ottoman slavery fully conformed to the public image of that institution promoted by the Ottomans themselves.

⁸³ Cumberbatch to the Earl of Clarendon, Smyrna, February 28, 1870 (received March 14, 1870), reprinted in British and Foreign State Papers, 1870–1871, 446.

⁸⁴ Draft of outgoing note from Ministry of Foreign Affairs to Maritime Administration, Vienna, June 28, 1870, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90, Z. 2150/HP.

There is some truth to the argument that, in the nineteenth century, slavery in the Ottoman Empire was unlike slavery in the Western Hemisphere. First, it was heavily female—the vast majority of enslaved Africans (and for that matter Circassians) brought to the Ottoman Empire were girls.⁸⁸ Second, with very few exceptions, slave labor was domestic, not agricultural.⁸⁹ Third, in the Muslim world—

⁸⁵ Wassitsch to Maritime Administration, Constantinople, December 27, 1869, no. 6241, attached to Maritime Administration to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Trieste, January 9, 1870, no. 8/I, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90, Z. 158/HP. This argument was neither unusual nor novel. Ogier de Busbecq, who was the Holy Roman emperor's emissary in Constantinople from 1554 to 1562, noted (as summarized by Paula Fichtner) that freedom "meant little to people who did not have the means to enjoy it. All human beings, he said, required some authority over them." Fichtner, Terror and Toleration, 79; Suzanne L. Marchand, German Orientalism in the Age of Empire: Religion, Race, and Scholarship (Cambridge, 2009), 9. Similarly, neither the notion of hierarchy nor the idea of lives of more toil than pleasure was fundamentally offensive to the nineteenth-century sensibility. Wilberforce and the other advocates of abolition in the British Parliament believed that "life was a place of moral trial, a moral obstacle course standing between each soul and heaven, and slaves were no more born to be happy than anyone else." Hilton, "1807 and All That," 75.

⁸⁶ Verwaltungsrath der Dampfschiffahrt-Gesellschaft des oesterreichischen Lloyd to Maritime Administration, no. 109, Trieste, February 4, 1872, attached to Maritime Administration to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, no. 1285/F48/V, re: Verwaltungsrath des oesterr. Lloyd über den angeblichen Sklaven-transport am Dampfer "Apollo," Trieste, February 10, 1872, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90.

⁸⁷ Habsburg diplomats could proudly point to a long tradition of study of what they called the Orient. The Imperial Royal Academy of Oriental Languages, or Oriental Academy, was founded in 1754 and trained not only translators and interpreters but also "candidates for the higher grades of the consular and diplomatic corps" in order to prepare them to serve "the political and commercial agenda of the state." Their thorough training in Ottoman language, literature, history, custom, and constitutional law included copying out Turkish sayings such as "He who does not know how to serve does not know how to rule." Thanks to the Oriental Academy, "at the beginning of the nineteenth century, Austria . . . had a clear advantage over its rivals Prussia and Russia in dealing with the Porte." Fichtner, Terror and Toleration, 122, 126, 127, 129.

⁸⁸ By the early nineteenth century, "the overwhelming majority of Ottoman slaves were female, African, and domestic; males, white females, and kul/harem slaves were only a small minority." Toledano, Slavery and Abolition in the Ottoman Middle East, 6–7, 12. "It must be said that in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the slave of the Ottoman slave owner was a woman and that slavery itself was increasingly female." Zilfi, Women and Slavery in the Late Ottoman Empire, 215. See also Claire C. Robertson and Martin A. Klein, eds., Women and Slavery in Africa (Madison, Wis., 1983), 5.

⁸⁹ There was not always a clear distinction between "domestic," "agricultural," and "artisanal" labor. Erdem, Slavery in the Ottoman Empire and Its Demise, 62–64; Michel Fontenay, "Pour une géographie de l'esclavage méditerranéen aux temps modernes," Cahiers de la Méditerranée 65 (2002), <http://cdlm.revues.org/index42.html>. For a discussion of the wide array of "productive tasks" concealed by the "misleading" phrase "domestic slavery," see Clarence-Smith, Islam and the Abolition of Slavery, 3–4. "We

and in the Ottoman Empire specifically—slavery was conceived of as a temporary condition, and one that, though it emerged from capture and sale, was predicated upon the condition of unbelief, not that of race.⁹⁰ Manumission was lauded as a good work; the children of any sexual union between an enslaved woman and her free owner were free at birth, and their mother was to be freed immediately upon the death of her owner.⁹¹

Scholars of Ottoman slavery must tread very carefully. To judge Ottoman slavery to be milder than Western plantation slavery risks appearing apologetic. After all, in the Islamic world, a slave “could be sold, given away or inherited, and his services could be pledged or hired out—all without his consent.”⁹² In the case of female slaves, temporary sale and resale could lead to a form of enslaved prostitution.⁹³ While only non-Muslims could be enslaved, a slave’s conversion to Islam did not result in manumission—a convenient elision of the prohibition on slavery within Dar-al-Islam (the House of Islam).⁹⁴ Enslaved men and women could not own property, nor could they inherit it; their evidence was considered unreliable and generally unacceptable in a court of law. Slaves were not allowed to marry without their owners’ permission; if they were the victims of crime, their lives were considered less valuable than those of their free counterparts.⁹⁵

To judge slavery in the Islamic world harshly, on the other hand, can fit all too easily into orientalist tropes of Eastern barbarity lasting long beyond Western hu-

also know that the human toll of slavery, both physical and cultural, was intimately tied to the exigencies of production, notably the work regimen.” Michel-Rolph Trouillot, Silencing the Past: Power and the Production of History (Boston, 1995), 18. Circassian refugees to the Ottoman Empire did bring their own agricultural slaves with them when they fled the Russian Empire in the 1850s and 1860s. Toledano, Slavery and Abolition in the Ottoman Middle East, 12, 82–84.

⁹⁰ John Hunwick, “Islamic Law and Polemics over Race and Slavery in North and West Africa (16th–19th Century),” in Shaun Marmon, ed., Slavery in the Islamic Middle East (Princeton, N.J., 1999), 43; Bernard Lewis, Race and Slavery in the Middle East: An Historical Enquiry (New York, 1990), 5–8. For a discussion of the interpretations offered by British “men on the spot” of the compatibility of Islam and slavery, see Clarence-Smith, “The British ‘Official Mind’ and Nineteenth-Century Islamic Debates over the Abolition of Slavery,” 125–142.

⁹¹ A concubine who bore her master a child (even a stillborn child) attained the status of ümm-i veled, or mother of a child. An ümm-i veled “could not be sold or otherwise alienated from her master’s household, and she became free upon his death. If her master wished to marry her, he had first to manumit her. An ümm-i veled’s children were free and enjoyed equal legal and social status with the children of their father’s free wife.” Leslie P. Pierce, The Imperial Harem: Women and Sovereignty in the Ottoman Empire (New York, 1993), 30–31. On the many ways in which an ümm-i veled’s status remained vulnerable, see Zilfi, Women and Slavery in the Late Ottoman Empire, 109–113.

⁹² Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 59.

⁹³ “The prostitution of female slaves by dealers and casual buyers was endemic in port cities all over the Mediterranean.” Zilfi, Women and Slavery in the Late Ottoman Empire; 199; Hunwick, “Black Slaves in the Mediterranean World,” 12–13. A Koma woman named Fadl al Saq (presumably a concubine) was sold no fewer than five times during one three-day period in 1877, for the price of 53, 66, 72, 70, and 74 riyals, respectively, leading Jay Spaulding to conclude, “it is difficult to believe that she would have accepted the proposition that ‘a slave in the Sudan was above all a human being, a member of a society or a family.’” Spaulding, “Slavery, Land Tenure and Social Class in the Northern Turkish Sudan,” International Journal of African Historical Studies 15, no. 1 (1982): 13. Spaulding’s internal quotation comes from Abbas Ibrahim Muhammad Ali, The British, the Slave Trade and Slavery in the Sudan, 1820–1881 (Khartoum, 1972), 75.

⁹⁴ Hunwick, “Islamic Law and Polemics over Race and Slavery in North and West Africa,” 52; Lewis, Race and Slavery in the Middle East, 6–8.

⁹⁵ Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 59.

manitarian abolitionism.⁹⁶ Avoiding either of these extremes, several decades of scholarship on slavery in Africa and the Ottoman Empire has shown that domestic labor and “wallowing in luxury” were not the same; that manumission was more frequently extolled than practiced; that mothers of free children were vulnerable to having their status challenged by the heirs to their owners’ estates; that the lives of most women in Constantinople harems were characterized more by the brutal hierarchy of their gendered space than by the putative privileges that came with the status of concubine.⁹⁷ And of course, as William Gervase Clarence-Smith has put it, the fortunes of even the luckiest of slaves “remained vulnerable to the whims of the free.”⁹⁸

Cumberbatch got in trouble with his superiors in part because he repeatedly took under his protection slaves in Smyrna who came to him complaining of ill-treatment. Juma fled to Cumberbatch to get away from his owner, a slave trader who had tried to murder him when he was unable to sell him after a month. Mehmet was shot through the leg when he tried to escape having his ears cut off by his owner. Hadji Mehmet served as a slave from about the age of 9 to the age of 16 and then was duly manumitted. Although he was married, as a free man, in Alexandria, he was pursued so relentlessly there by slave traders intent on re-enslaving him that he fled to the British consulate in Smyrna looking for protection.⁹⁹ Slaves in North Africa jumped over the walls of consulate compounds in an effort to reach the protection of British consuls there, who responded by having their walls built higher.¹⁰⁰ The depredations

⁹⁶ Ehud Toledano critically summarized what was then the latest scholarship on slavery in the Islamic world in the final chapter of Slavery and Abolition in the Ottoman Middle East (135–154) and raised the issue of the “good treatment debate” again in “Bringing the Slaves Back In” (12–24). William Gervase Clarence-Smith, with characteristic brevity, noted: “intellectual paralysis springs from a contradictory desire to condemn slavery and spare Islam.” Clarence-Smith, Islam and the Abolition of Slavery, 1. Hakan Erdem notes that “the result of these two conflicting sets of ideas can often be paralyzing, leading to a ‘neutral’ stance which is not conducive to the study of slavery.” Erdem, Slavery in the Ottoman Empire and Its Demise, xvii. Chouki El Hamel addresses the silence regarding the fact that “Islamic countries generally harboured a benign attitude towards slavery” in “‘Race,’ Slavery and Islam in Maghribi Mediterranean Thought: The Question of the Haratin in Morocco,” Journal of North African Studies 7, no. 3 (2002): 30. John Hunwick mentions a 1983 debate between Sudanese scholar Yusuf Fadl Hasan, who said “slavery is slavery and cannot be beautified by cosmetics” in an effort to provoke “a courageous and objective” discussion of Afro-Arab relations, and the Algerian scholar who retorted that one must emphasize “the Arabs’ humane and familial treatment of their slaves compared with other slave-owning people.” Hunwick, “The Same but Different: Africans in Slavery in the Mediterranean Muslim World,” in John Hunwick and Eve Troutt Powell, The African Diaspora in the Mediterranean Lands of Islam (Princeton, N.J., 2002), x. T. G. Otte complains of “genuflection before current Western intellectual fads” as inhibiting spirited inquiry into the topic. Otte, “‘A Course of Unceasing Remonstrance,’” 93. Suzanne Miers and Igor Kopytoff acknowledge a “squeamishness” that affects Western scholarship. Miers and Kopytoff, eds., Slavery in Africa: Historical and Anthropological Perspectives (Madison, Wis., 1977), 6.

⁹⁷ On gendered hierarchies of the harem, see Pierce, The Imperial Harem, ix, 6–7, 141. On the precarious claim to the rights of the ümm-i veled, see Zilfi, Women and Slavery in the Late Ottoman Empire, 109–113.

⁹⁸ Clarence-Smith, Islam and the Abolition of Slavery, 6.

⁹⁹ Cumberbatch to the Earl of Clarendon, Smyrna, August 28, 1869, reprinted in British and Foreign State Papers, 1869–1870, vol. 60 (London, 1876), 741.

¹⁰⁰ A Manumission Bureau was established in Cairo as a result of the Anglo-Egyptian Anti-Slave Trade Convention of 1877, with the task of issuing manumission papers to escaped slaves and helping them secure “gainful employment”—a plan that provided a “gradualist” alternative to an “outright ban on slavery,” which Lord Cromer believed would not be tolerated by Muslim society. Roger Owen, Lord Cromer: Victorian Imperialist, Edwardian Proconsul (Oxford, 2004), 256. See also Erdem, Slavery in the Ottoman Empire and Its Demise, 92, 171.

of slavery, moreover, were not limited to those who had been personally enslaved. In the Ottoman Empire—where, thanks to high manumission rates, relatively few children were born into slavery—slavery was impossible to maintain without a constant supply of newly enslaved young people. Every African-born slave, however comfortably housed in Constantinople, Smyrna, or Beirut, left behind a mother, a father, siblings, and friends in Africa; every slave who survived the march across the Sahara witnessed many more die along the way.¹⁰¹

According to the terms of §95 of the 1852 penal code, captains of Austrian ships on the Mediterranean were obliged to provide slaves asylum, not to parse complicated questions about the differences among various forms of bondage and the orientalist hegemony of Anglo-Atlantic analytical categories.¹⁰² The automatic provision of asylum was, after all, the very argument that had inspired Druscovich's initial defense—not that he could not tell whether there were slaves on an Austrian ship, but that there could not be any. According to Austrian law and Austro-Hungarian policy, any passenger who approached the captain of an Austrian ship and reported himself or herself to be held in a condition of enslavement was to be immediately escorted to the nearest port and turned over to the Austro-Hungarian consulate. The consul would see that the passenger was freed, and would find him or her suitable employment in the vicinity. The director of the Lloyd used the argument that slaves asked for a captain's protection, in his words, "not infrequently," to demonstrate the captains' willingness to act whenever action was called for.¹⁰³ But according to the Austro-Hungarian consul in Constantinople, "it has not yet occurred that one of the passengers declared to be a serving girl or boy has turned to the captain in order to reclaim his freedom"—an argument the consul general used to suggest, in his words, that "the slaves have no taste for freedom."¹⁰⁴

Now Druscovich's claim that "there can be no slaves on an Austrian ship" appears in a different light. It was not a position of plain ignorance, it was a legalistic position that based its claim on an assertion of the implied consent of each and every pas-

¹⁰¹ The survival rate of slaves who were forced to march from the Sudanic belt to Cyrenaica has been estimated at one in three. There is a substantial literature on the "trail of desolation and death" that the slave trade left behind in Africa. See, in particular, Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 61; Manning, Slavery and African Life; and Walter Rodney, How Europe Underdeveloped Africa (London, 1972). This same outrage was apparent to, and bemoaned by, William Pitt in his now-famous speech of April 2, 1792, before the House of Commons: "Do you think nothing of the ruin and the miseries in which so many other individuals, still remaining in Africa, are involved in consequence of carrying off so many myriads of people? Do you think nothing of their families which are left behind? Of the connections which are broken? Of the friendships, attachments and relationships that are burst asunder? Do you think nothing of the miseries in consequence, that are felt from generation to generation? . . . What do you yet know of the internal state of Africa?" The Speech of the Right Hon. William Pitt, in the House of Commons, on the 2d of April, 1792, on the Subject of the African Slave Trade (Newcastle, 1824), 22–23.

¹⁰² For a field-defining analysis of those German speakers who did try to create a scholarly understanding of the Ottoman Empire, see Marchand, German Orientalism in the Age of Empire.

¹⁰³ Lloyd to Maritime Administration, Trieste, July 5, 1870, no. 599, attached to Lloyd to Maritime Administration, Trieste, February 16, 1871, attached to Maritime Administration to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Trieste, February 24, 1871, no. 1155, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90, Z. 433/HP.

¹⁰⁴ Wassitsch to Maritime Administration, Constantinople, December 27, 1869, no. 6241, attached to Maritime Administration to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Trieste, January 9, 1870, Trieste, no. 8/I, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90, Z. 158/HP. Compare this to the problem of slavery within Africa: "it is assumed that all slaves must be unhappy, since their autonomy is so severely restricted. If they do not appear unhappy, then their autonomy is either not so limited or for some reason they do not feel that it is." Miers and Kopytoff, Slavery in Africa, 5.

senger who did not complain. “The ships’ captains,” the consul general further explained, “see their passengers in whatever light they themselves wish to be seen.” If they wished to give the appearance that they were traveling as servants, not slaves, then so be it. In its defense of Captain G. Giurovich, who was accused of transporting slaves on board the Apollo, the Lloyd administration insisted that without a spontaneous declaration on the part of the slave, the captain was “neither obligated nor entitled to substitute his own initiative for that of those whose interests are most immediately at stake in order to investigate the personal circumstances of the passengers. Such an inquisitorial course of action would have dreadful consequences for the Lloyd.”¹⁰⁵ In effect, the Lloyd argued that the unbidden termination of slavery on board its ships would constitute its own form of enslavement—that is, the forced substitution of one person’s initiative for another’s. Such a position would make abolition as a humanitarian act impossible: the slave would have to bear responsibility for liberating herself—she would have to exert her own force of will in order to demand action on the part of the captain. Beneath her slavery, she would have to know that she was free.

That this argument was self-serving is self-evident. But its flaws were nevertheless pointed out by the same Austrian officials who would have preferred to argue that Austria was, ultimately, blameless. When asked by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to compare Austria’s anti-slavery legislation to that of other powers, and to ascertain whether Austrian ships were particularly prone to accommodating slave traders because of loopholes in the legal system, Anton von Prokesch-Osten, the ambassador in Constantinople, determined that the laws themselves were sound. “Our laws,” he reported, “leave little to be desired. The communication of the law, however, cannot be judged favorably. Those slaves who set foot on board an Austrian ship under the designation of children, relatives, or servants of the slave driver, only seldom realize that their master no longer has the slightest power over them. It occurs to no one,” he continued, “to educate the children of the desert about their rights.”¹⁰⁶ Prokesch reiterated Druscovich’s emphasis on what both believed to be the real-life relevance of the law: the slaves were not slaves, because the law had freed them. Their masters no longer had the slightest power over them. Their passage from terrestrial slavery to maritime freedom back to terrestrial slavery might have been invisible to the slaves, and immaterial to the prospects that anything would actually be done about the Mediterranean slave trade, but it was essential to the maintenance of the enabling fiction that Austrian law was sovereign on Austrian ships.

Prokesch, unlike Druscovich, seemed to understand the paradoxical aspect of unknown rights, and his solution was literally to paper it over: to mount a tablet with the respective portions of Austrian legislation in a prominent place on each Lloyd ship. In addition, he proposed, “the ship’s officer should be assigned the duty of translating these legal passages to every individual who could possibly be a slave before departure and before disembarkation and to add that every slave who would like to be free and protected in freedom should come forward. If no one comes forward, so the proof is delivered that all follow their leaders willingly—and therefore, in the sense of the law, are not slaves.”¹⁰⁷ The maritime administration offered a sober evaluation of this proposal: it would “not have the desired practical effect—either because of a lack of language ability on the part of the slaves or because of their fear of speaking before their ever-present owners.”¹⁰⁸ Note that it was the slaves’ lack of language ability that was blamed, and not that of the ships’ officers of the Austrian Lloyd, who were widely known to speak no languages but Italian and sometimes Croatian—not German, not French, not English, and certainly not Ottoman Turkish, Arabic, or any sub-Saharan language.¹⁰⁹

¹⁰⁵ Verwaltungsrath der Dampfschiffahrt-Gesellschaft des oesterreichischen Lloyd to Maritime Administration, no. 109, Trieste, February 4, 1872, attached to Maritime Administration to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, no. 1285/F48/V, re: Verwaltungsrath des oesterr. Lloyd über den angeblichen Sklaven-transport am Dampfer “Apollo,” Trieste, February 10, 1872, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90.

¹⁰⁶ Prokesch-Osten to Beust, Constantinople, May 10, 1870, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90, Z. 1660/HP.

The documents left behind by Druscovich, Prokesch, the maritime administration, the minister of foreign affairs, and the Austrian corporate or public officials who commented on the intractable problem of the Mediterranean slave trade are not primarily concerned with the slaves’ true capacity for liberal, self-interested promotion of their rights in the single-minded pursuit of freedom, or the lack thereof. Aside from this one comment about the “ever-present owners,” there is no acknowledgment of the forces operating to compel people to proceed quietly from port to port, Austrian laws notwithstanding. No acknowledgment that many of these slaves were children, or that most of them were (also) female. No discussion of even the remotest possibility of returning any of them to the land of their birth or the families from whom they had been stolen. No comment on the fate of an African without any semblance of a social network left to his or her own devices in a foreign land. No recognition of the social vacuum represented by the liberal notion of “freedom” to the sensibilities of a person accustomed to thinking in terms of kinship.¹¹⁰ No plan for what to do in cases such as that of a group of women who were allegedly sequestered under a tent for the entire duration of their voyage so that no passengers

¹⁰⁷ Ibid.

¹⁰⁸ Maritime Administration to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Trieste, July 8, 1871, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90, Z. 1633/HP.

¹⁰⁹ According to the vice-consul of the consulate in Hong Kong, even Lloyd captains servicing the Trieste–Bombay and other Asian routes spoke neither German nor English, which prevented them from collecting necessary information about the ports they visited. Nikolaus Post, “Bericht über die anlässlich seiner in der Zeit vom 2. Februar bis 19. März l. J. auf Schiffen des oest. Lloyd zurückgelegten Ausreise von Triest nach Hong Kong gemachten Wahrnehmungen, den Betrieb und Dienst der vorerwähnten Schiffahrtsgesellschaft betreffend,” to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Hong Kong, May 30, 1900, HHStA MdA AR Fach 68/2: Beschwerden über den öst. Lloyd.

¹¹⁰ “Most Africans belonged to a lineage, clan or other kinship group to which they owed clearly understood obligations and in which they had defined rights. This group protected them both spiritually and materially . . . To a member of such a close-knit group the European concept of the ‘free’ or autonomous individual was meaningless . . . Liberated captives generally thought the only real freedom lay in being returned to their own people.” Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 119–120. “In most African societies, ‘freedom’ lay not in a withdrawal into a meaningless and dangerous autonomy but in attachment to a kin group, to a patron, to power—an attachment that occurred within a well-defined hierarchical framework . . . Here the antithesis of ‘slavery’ is not ‘freedom’ qua autonomy but rather ‘belonging.’” Miers and Kopytoff, Slavery in Africa, 17. On the other hand, “considering the Ottoman case, the sweeping concept of social alienation (or kinlessness), has a limited explanatory power for slavery in the Empire, since the proximity and intimacy of daily interaction between owner and slave produced what is sometimes called ‘fictive-kin’ relations that incorporated the slave—via the elite household—into the social networks (intisap) of Ottoman society, often effectively compensating for the lack of natural kin relations, though certainly at a psychological cost.” Ehud Toledano, “The Concept of Slavery in Ottoman and Other Muslim Societies: Dichotomy or Continuum,” in Miura Toru and John Edward Philips, eds., Slave Elites in the Middle East and Africa: A Comparative Study (London, 2000), 172.

(or crewmembers) could even lay eyes on them.¹¹¹ The maritime administration encouraged the adoption of Prokesch's suggestion because it would, in their words, "at least avoid the appearance of the ship's commander's complicity in any slave transports that might occur."¹¹² It could not, however, be expected to make those transports less likely.

Thus far, the interests of the Austrian Lloyd and the interests of the Foreign Ministry and consular corps appear to have been aligned. Their alignment was one of the Lloyd's key arguments: the minister of foreign affairs could not possibly ask the company to act against its own corporate interests, for the pursuit of those interests benefited all Austrians. But the final strand in the argument defending the Lloyd against the compulsion to take a more proactive stand against slavery was one that exposed a fundamental difference between the diplomatic needs of the Austrian Empire and the business needs of its largest shipping company. After twenty young African slaves were found aboard the steamer Apollo in October 1871, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs complained that "the ever-increasing cases of slave transports on Lloyd ships—especially larger transports—appear to lend a certain authority to the English consul in Smyrna's complaints about the lax application of regulations to suppress the slave trade in the Orient, by virtue of which the prestige and honor of the imperial flag is endangered."¹¹³ Would not the Lloyd take special measures to protect the flag that protected it?

The Lloyd administration insisted that "the Lloyd company and its organs do not have the attributes of a police authority and are not in the slightest authorized to worry about the individual affairs of the passengers—whether white or colored."¹¹⁴ Here it is not the proclaimed racial blindness of the Lloyd that was truly radical, but the brazen refusal to enforce the law. The maritime administration official who interviewed Druscovich after the Mars incident had to agree that "not only would the meticulous investigation of the personal relations of the passengers damage the Lloyd's commerce, it cannot possibly be the concern of a private company to play police."¹¹⁵ The conviction that passengers chose shipping lines that provided more comfort and less control was even reflected in the popular press. In response to a proposal that the Lloyd should employ navy veterans, the Triester Zeitung claimed that Austrian passengers, too, "prefer those ships where they find less discipline and more personal freedom."¹¹⁶ The Lloyd's duty to its shareholders, and to the Austrian tax-

¹¹¹ The Viennese traveler Ida Pfeiffer reported this case with horror in Pfeiffer, Reise einer Wienerin in das Heilige Land: Unternommen im März bis Dezember 1842 (Vienna, 1844), 65. My thanks to Walter Sauer for directing me to this source.

¹¹² Maritime Administration to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Trieste, July 8, 1871, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90, Z. 1633/HP.

¹¹³ Ministry of Foreign Affairs to Maritime Administration, Vienna, October 11, 1871, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90, Z. 2518/HP.

¹¹⁴ Verwaltungsrath der Dampfschiffahrt-Gesellschaft des oesterreichischen Lloyd to Maritime Administration, no. 109, Trieste, February 4, 1872, attached to Maritime Administration to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, no. 1285/F48/V, re: Verwaltungsrath des oesterr. Lloyd über den angeblichen Sklaventransport am Dampfer "Apollo," Trieste, February 10, 1872, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90.

¹¹⁵ "Bericht der k.k. Seebehörde vom 19 Oktober 1871 Z 9127 über den neuerlich vorgekommenen Fall eines Sklaventransports auf dem Lloyd dampfer 'Diana,'" Maritime Administration to Ministry of Foreign Affairs, no. 9127, Trieste, October 19, 1871, HHStA MdA AR F34SR90, Z. 2655/HP.

¹¹⁶ "Der Triester Lloyd und die Kriegsmarine," Triester Zeitung, undated clipping marked February 1869, in the Lloyd archive, Museo del Mare, Archivio Storico del Lloyd Triestino, 159v, 276 (11/510) 3609.

payers who subsidized its shipping lines, was to maintain its commercial strength in the Eastern Mediterranean, and not endanger its market share. Who in Austria would benefit if the Lloyd refused to honor legally purchased tickets, harassed its passengers, and showed no sensitivity to the precepts of Islam?

It was not the Lloyd's job to execute an anti-slave trade treaty signed by Austria according to the spirit of the law—but only to ensure that each traveling passenger had a valid ticket, was not visibly constrained in the exercise of his or her freedom of movement on board the ship, and was escorted to the nearest consulate if, and only if, he or she had explicitly requested the captain's assistance in escaping the bonds of enslavement. At stake here was the relationship of sovereignty and economy, that is, the character of empire: were private corporations bound to execute diplomatic agreements?

CUMBERBATCH DIED IN OFFICE, of causes not recorded, on March 29, 1876. With his passing, the detailed documentation of slaving through Smyrna came to an end. The slave trade, on the other hand, did not stop in the 1870s. It would be developments in the realm of international diplomacy, not individual exposures of slave-smuggling, that eroded the legal transportation of slaves across the Mediterranean. The Anglo-Egyptian anti-slave trade convention of 1877 was the first in a series of treaties that initiated what Suzanne Miers has called “a more determined effort to prevent the import of slaves” into the Ottoman Empire.¹¹⁷ The British occupation of Egypt, starting in 1882, gave the British more control over embarkation procedures in Alexandria and thus greater opportunities to prevent slaves from boarding ships. The Berlin Conference of 1885 and the Brussels Conference of 1889 both involved the Ottoman Empire in international agreements prohibiting the slave trade. The adventitious distinction between the slave trade and slavery within the empire's borders, however, continued to be upheld even as the Ottomans' official declarations that the trade in human beings would not be tolerated became more sincere and more stringently enforced. The Ottoman Ministry of the Interior and the Ministry of Police were responsible for the suppression of the traffic in Africans, but the deputy minister of the interior himself purchased slaves in 1893, which suggests that his principled commitment to preventing the trade was compatible with its practical continuation.¹¹⁸ The constitution of 1876 guaranteed the personal liberty of all subjects of the empire, but it was not put into practice until 1908. By then, the only slaves coming into the empire had to be smuggled in; the slave population had declined year by year.

According to Miers, “in the mind of the British public, the trader plying his business, the missionary spreading the gospel and the consul watching over British interests were as much concerned in [the slave trade's] suppression as the sailor patrolling the coast."¹¹⁹ Britain's military, diplomatic, commercial, and religious-ethical interests, that is, were all imagined to be aligned. This notion, David Armitage has argued, lay at the center of Britain's own original understanding of its empire: the British Empire was "Protestant, commercial, maritime, and free."¹²⁰ But the history of Britain's interactions with Africa has long been recognized as belying this happy assertion: slavery was tolerated where a challenge to it would threaten political stability, as in Egypt, as in Zanzibar, as in the Hijaz, or, for that matter, as in Cuba.¹²¹ The persistence of the slave trade in the 1870s was an anachronism that raised inconsistent and troubling questions about the character of European civilization and the benefits of European commerce in the Mediterranean. What if thickening commercial networks and revolutionary transportation technologies, instead of bringing an end to slave traffic, actually provided mechanisms for the transportation of slaves at greater speed and with greater comfort—slaves traveling as passengers, not in the holds of ships; slaves enjoying freedom of movement within the fundamental confines of a ship at sea; slaves disembarking without the use of visible force, according to a published timetable? What if, to amend Pitt's plaintive cry before Parliament in 1792, "the perversion of [European] commerce carried misery instead of happiness to one quarter of the globe"?¹²² What if free trade and freedom were not the same? After all, the dictates of the free market meant that the Austrian Lloyd had to compete for the very passengers whom its ships could easily lose to another company if the balance between ticket prices, convenience, comfort, and privacy tipped in the direction of "too costly."¹²³

¹¹⁷ Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 81. According to Paul Lovejoy, Britain became especially keen to “clean up” Egypt after the opening of the Suez Canal brought more exposure to the illegal slave trade there. Lovejoy, Transformations in Slavery, 270. Lovejoy argues that Africans themselves—rather than European moral diplomacy—deserve credit for forcing the abolition of slavery: “The aim of slaves was freedom, not the modification of the conditions of slavery, and this often placed Europeans in the position of reforming the institution so that its demise would occur gradually and not in one, single revolutionary action. The colonial regimes became the defenders of slavery and the greatest single impediment to full emancipation” (253).

¹¹⁸ Toledano, Slavery and Abolition in the Ottoman Middle East, 35.

Austrian diplomats' correspondence with the Lloyd and with their British counterparts shows that not only did these disquieting contradictions emerge from Britain's self-appointment as the primary enforcer of European civilization, personal liberty, free trade, and British commercial interests around the globe, but they also plagued empires with more modest ambitions. It was not, after all, the colonial powers that were most notorious for transporting slaves across the Mediterranean in the nineteenth century, but second-order powers such as Austria, Egypt, and the Ottomans themselves. In the mid- to late nineteenth century, Austria was caught between imperial formations—servicing the residual connections between the Ottoman Empire and Africa, while simultaneously striving to participate in the emergent

¹¹⁹ Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 38.

¹²⁰ David Armitage, The Ideological Origins of the British Empire (Cambridge, 2000), 8.

¹²¹ On the Hijaz, see Miers, Britain and the Ending of the Slave Trade, 82. Nevertheless, in Africa, Britain allowed itself to apply a kind of pressure that, according to Robin Law, actually violated international law—actions that ultimately facilitated the "European partition of Africa." Law, "Abolition and Imperialism: International Law and the British Suppression of the Atlantic Slave Trade," in Peterson, Abolitionism and Imperialism in Britain, 170. In a similar vein: "The first worldwide campaign for human rights did not call upon self-determining nation-states to end slavery as much as it took part in the determination of which people were fit to govern themselves as nations and which needed to be colonized in order to fulfill the higher good of eliminating slavery." Michael Salman, The Embarrassment of Slavery: Controversies over Bondage and Nationalism in the American Colonial Philippines (Berkeley, Calif., 2001), 13.

¹²² The Speech of the Right Hon. William Pitt, 24.

¹²³ "Empires," Frederick Cooper has pointed out, "perpetrated violence because they were strong and because they were weak." Cooper, Colonialism in Question: Theory, Knowledge, History (Berkeley, Calif., 2005), 157.

abolitionism that was coming to characterize the British and other colonial powers' expansion into Africa.

Austria had promised to prevent the transport of slaves on Austrian ships; it had even authorized other powers to search its ships to see that the law was being enforced. Its public role in international congresses and conventions throughout the long nineteenth century was that of a non-colonial power; a power that refused to participate in the exploitation and enslavement of Africans; a power for whom treaties about arms control, the export of alcohol, and the spread of drug addiction were inconsequential because it was confident that it had no stake in any of those nefarious trades.¹²⁴ As a Mediterranean power, Austria was able to set some of the rules of Levantine commerce. It could ponder the Eastern Question, pressure the Ottoman Empire to modify its policy toward France during the Crimean War, and insist on the maintenance of "capitulations" (the rights to regulate the affairs of Habsburg subjects living in the Ottoman Empire according to its own laws). But Austria was also governed by the mutually accepted immutability of other, older rules of Mediterranean trade: on these waters, personal autonomy was inscrutable, family was mutable, sovereignty was endangered. Only commerce was truly free.

¹²⁴ On Austria-Hungary's lackluster involvement in discussions about the limitations of alcohol and arms imports into Africa, see Graf Tarnowski, Brussels, to Aehrenthal MdA, Vienna, November 9, 1906, re "Die am 3. I. M. in Brüssel geschlossene Convention über das Zollregime für den nach Afrika eingeführten Spiritus betreffend," HHStA MdA AR Fach 39/4 [hereafter F39/4], Z. 89320; Kereskedelemügyi m.k. [Hungarian Ministry of Commerce] to Aehrenthal, April 9, 1907, HHStA MdA AR F39/4, Z. 27633; Note to Legation Royale de Belgique note verbale with copy to Hungarian HM Vienna, November 4, 1907, HHStA MdA AR F39/4, Z. 82165/9 7400; Note from Roessler (Austrian Ministry of Commerce) to Ministry of Foreign Affairs re Revision des Zollregimes auf Waffen und Munition in Afrika bis April 1908, Vienna, January 3, 1908, HHStA MdA AR F39/4, Z. 1454.

Alison Frank is Professor of History and Associate Director of the Center for History and Economics at Harvard University, where she has taught since 2005. She is the author of Oil Empire: Visions of Prosperity in Austrian Galicia (Harvard University Press, 2005), as well as articles on diplomacy and corporate interest, environmental sustainability, and Alpine tourism. She is currently writing a book on Austria's efforts to become a global commercial maritime power in the long nineteenth century.

Surface Tensions: Empire, Parisian Modernism, and “Authenticity” in African Sculpture, 1917–1939

JOHN WARNE MONROE

THE WESTERN AESTHETIC CATEGORY of primitive art came into its own in Paris in the early decades of the twentieth century.¹ While Europeans had appreciated the decorative quality and fine workmanship of some African and Oceanic objects as early as the 1880s, it fell to a group of cutting-edge Parisian artists, collectors, and dealers to transform this admiration into a self-consciously avant-garde project.² For these advocates, a penchant for what they often called art nègre was not simply another manifestation of the nineteenth-century cult of the picturesque; it was a way of turning Western taste on its head, substituting a new classicism for the Greco-Roman legacy.³ To be considered worthy examples of this alternative vision of the classical, which depended on a set of assumptions about the ahistorical nature of the “primitive mind,” the objects in question had to have formal characteristics that evoked

Funding for research travel from the University of Iowa Museum of Art, the Iowa State University College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, and the Iowa State University Center for Excellence in Arts and Humanities made this article possible. Sarah Adams, Jennifer Anne Boittin, Phillip Chen, Herbert M. Cole, Alice L. Conklin, Brandon Emerson County, Bonny Gabin, Wendy A. Grossman, Lorenz Homberger, Patricia M. E. Lorcin, Lenore Metrick-Chen, Steven Nelson, Christopher D. Roy, Wendie Ellen Schneider, Alexander Soifer, Z. S. Strother, Miklós Szalay, Ibrahima Thiaw, Robert Farris Thompson, and my colleagues at Iowa State have contributed insights, encouragement, and criticism at various points in this text’s long development. Several crucial pieces of evidence owe their presence here to two excellent archivists, Mamadou Ndiaye at the Archives nationales du Sénégal, and Katy Rawdon at the Barnes Foundation. Finally, I am deeply grateful for the incisive feedback provided by the AHR’s six anonymous readers.

¹ Although the perceived “family resemblance” among objects of diverse geographical origin—from Africa to Polynesia to Alaska—that it once designated remains a part of the Western cultural landscape, “primitive art” is no longer commonly used as a blanket term. Scholars of the topic, most notably Sally Price, have seized upon the sense of alienation this obsolescence has created to justify a strategic reappropriation. I am following Price’s example here, using the term “primitive art” both because it was the current designation in the interwar period—particularly after the waning of the term art nègre in the mid-1920s—and because its distance from present-day usage helps draw attention to the historical contingency and constructedness of the aesthetic category it designates. Although I have chosen not to place the term within quotation marks in order to avoid a distracting proliferation of them, I use it with the critical distance such punctuation would convey. See Sally Price, Primitive Art in Civilized Places, 2nd ed. (Chicago, 2001), 1–6; Price, Paris Primitive: Jacques Chirac’s Museum on the Quai Branly (Chicago, 2007), vii–viii. See also Daniel J. Sherman, “Post-Colonial Chic: Fantasies of the French Interior, 1957–62,” Art History 27, no. 5 (November 2004): 773–774.

² For a useful discussion of the pre-modernist aesthetic appreciation of objects from Africa, see Annie E. Coombes, Reinventing Africa: Museums, Material Culture and Popular Imagination in Late Victorian and Edwardian England (New Haven, Conn., 1994), esp. 7–28.

³ The conception of the distinction between nineteenth-century exoticism and the avant-garde idea of primitive art as classicism that I present here derives from Jean Laude, La peinture française et l’art nègre (Paris, 2006), esp. 13–43, 433–442.

the latest currents in contemporary art, while at the same time remaining perceptibly “authentic.” From the beginning, the identification of authenticity in this field was a process fraught with ambivalence. On the one hand, it advanced the cause of cultural tolerance by transforming a select group of objects, previously rejected in racist terms, into potential masterworks of world art; on the other, it perpetuated inequalities by drawing a sharp, if often illusory, line between the ancestral artists capable of producing such masterworks and the current, allegedly decadent inhabitants of the distant lands where these objects were created.

The interwar French reception of traditional African sculpture served a paradigmatic function in the constitution of primitive art as a broader category.⁴ Analyzing this transformation of taste in relation to the distinctive historical situation in which it began, therefore, provides us with a new way to think through the persistent ambivalence it entails. The idea of authenticity on which the aesthetic category of primitive art came to depend was the distinctive product of two interwar phenomena: the Indian summer of Parisian dominance of the Western art world and the attempted consolidation of French colonial power in Africa. Indeed, it emerged directly from the interaction of these historical factors, and thus provides a revealingly concrete demonstration of the complex connections between aesthetic modernism and the colonial project. Parisian connoisseurs in this period perceived, altered, and exhibited select examples of African material culture in ways that transformed them into autonomous works of art in the Western sense. Placed in their new context, these objects derived aesthetic power from the way in which they seemed simultaneously archaic and modern, enacting a mythic version of the narrative of radical innovation so crucial to the self-conception of the artistic avant-garde. This paradoxical construction had far-reaching consequences, first in the United States, then in French West Africa itself, as demonstrated by the contrasting cases of two figures who confronted the problem of authenticity in tellingly different ways: the well-known poet, thinker, and politician Léopold Sédar Senghor and the unknown artist Jean Dado.

Scholarly critiques of the idea of primitive art first emerged in the 1980s, as part of a wide-ranging reassessment of aesthetic modernism. The watershed moment in the history of this field came in 1984, with an exhibition at the Museum of Modern Art (MoMA) in New York, “Primitivism” in Twentieth-Century Art: Affinity of the Tribal and the Modern. In the museum’s galleries, these “affinities” were both direct connections—specific so-called “tribal” objects that canonical twentieth-century artists saw—and formal resemblances that became visible when historically unrelated works by Western and “tribal” artists appeared side by side. Curator William Rubin’s justification for the second type of affinity was emphatically universalistic. “Like all great art,” he wrote, “the finest tribal sculptures show images of man that transcend the particular lives and times of their makers.”⁵ The formal resonances he perceived between works by artists unknown to one another, operating in very different contexts, served him as proof of that transcendence. Rubin's willingness to transform objects into decontextualized formal ciphers derived quite logically from the high modernist vision that had been at the heart of MoMA's institutional mission since the days of founding director Alfred H. Barr.⁶ When applied to material that had originally been produced in cultural contexts far removed from the international art world, however, this seemingly affirmative approach to "the unpredictable potential of human creativity wherever found" raised disconcerting questions, which critics addressed in a surge of commentary that has since generated an active scholarly subfield.⁷

⁴ Throughout this article, I follow standard scholarly practice in the field of African art by using the term “traditional” to refer to the kinds of African objects that early-twentieth-century connoisseurs would have perceived as potentially authentic. For a further discussion of the pitfalls of terminology in this field, see Eli Bontor, “Challenges to Rural Festivals with the Return to Democratic Rule in South-eastern Nigeria,” African Arts 38, no. 4 (Winter 2005): 44.

⁵ William Rubin, “Modernist Primitivism: An Introduction,” in Rubin, ed., “Primitivism” in Twentieth-Century Art: Affinity of the Tribal and the Modern, 2 vols. (New York, 1984), 1: 73.

The earliest contributions to the debate questioned the "Primitivism" exhibition's underlying assumptions from the points of view of critical theory and cultural anthropology, seeing ethnocentric arrogance where the exhibition's curators saw a laudable inclusiveness. Broadly speaking, these critiques depended on a view of art not as universal, but as what James Clifford termed "a category defined and redefined in specific contexts and relations of power."⁸ From this perspective, assertions of the transcendent aesthetic appeal of primitive art had a sinister subtext. As Hal Foster put it, "no counterdiscourse was posed: the imperialist precondition of primitivism was suppressed, and 'primitivism,' a metonym of imperialism, served as its disavowal."⁹ The recognition of the Western "art-ness" of "tribal" objects, in other words, was a form of imperialism by other means; even more disturbing, it was an act of domination that denied its true nature, presenting itself as a magnanimous gesture of egalitarian acceptance. Subsequent critiques have taken these insights as a point of departure, moving from analysis of the specific circumstances of the "Primitivism" exhibition to broader explorations of Western ideas of the primitive, and the ways in which the consumption and reception of primitive art both reveals and perpetuates them.¹⁰ For these scholars, a rigorous skepticism of universalistic aesthetic

⁶ See Sybil Gordon Cantor, Alfred H. Barr, Jr., and the Intellectual Origins of the Museum of Modern Art (Boston, 2003).

⁷ For a valuable compilation of early interventions in this polemic by Thomas McEvilley, William Rubin, and Kirk Varnedoe, see Bill Beckley and David Shapiro, eds., Uncontrollable Beauty: Toward a New Aesthetics (New York, 1998). The quote comes from curator Kirk Varnedoe's preface in Rubin, "Primitivism" in Twentieth-Century Art, 1: x.

⁸ James Clifford, "Histories of the Tribal and the Modern," in Clifford, The Predicament of Culture: Twentieth-Century Ethnography, Literature, and Art (Cambridge, Mass., 1988), 198. This essay, a review of the "Primitivism" exhibition, first appeared in Art in America 73, no. 4 (April 1985): 164–177. For broader theoretical articulations of this conception that have become touchstones in the literature, see Jean Baudrillard, Le système des objets (Paris, 1968); and the work of Pierre Bourdieu, especially L'amour de l'art: Les musées d'art européens et leur public (Paris, 1968); La distinction: Critique sociale du jugement (Paris, 1979); and the essays collected in Bourdieu, The Field of Cultural Production: Essays on Art and Literature, ed. Randal Johnson (New York, 1993).

⁹ Hal Foster, "The 'Primitive' Unconscious of Modern Art," October 34 (Autumn 1985): 47.

¹⁰ Fred R. Myers provides a useful survey of the development of this literature. See Myers, "'Primitivism,' Anthropology, and the Category of 'Primitive Art,'" in Chris Tilley, Webb Keane, Susan Kuechler, Mike Rowlands, and Patricia Spyer, eds., Handbook of Material Culture (London, 2006), 267–284. For other important contributions, see Rolande Bonnain, L'empire des masques: Les collectionneurs d'arts premiers aujourd'hui (Paris, 2001); James Clifford, "On Collecting Art and Culture," in Clifford, The Predicament of Culture, 215–251; Annie E. Coombes, "The Object of Translation: Notes on 'Art' and Autonomy in a Postcolonial Context," in Fred R. Myers, ed., The Empire of Things: Regimes of Value and Material Culture (Oxford, 2001), 233–256; Raymond Corbey, Tribal Art Traffic: A Chronicle of Taste, Trade and Desire in Colonial and Post-Colonial Times (Amsterdam, 2000); Shelly Errington, The Death of Authentic Primitive Art and Other Tales of Progress (Berkeley, Calif., 1998); Ivan Karp and Stephen claims is a way to reverse what Sally Price calls “the dehumanization of Primitive Art and its makers,” and instead to acknowledge their “cultural diversity, intellectual vitality, and aesthetic integrity.”¹¹

Although this critical literature has expanded its reach steadily over the years, reshaping whole branches of the academic study of material culture, the questions it raises remain stubbornly unresolved. As the controversy surrounding the establishment of the Musée du quai Branly in Paris revealed so strikingly, the world of connoisseurs, collectors, and dealers of what once would have been called primitive art looked in 2006 much as it had in 1984.¹² Art museums, although increasingly conscious of the historical contingency of the standards of judgment they employ, and highly attuned to a body of scholarship that studies works of traditional African and Oceanic art from the points of view of those who made them, still select and display objects from these areas on the basis of a universalizing conception of aesthetic quality.¹³ This conception is also still the mainspring of a thriving market, in which objects widely acknowledged to be masterworks can command prices of several million dollars.¹⁴ For many in this milieu, a universalizing conception of aesthetics continues to appear not as a tool of crypto-imperialist domination, but as a positive means of fostering a more inclusive worldview in the museum-going public.¹⁵

D. Lavine, eds., Exhibiting Cultures: The Poetics and Politics of Museum Display (Washington, D.C., 1991); Sidney Littlefield Kasfir, “African Art and Authenticity: A Text with a Shadow,” African Arts 25, no. 2 (April 1992): 40–53, 96–97; Ruth B. Phillips and Christopher B. Steiner, eds., Unpacking Culture: Art and Commodity in Colonial and Postcolonial Worlds (Berkeley, Calif., 1999); Price, Primitive Art in Civilized Places; Christopher B. Steiner, African Art in Transit (Cambridge, 1994); Maruška Svašek, Anthropology, Art and Cultural Production (London, 2007); and Marianna Torgovnick, Gone Primitive: Savage Intellects, Modern Lives (Chicago, 1990).

¹¹ Price, Primitive Art in Civilized Places, 5, 126, emphasis in the original.

¹² The controversy surrounding the creation of the Musée du quai Branly has already elicited a body of scholarly analysis. See Sarah Amato, “Quai Branly Museum: Representing France after Empire,” Race & Class 47, no. 4 (2006): 46–65; Bruno Latour, ed., Le dialogue des cultures: Actes des rencontres inaugurales du musée du quai Branly (21 juin 2006) (Paris, 2007); Herman Lebovics, “The Dance of the Museums,” in Lebovics, Bringing the Empire Back Home: France in the Global Age (Durham, N.C., 2004), 143–177; and Price, Paris Primitive. Price has also produced a useful overview of the increasingly voluminous commentary that has appeared in the years since the museum’s 2006 opening; see Sally Price, “Return to the Quai Branly,” Museum Anthropology 33, no. 1 (2010): 11–21. The French journal Le débat devoted an entire issue to the new museum: Le moment du quai Branly, Special Issue, Le débat 147 (November–December 2007); Le débat 148 (January–February 2008) contains three additional articles on the topic: Kwame Anthony Appiah, “De qui est-ce la culture?” (158–169); Jean-Marie Schaeffer, “Le musée du quai Branly entre art et esthétique” (170–178); and Sally Price, “Réflexions sur le dialogue des cultures au musée du quai Branly” (179–192). For interventions that give a sense of the competing agendas involved in this polemic, see Bernard Dupaigne, Le scandale des arts premiers: La véritable histoire du musée du quai Branly (Paris, 2006); and Marine Degli and Marie Mauzé, Arts premiers: Le temps de la reconnaissance (Paris, 2000).

¹³ For an introduction to this substantial literature in the specific field of African art, see Monica Blackmun Visona, Robin Poynor, and Herbert M. Cole, History of Art in Africa (New York, 2003). For examples of recent catalogues from critically engaged museum exhibitions, see Christraud M. Geary and Stéphanie Xatart, Material Journeys: Collecting African and Oceanic Art, 1945–2000—Selections from the Geneviève McMillan Collection (Boston, 2007); Frederick John Lamp, ed., See the Music, Hear the Dance: Rethinking African Art at the Baltimore Museum of Art (Munich, 2004); and Pamela McClusky, Art from Africa: Long Steps Never Broke a Back (Princeton, N.J., 2002).

¹⁴ The highest price fetched by a piece of primitive art at auction thus far is 5 million Euros, for a mask by a sculptor from the Fang people of Gabon sold in Paris on June 17, 2006. See the website of the Hôtel Drouot auction house, http://www.gazette-drouot.com/static/magazine_ventes_aux_encheres/enchere_collection_verite.html.

¹⁵ In a major exhibition catalogue, for example, the curator Alisa LaGamma recently proclaimed

Similarly, scholars of modernism as a transnational phenomenon have noticed that the tropes of European primitivism, when strategically appropriated by those they define as “other,” can turn the cultural tables in intriguing ways, inspiring new visions of independence and creative possibility.¹⁶

The very intractability of these questions is itself a problem that calls for explanation. The obdurate paradox of primitive art—the way it simultaneously seems to reinforce prejudices about the “savage” other and provide a means of overcoming them—expresses a fundamental ambivalence that is itself a legacy of the French colonial project. To understand this fully, it is important to remember that the idea of primitive art took shape in Paris at a time when the city was both an imperial and a cultural metropolis. Scholars have generally chosen to treat these aspects of the city’s historical existence separately, and indeed at first glance the relation between them can seem tenuous. Where imperial Paris tended to be crassly nationalistic, politically centrist, bourgeois, and disturbingly prone to the siren song of kitsch, modernist Paris was cosmopolitan, politically radical, bohemian, and rigorous in its pursuit of the aesthetic cutting edge. The problem of primitive art, however, provides a vantage point that lets us see the connections between these two worlds with unusual clarity. To a certain extent, the link is material: colonial commerce is what put African sculptures in the hands of Parisian artists, collectors, dealers, and critics in the first place. There is also a conceptual dimension that is less explicit but perhaps equally important. As Fredric Jameson has observed, “the traces of imperialism can . . . be detected in Western modernism, and are indeed constitutive of it,” but they do not manifest themselves most strongly “in the obvious places, in content and representation.” Instead, they appear as “formal symptoms” that must be “detected spatially.”¹⁷ The Paris-born aesthetic category of primitive art is itself just such a spatially detectable “formal symptom,” a seemingly transcendent, “apolitical” way of seeing particular objects that, by virtue of its very appearance of being “above it all,” recapitulates the distinctive paradoxes that characterized France’s ill-fated effort to function as an imperial republic.

This approach builds on a conception of the predicament of empire that lies at the foundation of what European historians now call “the new colonial history,” and emphasizes the crucial importance of ambivalence to an understanding of the co-that by creating a rich, varied corpus of commemorative reliquary figures, “the peoples of equatorial Africa developed a sculptural form that would enter the pantheon of universal art”—an assertion meant to celebrate a triumphant revaluation of objects that were once dismissed as the “crude” and “hideous” work of “savages.” See LaGamma, ed., Eternal Ancestors: The Art of the Central African Reliquary (New York, 2007), 178. For “crude,” “hideous,” and “savage,” see R. P. Henri Trilles, Chez les Fang; ou, Quinze années de séjour au Congo français (Paris, 1912), 246. Critic Peter Schjeldahl, taking the praise a step further, wrote that the sculptor of one of the figures included in the show—now known as the “Black Venus”—“beggars Brancusi.” Schjeldahl, “Into Africa,” The New Yorker, November 5, 2007, http://www.newyorker.com/arts/critics/notebook/2007/11/05/071105gonb_GOAT_notebook_schjeldahl.

¹⁶ See, e.g., Simon Gikandi, “Race and the Modernist Aesthetic,” in Tim Youngs, ed., Writing and Race (London, 1997), 147–165; Wendy Martin, “‘Remembering the Jungle’: Josephine Baker and Modernist Parody,” in Elazar Barkan and Ronald Bush, eds., Prehistories of the Future: The Primitivist Project and the Culture of Modernism (Stanford, Calif., 1995), 310–325; and Carole Sweeney, From Fetish to Subject: Race, Modernism, and Primitivism, 1919–1935 (London, 2004).

¹⁷ Fredric Jameson, “Modernism and Imperialism,” in Terry Eagleton, Fredric Jameson, and Edward W. Said, Nationalism, Colonialism, and Literature (Minneapolis, 1990), 64.

lonial project.¹⁸ In the French case, as historians have shown, this ambivalence took a distinctive and striking form. The republican ideals on which the French polity was based created a fundamental conflict: equal citizenship for colonized peoples was an ideologically necessary promise, but one that had to be pushed into an ever-receding future in order to ensure the functioning of the colonial system.¹⁹ Frederick Cooper, drawing on the specific case of French West Africa, has developed a broader conception of empire that suggests a useful way of taking this key paradox into account. As he observes, European conquest in the age of the “new imperialism” was not simply a matter of exploitative domination, although that, of course, played a prominent role. For its advocates, empire was also a project designed to transform allegedly benighted non-European peoples into “civilized” facsimiles of their European conquerors. Those conquerors, in turn, considered themselves to be the very image of the universal modernity to which all humanity was progressing—albeit at unequal rates.²⁰ Even so, the colonial system depended on the maintenance of clear-cut boundaries demarcating “colonizer from colonized, civilized from primitive, core from periphery.” The coexistence of these two currents, inclusive and exclusionary, universalistic and particularistic, “made the space of empire into a terrain where concepts were not only imposed, but also engaged and contested.”²¹ Crucially, Cooper asserts, this ongoing contestation should not be seen in Whiggish terms, as inevitably leading to a process of decolonization culminating in the creation of independent nation-states. Instead, it should be approached in a manner that acknowledges the historically contingent range of possibilities available to participants in the debate at any given time. During the interwar years, when—as Cooper observes—the notion of empire was still broadly accepted as “an ordinary fact of political life,” the means by which “people living in colonies tried to make something of the situations they faced” could take a wide variety of forms.²² In French West Africa, for example, nationalistic discourses were only one of many tools available

¹⁸ Over the last twenty-five years, the study of Europe’s colonial past has gone from being a marginal subfield to a matter of central historiographical concern. Robert Aldrich provides a useful discussion of “the new colonial history” and its relation to European efforts to work through the colonial past in “Remembrance of Empires Past,” Fields of Remembrance, Special Issue, PORTAL: Journal of Multi-disciplinary and International Studies 7, no. 1 (January 2010): 1–18. For an influential statement of the crucial role of ambivalence in understanding empire, see Homi K. Bhabha, “Of Mimicry and Man: The Ambivalence of Colonial Discourse,” in Bhabha, The Location of Culture (London, 1994), 85–92.

¹⁹ Grappling with this distinctive tension between the universal and the particular has become one of the central historiographical issues in the study of France’s empire. See, e.g., Alice L. Conklin, A Mission to Civilize: The Republican Idea of Empire in France and West Africa, 1895–1930 (Stanford, Calif., 1997); Elizabeth Ezra, The Colonial Unconscious: Race and Culture in Interwar France (Ithaca, N.Y., 2000); James E. Genova, Colonial Ambivalence, Cultural Authenticity, and the Limitations of Mimicry in French-Ruled West Africa, 1914–1956 (New York, 2004); Herman Lebovics, True France: The Wars over Cultural Identity, 1900–1945 (Ithaca, N.Y., 1992); and Gary Wilder, The French Imperial Nation-State: Negritude and Colonial Humanism between the Two World Wars (Chicago, 2005).

²⁰ For a valuable recent discussion of this question and its implications both for scholars of Europe and for those defined as “non-modern” in Western terms, see the various contributions to the AHR Roundtable “Historians and the Question of ‘Modernity,’” American Historical Review 116, no. 3 (June 2011): 631–751, of which the following are of particular relevance to the concerns of this article: Zvi Ben-Dor Benite, “Modernity: The Sphinx and the Historian” (638–652); Carol Gluck, “The End of Elsewhere: Writing Modernity Now” (676–687); and Lynn M. Thomas, “Modernity’s Failings, Political Claims, and Intermediate Concepts” (727–740).

²¹ Frederick Cooper, Colonialism in Question: Theory, Knowledge, History (Berkeley, Calif., 2005), 4.

²² Ibid., 232, 231.

for arguing against the injustices of colonial power. West Africans and their critical allies in the metropole could also question, or seek to radically transform, the colonial project with visions of solidarity and difference founded on much broader bases than the national—as in Marxism or Pan-Africanism—or with other “forms of political action that depended on the overlapping idioms and interactions between colonizer and colonized.”²³

In interwar Paris and in the colonies, the concept of primitive art proved to be a notably active site for just this type of “engagement and contestation” based on “overlapping idioms and interaction.” From its inception, the notion of authenticity that underpins this aesthetic category was a product of the ongoing negotiations over inclusion and exclusion that “thinking like an empire” entailed, and as such could serve both as an instrument of domination and as a means of criticism or resistance.²⁴ The assumptions of many collectors and dealers transformed “authentic primitive art” into a restrictive category that only the Western eye had the power to know and define. Those assumptions, however, also contributed to a language of respect and admiration for otherness that could be used to make egalitarian cultural claims, even as they helped along a process of canon-building that would embed “authentic” African sculptures—and the conditions of their initial aestheticization—in a Western-style, universalizing narrative of “world art history.” The cases of Senghor and Dado show that the sea-change in Western taste brought about by the cultural triumph of modernism had tangible if contradictory consequences abroad, as a particular notion of authenticity became both a vehicle for challenging racist assumptions through assertions of diasporic black or Pan-African identity and a justification for colonial administrators to impose a limiting vision of “Africanness” on their subjects.

From the beginning, primitive art depended on an elaborate system of connoisseurship, a term that Jules Prown has defined as “formal or stylistic analysis . . . used in practice to distinguish among objects.”²⁵ Over the course of the twentieth century, as Price has shown, the wide diffusion of this system created the distinctive way of seeing that Westerners associate with the enjoyment of objects in this aesthetic category—one that blends an antiquarian appreciation for distressed surfaces, a sense of radical temporal or cultural distance, and the evocatively fragmentary with a modernist formal sensibility and conception of the vitality of the “primal.”²⁶ To a considerable extent, this set of aesthetic values owes its enduring power to the unique cultural situation of the Parisian critics and dealers who began to transform the market for traditional African sculpture in the late 1910s. Select “ethnographic specimens” became “art” in the Western sense not because their original creators intended to give them that status, but because during the 1920s and 1930s, they were enmeshed in a set of value-imparting practices rooted in the distinctive institutional structure that art historians have identified as a key factor in the rise of aesthetic modernism: the mutually reinforcing canon-building system of private galleries, crit-

²³ Ibid., 231.

²⁴ For “thinking like an empire,” see Frederick Cooper, “States, Empires, and Political Imagination,” ibid., 153–203.

²⁵ Jules David Prown, “The Truth of Material Culture: History or Fiction?” in Steven Lubar and W. David Kingery, eds., History from Things: Essays on Material Culture (Washington, D.C., 1993), 4.

²⁶ Price, Primitive Art in Civilized Places, 82–99.

ical commentary, and museums.²⁷ Paris was the center of this system, but as Robert Jensen notes, its position depended on a sense of universal importance conferred by “the sustained admiring gaze of the foreign public.”²⁸ In the case of primitive art, American collectors, dealers, and museums were perhaps the most influential of these legitimating publics. American eagerness to let modernist Paris set the cultural tone reinforced an idea of primitive art as a universal aesthetic category, while at the same time associating it with progressive racial attitudes—and particularly with the Harlem Renaissance. Thus inflected, the idea of primitive art made its way back to the colonies.²⁹

ART HISTORIANS HAVE THOROUGHLY documented the earliest phase of the formation of primitive art as an aesthetic category.³⁰ Beginning in about 1905, Pablo Picasso, Henri Matisse, Maurice Vlaminck, André Derain, and other artists of the School of Paris grew increasingly enthusiastic about the aesthetic qualities of sculptures produced by “natives” in French and Belgian colonies—particularly in West and Central Africa. Where these objects had once struck Western observers as ethnographic specimens, pagan idols, or exotic curiosities, they now took on the appearance of autonomous works of art that posed a profound challenge to Western aesthetic norms. In addition, their distinctive formal qualities made them readily traceable influences in numerous works that have since become mainstays of Western art history.³¹ These encounters touched off a process of revaluation that, by the mid-1920s, transformed the commodity status of traditional African sculpture first in France, then across the continent and in the United States: colonial trophies and bohemian bibelots were now objets d’art, sought after by a growing group of collectors and dealers, who saw their admiration for these strange objects as a natural counterpart to their sympathy with the experiments of the Parisian avant-garde. In this way, it was not the modernist artists themselves, but actors within the institutional structure that ensured their livelihood—owners of galleries, critics, and patrons—who were most responsible for elaborating the idea of primitive art, providing the financial investment, and constructing the system of value that allowed a specialized market

²⁷ See Michael C. FitzGerald, Making Modernism: Picasso and the Creation of the Market for Twentieth-Century Art (Berkeley, Calif., 1995); and Robert Jensen, Marketing Modernism in Fin-de-Siècle Europe (Princeton, N.J., 1994).

²⁸ Jensen, Marketing Modernism in Fin-de-Siècle Europe, 7.

²⁹ The complex factors involved in this transformation of objects from elsewhere makes it a distinctive problem in the history of material culture: a form of reception that entails both a physical and a conceptual remaking of the items being perceived, carried out with little concern for the intentions and experiences of their original creators. Material and discursive acts associated with connoisseurship—mounting on custom-made bases, “restoration,” formal aesthetic analysis—imposed new meanings on African objects that then underwent their own process of metamorphosis as they circulated across the globe. On the use of material cultural analysis in history, see Leora Auslander, “Beyond Words,” American Historical Review 110, no. 4 (October 2005): 1015–1045.

³⁰ See Robert Goldwater, Primitivism in Modern Art, enlarged ed. (Cambridge, Mass., 1986); Laude, La peinture française et l’art nègre; and Jean-Louis Paudrat, “From Africa,” in Rubin, “Primitivism” in Twentieth-Century Art, 1: 125–175.

³¹ See, e.g., the very different analyses presented in Patricia Leighton, “The White Peril and L’art nègre: Picasso, Primitivism, and Anti-Colonialism,” Art Bulletin 72, no. 4 (December 1990): 609–630; and Rubin, “Picasso,” in Rubin, “Primitivism” in Twentieth Century Art, 1: 241–340.

to appear. The dynamics of this market made the identification of “authentic” objects a central preoccupation.

Indeed, the system of connoisseurship that underpinned the Western conception of primitive art, and continues to exert its influence today, entails a fundamental assumption: in order for an object to become a candidate for designation as a masterwork, sale at a major auction, or inclusion in a museum collection, it must be “authentic.” The idea of authenticity that has generally been accepted by collectors, dealers, and museum professionals in this field depends on the way an object bears material traces of its history. An “authentic” object, as Christopher B. Steiner observes in his analysis of the late-twentieth-century African art market, is one that shows evidence of having been used in its culture of origin rather than having been made for sale to outsiders.³² Signs of “authenticity” include chips, age cracks, insect damage, uneven patination caused by extensive handling, and encrustation of multiple layers of pigment or sacrificial offerings. While many of these imperfections would diminish the value of a Western sculpture, Price notes that in this field they have traditionally been aestheticized, becoming a crucial element of the connoisseur’s emotional experience of an object.³³ Current commentary often emphasizes this conception of authenticity’s roots in an ethnographically informed acknowledgment of cultural difference.³⁴ In most traditional African societies, the notion of “art” in the Western sense—as a class of object to be contemplated in isolation, for its own sake—does not exist, or has emerged comparatively recently. Many traditional sculptural objects serve ritual functions that gradually change their appearance, for instance with encrustations of sacrificial libations, and preclude close scrutiny or open display; in more public secular and religious contexts, masks and figures often act as props in larger spectacles, where they are equal or even lesser contributors alongside music, drama, and dance.³⁵ Marks of use, therefore, become forensic evidence that an object was employed in an “authentic” cultural context. A sense of the cultural contingency of “art” as a category, however, is not the only reason why Western connoisseurs aestheticize weathered surfaces and marks of use in this field; after all, this taste for patina preceded the elaboration and wide diffusion of a detailed, fieldwork-based body of knowledge about the use and original significance of many traditional African sculptures, which did not begin in earnest until the 1930s.

Instead, the distinctively Western notion of how an “authentic primitive” object

³² Steiner, African Art in Transit, 100–129.

³³ Price, Primitive Art in Civilized Places, 37–42.

³⁴ For discussions of authenticity in this field that emphasize the value of “in-culture” use, see Fakes, Fakers and Fakery: Authenticity in African Art, Special Issue, African Arts 9, no. 3 (April 1976); Joseph Cornet, “African Art and Authenticity,” African Arts 9, no. 1 (October 1975): 52–55; and Henri Kamer, “De l’authenticité des sculptures africaines/The Authenticity of African Sculptures,” Arts d’Afrique noire 12 (December 1974): 17–40. Although the most recent of these publications is more than thirty years old, the vision of authenticity they articulate is still widely accepted among collectors and dealers.

³⁵ An awareness of the very different conceptions of “art” that exist in African and Western contexts has become an important part of the methodology used by scholars of art in Africa. For important early works on this question, see Herbert M. Cole, “Art as a Verb in Iboland,” African Arts 3, no. 1 (Autumn 1969): 34–41, 88; the essays by Daniel J. Crowley [1966], James W. Fernandez [1966], Roy Sieber [1959], Leon Siroto [1965], and Robert Farris Thompson [1966] reprinted in Carol F. Jopling, ed., Art and Aesthetics in Primitive Societies (New York, 1971); and Robert Farris Thompson, African Art in Motion: Icon and Act in the Collection of Katherine Coryton White (Berkeley, Calif., 1974).

should look first took shape in the late 1910s, at the same time that a market for traditional African sculpture as “art” emerged. Early collectors in this market were a cosmopolitan group—German, Russian, British, American, and Swiss, as well as French—but they were unanimous in looking toward Paris as the epicenter of art nègre, and they purchased the bulk of their objects there.³⁶ Not only was the French capital home to the leading dealers, it was also the place where collectors had the best odds of encountering the objects that struck them as most appealing: sculptures of the kind that Picasso, Matisse, and other artists would have seen and borrowed from a decade before, and that therefore benefited from the growing cultural prestige of the School of Paris. These objects came primarily from French and Francophone colonies—especially regions in present-day Gabon, Guinea, Mali, Côte d’Ivoire, and the Democratic Republic of Congo—a fact that is unsurprising given the restricted circuits of commerce that the new imperialism had created by the early twentieth century. When searching for material for their collections, these cosmopolitan amateurs picked and chose among the vast array of exotic objects that French colonial officials, soldiers, and businessmen brought back with them when they returned to the metropole. Over the course of the late teens and twenties, the supply of objects increased noticeably, as a result both of the expansion of French commercial activity in the colonies and of sociocultural dislocations in Africa produced by the spread of forced labor and the depredations of the draft during the First World War.³⁷ By the mid-1920s, the mark of a successful collector came to be the ability to enter a crowded curio shop or flea-market stall and distinguish the rare “authentic” object from the much more common “inauthentic” one.³⁸

Dealers and collectors from the late teens onward, following the pattern that Annie E. Coombes identifies in Britain, took it for granted that the story of African sculptural production was one of steady decline.³⁹ Where Coombes’s Victorian and Edwardian commentators ascribed this perceived decadence to biological “degeneration,” however, French art critics and dealers tended to see it as a consequence of disruptive foreign influence. “Authentic” objects, the assumption went, were necessarily pre-colonial. “Fetishes of contemporary manufacture,” the curator Henri Clouzot and the noted collector André Level wrote in 1919, were “easily recognizable” and “without interest,” aesthetically empty testament to the way “the arrival of the European has broken the chain of traditions and polluted the sources of native art.”⁴⁰ According to Paul Guillaume, the most important early dealer of this material,

³⁶ For non-French collectors who looked to Paris as a primary source for objects in this period, see Jacob Epstein, Epstein: An Autobiography (London, 1955); Liliane Meffre, Carl Einstein, 1885–1940: Itinéraires d’une pensée moderne (Paris, 2002); Mary Ann Meyers, Art, Education, and African-American Culture: Albert Barnes and the Science of Philanthropy (New York, 2003); the discussion of Josef Müller in Louis Perrois, Ancestral Art of Gabon from the Collections of the Barbier-Mueller Museum (Dallas, 1986); and Miklós Szalay, ed., African Art from the Han Coray Collection, 1916–1928 (Munich, 1998).

³⁷ For a broadly conceived account of the sociocultural consequences of colonial domination in Equatorial Africa, see Jan Vansina, Paths in the Rainforests: Toward a History of Political Tradition in Equatorial Africa (Madison, Wis., 1990); on the impact of the draft, see Gregory Mann, Native Sons: West African Veterans and France in the Twentieth Century (Durham, N.C., 2006).

³⁸ See, for example, the account of the early collecting career of Pierre Vérité, as described in the lavish catalogue prepared for the sale of his collection by Alain de Monbrison and Pierre Amrouche: Encheres Rive Gauche, Arts primitifs: Collection Vérité (Paris, 2006).

³⁹ Coombes, Reinventing Africa, 43–62.

⁴⁰ Henri Clouzot and André Level, “L’art nègre,” La gazette des beaux-arts 61, no. 700 (July–Sep-

by 1907 the art of sculpture “had long been dead in Africa, and only the ancestral heirlooms, centuries old and sacred, were to be desired.” Guillaume echoed Clouzot and Level in his assertion that these “heirlooms” were of superior quality because they came from pure cultures, “untouched by civilization” in the form of European incursions. As Guillaume and his co-author Thomas Munro wrote in their landmark 1926 text, Primitive Negro Sculpture, “The black ruled by European masters is a different being from his ancestors. The slave of the rubber plantation, lazy or rebellious, the petty thief along the water-front, the chief with eyes of solemn dignity above a parody of European clothing, the mission school-boy puzzled with Christian doctrine—these are not the makers of African art.” At best, these colonized Africans were careful custodians of the great objects their ancestors had made; at worst, they were “uninspired craftsmen, . . . chipping wood or ivory into a stiff, characterless image for foreign trade.”⁴¹ The antithesis of the “authentic” object was thus the souvenir: where pre-colonial sculptures were allegedly made for altruistic, deeply spiritual reasons, their colonial successors seemed irredeemably tainted by the venal motives of creators trapped in the sticky web of imperial commerce.⁴²

This tendency to equate antiquity with aesthetic quality led Guillaume to establish what he called “a code by which objects can be ranked according to their age and beauty”—one that involved ascribing surprising dates, derived “by deduction, and by divination as well,” to the objects he considered most admirable.⁴³ In Primitive Negro Sculpture, for instance, he dated works by Dan, Baule, and Fang sculptors to the thirteenth, twelfth, or even fifth century C.E.; he went even further in the magazine he edited and published, Les arts à Paris, asserting that “archaeologists do not hesitate to date certain ancient pieces to a period that long predates the Christian era.”⁴⁴ These dramatic claims played an important role in Guillaume’s strategy for marketing African objects as high-priced works of art rather than as curiosities or museum supplies—which is how they had previously been sold. Age and aesthetic quality, in his estimation, were closely correlated, and he did not hesitate to take a figure as eminent as Picasso to task for his advocacy of the “dangerous opinion” that “dates” were of “no importance” in the aesthetic assessment of African sculptures.⁴⁵ In Guillaume’s connoisseurship of African sculpture, as his correspondence with the American collector Albert Barnes suggests, age became the lens through which the artistic quality of an African object was perceived: he considered certain objects to tember 1919): 313–314. Level, as organizer of the famous Peau de l’ours investment group before World War I, played a central role in the shaping of the market for modernist art as it came to exist between the wars. See FitzGerald, Making Modernism, 15–46.

⁴¹ Paul Guillaume and Thomas Munro, Primitive Negro Sculpture (New York, 1926), 2, 13, 9–10, 13. All passages quoted here appear in both the English- and French-language versions of this text. See Guillaume and Munro, La sculpture nègre primitive, trans. Paul Guillaume (Paris, 1929).

⁴² This equation of aesthetic power in African sculpture with the spiritual purity of the anonymous creator’s intention—an idea that echoes nineteenth-century views of medieval art—is an enduring trope that first appeared in the earliest systematic critical attempt to approach ethnographic objects as art. See Carl Einstein, Negerplastik (1915; repr., Munich, 1920), xiii–xvi.

⁴³ Barnes Foundation Archives, Merion, Pa., letter from Paul Guillaume to Albert Barnes, November 6, 1924.

⁴⁴ “Actualités,” Les arts à Paris 1 (March 15, 1918): 3.

⁴⁵ “Une esthétique nouvelle—l’art nègre,” Les arts à Paris 4 (May 15, 1919): 3.

be “older” because they were formally more “vital.”⁴⁶ While Guillaume’s early dates were always controversial, and while other dealers and critics frequently rejected them in favor of the norm now accepted by scholars—that the vast majority of African wood sculptures then available in Europe were made in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries—his emphasis on antiquity remained a defining aspect of the primitive art aesthetic.

Even interwar French skeptics of Guillaume’s chronology shared his sense of the essential kinship between ancient sculpture and the wooden objects that were arriving from Africa in growing numbers. Generally, commentators justified this conception with arguments based on perceived formal similarities and commonly accepted notions about the ahistorical nature of African cultures.⁴⁷ Formally, the arguments depended on a resemblance between certain African and ancient Egyptian sculptures, noted as early as 1900 by the ethnographer Maurice Delafosse.⁴⁸ Clouzot and Level made this common comparison as well, but took it a step further. (See Figure 1.) Drawing on a broader conception of the nature of “the primitive mind,” they argued for the essential antiquity of even relatively recent African sculptures, provided they had been produced under conditions free from European influence:

[African sculpture] permits us to capture, in a period remarkably close to our own—a hundred-fifty or a hundred years, perhaps—the technique of a primitive art and the survival of forms doubtless diminished in force and vitality by repetition, but which, in contrast to classical forms, have not continued their evolution and have thus remained fixed in their age-old archaism.⁴⁹

⁴⁶ While Guillaume occasionally expresses opinions in his correspondence about the poor quality of other African sculpture collections—in particular, the famous one established by Stewart Culin at the Brooklyn Museum—he rarely spells out the explicit reasons for his judgments. Instead, the connection he drew between age and aesthetic quality emerges most clearly in a comparative analysis of two figures from the Lagoon region of present-day Côte d’Ivoire in Primitive Negro Sculpture (misidentified as “Guinea,” pp. 126–129). Christa Clarke argues convincingly that this portion of the text was written not by Guillaume but by Thomas Munro under the close guidance of Albert Barnes. At the same time, however, the date attributions on which it is premised—that one figure was made in the fourteenth century and the other in the fifteenth (p. iii)—are clearly Guillaume’s, and it is reasonable to suppose that his chronological judgment was implicitly based on an assessment of the differences in sculptural quality explicitly articulated in the text. For a few letters indicating Guillaume’s assessment of Culin’s taste, see Barnes Foundation Archives, letter from Barnes to Guillaume, October 6, 1922; letter from Guillaume to Barnes, November 6, 1922; letter from Guillaume to Barnes, February 16, 1923; and letter from Guillaume to Barnes, April 15, 1923. For Clarke’s analysis of Barnes’s and Munro’s roles in the writing of Primitive Negro Sculpture, see Christa J. Clarke, “Defining Taste: Albert Barnes and the Promotion of African Art in the United States during the 1920s” (PhD. diss., University of Maryland, 1998), 82–117. A more condensed presentation of the case appears in Clarke, “Defining African Art: Primitive Negro Sculpture and the Aesthetic Philosophy of Albert Barnes,” African Arts 36, no. 1 (Spring 2003): 40–51, 92, 93.

⁴⁷ For the formulation of this argument about the alleged historical stasis of “primitive” peoples that would have been most familiar to early connoisseurs in Paris, see Lucien Lévy-Bruhl, Les fonctions mentales dans les sociétés inférieures (Paris, 1910). Broader overviews are provided by William B. Cohen, The French Encounter with Africans: White Response to Blacks, 1530–1880 (Bloomington, Ind., 1980); Yves Monnier, L’Afrique dans l’imaginaire français: Fin du XIX^e–début du XX^e siècle (Paris, 1999); and Christopher L. Miller, Blank Darkness: Africanist Discourse in French (Chicago, 1985), 3–65.

⁴⁸ Maurice Delafosse, “Sur les traces probables de civilisation égyptienne et d’hommes de race blanche à la Côte d’Ivoire,” L’Anthropologie 11 (July–December 1900): 431–451, 543–568, 677–690;

⁴⁹ Clouzot and Level, “L’art nègre,” 315.

FIGURE 1: Illustration from Henri Clouzot and André Level, "L'art nègre," La gazette des beaux-arts 61, no. 700 (July–September 1919): 318, showing a figure by an unidentified Baule sculptor from Côte d'Ivoire. Clouzot and Level, in their description, noted that the face of "this figure evokes Egyptian influence, and from afar, the great sculpture of king Khafra" (318), by which they probably meant the seated figure crowned by the god Horus, excavated in 1860 and now in the collection of the Egyptian Museum, Cairo. Note the visible crack that emphasizes the figure's age, the crisp details, and the glossy, dark "telephone patina" prized by collectors in this period.

The formal archaism of African sculpture was so profound, Clouzot and Level suggested, that it might even provoke “one to go further and see the very source of the artistic genius of Egypt in the black race.”⁵⁰

From the very beginning of their career as “art objects,” therefore, African sculptures, while in fact about the same age as the modernist works they inspired, struck critics and collectors not as contemporary creations but as “antiquities.” This perception served two notable purposes, one economic and the other aesthetic. Economically, equating validity as a “true work of art” with visible signs of age established a criterion of scarcity in the face of the steadily growing supply of African objects that came to Paris during the interwar years. Cracks, weathering, and evidence of extensive handling distinguished a “true work of art” from a mere souvenir, even if both were formally quite similar, because the ostensibly older work would be easier to imagine as having come from a period before “polluting” contact with Europeans had occurred. Since the realities of colonialism rendered African sculptors anonymous by the time their works arrived in the metropole, this criterion became crucial: in the absence of a signature, aura needed to be created by other means, as it was in the fields of medieval and ancient art. Aesthetically, the equation of “authentic” African sculptures with “antiquities” took advantage of an already existing cultural paradigm for the appreciation of weathered, fragmentary, unsigned, and radically decontextualized sculptures. Collectors and critics demonstrated the power of this paradigm by mimicking the classicist’s practice of assigning sobriquets to notable objects: where connoisseurs of Hellenistic art had the “Victory of Samothrace,” for example, their Africanist counterparts had the “Pahouin Venus.”⁵¹

A head from the collection of Paul Guillaume, attributed to a Fang sculptor and photographed for one of the earliest books devoted to art nègre, demonstrates how the homology between African sculptures and antiquities functioned in material terms.⁵² (See Figure 2.) Even as the head shows pronounced formal similarities to what would have been, in 1923, cutting-edge modernist sculpture, it also bears signs of what would seem to a Western observer to be considerable age. The head itself appears to be a fragment of a larger figure—though in fact it was probably not—and has an extensively rubbed, chipped, and abraded surface. Taken out of context, this wear appears to be the result of purely natural processes, but the bulk of it was more likely a consequence of traditional Fang practice: either it was damage from gnawing rats, attracted by the regular libations of palm oil poured on the figure, or it was the result of ritual handling and intentional abrasion, which produced small shavings for use in medicinal potions.⁵³ What might have seemed to Guillaume, or any other

⁵⁰ Ibid., 321.

⁵¹ The “Pahouin” or “Black Venus,” a reliquary figure by a sculptor from the Fang people of present-day Gabon currently in the collection of the Musée Dapper in Paris, received its sobriquet in 1933 when it was exhibited in London by the well-known French dealer André Lefevre. See LaGamma, Eternal Ancestors, 178.

⁵² Henri Clouzot and André Level, Sculptures africaines et océaniques: Colonies françaises et Congo belge (Paris, 1923), plate XXII.

⁵³ For rats, see Susan Mullin Vogel, African Aesthetics: The Carlo Monzino Collection (New York, 1986), 148; for abrasion, see Louis Perrois and Marta Sierra Delage, The Art of Equatorial Guinea: The Fang Tribes (New York, 1990), 110. According to Perrois, this intentional abrasion was generally focused on a few key areas of the sculpture: nose, mouth, hands, and navel.

FIGURE 2: Plate XXII from Henri Clouzot and André Level, Sculptures africaines et océaniques: Colonies françaises et Congo belge (Paris, 1923). This object is now in the collection of the Musée d'art moderne de Troyes.

Western viewer of this photograph, to be evidence of centuries of wear, then, was actually the product of perhaps several decades of use.

As with antiquities, not all signs of age and use in African sculpture were created equal, and those that were considered most desirable changed over time. In the early 1920s, critics who admired African sculptures appreciated what one writer described as “the firmness and finish of their carving, the just appreciation of their volumes, the surface polish obtained with who knows what rudimentary instruments.”⁵⁴ Sharp details and darkly lustrous patinas (as in Figure 1) were what connoisseurs admired most. During this period, as Roy Sieber has noted, French dealers, restorers, and collectors sometimes doctored their objects in order to achieve the preferred deep, even sheen.⁵⁵ This process entailed removing traces of sacrificial offerings and repeatedly applied pigment, sometimes along with an application of stain or wax to even out and darken the color of the wood. In the case of the object illustrated in Figure 3, a twin figure from the present-day Republic of Benin photographed in 1919, a restorer has probably stripped the sculpture of the encrusted camwood paste and indigo powder that would originally have covered it, and given it a new, varnished finish.⁵⁶ After this treatment, the figure still looks as if it has seen use, but its earlier, alien-seeming surface has been replaced by the mellow, glossy, gently timeworn patina of high-end Western antique furniture. As Euro-American taste changed with the rise of surrealism in the late 1920s, the range of aesthetically acceptable surfaces broadened to include heavier encrustation and duller, more complex finishes. The African sculptures preferred by the surrealists were those that tended to strike Western viewers as extravagantly strange—evocative portals into exotic, mysterious, imaginative universes—and a complex, discomfiting surface could add powerfully to that effect.⁵⁷ (See Figure 4.)

Age—or rather, the appearance of age—was not enough to transform an African object from an ethnographic specimen into a work of art, however. Once it was determined to be authentically old and worthy of admiration for its formal qualities, an object would have to be presented in a particular way for its aesthetic value to become fully visible. Isolation was the most important aspect of this presentation: to be legible as a “sculpture,” an object needed to be singled out, mounted, and displayed in a manner designed to make the most of the formal characteristics that appealed to Western connoisseurs.⁵⁸ Previously, on the comparatively rare occasions

⁵⁴ Louis Sonolet, “L’art dans l’Afrique occidentale française,” La gazette des beaux-arts 65, no. 740 (September–October 1923): 232.

⁵⁵ Doran H. Ross and Roy Sieber, “Interview with Roy Sieber,” African Arts 25, no. 4 (October 1992): 40.

⁵⁶ See Eva L. R. Meyerowitz, “Ibeji Statuettes from Yoruba, Nigeria,” Man 44 (September–October 1944): 105–107. While she does not mention this particular object, Meyerowitz notes that Yoruba commemorative twin figures were frequently subject to “a vigorous cleaning process” once they were in “European hands.” In addition, she writes, “some European collectors unfortunately polish up their African carvings to such an extent as to alter their appearance completely.”

⁵⁷ The clearest indication of this aesthetic change is the African objects illustrated in the catalogue for the 1931 sale of works from the primitive art collections of André Breton and Paul Eluard. See Alphonse Bellier, Charles Ratton, and Louis Carré, Collection André Breton et Paul Eluard: Sculptures d’Afrique, d’Amérique, d’Océanie (Paris, 1931). For a more detailed study of the surrealist reception of primitive art, see Louise Tythacott, Surrealism and the Exotic (London, 2003).

⁵⁸ Susan Vogel has explored this phenomenon by playing with display conventions in a variety of provocative ways in her exhibitions of African sculpture. For the best-known example, see Vogel, Art/Artifact: African Art in Anthropology Collections (New York, 1988).

FIGURE 3: Illustration from Clouzot and Level, "L'art nègre," 316, showing a commemorative twin figure (Ere Ibeji) by an unidentified Yoruba sculptor from the present-day Republic of Benin. Though it still appears "antique," the surface of this figure was likely cleaned and refinished after its arrival in France.

FIGURE 4: Detail from Plate II in Bellier, Ratton, and Carré, Collection André Breton et Paul Eluard. The object is identified as a figure from Côte d'Ivoire, probably by a Baule sculptor. Note the complex, rough, and heavily encrusted patina, which is the result of accumulated sacrificial offerings.

when illustrations showing African sculptures were published, such objects had tended to appear as either parts of trophy assemblages or elements of local color. Images of this kind generally figured in travel literature—memoirs of colonial adventures, missionary travelogues, or magazines such as the popular Tour du monde. At the end of the 1910s, in contrast, it became increasingly common for African pieces to be photographed individually, and for hierarchical distinctions to be drawn between objects that could be perceived as “sculptures” worthy of solitary contemplation, such as the Fang head in Figure 2, and mere “everyday items” like spears or nets. Items perceptible as “sculpture” then became candidates for illustration in journals explicitly devoted to art rather than ethnography, religion, or travel.⁵⁹

In the Fang head’s novel state of splendid isolation, the contrasting surfaces of the sculpture, its neutral background, and its immaculate wooden base—the truncated-pyramid form marks it as the probable work of Guillaume’s primary socleur, Kichizo Inagaki, who also mounted objects for Rodin—emphasize the figure’s otherness.⁶⁰ In its new context, the object’s weathered patina testifies to its earlier existence in a distant cultural world. For dealers and collectors throughout the interwar period, and—as Steiner shows—for connoisseurs today as well, surfaces of this kind were an essential factor distinguishing works of primitive art from their “civilized” counterparts.⁶¹ Modernist conventions of display, both in photographs and in museum installations, intensified the power of the distinctive surfaces of these objects by further emphasizing contrast, setting the stark, crisp surfaces of pale walls and geometric bases against the variously patinated surfaces of the sculptures themselves. James Johnson Sweeney’s 1935 exhibition of African sculpture at MoMA, which depended on French dealers and institutions for many of the objects it included, marked a crucial juncture in the emergence of this now time-honored approach to the display of primitive art.⁶² (See Figure 5.) Sweeney’s strategy of throw-

⁵⁹ Wendy A. Grossman has done crucial work on the role of photography in the early reception of African objects as art in the United States and Europe. See Grossman, Man Ray, African Art, and the Modernist Lens (Washington, D.C., 2009); and Grossman, “Photography at the Crossroads: African Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction,” in Cordula Grewe, ed., Die Schau des Fremden: Ausstellungskonzepte zwischen Kunst, Kommerz und Wissenschaft (Stuttgart, 2006), 317–340. For early examples of illustrations of African sculpture in art magazines in addition to the examples cited elsewhere in this essay, see, e.g., Carl Einstein, “De l’art nègre,” L’action 12 (April 1922): 47–56; Henri Clouzot and André Level, “La décoration des textiles au Congo Belge,” L’amour de l’art 4, no. 6 (June 1923): 569–572; P.V.M., “Les arts anciens de l’Afrique noire,” L’amour de l’art 10, no. 11 (November 1930): 462–465; images published throughout Paul Guillaume’s journal Les arts à Paris, 1918–1935; L’art nègre, Special Issue, Cahiers d’art 2, no. 7–8 (1927); and Arsène Alexandre, “Le blanc et le noir,” La Renaissance de l’art français 2, no. 8 (August 1919): 317–322.

⁶⁰ See Bénédicte Garnier, “Kichizo Inagaki, ébéniste de Rodin,” in François Blanchetière et al., eds., Rodin: Le rêve japonais (Paris, 2007), 86–92.

⁶¹ Steiner, African Art in Transit, 100–106.

⁶² The documents held in the Archives of the Museum of Modern Art gathered in the carton “Exhibition 39” provide a clear sense of the crucial role that the French dealers Charles Ratton and Louis Carré played in the 1935 MoMA exhibition—contributing not only objects but also the benefit of their knowledge and connoisseurship. See especially the list of lenders, which shows that the three primary donors to the exhibition, in terms of number of objects, were Ratton, Carré, and Paul Guillaume’s widow; and the substantial folder devoted to Ratton in “Registrar Correspondence.” See also the Joseph and Ernest Brummer Records in the Cloisters Archive Room, Metropolitan Museum of Art Libraries, New York, folder “Correspondence 1932–1937,” letter from Ernest Brummer to Joseph Brummer dated January 21, 1935, in which Ernest, reporting from Paris to his brother in New York, mentions Ratton’s departure for the United States with a substantial inventory of African objects purchased in partnership with Carré, whom Ernest calls “crazy” for making such a large financial commitment.

FIGURE 5: Installation view of the exhibition African Negro Art, Museum of Modern Art, New York, March 18–May 19, 1935. Museum of Modern Art, New York.

ing the works themselves into sharp relief by placing them in the proverbial “white cube,” where they were isolated against a contrasting, self-consciously minimal backdrop, remains powerfully influential, one of the most evident signs distinguishing the African and Oceanic galleries of art museums from their more ethnographically oriented counterparts in museums of natural history.⁶³

As this close connection between display practices for primitive art and contemporary art indicates, traditional African sculptures had a very different emotional impact on sympathetic Western connoisseurs than classical antiquities did, despite certain key homologies of presentation. In place of a long association with mar-moreal academic tradition, these newly imported objects evoked the edgy frisson of early modernism. Clouzot and Level observed that African sculpture was “disconcerting . . . the furthest perhaps from the Greek canon that humanity has ever seen.”⁶⁴ Guillaume, similarly, wrote that certain alien characteristics present in African sculptures, from the “bodily organs emphatic and not to be ignored” to the “magic clay” that covered some objects, had a power to “reawaken in civilized man disapproved and primitive impulses,” provoking “a sickening repulsion, a thrill of fear, and at the same time, perhaps, a strange and inexplicable fascination.”⁶⁵ Writing in 1927, the critic Marcel Astruc took this idea still further in an elaborate apostrophe to a famous Fang head—now in the collection of the Metropolitan Museum—on display in Guillaume's gallery. (See Figure 6.) The visible signs of damage the sculpture showed, such as its "ravaged mouth," he wrote, only added to its power—these abrasions and cracks were proof of a "royal dignity" in the face of "the outrages of nature," and to him evoked a register of feeling far more profound than the pallid sentiments expressed by conventional Western art. Not everyone could be moved by such an object, Astruc rhapsodized,

⁶³ The term “white cube” was coined by Brian O’Doherty in an influential series of articles critiquing modernist conventions of display published in Artforum in 1976, reprinted in O’Doherty, Inside the White Cube: The Ideology of the Gallery Space (Berkeley, Calif., 1999).

⁶⁴ Clouzot and Level, “L’art nègre,” 311.

⁶⁵ Guillaume and Munro, Primitive Negro Sculpture, 48–49.

But some love you, O Secret one! Those who are tired of the merely pretty, which is always there in the trifles that pass for our art. Nothing of the kind with you. The artisan who made you did not cheapen religious thought as ours do, in order to pay tribute to the second-rate god they call Beauty. He sought to make you not beautiful, but terrible, perhaps; it is we who give you the qualities of beauty, because now we are made in such a way that all our feelings are for the form, and are no longer able to experience the spirit.⁶⁶

In Astruc's account, the Fang head became both a work to be appreciated as a picturesquely aged, fragmentary testament to a lost culture—in the same manner as a conventional antiquity—and something else, a manifesto proclaiming a typically modernist disdain for the "merely pretty" in favor of more profound aesthetic pursuits.

Here, the impact of this head resembles the impact of the Stravinsky-Nijinsky ballet Le sacre du printemps, as described in 1913 by the critic Alexis Roland-Manuel, quoting the original program notes:

The most striking thing at first, is that despite its apparent complexity, this work has a robust simplicity entirely unmarred by rhetoric. Robust and clear . . . ; no deceptive whispers: the ardent mystery of spring, "the obscure and immense sensation of all things at the hour when nature renews their forms," is not evoked with a vain, coquettish stammer that conceals underlying artifice. These stammers have the courage to express themselves without affectation. To endow his work with the stern force, the enormous power of these primitive rites, which far predate those of Dionysus, to evoke "the total Panic rise of the universal sap," the musician . . . has to break the hallowed rules, must deliberately change the color of his music, and of music itself.⁶⁷

Like Le sacre du printemps, then, the Fang head that Astruc admired in Guillaume's gallery derived its aesthetic power from the way it evoked an early-twentieth-century Western vision of the "terrible" yet revitalizing "primitive." When juxtaposed, however, the two descriptions also differ from one another in a crucial respect: their attribution of intention. Where Roland-Manuel presented Le sacre as the result of a very modern artist's conscious choice to abandon "hallowed rules," Astruc saw the Fang head as a long-dead anonymous "artisan's" articulation of exactly such rules, in the form of a profound and unquestioned religious faith.

The gap between Astruc's spontaneously devout, ancient African "artisan" and Roland-Manuel's "deliberately" innovative primitivist musician reveals a historical displacement at the heart of this early appreciation of traditional African sculpture—a displacement that did much to shape the ambivalent nature of primitive art as an aesthetic category. By insisting that the aesthetic quality of an object was tied to its antiquity and its imbrication in a set of values that contact with Europeans would inevitably destroy, early connoisseurs deprived contemporary Africans of creative agency while at the same time projecting a modernist conception of art history onto African sculptural production.⁶⁸ The best African sculptures, as these connoisseurs saw them, had a formal élan that they equated with the avant-garde. Since the ethnological understanding commonly accepted during the early decades of the twentieth century considered “primitive” cultures to be ahistorical, the notion of an African avant-garde was a contradiction in terms. As a result, it seemed necessary to account for the aesthetic vitality of certain African sculptures by imagining them to date from alternative moments of rupture: what Le Corbusier, in a short text on “so-called primitive” sculpture, termed “creative periods, when a society constructed its tools, its language, its thought, its gods.” Once these gods had been invented, he wrote, echoing Clouzot and Level, all that was left was “style.”⁶⁹ In this way, Western observers constructed traditional African sculpture as both the archaic foundation of a “classicism” and an example of the formally “modern.” The African version of the avant-garde artist, according to this understanding, became a mythical rather than an actual being, a primal genius who created the “classical” vocabulary that his culture would endlessly repeat, with steadily diminishing vigor—but that Western artists could transform into the starting point for an entirely new process of formal evolution. Thus, while the notion of authenticity in primitive art accorded a new dignity to people from colonized societies by acknowledging them as potential creators of works that could rival or even surpass the best of Western sculpture, its classicizing notion of antiquity also tended to make that dignity something always already lost.

⁶⁶ Marcel Astruc, "A une idole noire," Vogue 8, no. 3 (March 1, 1927): 39.

⁶⁷ Alexis Roland-Manuel, "Le sacre du printemps," Montjoie! Organe de l'impérialisme artistique française 1, no. 9–10 (June 14–29, 1913): 13, emphasis in the original.

FIGURE 6: Unidentified Fang sculptor, Gabon, Reliquary Head (Nlo Bieri), nineteenth or twentieth century, wood, metal, palm oil, $8\frac{5}{16} \times 9\frac{3}{4} \times 6\frac{5}{8}$ in. (46.5 × 24.8 × 16.8 cm). Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York. The Michael C. Rockefeller Memorial Collection, Bequest of Nelson A. Rockefeller, 1979. 1979.206.229.

TO UNDERSTAND THE IMPLICATIONS of the idea of primitive art for Africans and people of African descent in French colonies, we need to consider how that idea moved across national borders, carried by the cultural prestige of its initial Parisian advocates. Almost from its inception, the market for African objects as art in Paris had a strong transatlantic dimension, which depended heavily on the American willingness to acknowledge French preeminence in matters artistic. Paul Guillaume’s most famous text, Primitive Negro Sculpture, was a typical product of this exchange: thanks to the support of American collector Albert Barnes, it appeared first in English. Guillaume’s American co-author, Thomas Munro, an art educator in Barnes’s employ, probably did more than half of the actual writing, but he nevertheless shared billing with Guillaume, in deference to the latter’s far greater cultural prestige.⁷⁰ As early as 1914, working through his contact Marius de Zayas, Guillaume sent objects to New York, where they were featured in a landmark exhibition at the photographer Alfred Stieglitz's gallery 291.⁷¹ Statuary in Wood by African Savages: The Root of Modern Art was perhaps the first show to present African sculptures in the modernist style that would reach its apogee in MoMA's galleries twenty years later.⁷² Similarly, as Wendy Grossman has shown, American photographers, including Charles Sheeler, Man Ray, and Walker Evans, played key roles in developing the conventions of representation that would be used in images of primitive art for decades to come.⁷³

⁶⁸ For perhaps the classic statement of this conception, which envisions the history of modern art as a series of movements engaged in dialectical progress toward “geometrical” and “non-geometrical” abstraction, see the art-historical flowchart prepared by the Museum of Modern Art’s first director, Alfred H. Barr, Jr., on the original dust jacket of Barr, Cubism and Abstract Art (New York, 1936).

⁶⁹ Le Corbusier, “Les arts dits primitifs dans la maison d’aujourd’hui” (flyer, Paris, 1935), 2.

⁷⁰ As Christa Clarke has shown (see fn. 46), Guillaume’s role in the production of the text was less extensive than his credit as co-author would indicate. It is nevertheless possible to judge the extent to which the book reflected his opinions by comparing the English-language edition with the French translation he published in Paris three years later. Guillaume’s translation retained all the passages quoted in this article, but eliminated the final chapter of the original edition, which was devoted to a series of elaborate formal analyses of particular objects in the Barnes collection. This omission enraged Barnes, and did much to contribute to Guillaume’s final rupture with him in 1929. Guillaume and Munro, La sculpture nègre primitive; and Barnes Foundation Archives, letter from Barnes to Guillaume, March 1, 1929.

In the American context, the modernist aesthetic approach to traditional African sculpture was closely tied to race politics, even as it recapitulated the ambivalences of the French discourse of connoisseurship: in New York, as in Paris, these objects generally were seen not as contemporary creations, but as antiquities—"ancestral" sources of an alternative classical tradition. The African American philosopher Alain Locke, for example, in his influential 1925 anthology The New Negro, pointed with pride to the "growing influence of African art upon European art in general." For him, traditional African sculptures were "arts of the forefathers," which had the potential to give contemporary black artists "the lesson of a classic background, the lesson of discipline, of style, of technical control pushed to the limits of technical mastery."⁷⁴ At the same time, a growing number of white collectors saw an interest in African sculpture as a natural complement to progressive racial attitudes. Barnes, for instance, served as a bridge between Guillaume and African American intellectuals; several photographs of works from his collection appeared in Locke's anthology. The numerous addresses of American primitive art collectors that Parisian dealer Louis Carré gathered during his trip to New York for the 1935 MoMA show provide further proof of the large moneyed public that was willing to embrace traditional African sculpture in the United States at the time.⁷⁵

Nevertheless, throughout this period, there was a difference in degree between American and French knowledge of these objects. Interwar Paris was in the throes of "negrophilia," a widespread fascination with things black, ranging from jazz to traditional African sculpture.⁷⁶ Jean-Louis Paudrat suggests that there were 147 private collections of African sculpture in the city by 1930, and in 1931, African objects fetched record prices in a pair of highly publicized auctions.⁷⁷ Certainly, the constant

⁷¹ See Paudrat, "From Africa," 153–154.

⁷² A photograph of the installation, designed by Edward Steichen, appeared in the 1916 issue of the journal Camera Work. See Grossman, Man Ray, African Art, and the Modernist Lens, 15.

⁷³ In addition to Grossman, "Photography at the Crossroads" and Man Ray, African Art, and the Modernist Lens, see Virginia-Lee Webb, Perfect Documents: Walker Evans and African Art, 1935 (New York, 2000).

⁷⁴ Alain Locke, "The Legacy of the Ancestral Arts," in Locke, ed., The New Negro: Voices of the Harlem Renaissance (1925; repr., New York, 1997), 256.

⁷⁵ Archives nationales de France, fonds Louis Carré, 389 AP 29, dr. 1, "Relations avec l'amérique, secrétariat, 1935–1945," subfolder marked "Voyage New York 1935."

⁷⁶ See Petrine Archer-Straw, Negrophilia: Avant-Garde Paris and Black Culture in the 1920s (New York, 2000); Jody Blake, Le Tumulte Noir: Modernist Art and Popular Entertainment in Jazz-Age Paris (University Park, Pa., 1999).

⁷⁷ Jean-Louis Paudrat, "Primitive Arts in Paris on the Threshold of the Thirties," Art Tribal: Bulletin de l'Association des amis du musée Barbier-Müller (1996): 46. The two auctions were the sales of the collections of André Breton and Paul Eluard, and of Georges de Miré. See Bellier, Ratton, and Carré, Collection André Breton et Paul Eluard; and Alphonse Bellier, Charles Ratton, and Louis Carré, Collection G. de Miré: Sculptures anciennes d'Afrique et d'Amérique (Paris, 1931).

flow of businessmen, soldiers, and civil servants to and from the colonies meant that it would have been much more likely for enthusiasts of modest means to encounter African objects of a type that struck them as potentially “authentic” in the flea markets and antique shops of Paris than it would have been in the United States, where such objects appeared only as high-priced rarities in art galleries. The Paris Colonial Exposition of 1931 further intensified popular interest in African sculpture.⁷⁸ It was no accident, for example, that the French Equatorial Africa Pavilion at the 1931 Exposition included a “special vitrine devoted to art nègre,” which “showed the differences between authentic pieces of native art and those made en série for export,” presumably to prevent aspiring collectors from being duped into buying allegedly inferior objects.⁷⁹ By 1935, therefore, an appreciation of traditional African sculpture had already become a nostrum of progressive French taste. At the same time, the discipline of cultural anthropology in France underwent a profound shift, developing a new attitude toward the systematic use of data gathered through fieldwork. The key agents in this transformation were the Institut d’ethnologie, founded by Lucien Lévy-Bruhl, Marcel Mauss, and Paul Rivet in 1925, and the Musée ethnographique du Trocadéro, as reformed in 1928 by Rivet and Georges-Henri Rivière.⁸⁰ These institutions, as James Clifford has shown, provided training, financial support, and publicity for the work of Africanist anthropologists such as Marcel Griaule and Michel Leiris, who redefined the field in the 1930s.⁸¹ As a result of these twin developments—growing cultural acceptance and an expansion of ethnographic literature—French-language commentary on African art began to change, developing a more fine-grained sense of the original contexts in which sculptures were produced.⁸²

During the 1930s, an appreciation of the merits of primitive art grew deep enough roots in French culture to have an influence on colonial policy as well. This development occurred in the context of a broader movement that Gary Wilder has called “colonial humanism,” an effort on the part of left-leaning French colonial administrators after the First World War to foster “economic development, social welfare, and political order” in the empire through the cultivation of “an ethnological un-

⁷⁸ See Benoît de L’Estoile, Le goût des autres: De l’exposition coloniale aux arts premiers (Paris, 2010), 33–72; and Patricia A. Morton, Hybrid Modernities: Architecture and Representation at the 1931 Colonial Exposition, Paris (Cambridge, Mass., 2000).

⁷⁹ Henri Vallois, “L’Exposition coloniale de Paris et les congrès (1931),” L’Anthropologie 42 (1932): 57–58.

⁸⁰ For a classic analysis of this shift, see James Clifford, “On Ethnographic Surrealism,” in Clifford, The Predicament of Culture, 117–151. See also Alice L. Conklin, “The New ‘Ethnology’ and ‘La Situation Coloniale’ in Interwar France,” French Politics, Culture and Society 20, no. 2 (2002): 29–46; and Élise Dubuc, “Le futur antérieur du Musée de l’homme,” Gradhiva 24 (1998): 71–92.

⁸¹ As Clifford was the first to note, this generation of ethnographers had close ties to the artistic avant-garde. For a thought-provoking and useful exploration of these connections, see Julia Kelly, Art, Ethnography, and the Life of Objects: Paris, c. 1925–35 (Manchester, 2007).

⁸² Perhaps the most influential early product of this intellectual shift was the Danish collector Carl Kjersmeier’s four-volume study of African sculpture, which organized objects taxonomically into ethnically and geographically defined “style centers.” The notion of “tribal style” that Kjersmeier’s work codified remains a powerful, if contested, theoretical lens for students of African art. See Kjersmeier, Centres de style de la sculpture nègre africaine, 4 vols. (Paris, 1935–1938). For assessments of Kjersmeier’s significance, see Laude, La peinture française et l’art nègre, 435; Grossman, Man Ray, African Art, and the Modernist Lens, 70–76. For a wide-ranging critique of this taxonomic approach, see Sidney Littlefield Kasfir, “One Tribe, One Style? Paradigms in the Historiography of African Art,” History in Africa 11 (1984): 163–193.

derstanding of indigenous society as a distinct, organic and dynamic totality.”⁸³ As this description indicates, advocates of colonial humanism took considerable inspiration from the new ethnography that began to emerge in the late 1920s. Administrators sympathetic to this approach reached the apex of their influence in the wake of the 1936 triumph of the Popular Front, a broad leftist coalition that formed in response to the rise of fascism at home and abroad. The most enduring metropolitan product of this ascendancy was the Musée de l’homme, established in 1937 under Rivet’s direction.⁸⁴

From the start, colonial humanism was hobbled by contradiction: colonial officials, after all, strove to understand indigenous cultures not just out of pure respect or admiration, but in order to be able to reshape those cultures according to a vision of “modernity” that they retained the sole authority to define and impose. While the ethnological framework on which colonial humanism was based, as embodied in the information-packed display cases of the Musée de l’homme, tended to downplay aestheticizing isolation in favor of a holistic view of a given group’s material culture, this new approach also fostered a sense among colonial administrators that various ethnic groups had artistic styles of their own, and that such distinctions should be preserved—both for the benefit of colonized peoples themselves, and to increase local production of craft goods imbued with an “authenticity” that would appeal to metropolitan consumers. Taken together, the experiences of two very different French West Africans, both also from 1937, give us a sense of the way primitive art, and the idea of authenticity that went along with it, crystallized the possibilities and paradoxes of this distinctive moment in the history of France’s empire.

In early September of that year, at the invitation of Marcel de Coppet, the new governor-general of French West Africa, thirty-year-old Léopold Sédar Senghor traveled to the colony’s capital, Dakar, to deliver a public lecture on colonial education.⁸⁵ Even at this early stage of what would become a distinguished and controversial career, Senghor’s exceptional position made him a local celebrity: an audience of more than a thousand came to hear him speak.⁸⁶ Senghor had been born in the coastal town of Joal, far from the historical centers of Franco-African power in Senegal, but he had nevertheless achieved an unprecedented degree of success in the French educational system.⁸⁷ He was the first African to receive a French gov-

⁸³ Wilder, The French Imperial Nation-State, 76.

⁸⁴ See Alice L. Conklin, “Civil Society, Science, and Empire in Late Republican France: The Foundation of Paris’s Museum of Man,” Osiris, 2nd ser., 17 (2002): 255–290; Dubuc, “Le futur antérieur du Musée de l’homme”; and Daniel J. Sherman, “‘Peoples Ethnographic’: Objects, Museums, and the Colonial Inheritance of French Ethnology,” French Historical Studies 27, no. 3 (Summer 2004): 669–703.

⁸⁵ The information presented here about the circumstances of Senghor’s speech comes from Janet G. Vaillant, Black, French, and African: A Life of Léopold Sédar Senghor (Cambridge, Mass., 1990), 147–165. For a useful timeline of Senghor’s life and accomplishments, see Jacques Louis Hymans, Léopold Sédar Senghor: An Intellectual Biography (Edinburgh, 1971), 259–262.

⁸⁶ Ibid., 151.

⁸⁷ Senegal occupied a distinctive situation among French colonies. From the 1880s, when the French extended their control over the region’s interior, Senegal was divided into two parts, the urban communes (Dakar, Gorée, Rufisque, and Saint-Louis) and the rural protectorat. Creoles and Africans born in the communes, known as originaires, enjoyed a privileged status as French citizens. Africans born outside the communes, such as Senghor, were subjects rather than citizens, and were accountable not to metropolitan French law but to the colonial legal system known as the indigénat. See Michael C. Lambert, “From Citizenship to Négritude: ‘Making a Difference’ in Elite Ideologies of Colonized Francophone West Africa,” Comparative Studies in Society and History 35, no. 2 (April 1993): 239–262.

ernment scholarship to go to Paris for a degree in letters, and also the first to become an agrégé de l'Université. When he gave his speech in Dakar, he had already spent several years living in Paris and then in Tours, where he worked as a lycée teacher—another position that it was quite remarkable for an African to occupy. Coppet, a Popular Front appointee, saw Senghor as an important potential contributor to the new order that advocates of colonial humanism were seeking to create. The Dakar address came at the end of a government-funded research trip to Senegal, during which Senghor visited colonial schools in Dakar, Joal, Thiès, and the rural region of Sine-Saloum; he would subsequently present the results of his fieldwork both in a letter to Coppet—which the governor-general appears to have read with enthusiasm—and in an address to the 1937 International Congress on the Cultural Evolution of Colonial Peoples in Paris.⁸⁸

During his student years in Paris, in conjunction with a group of colleagues and fellow intellectuals from the West Indies—especially Aimé Césaire and Léon-Gontran Damas—Senghor had begun to develop a cultural conception of black identity that sought both to define its uniqueness and to encompass the broad geographical sweep of the African diaspora.⁸⁹ This conception was very much a product of the open, cosmopolitan atmosphere of Paris in the early 1930s, where modernist aesthetic concerns, popular negrophilia, a growing interest in ethnography, a small but visible group of African and West Indian migrants, an expatriate African American community, and an array of short-lived journals fostered a lively transatlantic engagement with the idea of “Africanness.”⁹⁰ The widespread appreciation of African sculpture, both among Parisian modernists and among figures in the Harlem Renaissance, proved a particularly important inspiration for Senghor. As he recollected in 1961, although Paris in the early 1930s might not have been “the largest museum of Negro-African art, nowhere else had art nègre been understood, commented on, praised, assimilated to such a degree.” This enthusiasm, “by revealing the values of my ancestral civilization to me, obliged me to adopt them and cultivate them in myself.”⁹¹ The courses Senghor took at the Institut d’ethnologie beginning in 1936 gave him an intellectual framework in which to place this aesthetic response, al-

⁸⁸ For Coppet’s attention to Senghor’s report, see the pencil notes from Coppet on its first page, Archives nationales du Sénégal [hereafter ANS], O-614 (31). Vaillant provides information about Senghor’s tour and presentation to the Paris conference; Black, French, and African, 155–165.

⁸⁹ These initial discussions would provide the foundation for what would later become the ideology of Négritude, which first reached a broad audience with the 1948 publication of Léopold Sédar Senghor, ed., Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache de langue française (Paris, 1948).

⁹⁰ Perhaps the most important of these journals for the young Senghor was the Revue du monde noir, which grew out of the well-known salon held in the early 1930s by the Nardal sisters, Paulette, Andrée, and Jane. The Nardals, who were from the West Indies, served as a link between the Anglophone and Francophone black worlds; their Revue published many of the American writers associated with the Harlem Renaissance. See Hymans, Léopold Sédar Senghor, 33–35; and Vaillant, Black, French, and African, 94–97. For more on the transnational black community that took shape in Paris during this period, see Jennifer Anne Boittin, Colonial Metropolis: The Urban Grounds of Anti-Imperialism and Feminism in Interwar Paris (Lincoln, Neb., 2010); Brent Hayes Edwards, The Practice of Diaspora: Literature, Translation, and the Rise of Black Internationalism (Cambridge, Mass., 2003); Tyler Stovall, Paris Noir: African Americans in the City of Light (New York, 1996), esp. 25–129; and Sweeney, From Fetish to Subject.

⁹¹ Léopold Sédar Senghor, “Paris” [1961], in Senghor, Liberté I: Négritude et humanisme (Paris, 1964), 313–314.

lowing him to elaborate a conception of African civilizations as organic wholes distinct from those of Europe, but by no means inferior to them.⁹²

In his 1937 Dakar address, "The Cultural Problem in French West Africa," and the report to Coppet that followed it, Senghor sought to bring these ideas together by proposing a new cultural relationship between France and its African colonies.⁹³ The challenge facing Africans, he told his audience, was "to assimilate, not be assimilated." The future, he declared, would be "Afro-French." In practice, as he saw it, realizing this goal would involve creating a "two-headed" educational system in the colonies, which would teach students both French and African languages, history, and moral principles. Self-consciously echoing the title of Locke's landmark anthology, Senghor asserted that "bilingualism is precisely what will permit an integral expression of the new Negro [nègre nouveau]." To be effective, he added, this bi-cultural approach would need to be applied at all levels of the educational system, from Dakar's elite École William Ponty to the vocational training schools known as maisons des artisans. Indeed, for Senghor, the latter played a crucial "cultural role," since they "do not seek to train workers who execute a plan, but artisans who draw inspiration from old black techniques, which they enrich with the study of European techniques."⁹⁴ In his report to Coppet, Senghor directly linked the cultural exchange that this new educational system would promote to recent developments in European art:

French humanism . . . has a duty to enrich itself with new cultural contributions, and to seek them first in its colonies. It has a duty to investigate, to explore every corner of the French soul to reveal all of its hidden traits. And Africa, among other lands, will reveal these hidden traits by casting them in relief. French artists have not hesitated to assimilate black values and to make French works of them.

The colonial government, in turn, could push this process further by creating schools that permitted "black and white to meet," and to emerge from that meeting "richer, and with a stronger personality."⁹⁵

While Senghor's educational ideal of cultural encounter and mutual enrichment was compelling when stated in theoretical terms, realizing it proved much more complex. This difficulty emerged with particular clarity in the maisons des artisans that he singled out for special mention in his speech. For the officials who administered the education system in French West Africa, the mission of these institutions reflected the fundamental assumptions of French connoisseurs of art nègre. In practice, therefore, the goal was not Senghor's blending of African and European techniques, it was to "save" the venerable but disappearing traditions of "ancestral" African art by teaching "authentic" techniques and aesthetic principles to African sculptors, weavers, and other craftsmen who had succumbed to excessive European influence. Training "authentic" artists—or, as colonial administrators preferred to call them,

⁹² Wilder, The French Imperial Nation-State, 155. For a letter expressing Senghor's intention to study "African ethnology and linguistics" by commuting to Paris from Tours, see ANS O-718/931, letter to Albert Charton, inspecteur général de l'enseignement, dated August 17, 1935.

⁹³ See the typescript of the address and report in ANS O-614 (31). An abridged version of the address is collected in Senghor, Liberté I, 11–21.

⁹⁴ ANS O-614 (31), "Le problème culturel en AOF," 5, 4, 6, 13, 10.

⁹⁵ ANS O-614 (31), Report by Léopold Sédar Senghor to Marcel de Coppet, "L'enseignement en A.O.F.," 22.

“artisans”—on the ground, however, turned out to be considerably more difficult than transforming already existing objects into “authentic works of art.”

The case of an artist from Porto-Novo, in the present-day Republic of Benin—previously the French West African region of Dahomey—provides a revealing counterpoint to Senghor’s discovery of the culturally affirmative value of traditional African sculpture viewed in European terms. In 1931, Jean Dado, a talented young man who made a good living creating souvenirs for European visitors, received an opportunity to go to Paris and participate in the Colonial Exposition.⁹⁶ Upon his return, Coppet, then the regional governor, noticed the young man’s talent. When Coppet became governor-general, Dado was awarded a scholarship to the Maison des artisans soudanais, in the city of Bamako. The self-proclaimed mission of the school’s founder, the architect J. Le Gall, was to bring about “the plastic realization of the black race” by retraining Africans in the principles and values that had once inspired their own traditional sculpture. Dado quickly disappointed Le Gall. In a bitter report to the colony’s inspecteur général de l’enseignement, Le Gall noted that Dado, despite his self-confidence—his luggage tag proclaimed him to be an “artiste graveur”—“has until now made nothing but small pyro-engraved copies of drawings, on calabashes, or copies of post-cards on ostrich eggs.” Worse, Dado had proved entirely unwilling to abandon the aesthetic values that had served him so well as a maker of souvenirs: “from the point of view of his conceptions concerning native art,” Le Gall concluded, “he has totally lost the plastic sense of his race.”⁹⁷ To become “authentic,” Dado would have had to abandon his own creative impulses and follow the examples his French teacher provided, for instance by copying traditional Dahomean sculptures from photographs. Instead, pleading ill health and “serious malaises,” he chose to return to Porto-Novo after only a few months, abandoning his earlier ambition to be the sculptor who would supervise the decoration of the Dahomey Pavilion at the 1937 Paris Exposition.⁹⁸ The pavilion was eventually decorated with castings of more “authentic” earthen bas-reliefs from the palace of King Behanzin in Abomey.⁹⁹ Dado himself disappeared from the historical record after leaving Bamako. A few engraved calabashes may be sitting in the dusty shop of a French brocanteur, but until they are discovered, the only trace of his art that is accessible to us is the immaculate penmanship of his letters to colonial administrators.

Taken together, Senghor’s and Dado’s very different situations reveal the paradoxical nature of the idea of authenticity upon which the Western aesthetic category of primitive art depended. At root, this paradox involved a conflict between an affirmative vision of aesthetic universalism and a pluralistic awareness of cultural difference. Appreciation of these objects could foster a new kind of broader understanding, enabling proud bearers of one civilization to develop a sense of another’s subtleties and achievements; at the same time, however, the poignancy of the impact of these objects on Western viewers relied upon an implicit sense that the current descendants of their original sculptors, by virtue of having sacrificed their cultural distinctiveness to “modernity,” were forever unable to replicate the creative feats of

⁹⁶ ANS O-613 (31), dossier Jean Dado, report signed Albert Charton, January 20, 1937.

⁹⁷ Ibid., report signed J. Le Gall, March 16, 1937, 2, 1.

⁹⁸ Ibid., letter from Jean Dado, April 2, 1937.

⁹⁹ For a description of these bas-reliefs, see Michel Leiris and Jacqueline Delange, African Art, trans. Michael Ross (London, 1968), 191–192.

their ancestors. With this aesthetic double bind, early-twentieth-century connoisseurs of primitive art recapitulated a paradox at the heart of the late-nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century French colonial enterprise. "Natives," in the grand tradition of French republicanism, were widely acknowledged as potential equals, but the imperatives of colonial domination meant that in practice equality was permanently deferred.¹⁰⁰ Even so, the ideal of potential equality could serve as a powerful lever for changing dominant assumptions—in Cooper's terms, as a way of renegotiating the boundaries of inclusion and exclusion that imperial power drew. In the hands of Senghor or African American intellectuals such as Locke, the "antique" sculpture of Africa could serve as a legacy on which subsequent generations of black artists could build. It promised to provide the basis for a positive sense of Pan-African identity in the same way that classical Greek and Roman sculpture did for Europeans, and as such could offer a glimpse of a new form of cultural and political solidarity.¹⁰¹

This ambivalent legacy continues to challenge scholars, who have simultaneously elaborated an incisive critique of the idea of authenticity that continues to inform connoisseurship of traditional African sculpture—as in the work of Price and Steiner—and a compelling case for the aesthetic value of what Susan Vogel has called "the classical arts of Africa," which "remain as rich and inexhaustible a subject of study as Roman art or Shakespeare."¹⁰² Rather than viewing these two lines of argument as mutually exclusive, it might be useful to consider them linked products of the historical context in which the idea of primitive art emerged: the French Third Republic, with its distinctive position as both a democracy founded on a universalistic conception of human rights and an imperial power that exerted authority through conquest. Efforts to come to grips with the ever-ramifying ways in which this political doubleness expressed itself have become central to the work of historians of colonial France; the case of primitive art suggests an additional dimension to the problem, one that allows us to sharpen our sense of the relationship between cultural and imperial power. Certainly, scholars have done much to explore the complex ways in which all empires generate categories of inclusion and exclusion, but in the case of primitive art, it is important not to lose sight of the specifically French conditions in which this particular category emerged. Artists, collectors, critics, and dealers all benefited from the remarkable influence that came from their residence in what was, at the time, the capital of the Western art world. They generally did not consider themselves propagandists for colonial expansion—many, in fact, strongly opposed it. Nevertheless, the way of seeing traditional African sculptures that they developed grew from a set of historically contingent assumptions about the nature of “primitive man” that resonated with the ideology of French colonialism. This system of connoisseurship also helped transform certain objects into “masterpieces of world art,” however, and by virtue of that act, made it possible for them to lead very different discursive lives elsewhere. In the context of colonialism, the idea of primitive art became—to borrow Benedict Anderson’s term—“modular,” susceptible to appropriation, redefinition, and use for a variety of conflicting purposes, not only in the French metropole and its colonies, but across the globe.¹⁰³

¹⁰⁰ For two different perspectives on this paradox, see Conklin, A Mission to Civilize, and Wilder, The French Imperial Nation-State.

¹⁰¹ This conception of traditional African sculpture played an important role in the art history of post-independence Senegal, in part because of the influence of the Négritude-based cultural policy that Senghor developed as the country's first president. See Elizabeth Harney, In Senghor's Shadow: Art, Politics, and the Avant-Garde in Senegal, 1960–1995 (Durham, N.C., 2004), esp. 1–104.

¹⁰² Susan Vogel, "Whither African Art? Emerging Scholarship at the End of an Age," African Arts 38, no. 4 (Winter 2005): 12. Sidney Littlefield Kasfir has ascribed this bifurcated approach to the position of African art scholarship, which, especially in the United States, has uneasily attempted to join the very different—and often contradictory—disciplinary concerns of anthropology and art history. See Kasfir, African Art and the Colonial Encounter: Inventing a Global Commodity (Bloomington, Ind., 2007), esp. ix–xi.

¹⁰³ Benedict Anderson, Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism, new ed. (London, 2006), 4.

John Warne Monroe is Associate Professor of History at Iowa State University, where he has taught since 2002. He is author of Laboratories of Faith: Mesmerism, Spiritism, and Occultism in Modern France (Cornell University Press, 2008) and is currently writing a book on the reception of African sculpture in interwar France and its colonies.

Featured Reviews

JULIA A. CLANCY-SMITH. Mediterraneans: North Africa and Europe in an Age of Migration, c. 1800–1900. (The California World History Library, number 15.) Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 445. $49.95.

In the past decade or so, Mediterranean history and Mediterranean studies have attracted increased attention among scholars writing in English. A number of monographs have appeared (not least Peregrine Horden and Nicholas Purcell's monumental Corrupting Sea: A Study of Mediterranean History [2000]), journals have been established, conferences have been organized, and spirited debates have raged on the merits, limitations, and values of taking the Mediterranean as a unit of historical investigation. While this revived interest in the Mediterranean and its history has spurred valuable scholarship, the resurgence has generally tended to privilege states and empires as subjects of these histories, or has focused on specific ethnic networks and traced their members' movements and activities across the shores of the Mediterranean. In all these histories, North Africa has been, if not side-tracked, then clearly understudied and marginalized.

Julia A. Clancy-Smith's exceptional and magisterial book is thus a particularly welcome addition to the literature on Mediterranean history. First and foremost, by focusing on Tunisia, it shifts North Africa from the periphery to the center of Mediterranean history. Or, more accurately, it challenges the conception of a center-periphery and of a dichotomy between (Muslim) North Africa and (Christian) Europe by underlining the deep connections and flows that linked North Africa to other parts of the Mediterranean. Second, the book focuses on the half-decade preceding the establishment of a French protectorate in Tunisia in 1881. This is also a major contribution, since the body of historical research on the colonial period far outweighs that preceding it, and since the history of migrations around the Mediterranean has received greater attention for the later part of the nineteenth century. Third, Clancy-Smith's work familiarizes an English-reading audience with the vast and rich body of literature on North Africa produced in North African, French, and Italian universities.

An opus magnum, this book is clearly the outcome of the author's deep knowledge and decades of research in Tunisian, North African, and Mediterranean history, focusing on populations hitherto marginalized or deemed nearly invisible in previous "traditional" histories: trans-Mediterranean migrants who made their way to Tunisia (often via other parts of North Africa, such as Algeria) from various corners of the Mediterranean, particularly Malta and Sicily. As Clancy-Smith clearly states, her "objective is not merely to salvage these life stories but primarily to understand how Tunisians, defined roughly as subjects of the Husaynid dynasty, as well as other city residents viewed, lived in close proximity to, and interacted or coped with immigrants. Another aim is to trace how a borderland society came into existence and what that meant for Tunisia's history in the long term" (p. 6). Needless to say, this is a particularly ambitious and difficult task since migrants mostly left a documented trace "when they faced some difficulty—lack of housing, unpaid debts, violent conflict with neighbors—that brought into play local authorities, either Tunisian, or consular, or both" (p. 15). Clancy-Smith rises to the challenge by uncovering and using a plethora of original sources, assembling them in a creative manner, and reading them against the grain and between the lines. She adroitly weaves vignettes with large-scale structural analysis, combining the micro and the macro. The result is a lively and thought-provoking social history that raises important questions, and suggests many avenues for future research.

This remarkably wide-ranging book is organized into nine chapters in addition to an introduction and an epilogue. The first six chapters are prosopographies, while the last three trace individual life stories more fully. Chapter one presents the lay of the land and introduces the reader to the social geography of Tunis circa 1830: its various neighborhoods, markets, and places of work and worship, and the ways in which individuals and communities demarcated their territories. Chapter two, "Detours: Migrations in a Mobile World," examines the forces behind migrations, including those governing women's displacement. The author suggests that a pattern of circular migration was emerging in the nineteenth century as a consequence of relentless population pressures in Sicily and especially Malta, which drove migrants to Tunisia. One of Clancy-Smith's most important and interesting arguments here is that the French occupation of neighboring Algeria in 1830 had a direct effect on migration to Tunisia, as it "prim[ed] the migratory pump" and turned La Goulette and smaller port towns in Tunisia into "gateways—or get-aways for deserters, escapees and criminals headed to—or out of—Algeria" (p. 97). In the course of the nineteenth century, North Africa "was transformed into a human dump for the politically turbulent or socially unwanted—in addition to representing a sort of 'new World' for people suffering from the dislocations wrought by nation-state or empire building, warfare, and industrial capitalism" (p. 94).

Chapters three, four, and five form a unit examining how migrants made a living, and how they integrated themselves into existing systems of production, distribution, and resource allocation. Chapter three, "Making a Living: Domestic Service and Other Forms of Employment," describes how household servants used existing networks to secure positions and, once employed, how they constructed new networks and recruited newcomers (p. 106). This chapter also raises interesting and salient questions on the relationship between the abolition of slavery and domestic service; communal relations between migrants and established artisans; the growing numbers of middle-class Europeans in Tunis and new opportunities and spaces for employment; and the deep anxieties about moral disorder surrounding female migrant workers. This last theme is further explored in chapter four, "Making a Living: Petty Commerce, Places of Sociability, and the Down-and-Out," which analyzes multiple cases involving migrant women deemed of uncertain virtue for selling spirits in taverns. Widows, viewed as "women without men" (p. 145), were particularly feared as agents of moral peril. More broadly, Clancy-Smith shows how migrant employment was connected to the emergence of new popular urban places such as taverns, which destabilized traditional patterns of street marking and spatial gendering. The risk of such social tremors was particularly feared when migrants fell into destitution. Clancy-Smith masterfully and painstakingly reconstructs the story of the Fassy family (originally from Marseilles) from archival sources spanning the Mediterranean—from the Catholic registry archives in the Tunis cathedral to the archives of the Chamber of Commerce in Marseilles. She sheds light on mechanisms of survival and charity that were available to indigent migrants, and that often crossed communal boundaries. The resulting picture is one of continuous motion throughout the nineteenth century, as families moved back and forth among Tunisia, Algeria, Sicily, and Malta, struggling to find adequate work and housing.

In a particularly rich chapter (chapter five), Clancy-Smith examines people whose livelihood was connected to the sea. She shows how the near monopoly held by Maltese, Italian, and Greek sponge fishermen in the Sfax region deprived local Tunisian fishermen of their fair share, occasionally creating conflict and prompting Tunisian beys to file complaints with foreign consuls. One of Clancy-Smith's most insightful discussions here pertains to contraband. The author argues that the boundary between legal and illegal activities could be very blurred and that the growing contraband economy—in fish and gunpowder, among other commodities—that operated in the central Mediterranean corridor throughout the nineteenth century depended upon certain kinds of migrations, and specifically upon occupations tied to the sea, that were often integrated into legitimate household economies of tavern keeping and fishing. Her study of contraband yields several important findings: first, it "reveals the nature of, and complex processes leading to, greater commercial and financial entanglement with Europe and a concomitant reduction of economic ties with the Ottoman Empire" (p. 196). Second, black market operations and smuggling can be read as "globalization from below" and as "a form of resistance to the intrusions of centralizing states or imperial formations or simply business as usual" (p. 196).

Chapter six examines the increasingly tangled legal culture and the legal pluralism that regulated the lives of beylical subjects, expatriate Europeans, and other foreigners. These complex and overlapping legal arrangements often resulted in "forum shopping"—"a system through which individuals appeal to competing legal authorities to secure a more sympathetic hearing and hopefully successful outcome" (pp. 201–202). Women seem to have often employed forum shopping, including by switching religious affiliation through conversion, a practice Clancy-Smith qualifies as a kind of border crossing. The author shows that foreign protection shifted in response to internal and external forces and the meanings attached to "protégé" could be very flexible and occasionally elusive. She suggests that we read "protection not as a legal absolute but as representing a spectrum of rights and privileges with inherent plasticity interpretation" (p. 210).

The last three chapters focus on individual figures and their impact on Tunisian society. Chapter seven traces the life and work of Emilie de Vialar, who founded a religious order (the Sisters of St. Joseph de l'Apparition) that, for forty years, was the only female congregation in Tunisia. It examines the impact that this congregation, whose members were simultaneously migrants or travelers and missionaries, had on local society, and similarly, the order's relationship with Tunisian society and with the Husaynid rulers, as well as the transformations it underwent through its members' multiple displacements. As such, it is a welcome addition to the growing body of literature on missionaries, gender, and empire. Chapter eight looks at elite households and social interactions on the seaside, where leisure and sea-bathing were combined with seaside diplomacy. Chapter nine follows the life and career of Khayr al-Din al-Tunisi, an influential author, thinker, statesman, ■ member of “a Mediterranean community of thought,” and a migrant par excellence who was at various moments in his life “a Circassian, an Ottoman, an official in service to the Husaynids, and in his final days, a Tunisian” (p. 316). Finally, a remarkable epilogue that juxtaposes the past and the present not only underlines similarities between Mediterranean migrations in our century and in the preceding ones but also underscores how earlier migration flows “directly shaped subsequent south to north movements in the twentieth and early twenty-first centuries” (p. 343).

This book is an embarrassment of riches, which can be somewhat overwhelming at times, as there is a great deal of information and illustrative vignettes. Also, while Clancy-Smith is keen on examining how migrants interacted with non-migrants, and how Tunisian society viewed these migrants, the voice of Muslim Tunisians, especially non-elites, is barely audible at times. This being said, the dearth of sources for the period under study makes the task extremely difficult. These minor points notwithstanding, the importance of this book cannot be overstated. Well-written and engaging, it is extremely accessible and should be of interest to all historians. It is first and foremost about mobility and the fundamental ways migrations have shaped local societies, and it offers an inspiring (if daunting) example of how to rewrite local, national, and regional histories by reintegrating the stories of migrants. As Clancy-Smith puts it, “as a history of trans-Mediterranean displacements in a small place, Tunisia before colonialism stands in for many parts of the globe experiencing similar and in some cases interlinked processes during the long nineteenth century” (p. 16). The book speaks to key debates in history, migration studies, and gender studies and contributes to central discussions on periodization and on the relationship between the pre-colonial and the colonial period. It is profoundly relevant for understanding contemporary migrations, and for historicizing the deep connections that have existed between various shores of the Mediterranean. In sum, this is a remarkable and important volume that should have widespread appeal to historians interested in the Mediterranean and in North Africa specifically, as well as scholars concerned with migration past and present.

ILHAM KHURI-MAKDISI
Northeastern University

ERIC AMES. Carl Hagenbeck's Empire of Entertainments.
Seattle: University of Washington Press. 2008. Pp. viii, 336. $35.00.

Eric Ames ends his colorful book with the following statement: “If the name Hagenbeck no longer resonates throughout the universe, it is also more than just a memory. Even today, we are surrounded by forms of theme space and immersive environments that bear the imprint of his legacy” (p. 229). It is this enduring legacy that the author places at the center of his analysis. While most studies that explore the link between Germany’s empire and its museums and attractions tend to be concerned with connections between the metropole and imperial periphery, Ames offers a different take on empire and imperial influence. Carl Hagenbeck’s “empire” coincided with and was supported by German imperialism, yet his imperial reach went far beyond Germany’s territories in Africa and the Pacific Islands.

Hagenbeck skillfully employed his expansive connections to assemble exotic animals and ethnographic troupes, but only a handful of the animals and indigenous people originated in the German colonies. For instance, Hagenbeck was involved with close to one-third of the more than three hundred ethnographic troupes touring Germany between 1875 and 1914, yet “the vast majority of performers were recruited in territories controlled by other [non-German] colonial powers” (p. 65). His ethnographic exhibits were frequently at odds with the wishes of German dignitaries who liked their colonial exhibits to reflect Germany’s civilizing mission, prevent racial mixing, and showcase the existence of a docile and subservient indigenous labor force. Hagenbeck’s ethnographic displays inadvertently contradicted the existing anthropological premise that “‘nature peoples’ were absolutely different from ‘cultural people’” (p. 93). Increasing interaction between ethnographic subjects and German observers did much to tear down the artificial boundaries colonial supporters had erected and sought to maintain. To make matters worse, rumored sexual encounters and infatuations (Nubiertoll) between observers and indigenous participants in the ethnographic exhibits led to charges that Hagenbeck was instigating and supporting moral decline among both the cultured people of Germany and the more primitive nature peoples that he and others imported there. By moving away from the focus on colonial connections and illustrating Hagenbeck’s impact on thematic space, Ames sidesteps the thorny issue of “Hitler’s shadow”—the almost obligatory analysis of how Hagenbeck’s work influenced the rise of the Nazi Party and the dark years between 1933 and 1945. It is laudable that the author dares to cast a wider net, capturing Hagenbeck’s global rather than national legacy.

Hagenbeck was a visionary who understood the German public's needs and desires, turning such insights into a lucrative business. Writing neither a hagiography nor a damning exposé, Ames explains how Hagenbeck combined real and unreal elements to provide visitors with glimpses of a parallel universe that eschewed authenticity for tantalizing visions of the imaginary and the hyperreal. When Hagenbeck opened his Tierpark in 1907, he merged ethnographic displays with exotic animal exhibits, introduced anachronistic dinosaur displays, and added joyrides to entertain visitors. A predator ravine brought together animal species (such as tigers and lions) that did not inhabit the same geographical regions. Instead of recreating the natural habitats of the animals, Hagenbeck aimed at cheap thrills through a cleverly camouflaged trench that minimized the separation between spectators and wild animals.

Hagenbeck was also an early experimenter with cinema, using both documentaries and feature films to enhance the experience of the German people who flocked to his establishment in droves. Enabling Hagenbeck to stretch further into the realm of the imaginary, cinema also had the added benefit of eliminating dull moments while spectators were waiting for the start of another attraction. How much cinema complemented the attraction of the Tierpark becomes obvious when one considers that it produced a hefty one-third of the park's revenues. Moreover, Hagenbeck's park provided a perfect backdrop for movie sets, foreshadowing the cinematographic studio parks where many genres of movies could be filmed simultaneously.

Cinema also prevented the early closure of the Tierpark. Following Hagenbeck's death in 1913, his multifarious entertainment empire contracted due to increasing debt. The outbreak of the Great War exacerbated these problems, as the Allied blockade prevented the resupplying of ethnographic and zoological exhibits and the ensuing food shortage took a horrendous toll on the remaining exotic animals. But the movie industry thrived during the war. Renting out space in the Tierpark to cinematographic companies provided a welcome form of income. Hagenbeck's heirs even negotiated a deal with a German cinematographic company (Decla Film Company) to use the park for movie production. Decla's executives ultimately decided on another location, however, and the park had to close in 1920. Ames argues that Hagenbeck's experiments helped realize cinema's escapist potential. By moving from meticulous attempts at recreating authentic "natural" habitats for human and animal displays to a world where the imaginary reigned supreme, Hagenbeck foresaw the silver screen's effect on the public audience. Indeed, cinema was the next step in reducing pricy ethnographic and zoological displays to cinematographic moments that could be exported with considerable ease. Hagenbeck did not live through the golden age of cinema, but he certainly paved the way for its reception among the German public and beyond.

Ames is mindful of the fact that Hagenbeck's story has been told many times over, and rather than providing yet another biography, he makes his contributions in the realm of theory. In interdisciplinary fashion, he borrows from cultural and film studies as well as anthropology and history to weave his account. Hagenbeck's lasting contribution to the thematic environment, for example, rests on the all-important concept of "displacement," which deconstructs the attempt to recreate "natural" environments in culturally alien environments. Hagenbeck was one of the first to realize the futility of this approach. His involvement in the recruitment of ethnographic subjects from all over the world led him to see that most indigenous people had been thoroughly exposed to Western Christian teaching and economic models. He also became cognizant of the fact that the German public's notion of authenticity was shaped less by ethnographic texts and observation and more by popular writers and their notions of the American West. This became most noticeable in the case of the indigenous Bella Coola (Nuxalk), who were brought to Germany from the northwest coast of America. While their tour was a great success among German ethnographers, it failed to garner commercial success. The German public preferred to spend money on Buffalo Bill Cody's "Wild West" shows and their more theatrical portrayals of Native Americans.

Ames's book is organized chronologically from the extension of Hagenbeck's collection network to the demise of his Tierpark. The first three chapters center on ethnographic displays and chart Hagenbeck's ever-expanding network of collectors. The people, animals, and other items that Hagenbeck brought back and placed on display ultimately led to his abandonment of unobtainable notions of authenticity. The fourth and fifth chapters of the book explore Hagenbeck's construction of the Tierpark, which he designed and opened shortly after the turn of the century. Mixing human and animal displays with little regard to geographical or historical order set a trend that, while frowned upon by many contemporary commentators, anticipated theme parks of the twentieth century. The sixth and last chapter explores Hagenbeck's brief but fateful engagement with the new medium of cinema. While the marriage between theme park and silver screen brought Hagenbeck and his heirs few financial advantages and could not save the park, his experiments were imitated by generations of attraction owners.

Despite the astonishing array of interdisciplinary theoretical work that went into the book, it does disappoint a bit in terms of the promised original historical research. Ames effectively draws on a massive amount of printed and photographic material, but written archival material is rarely used and serves mostly to support rather than to develop his arguments. This is clearly not always Ames's fault. He was, for example, denied access to the Johan Adrian Jacobsen papers at the Hamburg Museum of Ethnology on four separate occasions. To overcome this deficiency, Ames had to depend on German-speaking historians, such as Hilke Thode-Arora, to perform primary source research. But instead of acknowledging a fruitful division of labor, Ames attributes a qualitative difference between his work and that of the historian. In his words, this book "is driven by ideas and theoretical concerns to a degree that [the historian's] work is not" (p. 241, fn. 20). Is such a distinction between historians and theoreticians really needed, or does it exaggerate the division that his work is supposedly trying to bridge? This reviewer is put off by the notion that historians provide "first-tier" research while more theoretically oriented scholars in other disciplines advance the horizons of knowledge into new directions. A more complementary outlook might have been more fruitful.

Ames's highly theoretical approach may also run counter to the intent of the University of Washington Press. The old adage not to judge a book by its cover certainly does not apply to this work. Its dimensions (10 x 8.5 inches) are those of a coffee table book, an appearance that is further supplemented by the vast array of illustrations, many of them in color. The press apparently hopes these features will make the book attractive to non-academic readers. But Ames's heavily theoretical approach might turn the same away. These concerns aside, this stimulating book is destined to propel German studies and the notion of empire into new directions.

RAINER F. BUSCHMANN
California State University,
Channel Islands

JOHN W. DOWER. Cultures of War: Pearl Harbor/Hiroshima/9-11/Iraq. New York: W. W. Norton, the New Press. 2010. Pp. xxxvii, 596. $29.95.

"Whatever the locus of action, from national government down to precinct, whether in an executive body or a legislative committee, some participants are almost sure to start with favorite, long-developed schemes. Their inclination will be to ignore whatever seems not to fit and to define the problem as one calling for solutions they have handy. Their arguments will be supported, more than likely, by analogies."

Richard Neustadt and Ernest May made this observation more than twenty-five years ago in their seminal book, Thinking in Time: The Uses of History for Decision Makers (1986; quotation from pp. 234–235). Writing in the shadow of America's agonizing war in Vietnam, Neustadt and May contended that policymakers were not ignorant of history. The problem was that figures like Harry Truman, Lyndon Johnson, and Richard Nixon knew a lot of history. They had lived through the rise of fascism, World War II, and the beginning of the Cold War. They had witnessed the failure of appeasement in prewar Europe and Asia, the brutal aggressiveness of undemocratic adversaries, and the postwar renewal of societies reconstructed under American tutelage. Historical references encouraged Truman, Johnson, Nixon, and most of their advisors to believe that, when confronted with communist adversaries in Southeast Asia, they had to act quickly, decisively, and militaristically. The historical analogy to the origins and aftermath of World War II was irresistible for Cold War citizens educated in this recent history.

Neustadt and May drew a valuable distinction between factual historical "knowledge" and "the kind of mental quality that readily connects discrete phenomena over time and repeatedly checks connections" (Thinking in Time, p. 252). The simple invocation of a past experience to guide a new challenge involved knowledge, but revealed a striking failure to understand how circumstances had changed from 1939 to 1965. Historical knowledge provided points of reference, but real historical analysis, according to Neustadt and May, required rigorous attention to similarities and differences, close examination of patterns and trends, and a cultivated capacity to imagine alternative paths. History mattered enormously for policymaking, according to the authors, but not as a source of "lessons." History offered a frame of mind, a sensitivity to change, and a check on simply fighting the last war.

No scholar of the last thirty years has done more to elucidate the value of rich historical thinking than John W. Dower. His previous books on twentieth-century Japan have demystified politics and society in this island nation, without sacrificing sophistication or subtlety. He has captured the brutality of the Japanese Empire and its profound humanity at the same time. He has shown how Japan was both perpetrator and victim in the ruthless international politics of midcentury. Most of all, Dower has offered a running account of how historical agency is diffuse, unpredictable, and often contradictory even when a very powerful society (the United States) fights and occupies a far weaker nation (Japan). Dower's work undermines all simple analogies and "lessons" about the World War II era in the Pacific. His books teach us to appreciate the countless interpersonal adjustments that, in the end, determine outcomes unseen by actors at the time.

In this sense, the main body of Dower's historical writing echoes Leo Tolstoy's emphasis on grand historical forces moved by small figures who really cannot comprehend the implications of their actions (War and Peace [1869]). Dower writes with a novelist's attention to intimate details and surprising personalities in both Japan and the United States. He analyzes Japan's relations with the United States through the eyes of people well beyond leaders.

For a scholar of this temperament to find his work manipulated to justify a controversial American invasion of Iraq in 2003 must have been disillusioning. Time and again, advisers to President George W. Bush invoked the analogy of the American occupation of Japan for what they expected to accomplish in Iraq. Dower reflects on this phenomenon in his new book: "From a Japanese perspective, there was an ironic, bitter twist to watching Americans invoke the 'success' of occupied Japan to brighten the picture of what might be anticipated in postwar Iraq . . . Japan's own experience of being occupied was regarded by many as a humiliating chapter in the nation's history—more dishonorable even, some would have it, than the war years" (pp. 316–317).

Chastising the Bush administration for the very misuse of historical analogies flagged by Neustadt and May, Dower continues: "Rose-colored invocations of occupied Japan by Americans gearing up for war with Iraq thus fell in place with the other uncomfortable Japan-related images that poured out in the wake of September 11: Pearl Harbor and 'infamy'; kamikaze and terror bombing; Japan's membership alongside Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy in the original 'Axis' of evil; Ground Zero as transplanted code for American rather than Japanese victimization; all-out war against an Islamist enemy as fanatical as the emperor's soldiers and sailors had been; the Stars and Stripes triumphantly raised at Iwo Jima; and so on" (p. 317).

Dower is not the first to criticize the misuse of historical analogies in the War on Terror. He tried to offer a strong corrective at the time, publishing essays in the New York Times, the Boston Review, and The Nation that were widely read. Many historians agreed with Dower, but few policymakers listened. The book under review is an effort by Dower to explain why the leaders who did not heed his warnings were tragically foolish and terribly consistent.

Analyzing the failures of the Bush administration, Dower effectively deconstructs the self-serving and misguided historical analogies invoked by American leaders. Describing how the president manipulated power, however, Dower draws his own jarring historical analogies that the reader might question. In this sense, the study is really two books in one: a historian's correction of false analogies in a time of war, and an angry citizen's effort to create new analogies that he can turn against the people who did not listen to him.

Dower is at his best when he writes about the details of the occupations after 1945 and 2003. The last third of the book offers a perceptive discussion of why American nation-building efforts had particular advantages in postwar Japan: "Discipline, moral legitimacy, well-defined and well-articulated objectives, a clear chain of command, tolerance and flexibility in policy formulation and implementation, confidence in the ability of the state to act constructively, the ability to operate abroad free of partisan politics back home, and the existence of a stable, resilient, sophisticated civil society on the receiving end of occupation policies—these political and civic virtues helped make it possible to move decisively during the brief window of a few years when defeated Japan itself was in flux and most receptive to radical change" (p. 338).

Under the direction of General Douglas MacArthur, American forces worked to empower the Japanese state as an engine of production, wealth redistribution, and social management. They encouraged land reform and the growth of labor unions. They also contributed to new forms of civil society, especially those centered on consumer culture and popular entertainment. In these areas and others, Dower explains, the "visible hand" of New Deal-inspired state capitalism found fertile soil in a Japanese society that was devastated by war, but also unified and forward looking (p. 409).

Iraq in 2003 did not share any of the advantages experienced in postwar Japan, and American policies compounded the difficulties, according to Dower. Saddam Hussein had destroyed most elements of civil society, he had exacerbated religious and ethnic divisions, and he had saturated the country with weapons. American forces arrived with very questionable legitimacy, minimal support among allies, and deep divisions within the American electorate. Iraqi, American, and international conditions did not allow for anything like the coherent and effective occupation policies implemented in Japan a half century earlier.

Dower explains that the Bush administration spoke of a Japanese-style occupation, willfully denying the striking differences. This is where false historical analogies enabled the worst policy instincts: "They disregarded not only forbidding social, political, and religious conditions that were taken seriously at the time of the first Gulf War, but also incisive warnings from lower-level officials as well as non-governmental sources. Postwar Japan was not really a serious model in anyone's thinking, but rather another example of the administration's penchant for using history ideologically" (p. 340).

Instead of building a constructive Iraqi state, the Bush administration pursued a privatized vision of free market capitalism that left postwar society unregulated and ripe for rapacious behavior. Extremist groups and unscrupulous profit-seekers filled the economic void in Iraq that the regulatory power of state institutions had controlled in postwar Japan. Private contractors operated on behalf of the United States in Iraq with little oversight or accountability, unlike the American trained and managed civilian personnel who had served under the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers (SCAP) in the Pacific. Insurgents hijacked Iraqi reconstruction because the United States left a power vacuum as it sought to implement free market reforms in a society that had neither secure freedoms nor functioning markets. "The result," Dower writes, "was a level of confusion, cronyism, non-transparency, and corruption that had no counterpart in Japan" (p. 397).

Dower's work hammers the final nails in the coffin of any attempted analogy between 1945 and 2003. Dower, however, is not content to correct misguided historical comparisons. In an effort to explain why Bush and his advisers made so many obvious mistakes, he turns their Japan analogies upside down. Postwar Iraq was not postwar Japan, but the brutality of the United States in Iraq marked a "convergence of a sort" with Japanese war crimes in Asia, according to Dower (p. 359). The author goes a step further, arguing that America's militant democracy after September 11, 2001 resembled Japanese fascist authoritarianism in 1941: "the Japanese and U.S. cases hardly amount to sharply contrasting examples of authoritarian rule versus democratic checks and balances." Dower claims that in both Japan and the United States the legislature failed to limit executive decision making, and the public supported war as an "obedient herd" (p. 102).

The most startling moment is Dower's comparison of the American president to the Japanese emperor: "In practice, the imperial presidency under George W. Bush was in certain critical respects more absolute, inviolate, impenetrable, and arbitrary than the militaristic government that took imperial Japan to war" (p. 103). Elsewhere Dower compares Bush and his advisers to the leaders of Japan and Osama bin Laden, all of whom allegedly pursued "holy war" grounded in "faith-based thinking" rather than reason and compromise (p. 438). My personal favorite is Dower's quip that the American "security state, with its holy writ and labyrinthine complexity, amounted to a profane theocracy" (p. 440).

How can one evaluate such nonsense written by a distinguished and talented historian? How can one characterize a book that masterfully dissects false historical analogies only to create its own misguided assertions of parallels and moral equivalencies? Besides the gross oversimplifications and factual problems with Dower's analogies, one must note the deep anger that colors their composition. Dower is clearly offended by Bush's policies, Bush's worldview, and, above all, Bush's refusal to listen to him. Throughout the book, the misguided politicians are "faith-based," and the good critics are rational and learned. The post-9/11 policymakers are practitioners of "strategic imbecilities" (p. 115), while the careful scholars offer the possibility for transcendent "cultures of peace" (p. 452). Dower never defines that last phrase, except to claim that it is the opposite of everything that Bush did in Iraq.

John Dower is probably the greatest living historian of modern Japan in the United States. Our profession is deeply indebted to him for his seminal efforts to translate Japanese society for Western audiences. This book captures his range of vision, but it also proves the seduction of bad historical analogies, even for a skilled scholar struggling, like all of us, to explain the frustrations, shortcomings, and contradictions of national policymaking.

Neustadt and May's warning about forced comparisons and ready-made explanations is worth remembering as we deconstruct the actions of our leaders and ourselves. We need to think beyond analogies, examining how policy aims and experiences evolve over time. Tracing the details of decision making in the archives is often more valuable than labeling actions after the fact.

JEREMI SURI

University of Texas at Austin

Reviews of Books

METHODS/THEORY

EDMUND RUSSELL. Evolutionary History: Uniting History and Biology to Understand Life on Earth. (Studies in Environment and History.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xxi, 216. Cloth $90.00, paper $22.99.

“Evolution is ordinary, not exceptional” (p. 5). “It is ubiquitous” (p. 151). So begins and effectively ends Edmund Russell’s accessible and engagingly written, thoughtful, and thought-provoking book, the contention of which is that history is intimately intertwined with evolution. Russell believes biology and history have much to say to each other in terms of their mutual interplay.

Following a brief discussion of evolution itself, Russell sets out a number of illustrative examples of the ways that humans have shaped the evolution of other species, and how in turn such human-induced evolution has shaped our own history. For example, selective hunting of Zambian tusked elephants favored the evolutionary survival of once rare tuskless elephants in much larger than traditional percentages, while an emphasis on hunting larger Canadian bighorn sheep led to the survival of smaller animals. The role of the state, in terms either of its inability or capability to regulate hunting in such cases, also affects evolution. The fishing of cod and salmon offers similar lessons regarding population size and makeup and their implications as available food stock for humans. Bacteria and insects provide further examples of human influence on otherwise natural populations, as each proves increasingly resistant through evolutionary adaption to antibiotics and pesticides, respectively. An especially interesting chapter focuses on the role of unconscious anthropogenic selection in the evolution of dogs from wolves. When early hunter-gathers likely fed gentler wolves while eliminating those more dangerous, they unconsciously selected for tameness, a trait that appears to control for other adult behaviors in addition to fierceness, thereby leading to the emergence of what we view as separate species. Agriculture, which provides a number of interesting evolutionary examples including domesticated plant developments, also appears to have played a role in adult human lactose tolerance, or lack thereof. Russell argues that a history of dairy farming in such regions as northern Europe appears to have entailed a coevolution between humans who developed genetic tolerance for lactose, a trait normally found only in infants, and milk cows—Jerseys and Guernseys—that provided them with more protein and other nutritional value. Ultimately, Russell is most intrigued by reciprocal interaction.

One particularly revealing example of how an understanding of evolutionary change can enrich our historical understanding is revealed through a reexamination of the industrial revolution. To that end, Russell devotes a chapter-length case study to cotton textiles. Russell’s contribution is to urge a focus on environmental factors rather than the heroic inventors of machines, the broader factory system, economic conditions, or labor and class, important as these things may have been. Rather, he views the Lancashire technical innovations as being a “response” (p. 105) to the arrival of New World long-fiber cotton, which due to its genetic makeup was the product of anthropogenic selection by Amerindians. Russell argues that cotton fiber is not inherently uniform, and thus not necessarily suitable for machine spinning, which required a certain level of strength combined with length. These characteristics and other positive traits—enhanced geographic growing range, better harvestability, and larger seeds more amenable to separation, mechanical or otherwise—evolved through Native American selection of certain plant variants over others, in turn yielding fibers that would ultimately prove better suited to mechanization. Finally, Russell suggests a connection to the triangular slave trade that enabled England to capitalize on “the evolutionary inheritance of the New World” and to industrialize when and where it did (pp. 104, 128). The story is, of course, more complicated than this brief summary, but suffice it to say that both in the mid-nineteenth-century British industry and in today’s marketplace almost one hundred percent of the world’s cotton crop is based on New World-derived plant species. Thus, in Russell’s view “a more balanced account would describe industrialization as a revolution in the ability to capitalize on the variation and abundance of nature” (p. 131).

These examples barely scratch the surface of this intriguingly suggestive volume. Written in a manner that will make it attractive to scholars and students alike, it will force perceptive readers to re-examine their fields. History, and especially the histories of technology and the environment, surely benefit from the insights of biology and evolution.

STEPHEN H. CUTCLIFFE
Lehigh University

DOUGLASS C. NORTH, JOHN JOSEPH WALLIS, and BARRY R. WEINGAST. Violence and Social Orders: A Conceptual Framework for Interpreting Recorded Human History. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2009. Pp. xvii, 308. $30.00.

This ambitious book by Douglass C. North, John Joseph Wallis, and Barry R. Weingast seeks to provide an explanatory account of how, in the long-term historical perspective, societies devise institutional structures to solve the problem of violence. The containment of violence has been a problem for all three social orders that have existed in the course of human history: the foraging order (essentially hunter-gather societies), the natural state, and the open access order. The focus of the book is on the latter two and the mechanisms by which the natural state makes the transition to the open access order. The natural state—or the limited access order—has been the dominant social order in human history, while the open access state emerges with modernity. The open access order is characterized by the impartial rule of law and the existence of impersonal rights that all citizens possess, while the natural state has a limited civil society, more centralized government, and fewer organizations. Those societies that have made the transition have become wealthier and more peaceful. Natural states have slow-growing economies and are less adept at dealing with change. Some eighty-five per cent of the world's population still lives in natural states. Modern democratic states with free market economies, such as Canada, the United States, Australia, and the countries of the European Union, are representative of the open access order.

The book is primarily concerned less with the problem of violence, as the title suggests, than with how natural states—of which there are three types: fragile, basic, and mature—make the transition to the open access order. The authors do not assume that the transition is inevitable or that the natural state is anything like the Hobbesian state of nature, since it has been the most effective institutional framework for the control of violence in human history.

One of the book's signal contributions is its questioning of the influential Weberian theory of the state as a single actor with a monopoly of violence. The authors claim that Weber's understanding of the state is flawed, as the empirical reality of the natural state, which has been the dominant order throughout history and is still present today, is that there is not a separation of the economic and political order and, most importantly, the transition to the open access state, where it has occurred, has in fact depended on the separation of these domains. The unity of the state is an achievement only of the modern open access state. In fact, the state only gains a monopoly over violence after a long period of dispersed violence. This is because natural states achieve order and stability only when powerful individuals are given incentives not to use violence. It is a fundamental misunderstanding of history to see the state as a single actor.

The authors focus on the role of elites and elites' pursuit of their own interests. The question is why elites would choose to create institutional orders that allow non-elites to have more power and control of resources. The authors argue that the transition to open access orders can only be explained by elite interests. The first step occurs when elites find that their interests will be furthered if non-elites are given more control. The transition is incremental, unfolding differently and at different speeds in the various spheres of society. Three critical "doorstep" conditions must be met: the rule of law for elites, long-lived organizations in the public and private spheres, and consolidated control of the military.

The upshot of this argument is important for developing countries for it suggests that the solution to the problems of the natural state lie within it and not in the open access state. This is not an insignificant conclusion since it means that natural states will not make the transition to the open access order by simply adopting the institutions of those Western countries that have made the transition. So, for example, the adoption of constitutions in nineteenth-century Latin American countries was not in itself sufficient to make the transition to the open access state. The objective should not always be to undertake the transition, for the transplanting of open access institutions into natural states cannot by itself produce development.

This is an insightful book that will be of great interest especially to historical sociologists and economic historians. It is most interesting in its account of how institutional change occurs in what they call the natural state. The approach is strongly institutional and elite-focused, and some will find this too limiting, although it offers a very challenging account of how major social change occurs. The pluralist account of the open access order is limited in scope and raises many questions. The huge scale of organized state violence and the embedded nature of the industrial war complex in the modern open access state appear to challenge some of the author's assumptions about the capacity for violence in democratic constitutional states, as does the war in Iraq led by the United States and the United Kingdom.

GERARD DELANTY
University of Sussex

ZACHARY M. SCHRAG. Ethical Imperialism: Institutional Review Boards and the Social Sciences, 1965–2009. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2010. Pp. xii, 245. $45.00.

Historians rarely experience a review of proposed research as part of the Institutional Review Board (IRB) process. Our ethical concerns are more focused on honest representations of primary materials, diligent archival searching, appropriate reading of secondary sources, and avoidance of plagiarism. According to Zachary M. Schrag's powerful new book, we should, however, be afraid, very afraid, of the potential threat of IRBs to social science scholarship. Schrag wants us to worry about the dangerous mission creep of the ethics uberlords, backed by the power of the federal government and financially dependent and lawsuit wary academic administrations. At stake, he argues, is our disciplinary independence and academic freedom to do research that matters.

Schrag makes his point of view clear with the book's title. He provides evidence of IRBs that over the last forty years have wreaked havoc on innocent scholars as cowed professional associations and academic institutions gave in to federal power. His careful review of archival materials, although at times a bit tedious for the non-policy specialist, captures the hypocrisy and doublespeak of ethics bureaucrats who cannot seem to differentiate between a multisite medical research project and a lowly graduate student trying to conduct observations in a public school classroom. This is a story, Schrag reminds us, about policy expansionism, the inability of social scientists to reject protectionism that was developed for medical research, and the failure of academic leaders to protect their faculty and students. Schrag suggests that the major problem is that the federal government's pressure tactics can deny research dollars to cash-strapped universities.

Schrag is not naïve. He is aware of the mistakes made in social science research and accepts that there is a need to monitor academic behavior. Nevertheless, he downplays some of the dangers posed to subjects. Schrag does note, however, that research errors have been magnified as simplistic explanations for why ethics review should keep some social science research projects from even beginning. He sides with sociologist Howard Becker's view that "'a good study . . . will make somebody angry'" (p. 17). He also claims that "to do no harm" is, in a sense, almost impossible, and that in order to do research well the ethical standards of the social sciences, not of medical studies, ought to be followed.

With a careful review of the archival sources, he faults officials from the Public Health Service and National Institutes of Health for ignoring and bludgeoning social scientists whose work they do not understand. Schrag analyzes policy debates over several decades, taking on the commission that issued the Belmont Report in 1978 (the basis of the subsequent federal "Common Rule" for ethical research) and criticizing its emphasis on principles of respect for persons, beneficence, and justice in all research for its limitations. Schrag argues that no one on this crucial commission really understood social science research, and traces what he sees as real failures by commissioners and staffers alike to differentiate between biomedical and behavioral research. He critiques their own lack of research and seeming indifference to the actual work or harm done by social scientists.

These criticisms, and the efforts of social scientists to demand a rethinking, in particular the struggles of political scientist Ithiel de Sola Pool, form the heart of the book. Schrag demonstrates how compromises, muddled thinking, and regulatory expansionism in the 1990s led to the growth of IRBs in the present day.

Schrag is not alone in his critiques of the IRB process, but this is the first historical account of the problems IRBs pose to the social sciences. Officials in the federal government are currently considering revisions to the decades-old Common Rule; Schrag's work has already begun to have an impact on their thinking, as evidenced by footnotes to his scholarship in their most recent report. This book ought to be required reading for those concerned about the political forces that make our work possible, and sometimes not possible at all.

SUSAN M. REVERBY
Wellesley College

COMPARATIVE/WORLD

ANDREW PHILLIPS. War, Religion, and Empire: The Transformation of International Orders. (Cambridge Studies in International Relations, number 117.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 364. Cloth $90.00, paper $34.99.

This book primarily analyzes the constitution, transformation, and demise of two major systems of international order. It focuses first on what Andrew Phillips refers to as "Latin Christendom" during the late medieval and early modern period. It subsequently shifts attention to the "Sinosphere" as a regional system and its disintegration during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. This diachronic historical comparison is followed by an interpretative account of the contemporary world order.

The case studies are framed by a theoretically oriented introduction and conclusion. In these sections, Phillips seeks to bridge the gaps between constructivist and realist approaches to the study of international orders. He complements his discussions of normative complexes and governing institutional frameworks by considering economic and other material factors underlying specific formations. In this context, Phillips does not engage in a close discussion with movements such as the re-emerging English School of International Relations or several branches of historiography, which—albeit from different angles—also combine the study of cooption and coercion, of power complexes and normative structures.

According to Phillips, pressures on international orders work through an intricate nexus of violence, interdependence, institutional decay, and ideological challenges. In the case of Latin Christendom, Phillips follows the assumption that the Reformation constituted a decisive departure from a political landscape composed by diarchical aspects (church and empire) as well as overlapping realms of power obligations. During the following periods, the processes leading toward a new order took important interim steps—most notably the Wars of Religion and the emergence of absolutist rule, which had not been intended by the Reformation's main protagonists. While discussing the political changes in early modern Europe, the author nods to the literature addressing the "myth of 1648" but remains convinced that the emergence of the Westphalian system constituted a decisive break in European history.

Subsequent chapters portray the Sinosphere prior to the nineteenth century as a hierarchical order with the Chinese emperor at the top, which was largely based on Confucian norms. The book displays a strong tendency to describe Confucianism and imperial China in rather monolithic ways, for example by marginalizing important transformations of Confucian contents and institutions such as the rise and dominance of Neo-Confucianism from the Song dynasty onward. Phillips then describes how, during the nineteenth century, a combination of global and local changes decisively weakened the material fundamentals of imperial China. Together with other factors, the advent of Britain and other powers that were unwilling to accept Confucian normative principles eroded the patterns of political order in East Asia. Phillips generally agrees with academic literature that—despite Britain's imperial ambitions—interprets the encounter between China and England as a clash between hierarchical and egalitarian visions of international order.

Investigating the demise of the Sinosphere, Phillips likens some major crises in nineteenth- and twentieth-century China to events in Europe. For example, he interprets both the Thirty Years' War and the Warlord Period as struggles over power, not principles. Within a larger framework, he discusses the disintegration of the tribute system in East Asia. In addition to other developments, he notes that the ailing Qing dynasty was kept afloat through an untenable alliance of conservative Confucian circles and Western powers driven by fundamentally different interests. Around the turn of the twentieth century, Japan's growing international ambitions created tensions between egalitarian international principles and hegemonic claims in East Asia. Following the rise and collapse of Japanese imperial ambitions, East Asia witnessed the emergence of an order based on sovereign states that, as Phillips maintains, also displays elements of an informal hierarchy—most notably through U.S. security guarantees in the region.

While the book is largely based on comparative perspectives of Chinese and European history, the author also addresses more recent global trends, particularly the secularization of politics and the decline of empire. Discussing the current international system's prospects for long-term durability and its major challenges, Phillips mainly focuses on Jihadism and the erosion of the state's monopoly of violence. However, he does not go so far as to portray the rise of religious fundamentalism as evidence of an imminent collapse of the current international order.

All in all, this book makes a great contribution to the study of international relations. It attempts to widen the debates on international orders by drawing on a wide variety of themes and area-specific research. As such, it will certainly be important for researchers working on political orders, no matter what their regional interests may be.

DOMINIC SACHSENMAIER
Duke University

HANS BELTING. Florence and Baghdad: Renaissance Art and Arab Science. Translated by DEBORAH LUCE SCHNEIDER. Cambridge: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. 303. $39.95.

In this book, Hans Belting boldly argues that the fifteenth-century invention of linear perspective, a venerable trademark of Italian Renaissance pictorial art, developed in part through the efforts of a devout Muslim, Ibn al-Haithan called Alhazen or Alhacen, an eleventh-century Arab polymath. Alhacen is well known to historians of science because of his optical theory that light enters the eyes in a geometric cone composed of converging rays, each transmitting a sensible "form" to stimulate vision. However, his Arabic term for "form," sura, definitely did not then refer to "image" but rather to an abstract metaphor of the phenomenal world that could only be expressed in words.

How then could Alhacen's aniconic optics have aided the Florentine impresario, Filippo Brunelleschi, who, around 1425, invented linear perspective for the painting of pictures? While Belting does not clarify this link to my satisfaction, he correctly identifies the Alhacen connection. In his excitement, Belting credits himself with being the first art historian to have made the discovery. Not true. Nearly forty years ago, I discussed this matter at some length in my own book, The Renaissance Rediscovery of Linear Perspective (1975), also in German translation (2002), explaining the role that classical and medieval optics in general and Alhacen in particular played in the conception of linear perspective.

I am delighted that Belting is championing my then controversial hypothesis. Perhaps his oversight was due to the fact that even after I first made the case, few art historians were convinced. The prevailing opinion was that Brunelleschi deduced linear perspective from his experience as an architectural draftsman, and not from optical science, which had naught to do with the pictorial arts.

So why this sudden acceptance of the Islamic optical connection (Belting's German edition is already in its second printing)? Surely his clever binary title has attracted renewed attention. While Baghdad had little directly to do with Alhacen's optics (he lived and wrote in Cairo), its fabled name is synonymous both with the medieval "Golden Age" of Arab civilization, and its current media notoriety in the post-9/11 Middle East. By pairing it with Florence, that symbol of Western civ-ilization's most glamorous artistic achievements, Belting wants to jar Western readers from their presumed cultural complacency and make them appreciate again the glories of that other great civilization, equal in art and once even scientifically superior to the West.

Belting has joined two German words to describe what he intends to demonstrate: Blickwechsel, which originally he rendered as "exchange of glances" (p. 4). He expands the term's metaphorical meaning to encompass how two cultures looked at the world through the same eyes but saw it differently, and expressed their "glances" differently in art. Unfortunately, he permits Blick to be translated in his English edition as "gaze," interpreted not in its true German meaning but rather as in the manner of psychoanalyst Jacques Lacan and art critic Norman Bryson, who have converted it to a popular buzzword among Anglo-American postmodern critical theorists. The word has since been associated with a variety of politicized causes with little relevance to Belting's thesis. "Gaze" is now sufficiently laden with theoretical baggage such that Belting's much too repetitious use of the term, even when relevant, will seem to some readers as an overindulgence of pretentious jargon.

Nevertheless, he does present a compelling case when he describes how the medieval science of vision and light resonated in both cultures and how the architectural window literally framed their difference. In the West, viewing the real world through an open window came to be understood as like looking at a picture, while in the Islamic East, windows were deliberately closed to the outside world, permitting pure sunlight into the interior only through patterned lattices that projected arrays of luminous shapes onto the floor and walls. Even a visitor to a traditional mosque cannot help but be struck by the transcendent beauty of these varied light displays. Belting makes a nice point when he applies Erwin Panofsky's famous essay, entitled "Die Perspektive als symbolische Form," to Islamic art. If the perspective window is the "symbolic form" of Western Renaissance art, then the splendors of light infiltrating the latticed Muslim window should be considered the parallel "symbolic form" of Islamic art. His book is beautifully illustrated to bolster this comparison.

Belting is less successful when he tries to explain which of Alhacen's optical theories were applicable to Brunelleschi. By the fifteenth century, the still aniconic science henceforth known in Latin as perspectiva communis was a popular subject of study everywhere in Western Europe. Alhacen's notions were so imbedded in it, and so amended by medieval European scholars like the Franciscan friars Roger Bacon and John Pecham, that Brunelleschi could hardly have been aware from which source any particular idea emanated.

Belting's real hero as he tries to link Arab optics to Brunelleschi is not Alhacen but another fourteenth-century Italian philosopher, Biagio Pelacani, who also wrote a treatise on optics. This treatise actually was the subject of lectures at the University of Florence during Brunelleschi's lifetime. Pelacani taught that shapes and colors perceived by the eyes unite in a likeness of three-dimensional space in the sensus communis of the brain. He also introduced a crucial new term, figura, as synonym for species, the original Latin word that Western philosophers translated from Alhacen's sura. Species had always meant "form" in the abstract, but the word slowly evolved etymologically through two centuries. The term first referred to a "likeness" but not yet a picture, and finally to "figure," fully meaning a "picture."

Belting does not explain how the idea of figura in Pelacani's head translated to Brunelleschi's hand as it held the paintbrush. He claims to be more interested in image theory than how artists actually make their art. Still, he goes on to discuss how the medieval philosophers including Alhacen had worked out the geometry of mirrors, even postulating that the lens in the eye reflects the visual world just like a mirror. By the early Renaissance, narcissistic artists were increasingly given to admiring themselves reflected in mirrors and so, Belting avers, the art of self-portraiture was born. Mirrors were in such vogue during the Renaissance, and their geometric catoptrics so well known, that it is surprising the author does not give them more credit in the crucial narrative of Brunelleschi's first picture using perspective. Instead, Belting contradicts all that he has argued so far about the importance of optics. He merely recites the same old theory, namely that Brunelleschi "made use of a measuring practice that had long been in use in his own field of architecture" (p. 172).

Surely it was not traditional architectural drawing that inspired Brunelleschi but the exciting possibility of painting a figura by the same geometric rules that cause reflection in mirrors! As Antonio Averlino (nicknamed Filarete), Brunelleschi's Florentine contemporary and perhaps eyewitness to the first perspective experiment, recalled, "I believe that Pippo discovered the rule [the horizon vanishing point] from what the mirror shows you . . . Truly I think it was by this method that Pippo discovered this perspective."

SAMUEL Y. EDGERTON
Williams College

WALTER HAWTHORNE. From Africa to Brazil: Culture, Identity, and an Atlantic Slave Trade, 1600–1830. (African Studies, number 113.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2010. Pp. xxi, 259. Cloth $85.00, paper $25.99.

In Pará, northern Portuguese America, sometime in the 1760s, the slave José, of Mandinka origins, was summoned to cure a Bijago slave. José prepared a concoction of plants and applied it as part of a complex curing ritual that involved both his knowledge as a master herbalist as well as his contact with the spiritual domain. Although we know practically nothing of José's personal story, this episode takes us across the Atlantic to the coastal and upland societies of Upper Guinea in West Africa. As Walter Hawthorne demonstrates in From Africa to Brazil, the simple fact that the slave trade between the Upper Guinea Coast and the Amazon placed a number of witches in circulation during the eighteenth century sheds light on little known or previously unexplored aspects of Atlantic history.

A specialist in Upper Guinean history, Hawthorne focuses on the features that fashioned the historical development of an Atlantic slave economy in the Amazonian region of Grão Pará and Maranhão. Tackling multiple and complex themes, the author explores the origins and dismantling of a regional economy based on Amerindian labor, slave and free, from the early seventeenth to the mid-eighteenth century. He then proceeds to analyze the structuring of an Atlantic slave trade that gave sustenance to an enlightened reform policy that made rice cultivation the mainstay of the Maranhão economy in the late eighteenth century. Finally, he examines the full unfolding of an African slave-based agrarian economy and society in the Amazon. The new agrarian system siphoned a continuous influx of Upper Guinean slaves, forced to toil from dawn to dusk in the inclement Amazonian tropical climate, facing tasks ranging from striking down and torching the forest to the incessant weeding, harvesting, and preparation of Carolina rice for a voracious Portuguese consumer market. The author supplies rich and varied data to support his solid interpretations, making his book the most thorough study to date on the constitution of an Atlantic slave society in this tropical zone.

While Hawthorne covers myriad themes, two aspects stand out. First, the author offers a precise study of the slave trade, carefully qualifying all the information available from existing databases. Hawthorne analyzes reports on the slave trade, correspondence, postmortem inventories of slaveowners, and ecclesiastical records, among other sources. He demonstrates that the trade between the Upper Guinea Coast and the Amazon flourished from the second half of the eighteenth to the mid-nineteenth century, primarily at the expense of coastal peoples. Even though the slave trade showed an appetite for both upland and coastal peoples—Mandinka, Bijago, Papel, Balanta, and others—coastal societies became more deeply entangled in the Atlantic economy, not only as a result of their demand for iron tools for local rice production but also because the social systems that produced captives, which included the capture and deportation of persons accused of witchcraft, increasingly supplied Atlantic slave traders. Subscribing to Sidney Mintz and Richard Price's well-known interpretation, the author argues that the Middle Passage played an important role in shaping a pan-regional identity, which established profound ties between slaves who shared the same cultural background, in spite of the strong distinctions that separated peoples into specific ethnic groups within the coastal Upper Guinean context.

A second, especially rich aspect of the book is the author's discussion of rice cultivation and the specific role played by Upper Guinean slaves in this productive system. Taking a stand against Judith Carney's "black rice" thesis, Hawthorne underscores important discon-tinuities between rice cultivation in the mangrove lands on the Upper Guinea Coast, which required a substantial deployment of local knowledge, and the slash-and-burn (coivara) practices that characterized colonial Amazonian rice cultivation. The author suggests that the system of rice agriculture in the Amazon derived from Amerindian, Portuguese, and Upper Guinean knowledge and techniques, producing what the author calls "brown rice." While this New World system diminished and even excluded the skills and knowledge that men brought from West Africa, women from Upper Guinea played a crucial role in maintaining and transmitting culinary and other cultural practices and knowledge, which afforded the continuity of strong links between enslaved peoples in Amazonia and an Upper Guinean pan-regional identity.

In the book's final chapters, Hawthorne directs our attention to a discussion of day-to-day aspects of slave life in Maranhão. Although the author presents fresh research and suggestive analyses, this constitutes the least developed part of the book. Lacking a more productive dialogue with the current social history of slavery in Brazil, these chapters stand in contrast to the depth and density of the earlier chapters. Notwithstanding this shortcoming, Hawthorne has produced an important contribution to the existing body of literature on transatlantic cultural flows and identity formation.

MARIA HELENA P. T. MACHADO

University of São Paulo [Translated by John Monteiro]

SOPHIA ROSENFELD. Common Sense: A Political History. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. 337. $29.95.

Sophia Rosenfeld's subtle, iconoclastic book profoundly unsettles the way historians of the Atlantic world have traditionally thought about the relationship between "common sense" and democracy. According to the standard story, the populist language of Thomas Paine's Common Sense (1776) fired the political imaginations of ordinary American colonists, giving voice to the age of revolution's emergent, democratic understanding of popular sovereignty. The people, not nonsensical characters like monarchs and aristocrats, now drove history and politics forward. Paine—a leader of Pennsylvania's democratic insurgency, a critic of religious dogma, and an avid pursuer of scientific knowledge—used the language of common sense to clear away the elitist obfuscation and popular deference that had previously stifled the development of truly self-governing polities. Paine's validation of ordinary citizens' ways of knowing, their common sense, thus underwrote the ideal of democratic self-rule the modern world has inherited from the age of reason.

Rosenfeld's intellectual history of common sense—from its emergence in late seventeenth-century London through its multiple iterations in eighteenth-century Aberdeen, Amsterdam, Philadelphia, and Paris—pushes against this standard narrative in two ways.

First, she reveals how conservative thinkers and polemicists in 1760s Aberdeen and 1790s Paris deployed common sense as a way to stave off challenges to traditional political, social, and clerical authority. The popular “wisdom” valorized by Scottish popularizers like James Beattie or in French antirevolutionary catechisms was little more than reactionary, anti-intellectual group-think. For them, common sense merely demonstrated that what is (and what had been) is right.

When the scene shifts to the radical intellectual circles of 1760s Amsterdam and the streets of revolutionary Philadelphia in the mid-1770s, Rosenfeld traces a different, though just as dubiously democratic, manifestation of common sense. In both Amsterdam and Philadelphia, common sense functioned not as a description of reality but as a language of “arch-partisanship” that small groups of radicals used to further their political goals. Amsterdam’s freethinkers, for example, ridiculed the established church as nonsensical, but they were equally disdainful of the bulk of their devout contemporaries who failed to appreciate the Radical Enlightenment’s self-evident truths. Likewise, we too easily forget that Paine’s famous pamphlet spoke for the minority of Americans who in early 1776 were ready to sever ties with the British monarchy. The discourse of common sense enabled radicals in Amsterdam and Philadelphia to engage in hyperpartisan attacks while claiming to articulate ideas that were obvious and uncontroversial. By bringing to light both the conservative and partisan meanings of common sense in the eighteenth century, Rosenfeld demonstrates that this political trope did not simply liberate and authorize the political voice of the previously excluded people. Rather, common sense just as frequently functioned as a vehicle of coercion, whether that implicit in the status quo or in the deeply partisan ambitions of a self-confident and often self-righteous minority that claimed to speak for everyone.

What motivates Rosenfeld’s historical analysis is a question, provoked by Hannah Arendt, about the possibilities and limitations of a democratic politics grounded in ordinary citizens’ commonsensical understandings of the world. While the final chapter of the book—in which Rosenfeld engages Arendt, Immanuel Kant, and the history of common sense from 1800 to the present—is not as compelling as the earlier chapters, the book as a whole succeeds in its effort to detach readers from the benign, self-congratulatory narrative about common sense with which this review began. Rosenfeld’s critical history shows us how common sense frequently has been used to quash political complexity. In the hands of both radicals and reactionaries, the language of common sense articulated unrealistic and potentially dangerous fantasies of unanimity in an increasingly diverse world. Behind common sense’s inspirational and purportedly universalistic rhetoric of popular sovereignty lay a host of covert exclusions, cynical political manipulation, and populist anti-intellectualism. The contemporary implications seem clear: beware of Tea Party activists who claim the mantle of common sense as they pass off oversimplified political solutions as the consensual will of the people.

Since the publication of this book, however, a new, progressive political movement has emerged in the United States that claims to speak for commonsensical policies that will honor the interests of ninety-nine percent of the population over those of one percent. While the conservative Tea Party uses the language of common sense to criticize the obfuscations of scientific elites and their complicated theories about climate change and evolution, the Occupy movement targets the complex financial mechanisms created by the capitalist elite that have harmed ordinary people whose interests have lacked representation within the halls of political power. Reading Rosenfeld’s book in the early days of the Occupy movement’s development, I wondered if she would be as critical of the contemporary, progressive use of common sense as she is of the conservative variant. This brought me back to her refreshingly skeptical analysis of Paine’s Common Sense. In that discussion she pushes against the scholarship that has emphasized the role class played in Philadelphia’s revolutionary mobilization. Instead of reading it as a text that tapped into deep-seated but previously submerged animosities, Rosenfeld sees it as a partisan attempt by the political “outs” to become the “ins.” But what if all appeals to common sense are not created equal? Is an appeal authored by a former stay maker that sells tens of thousands of copies the equivalent of reactionary catechisms written and disseminated by wealthy elites? Has the appeal to common sense ever inspired a historically significant movement that shifted social or political structures in a more democratic direction? While Rosenfeld’s book does not offer us easy or straightforward answers to such questions, there are few better places to start in our efforts to answer them.

SETH COTLAR

Willamette University

WILLIAM MICHAEL MORGAN. Pacific Gibraltar: U.S.-Japanese Rivalry over the Annexation of Hawai‘i, 1885–1898. (ADST-DACOR Diplomats and Diplomacy Series.) Annapolis, Md.: Naval Institute Press. 2011. Pp. x, 330. $34.95.

One hundred years after white political leaders overthrew Hawai‘i’s last monarchy, the U.S. Congress passed a resolution declaring that they would not have succeeded in denying the sovereign rights of the native populace without the participation of American officials in the conspiracy and the landing of U.S. forces. In this superb monograph, William Michael Morgan explains why “these assertions are wrong in an absolute sense but sometimes partly right in a larger sense” (p. 5). He convincingly describes the “forces and events and actions that bore directly on the 1893 revolution” and “the acquisition of what might be called America’s Pacific Gibraltar, a prized naval bastion” (p. 3). An explanation for this outcome, Morgan writes, “nestles easily into a theory of eclectic American imperialism”

(p. 238), but three factors were decisive. First was how a "revolution in naval technology and strategy" after 1880 accentuated Hawai'i's matchless strategic value (p. 4). Second was the drive of white islanders for wealth and power. Third was the "growing American rivalry with Japan" (p. 5). Meticulous use of an impressive array of primary and secondary sources fully substantiates Morgan's compelling arguments.

After briefly covering the populating of Hawai'i and early contacts with the West, the author describes how "the processes of 'civilization,' 'modernization,' and 'globalization' . . . caused the near physical extinction of the Hawaiian people" (p. 16). His account of the arrival and growth of the sugar industry reveal how "King Cane" came to "dominate the economy and distort politics and foreign relations as well" (p. 27). Planters, wanting to avoid reliance on Chinese labor, turned to Japanese immigration to supply the bulk of field workers under a treaty with Japan requiring repatriation. The "Bayonet Constitution" of 1887 barred naturalization of non-whites, but its income or property requirements for voting ignited almost six years of discord. Liliuokalani, even before she became queen in 1891, was committed to enfranchise only native Hawaiians. "Nobody was plotting" (p. 68) against her, Morgan insists, until "inept advisors" (p. 59) failed to dissuade the queen from preparing to impose a new constitution. Her gamble forced white leaders to revolt. The author labels U.S. Ambassador John L. Stevens's behavior as only "highly improper" (p. 86) in being "overbearing and rude" toward the queen (p. 61) and "hobnobbing with [her] declared enemies" (p. 64). U.S.S. Boston Captain Gilbert C. Wiltse, not Stevens, ordered the troop landing, exceeding "what was necessary and prudent" (p. 108). His action left royalists, "strongly predisposed to surrender," "completely paralyzed" (p. 103).

Morgan finds flaws in the Blount Report that attributed the rebel victory to U.S. collusion, explaining how the natives were not stronger militarily and the rebels would have acted without U.S. troops and triumphed because of royalist errors. He blames Secretary of State Walter Q. Gresham not only for a report that Congress repudiated but for a disastrous failed attempt to restore the queen. While the Cleveland administration followed "a policy of benign neglect" (p. 138), Tokyo began pressing Hawai'i to grant voting rights to Japanese islanders, who now comprised a plurality of male residents. Equally important in pushing the United States toward annexation were Alfred Thayer Mahan's writings and recognition of "the insatiable coal hunger of battleships" (p. 158) that dictated the need for a naval base at Pearl Harbor. After a lengthy and tedious discussion of U.S. coastal fortifications, Morgan convincingly argues that the U.S. clash with Japan over Hawai'i in 1897 "was not a phony confrontation invented by Honolulu to provoke annexation" (p. 216). Japan's aggressiveness motivated U.S. leaders to submit a treaty, but the crisis in Cuba—and Congressman Thomas Reed's opposition—"scuttled" it until the Spanish-American War acted as "a validation and a trigger" (pp. 223–227). "Annexation succeeded because it was old policy," Morgan contends in his conclusion, "formed by two decades of maturing argument, and made urgent by the U.S.-Japan clash" (p. 240).

Two good maps complement crisp and incisive prose, one of downtown Honolulu and the other demarcating distances from Hawai'i to key points along the Pacific Rim. Morgan presents splendid personal profiles of every influential actor, among them President William McKinley, who he portrays as "a reasonably good leader" (p. 183). He also skillfully assesses the findings of prior writers, including Charles S. Campbell, Merze Tate, and Thomas J. Osborne. This book corrects mistaken historical details, refuting for example the queen's claim that U.S. troops aimed their rifles at her. But Morgan errs in identifying Hawai'i, not Midway, as the first U.S. territorial acquisition "outside of North America" (p. 237). Support is exact for two of his main conclusions: "Sugar planters played no discernible role in fomenting revolution" (p. 67) and a "newspaper barrage" implicating the Harrison administration "was twaddle, and bad twaddle at that" (p. 68). The author's description of how "the events of January 14–17 show a high degree of mutual understanding and an array of simultaneous or complementary actions typical of a unified group rather than two distinct camps" undermines his case against a U.S. conspiracy (p. 84).

JAMES I. MATRAY
California State University,
Chico

ROBERT W. THURSTON. Lynching: American Mob Murder in Global Perspective. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2011. Pp. viii, 427. $99.95.

Robert W. Thurston challenges the monochromatic picture of lynching often painted in popular stories, stories that remove ambiguities to simplify all whites as the mob and to depict the late nineteenth-century South as dominated by the noose. Thurston shows that lynching was fluid across time and space and that white southerners varied significantly, even erratically, in their beliefs and actions, their perceptions of crime, and their understandings of African Americans.

Thurston's most interesting contribution is to widen our angle on lynching to a global perspective by examining mobs and popular violence in Indonesia, Russia, Nigeria, India, Guatemala, and elsewhere. He concludes that mob violence tends to follow political instability and growing concern about crime and that the ritualistic and community functions of lynching, often important elsewhere, were less important in the American South.

From this global perspective the author moves to large issues of race, civilization, and sexuality. Particularly useful is his incorporation of literature and other cultural forms, ranging from Edgar Rice Burroughs's Tarzan stories to the actress Tallulah Bankhead and, most important, to the contexts of imperialism. Thurston makes extensive use of popular and scholarly literature on changing images of the body in the Anglo-American world. And finally he moves to the American South, where white women by the early twentieth century were far from the delicate figures on a pedestal portrayed in some accounts. From these changing contexts came lessened white anxiety over sex generally and a decline in the obligation of white men to protect helpless women from imagined black rapists (an imagined danger never as central as often suggested, Thurston asserts). Sexuality diminished as a useful means of asserting racial boundaries, a change understood only when considered in global and especially European colonial contexts.

The last section of the book hones in on Georgia, the heartland of lynching. Here Thurston drills down to Hugh Dorsey, prosecutor in the Leo Frank trial and apologist for the lynching that followed Frank's conviction for murder. Mixing this case study with his comparative arguments for fluidity and ambiguity, Thurston shows how Dorsey's views evolved to a modest challenge to lynching and mob violence and to incorporation of the language of race and civilization. Dorsey's evolution did not go so far as to question racial segregation or the assumed inferiority of other races, but it did help make lynching less central in southern life.

All these subjects weave in and out of this impressive effort to understand the rise and decline of lynching. Thurston's linkages of global changes to the decline of lynching after 1892 raise important questions, as do other features captured by his wider geographical lens. While Thurston cites an impressive range of secondary literature, specialists in a particular area may quibble with his analysis (e.g., the Ku Klux Klan of the 1920s). And readers may need some patience because this is a massive and sprawling book about a subject most slippery. One hopes that it will encourage others toward the larger framework of lynching. Finally, by bringing the story to our times Thurston challenges simple-minded but popular notions of the ubiquitous lynch noose and the manner in which they enable some Americans to take comfort in one-dimensional stories of hate and guilt.

JAMES H. MADISON
Indiana University,
Bloomington

MARGARET D. JACOBS. White Mother to a Dark Race: Settler Colonialism, Maternalism, and the Removal of Indigenous Children in the American West and Australia, 1880–1940. Paperback edition. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press. 2011. Pp. xxxii, 557. $30.00.

In the latter half of the twentieth century, the deep wounds of injustice, physical and emotional trauma, and other effects of colonization experienced by individuals, families, and communities of indigenous peoples in North America and Australia were given wide public exposure through research and various Commissions of Inquiry. In Canada, the final report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples (1996) acknowledged the deep impact of the removal policies and the residential schools system. The Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission in Australia delivered its report in 1997. This landmark inquiry highlighted not only the history of removal policies and practices in Australia but, more importantly, their long-term consequences. These reports remind readers that government and government-subsidized institutions were essential to implementing removal policies in North America and Australia. They also draw attention to the colonial mentality that created these policies and institutions.

Margaret D. Jacobs's book is an important work based on extensive comparative research in Australia and the American West. Jacobs addresses the removal of indigenous children from their families in both cultural and geographical contexts and goes beyond simple descriptive narrative of policies and practices by employing maternalism as the key organizing concept. This book examines the intimacies of the colonial encounter through a feminist analysis of layers of dispossession. Ann Laura Stoler's Carnal Knowledge and Imperial Power: Race and the Intimate in Colonial Rule (2002) has been particularly influential in shaping Jacobs's approach to the various complex roles that women have played in the colonizing project as teachers, missionaries, enforcers, and friends.

Five significant themes emerge from and shape the work: the dispossession of land, culture, and family, resulting from the total sundering of affective bonds between children and their parents; the threat that the ongoing survival of indigenous groups posed to the colonizing project; the gendered dimensions of protection and assimilation policies that implicated white women and affected "rescued" and "uplifted" indigenous women; the invasion of indigenous families and homes—a practice that created serious conflicts of interest between the maternalist ideals of some white women and the demands of the state; and the apparently excessive amount of attention that white women gave to indigenous homes and bodies, enforcing their own strongly held concepts to sever indigenous children's connections with their families and homelands or country.

The first three chapters set down the historical and conceptual groundwork for the maternalist analysis of child removal policies and practices within the Australian and U.S. contexts. Jacobs's narrative is replete with detail and examples. However, while the author's familiarity with the history of cross-cultural encounters between indigenous and whites in the American West is apparent her analysis often overlooks particular regional differences. In spite of her thorough research in Australia, Jacobs focuses less on the Northern Territory, Queensland, and Western Australia, which together have had the highest indigenous population in the country, than on longer settled southeastern Australia. For example, it is not accurate to say that Aboriginal people were no longer engaged in warfare against their colonizers in the late nineteenth century

(p. 31). On the frontiers in the three states identified above, some Aboriginal people continued to engage in guerrilla warfare against colonizers who appropriated their land and waterholes, and there are recorded instances of white settlers killing groups of Aborigines into the first quarter of the twentieth century.

Chapters five through nine effectively develop the central themes of the book: the maternalist approach, the paradoxical nature of the roles of white women in the colonizing project, and the intrusiveness of the maternalist agenda in institutionalizing indigenous children. A minority of white women challenged the status quo through their growing intimacy and friendship with indigenous women. They supported indigenous women in their opposition to the removal of their children and in their struggle for reform. In the process, some white women gained insight into their own complicity in the colonizing agenda implicit in the practice of indigenous child removal, abandoned their previously held maternalist values, and worked alongside indigenous women as equals.

Jacobs's thoroughness, breadth of comparative research, and fresh analysis of the removal of indigenous children have earned three awards for this book (2010 Bancroft Prize; 2010 Athearn Western History Association Prize; 2010 Armitage-Jameson Prize). I appreciate especially her personal approach in framing her entry into the research, making it truly feminist in content and form.

CHRISTINE CHOO
University of Western Australia

JESSICA C. E. GIENOW-HECHT, Sound Diplomacy: Music and Emotions in Transatlantic Relations, 1850–1920. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 2009. Pp. xv, 335. $49.00.

The cultural turn appears to have come to the history of international relations just when questions have been raised as to whether it might have gone too far in historiography as a whole. In Culture and International History (2003), Jessica C. E. Gienow-Hecht asserted that “culture affects nations and global systems as much as, if not more than, power and economic interest” (p. 6). In the present study she attempts to demonstrate that thesis by focusing on German-American musical relations in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Engaging the history of emotions, a field pioneered and long explored by Peter N. Stearns, she enlists a notion in Johann Wolfgang von Goethe’s novel Elective Affinities (1809), based on the metaphor of human passions being governed or regulated by the laws of chemical affinity. For Gienow-Hecht, emotional elective affinity between Americans and Germans explains why Americans so heartily welcomed German classical music in the latter half of the nineteenth century and why, despite political vicissitudes between the two states, it remains the core of the classical canon in the United States.

Soft diplomacy, dubbed “emotional crossings” by the author, enabled non-state actors on both sides of the Atlantic to promote good relations by elevating music as both a universal language and a form of national identity. Competing with Britain, which had the advantage of language, and France, which claimed superiority in art, Germany engaged in the mission of “civilizing” Americans by exporting symphonic music to the New World. The German Foreign Office sponsored private touring groups spreading German culture abroad because it served state interests without appearing to be propaganda. Americans, for their part, welcomed the professed universal language of music as a way of bridging ethnic diversity, and the new elite cherished European high culture as a means of expressing and displaying its social success. On the theme of emotional transmission, Gienow-Hecht argues that the German orchestra, with its large body of soldier-like, disciplined musicians controlled by a stern, general-like conductor, evoked a quasi-martial masculinity that allowed Victorian Americans to overcome their fears of emotion, which they had gendered as feminine.

Gienow-Hecht’s empirical work on the music industry is exhaustive and her style is winning. She vividly portrays the personalities of conductors such as Anton Seidl, Theodore Thomas, and Frederick Stock, who were drawn to the United States by money but also by musical evangelism. She brings the musical scene to life in her descriptions of the rave receptions given by towns in the Midwest to touring companies, which in turn boosted burgeoning business communities. Patrons were essential in creating symphony orchestras of some permanence in Boston, Chicago, St. Louis, and New York City. Music critics were important in celebrating the universalism and transcendence of German music, soon becoming “experts” in the new music journals and gatekeepers of the musical canon.

But who was in the audience? While acknowledging that little is known about them, Gienow-Hecht notes that subscriber lists mirrored local elites and that observers reported seeing lower-income people, including some well-off African Americans. Overall, women acted like fans, making a star cult of “sexy” conductors.

The American love affair began to wane, however, toward the turn of the century as nationalism took root on both sides of the Atlantic. American composers sought a national musical identity and local musicians began to unionize against immigrant competitors. Tensions grew in foreign policy as Germany built a navy and embarked on its Weltpolitik while the United States fought Spain over colonies in 1898. With the outbreak of World War I, Americans vilified everything German, including its Kultur. Orchestras had to play the Star Spangled Banner before every performance (although it only became the official national anthem in 1931); when the German conductor Karl Muck refused to follow suit, he was briefly interned before leaving the country. At this point, one must doubt Gienow-Hecht’s claim about culture’s superior efficacy over political and economic power in world events. Yet she maintains that the war was not, as many historians assert, the great watershed in German-American cultural relations, because “emotional elective affinity” between the two peoples survived. The canon was upheld and elaborated in music theory and education by German émigrés from Nazism, although here again the critical reader must note that this affinity did not prevent the hostilities of World War II. Finally, the early Cold War led to the reassertion of American affinity with the Federal Republic of Germany.

Despite these contradictions to her thesis, Gienow-Hecht concludes that cultural relations develop a life of their own, apart from political realities with which they may occasionally overlap. This implies Pierre Bourdieu’s theory about fields of cultural production, according to which symbolic power is intertwined with but not reducible to economic and political power, and thus serves a legitimating function. She might have made more of this in tracing the role of classical music as a form of cultural consumption and domination that met the needs of the bourgeoisie in Germany and the United States as they aspired to consolidate their social power in the two incompletely unified nations. That analysis might better explain the supposed affinity as structural rather than emotional. Indeed, one hardly can be certain of one’s own emotions much less those of another, and even less of entire groups.

RENATE BRIDENTHAL,
Emerita
City University of New York,
Brooklyn College

JEREMY BLACK. The Great War and the Making of the Modern World. New York: Continuum. 2011. Pp. xv, 337. $29.95.

Jeremy Black’s stated purpose is to make sense of World War I, “the most misunderstood major conflict in history” (p. 229). As he goes on to argue, a book with this aim would not have been necessary at the time or in the 1920s when, on both sides, there was clarity about why the war was fought. The “important and worthwhile issues” became obscured in the 1930s and have remained forgotten until, in recent decades, historians, if not the wider public, have reached conclusions not dissimilar from those of contemporaries. In the case of the most important belligerents of 1914, Germany quickly adopted a program of large-scale annexations and was resolutely unwilling to contemplate peace if it was not achieved. The German leadership remained committed to this until they saw defeat staring them in the face. For Great Britain, France, and even tsarist Russia, the war was one to uphold international stability and the rule of law in the wake of Austro-Hungarian determination, backed by Germany, to crush Serbia and the German invasion of Belgium after France had rejected German demands to occupy portions of French territory as a guarantee of its neutrality after Germany and Russia had gone to war. Black concedes that historians may face insurmountable difficulties in persuading the wider public that this was not hypocritical eyewash, so deep did that belief become embedded well after the war had ended.

Black rightly stresses the absence of “simple lines” (p. 255) connecting the Great War to its successor in 1939–1945. On the actualities of 1914, besides the Big Four (or Five including Vienna), Black does justice to the motives of other participants, except that he evidently confuses Portugal and Greece in stating that Britain forced the former into war in 1917. Portugal entered in 1916 after an internal debate and was under little or no British pressure, unlike Greece, which was cajoled into the war in 1917 by Britain and France. Virtually the only other detailed criticism concerns Black’s occasional lack of attention to his audience. He references the 1960s antiwar play Oh! What A Lovely War being played in 2010 in “nearby Plymouth” (p. 220), which readers, not least in New England, might find puzzling. The explanation is that Exeter, where Black teaches, and this Plymouth are cities in the same British county.

Political parameters are the essential framework for the military history of the war, which takes up the greater part of the book. In particular, they explain why there was a widespread determination to continue fighting after the pre-1914 assumptions about what a war would be like had been confounded. Those included an expectation that offensives would produce speedy victory on land and a consequent readiness to accept heavy casualties and, after the Japanese fleet’s victory at Tsushima, an assumption that there would be great and decisive naval battles. After the failure in 1914 of the German, Russian, and French offensives, all that remained of earlier thinking was the readiness to accept heavy casualties for the duration of the war while means were found to break the military deadlock. Black notes the stubborn persistence of assertions by generals concerning the “morale” factor, the belief that the superior morale of their own troops would make the difference. He indicates that some advances in assumptions occurred by 1917 insofar as the more hardheaded politicians found this “theory,” as one British minister called it, not merely unpersuasive but exasperating. The stalemate resulted from roughly equal capabilities and the advantage enjoyed by the defense. Black’s book is especially interesting in delineating the learning curve by which techniques were found to break the stalemate, not least by the British in their journey from the failures at Gallipoli in 1915 to triumph on the Western Front in 1918. Indeed, by the summer of 1918 German military defeat was inevitable even if the German home front had not disintegrated. If the successful Anglo-French-American operations of that summer had not been decisive, the full weight of American economic and manpower resources available in 1919 could not have failed to bring Germany to its knees.

The last two chapters are about what the war did to shape world history from 1919 to the present, covering much from female emancipation to the rise and downfall of Soviet communism. What is missing here is almost any discussion of the early postwar period. The 1930s receive mention, but the reader would look in vain for any reference to something as important as the Locarno Treaties of 1925 and the undoubted improvement in international relations around that time, recently expounded by such historians as Patrick O. Cohrs and Zara Steiner. This is a regrettable omission.

VICTOR ROTHWELL
University of Edinburgh

BROOKE L. BLOWER. Becoming Americans in Paris: Transatlantic Politics and Culture between the World Wars. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 354. $34.95.

Had this book appeared before Woody Allen made Midnight in Paris, he might have been able to use more than the absence of novocaine in dentists' offices to question whether life in 1920s "Gay Paree" was really as gay as it is said to be. While its author, Brooke L. Blower, admits that hundreds of thousands of frivolous tourists from Prohibition-era United States did enjoy the many pleasures on offer in Paris, she argues that the sojourners who stayed longer were often involved in more serious pursuits. She tells of how, in the aftermath of World War I, Americans arrived brimming with confidence in their country's economic and cultural superiority, and how large parts of the city, still on its economic knees, were transformed to cater to their tastes. Montmartre and the Champs-Élysées were crammed with American-style bars and night-clubs; "English-spoken" restaurants surrounded the Place de l'Opéra; American bohemians packed the terraces of Montparnasse cafés, becoming a tourist attraction in their own right.

Conflicts with the locals inevitably followed, many of which the author chronicles by combing the police archives. Parisian conservatives condemned the "hooked-nosed" "cosmopolitans" of Montparnasse, as well as the African American jazz bands blaring through the night in Montmartre. They bridled at the apparent Americanization of the capital—the garish neon signs, the ubiquitous posters advertising Hollywood movies, and the honking cars clogging streets. Leftists condemned "Fordism" for ruining workers' lives and angrily protested the death sentences meted out in Massachusetts to the anarchists Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti. After their execution in August 1927, demonstrators who were thwarted from attacking the American embassy trashed Montmartre and the area around the Champs-Élysées, two of the four districts most associated with pleasure-seeking Americans in Paris. (Blower sees these protests as helping to forge transatlantic links among leftists that presaged the mid-1930s Popular Front, something that seems a bit far-fetched given the distinct lack of enthusiasm for supporting their anarchist rivals displayed by the two nations' Communist parties, the future keystones of the Popular Front.)

The rightist prefect of Paris followed the riots with an épuration of the city intended, he said, to turn the "capital of good humor" into the "capital of good manners" (p. 132). Blower tries to put an anti-American spin on the roundups of streetwalkers and raids on unregulated brothels, after-hours night spots, and gay bars by pointing out that they were concentrated in the districts most frequented by foreigners. But few Americans were caught in this net, and the prefect himself said that, rather than being anti-American, they were intended to prepare the city to welcome "our American friends"—the ten-thousand-odd American Legionnaires who soon descended on the city for their annual convention.

Blower's chapter on this rather loopy affair tries to read too much into it. She sees the Legion as "a new American right" and implies that it was a counterpart to the French Right, with its affinities for fascism. She criticizes other "scholars" (e.g., this reviewer) for not recognizing the convention's "significance . . . in the transatlantic political debate" (p. 175). Yet, as she points out, for the most part the convention consisted of curiously costumed, often drunk, middle-aged men indulging in "high-jinks" that turned out to be either deeply offensive or simply puzzling to many Parisians. The Legionnaires made no real connections with the French Right, and anyway, she admits, whatever their activities back home, the Legion could hardly be considered a fascist organization.

The next chapter is devoted to correcting the impression left by the famous writers who returned from France after the Great Crash chanting mea culpas over their lack of involvement with the problems of the world. Blower takes pains to refute Malcolm Cowley's Exile's Return (1934), the classic in the genre, saying that the political maelstrom of Paris in the 1920s helped turn writers such as Ernest Hemingway, e.e. cummings, John Dos Passos, William Shirer, Langston Hughes, and Martha Gellhorn into committed liberal internationalists. In the 1930s, she says, the broad perspective they had developed in 1920s Paris led them to become enthusiastic supporters of the Popular Front, active defenders of Loyalist Spain, and fierce opponents of Nazi Germany. Yet by then most had long since left Paris and were drawing their inspiration from elsewhere. (Hughes opined that Moscow had replaced Paris as "the greatest city in the world" [p. 242].) Nevertheless, Blower says, by the time the United States entered World War II, the internationalist ideals that had originated in the heated debates on Paris's Left Bank had helped convince many Americans "that people suffering and enduring elsewhere were like Americans . . . and that their lands . . . were savable" (p. 256).

Whether or not one finds this formulation convincing, practically anyone interested in Paris in the 1920s—even Woody Allen—should find this well-written and thoroughly researched view of the other side of "Gay Paree" informative and stimulating.

HARVEY LEVENSTEIN,
Emeritus
McMaster University

SEAN SCALMER. Gandhi in the West: The Mahatma and the Rise of Radical Protest. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. vi, 248. Cloth $90.00, paper $32.99.

Although there are numerous books on Gandhian-style nonviolent resistance, most describe and analyze the technique or examine particular protests. There are very few histories that observe the way in which the method evolved over time. Sean Scalmer's book provides evidence of this evolution in the United States and Britain during the period from about 1940 to 1970, using numerous contemporary sources.

Scalmer shows that Mohandas K. Gandhi was for many years poorly understood in the West. Views were constructed on the basis of racist stereotypes about "Orientals," and even those who revered the man had little real understanding of his methods. In part, this was due to colonial censorship and counter-propaganda, but Gandhi's use of Indian concepts and idioms made his beliefs opaque to audiences outside India. In particular, the term satyagraha was difficult to translate, and the existing terms in English for civil protest, such as "passive resistance," carried different implications. In general, it was only after the mid-1940s that Western activists began to gain an informed understanding of Gandhi's methods and ideology, with the result, according to Scalmer, that "an era of exciting political experiment opened suddenly outwards" (p. 104).

A small and isolated group of Western pacifists had employed Gandhi as a model for their own activism in the 1930s and 1940s, often in very quiescent ways. It was only in the 1940s that some African American civil rights campaigners began to try to adapt Gandhian methods to their particular cause, and in the early 1950s that anti-nuclear activists began to do the same in Britain. At first, there was little popular support for their protests. African American civil rights protestors were beaten up by white thugs while the police looked on. Rather than winning the sympathy of onlookers and opponents, as Gandhi had argued was the effect of self-imposed suffering by protestors, their efforts gained few converts to the cause. All that they had was courage and optimism, while failure stared them constantly in the face. Gradually, as they learned how to direct their attention to clearly defined targets, such as segregation on buses and at lunch counters in the American South, they began to win wider sympathy and support.

Scalmer argues that at this juncture, Western activists began to distance themselves from the Gandhian legacy. He perhaps overstates the ways in which Martin Luther King, Jr. downplayed Gandhi's influence; in 1959 King went on pilgrimage to visit Indian sites associated with the Mahatma, and in 1963—when King delivered his "I Have a Dream" speech—photos show him surrounded by people wearing Gandhi caps. Scalmer nonetheless provides strong evidence that from around 1963 onward, increasing numbers of American civil rights activists began to challenge the Gandhian legacy, asserting an American tradition of civil protest. In Britain, anti-nuclear campaigners looked both to ancient assertions of British freedom and to more recent movements such as that of the suffragettes, in the process making audacious claims about the superior morality of their own societal traditions and the great originality of forms of protest that were, in their essential methods, derived directly from Gandhi and his Indian followers.

In time, the Gandhian method developed in new ways. King innovated the tactic of "creative tension," provoking constant confrontations in which the violence of the antagonist was revealed in its full ugliness, thus winning widespread sympathy for the cause. As more people were attracted to the civil rights cause, the strict nonviolence of the disciplined, Gandhian-style activist gave way to the more riotous behavior of the crowd. Protestors no longer dressed in respectable clothing and acted with the dignified discipline that emphasized their superior morality—the enemy, it was said, was too hardened to respond to such appeals. Instead there was confrontation, and even fighting back with staves and brickbats. As the 1960s advanced, many protestors began to associate nonviolence with timidity, and strength with masculine muscle-flexing. This indeed represented a turning-away from the Gandhian ethos. The rioting that accompanied King's assassination in 1968 marked the symbolic end of this era, with the rhetoric of Black Power and the idealization of guerrilla warfare in the cult of Che Guevara replacing King's nonviolence as the most fashionable model for resistance. That these too were soon discredited and displaced by the major nonviolent campaigns of the 1980s and beyond takes us past the period examined by Scalmer, but as he says in the conclusion to this excellent book, there are many further histories to be written.

DAVID HARDIMAN
University of Warwick

JOHN B. HENCH. Books as Weapons: Propaganda, Publishing, and the Battle for Global Markets in the Era of World War II. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2010. Pp. xviii, 333. $35.00.

Millions of books appeared during World War II bearing the logo of a fierce eagle clutching a book in its talons, a streamer trailing from its beak reading "Books are weapons in the war of ideas." Franklin D. Roosevelt, his Office of War Information (OWI), and myriad U.S. book publishers seconded this catchy slogan. World War II was not only a military struggle but also a battle of ideas, and books, it seemed, could play a vital role in the global ideological conflict. But which books? Who would choose them? And how would they be distributed?

John B. Hench analyzes how publishers and the American government tried to advance their compatible, but sometimes conflicting, interests during and immediately after the war. After the intellectual blackout that had descended on Axis countries and their conquests, OWI officials sensed a golden opportunity to promote positive views of U.S. government and society. It was thought that books could counter not only Joseph Goebbels's noxious propaganda but also the image of a violent, consumerist United States fed, paradoxically, by another American cultural export: Hollywood movies. Perhaps betraying their high culture bias, some OWI officials believed that impressions made by books were more profound than those received from films.

Book publishers wanted to promote sales in areas that had been off-limits during the Axis occupation and to crack the British market that had restricted American book sales in the empire. Although bureaucrats and publishers had broadly compatible interests, working through a maze of bureaucratic snarls, paper restrictions, and transportation dilemmas required prodigious energy. Hensch ably untangles the sometimes mind-numbing negotiations required to fuse public policy and private interests. His book is thoroughly researched, well written, and clearly argued.

A few weeks after D-Day, cartons of books hit the beaches of Normandy. Eventually 3.6 million books were sent to Europe in special printings known as Overseas Editions and the Transatlantic Series. Starved for reading fare, impoverished but with few outlets for entertainment, Europeans snapped up cheaply priced American volumes. Some translated titles were sold at German prisoner of war camps in the United States—truly a “captive market,” as Hensch drily notes (p. 128).

Titles had to pass through multiple sieves, and screening standards were not always clear. Hensch characterizes the choices as “middlebrow,” similar to Book-of-the-Month Club selections. The list included books by historians such as Carl Becker, Henry Steele Commager, Foster R. Dulles, Allan Nevins, and Fletcher Pratt. Edgier titles were avoided, although Alfred Kazin's On Native Grounds: An Interpretation Of Modern American Prose Literature (1942) met with favor. Later shipments included such authors as Charles Beard and Lincoln Steffens, though not their most challenging works. Ernest Hemingway's For Whom the Bell Tolls was chosen to showcase American literature, but authors such as Jack London and Walt Whitman were vetoed for unexplained reasons. Books that had been banned by the Nazis, such as Thomas Mann's The Magic Mountain (1924) and Erich Maria Remarque's All Quiet on the Western Front (1929), were prized exports.

The government and the publishing industry both saw wartime book distribution as beachheads for postwar literary penetration. Publishers worked with the occupation government in Germany in the difficult task of resurrecting a de-Nazified publishing industry. In Japan, where the occupation government worked through the inherited Japanese bureaucracy and where few Americans boasted linguistic skills, a publishing revival occurred more quickly. Margaret Mitchell's Gone with the Wind (1936) became the first translated American title to crack Japan's bestseller list in 1949. American and British firms engaged in dueling “biblioimperialisms” (p. 222) for access to foreign markets.

Although it is notoriously difficult to assess the effects of specific propaganda programs, Hensch reasonably concludes the book offensive was successful. He argues it introduced freer publishing regimes in Germany and Japan and helped make both countries “on the whole good friends and reliable allies for the ensuing cold war” (p. 256). The links between the wartime programs and the more controversial use of cultural tools by the Central Intelligence Agency and other government units merit deeper analysis. Hensch laments the declining use of books in advancing “soft power.” In an age of blogs and videos gone viral, his work, perhaps unintentionally, inspires nostalgia for a time when books seemed to be a winning cultural weapon.

CLAYTON KOPPEL
Oberlin College

CHRISTOPHER KLEMEK. The Transatlantic Collapse of Urban Renewal: Postwar Urbanism from New York to Berlin. (Historical Studies of Urban America.) Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 2011. Pp. x, 315. $40.00.

Inner-city expressways, “slum” clearance, and public housing projects are the negative icons of liberal modernist urban planning that prevailed throughout the 1950s and 1960s. Reinforcing popular resentment against this type of urban planning, historians have pointed out the adversarial social effects of such schemes, especially the tendency to aggravate racial inequalities, and the lack of public participation and acceptance. While these shortcomings arguably contributed to the virtual disappearance of wholesale urban renewal by the 1970s, Christopher Klemek is interested in how the underlying ideals of liberal modernism concurrently lost their assertiveness. The subject of the study is a set of ideas and institutions that sustained and mutually reinforced what Klemek labels the “urban renewal order” and the process of their erosion. The “urban renewal order” is presented as a bundle of aesthetic preferences, expertism, federal policy, and local power structures all tuned to the principles of modernism after World War II. Klemek goes on to show how every single one of these elements came under attack during the 1960s and how the bundle eventually unraveled in the following decades.

The first part of the book is devoted to the emergence of the modernist “urban renewal order.” The origins are traced back to interwar Europe, from which a number of architects and planners, such as Walter Gropius, migrated to the United States and became the intellectual spearhead of the “urban renewal order.” Their efforts were complemented by federal policy, mostly on housing and road building, and above all by political shifts in various local regimes. Under the banner of reform, a new generation of politicians in alliance with professional urban planners had acquired power in many U.S. cities in the early 1950s. However, Klemek asserts in the second part of the book, critique was never completely absent. He cites the British Architectural Review as a source of competing aesthetic ideals and the Independent Group that called for more sensitivity to context of urban planning during the 1950s. Growing criticism resulted from sociological inquiries into urban redevelopment projects suggesting that existing communities should be preserved. While such objections were discussed within the profession, Jane Jacobs' The Death and Life of Great American Cities (1961), to which Klemek devotes an entire chapter, made a wider public aware of this divergence of opinion. These disputes are scrutinized in the third part of the book. The notorious "Freeway Revolts" serve as a case in point to show how the professional critique of modernist schemes was echoed by popular resentments. By the end of the 1960s, some of the concerns had found their way into local policy, illustrated by the case of neighborhood preservation in New York City. Concurrently, grass-roots organizations had become powerful actors on the urban scene. This was possible, as portrayed in the fourth part of the book, because on the one hand activists were supported by "anti-experts" of the New Left, and on the other hand neoconservative notions among urbanists led to the questioning of the effectiveness of modernist intervention. As small-scale participatory planning flourished, the funds on which it thrived were eventually discarded altogether by the Nixon administration. Nonetheless, Klemek concludes the book on a positive note, arguing that the legacy of small-scale participatory planning did live on in other countries, foremost in Canada and West Germany.

This book provides a valuable interpretation of the transformations in postwar urban planning in the United States. Klemek convincingly concentrates on the intellectual history manifested in the professional discourse among urbanists. In doing so, Klemek is able to analyze the transformations in thinking without losing sight of the broader political context which he consistently includes through his concept of the "urban renewal order." This book is especially important because of Klemek's persuasive demonstration of the strong relationship between the evolution of ideas and the local experiences of those professionals involved. Accordingly, the sites that figure as the nodes of the book's narrative are the Joint Center for Urban Studies of MIT and Harvard, New York's West Village (the long-time home of Jacobs), and University of Pennsylvania's School of Design in conjunction with Philadelphia's South Street neighborhood. Klemek adds to this perspective considerable material from Berlin, London, and Toronto, which is sometimes used to show the significant transfer of ideas, and is at times employed as a comparative reflection. While these additions contribute to the book's comprehensiveness, they are too erratic to amount to categorizing the book as a transatlantic history of urban planning in a strict sense. Nonetheless, the extensive contextualization of the professional discourse both in breadth and in depth not only reflects a current trend in scholarship on urban planning but is done in an exemplary and productive way. This book is an important contribution to the urban history of the United States as well as a conceptually farsighted study.

SEBASTIAN HAUMANN

Technische Universität Darmstadt

SEBASTIAN HAUMANN. "Schade, daß Beton nicht brennt . . .": Planung, Partizipation und Protest in Philadelphia und Köln 1940–1990. (Beiträge zur Stadtgeschichte und Urbanisierungsforschung, number 12.) Stuttgart: Franz Steiner Verlag. 2011. Pp. 335. €62.00.

Twin shibboleths—already battered, and even looking somewhat like straw men now—mark the historiography of city planning after World War II on both sides of the Atlantic. The first holds that there was a watershed break roughly forty years ago (in 1960s America and 1970s Europe), caused when grass-roots opposition to urban renewal effected a wholesale rejection of planning visions and practices. The second dominant interpretative trend suggests that this rejection was all for the best. Sebastian Haumann's study, whose title invokes a German squatter slogan ("a pity that concrete doesn't burn"), raises intriguing questions about both. Famous protest episodes did occur, of course, but Haumann argues that they did not really constitute breaks with the dominant modernist planning approach. Rather, they worked out tensions inherent within the modernist conceit that progressive emancipation of citizens would occur via technocratic planning for them (p. 313).

Haumann examines two lesser-known flashpoints of community mobilization in great detail: opposition to a crosstown expressway in South Philadelphia (1967–1974) and attempts to stop the redevelopment of a chocolate factory in Cologne (1973–1981). Even within the histories of each respective city, not to speak of the larger transatlantic context, these represent single episodes unfolding over less than a decade. So for both cases, Haumann provides an introductory chapter setting the stage of urban renewal in the decades leading up to the clashes. In the American setting, a mid-century civic reform movement took up city planning as a cudgel against entrenched political machines. In Germany, postwar urban reformers were situated within an expanding welfare state, comfortably beyond such politicized contests.

The utility of this version of Haumann's project will necessarily be rather limited for urban scholars outside of German-speaking academic circles. Beyond the obvious linguistic barrier is the basic fact that the study is firmly anchored in a German scholarly conversation, and primarily interested in illuminating the history of German planning via the U.S. example, rather than vice versa, or something even more broad. It must also be noted that, in keeping with German academic practices, the published text is essentially a dissertation, which explains its heavy reliance on other scholars' theoretical frameworks. In particular, Klaus Selle's concept of "planning cultures" (Planungskulturen) forms the point of departure (p. 19), and Haumann fits his conclusions into Selle's three analytical categories of images (Leitbilder), institutions, and implementation (pp. 313–316).

Haumann emphasizes continuities between the mid- and later twentieth centuries, and between the U.S. and German examples. He insists that there is a convergent trend, despite the divergent outcomes of civic opposition movements—the Philadelphians' freeway revolt stopped the road project, but the Cologne squatters failed to prevent demolition. For Haumann, the grass-roots opposition of the 1960s and 1970s did not reflect clashing planning cultures, but a kind of reformation within the extant one. Ultimately, he concedes, a new planning culture did emerge by the 1980s, influenced by the protest perspective and even glorifying it, though he hopes to chasten that celebration of change. Such conclusions foreground his German point of reference. According to Haumann, indications of the newest paradigm—including the emergence of the Green Party in Germany and the implementation there of a national urban policy for socio-economic stabilization of neighborhoods (Soziale Stadt)—imply the normalization and incorporation (borrowing Jens Ivo Engels's terms) of participatory planning. But Haumann critiques such self-satisfied triumphalism by pointing to accompanying deregulatory trends that undermine the goals of earlier neighborhood activists.

It is precisely here that the comparative discussion beckons most tantalizingly for further development. For example, Haumann notes that German planning officials defended a technocratic vision of apolitical objectivity well into the 1980s (pp. 310–311). Yet such conceptions faced forceful challenges from the early 1960s in the U.S. (viz. Paul Davidoff and advocacy planning) and fell into unfunded irrelevance with the discontinuance of major urban renewal programs a decade later. Thus, the sense of historical break—and the effects of subsequent deregulation—might be drawn much more sharply in the U.S. case. Similarly, Haumann's facility in two sets of urban archival sources raises some fascinating questions about political cultures and the nature of citizenship that could lead to bolder conclusions. He points to the broadly defined rights of citizen participation in U.S. cities, compared to the tightly circumscribed German category of Betroffenen (those directly "affected" by condemnations and displacement)—the latter term and concept being absent from planning vocabulary in the United States. And while the German approach seems less democratic at first glance, it also anchored the participation and consideration of neighborhood residents in durable planning institutions. While Haumann construes the relationship between the U.S. and German examples to be one of "transmission" (Transfergeschichte) within a context of "great structural similarities" (p. 27), his study also suggests that planning in Germany retained its own indigenous characteristics in the face of transatlantic influences.

CHRISTOPHER KLEMEK
George Washington University

JESSE HOFFNUNG-GARSKOF. A Tale of Two Cities: Santo Domingo and New York after 1950. Paperback edition. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2010. Pp. xxxi, 319. $27.95.

The nature of Dominican racial identity has fascinated many academics who have tried to decipher Dominican history in relation to the Dominican racial imagination. Jesse Hoffnung-Garskof's book contributes to this field of inquiry. Hoffnung-Garskof describes two neighborhoods—Cristo Rey in Santo Domingo and Washington Heights in New York City illuminating the lives of Dominicans in both cities. Hoffnung-Garskof stitches together an uneven patchwork comprised of the Dominican Republic's history, flows of migration and the concepts of cultura, national imaginaries, and imperialism. This impressive book addresses transnational topics—especially racial identity and the politics of migration—that link the Dominican Republic to the northern reaches of the Atlantic world. Hoffnung-Garskof accomplishes this task by drawing upon both archival and ethnographic data.

Hoffnung-Garskof frames migration largely as an outcome of exclusionary racial and class-based understandings of cultura and progress espoused by intellectuals in the Dominican Republic. The latter define progress from a racist perspective, blaming biological factors such as skin color and undernourishment for the low status of blacks, peasants, and the poor in Dominican society. Peasants, according to Hoffnung-Garskof, first saw internal migration to cities as the means of progress, only to learn that urban integration was not the same thing as full citizenship. International migration then became more common because of the U.S. influence on Dominican culture. Hoffnung-Garskof identifies the widespread U.S. military and commercial presence in the Dominican Republic as the most effective vector for transmitting awareness of the United States and thus making it the likely destination for Dominican migrants.

The growing Dominican presence in New York City eventually led to Dominican involvement in a number of important political issues and identity movements. For example, Hoffnung-Garskof examines racism directed against Dominicans and the evolving relationship among the Dominican, Puerto Rican, and African American communities. He also shows how the ideas of blackness and Hispanidad/Latinidad restricted the understanding of Dominican ethnicity in the United States. Hoffnung-Garskof presents Dominicans in New York as trapped between anti-immigrant sentiments in the United States and class barriers in the Dominican Republic while simultaneously negotiating their status in both countries. Hoffnung-Garskof deftly interweaves changes occurring in Cristo Rey with the larger transformations analyzed in the book. The ethnographic detail sheds light on how Cristo Rey's residents view, practice, and perform transnationalism.

Some parts of this work, however, are more crudely constructed. For example, Hoffnung-Garskof con-

denses five centuries of Dominican history into a single, uncomplicated transparent national imaginary. I contend that Dominicans have a split imaginary. Key elements shaping Dominican identity since colonial times include bloody slave insurrections, centuries-old Maroon villages, struggles against slavery (before, during, and after independence), and peasant resistance to hierarchically organized religion. The idea of blackness is varied, complicated, complexly articulated, and completely silenced in official written narratives. The Dominican “character” cannot simply be read off these hegemonic discourses of race and personhood. Hoffnung-Garskof’s ethnography of Dominicans operating in New York City politics is superb, but his interpretations disappoint because he narrowly follows official scripts of identity. Moreover, he ignores bloody episodes of anti-imperialist resistance, and inaccurately describes several Dominican characters such as merengue singer Johnny Ventura and Freddy Beras-Goico.

Other parts of this transnational view fail to convince. Cristo Rey seems to stand in for the whole island. What is the relationship between Cristo Rey and Washington Heights? Is it migration? Early Dominican migrants were not poor people from Cristo Rey but middle-class urbanites. What was the impact of these questions of culture and progress on the latter, and what was the effect of their migration? Most poor Dominican migrants reached New York City during the 1980s in the context of an economic crisis that did not follow the logic of earlier migratory flows. Hoffnung-Garskof does not address the role of later generations of Dominicans and how they continue to negotiate identity. Hoffnung-Garskof discusses imperialism benignly and ignores the fact that early migratory flows happened in the shadow of bloody confrontation between the United States and the Balaguer regime over political repression against dissidents carried out by death squads and the Dominican state. Moreover, the author treats the Left as monolithic when it was highly fragmented, both in Santo Domingo and New York.

While readers can glean important bits of information concerning Dominican transnational practices in the twentieth century, the book’s loose ends and blind spots reduce its overall impact.

MILAGROS RICOURT
Lehman College

ASIA

TONIO ANDRADE. Lost Colony: The Untold Story of China’s First Great Victory over the West. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 431. $35.00.

The authors of China’s dynastic histories realized that the root of good history lies in telling compelling stories. Those of us who study imperial China cannot help but recall Sima Qian’s vivid account of the epic struggle between Xiang Yu and Liu Bang as recorded in the Shiji (Historical Records) or the account of the Song emissary Qin Gui turning white when he beheld the armor and spears of the Jin cavalry glittering in the sun as recorded in the History of the Song Dynasty (Song shi). But too often nowadays academic historians seem to miss this fundamental lesson and dismiss narrative history as the province of popular historians. That is why the present volume is such a welcome contribution to the field. Tonio Andrade sets out not only to recount the fascinating history of an event largely unknown outside of China and Taiwan, but also to situate this event within the context of broader debates about modernization and the so-called “Military Revolution” in world history. The result is a delightfully engaging account that has the rare quality of being both a great read and academically rigorous enough to provoke further debate and scholarly engagement about the subjects it treats.

The book arose out of Andrade’s earlier work on the colonization of Taiwan in the seventeenth century. As all patriotic Chinese know, the formal Chinese annexation of Taiwan took place under the Qing dynasty (1644–1911) after the Ming loyalist pirate Zheng Chenggong, also known as Koxinga, had first ousted Dutch settlers in the early 1660s, only to see his descendants in turn defeated by Qing adversaries who took the island for their own. Moreover, Koxinga’s victory over the Dutch occurred despite the fact that they possessed the latest in weaponry and military fortification technology. This event therefore provides a perfect case study for historians looking to understand the processes of military expansion and modernization in the early modern world and allows them to test the viability of various theories pertaining to the relative military superiority of Europeans vis-à-vis the rest of the globe. Andrade briefly lays out some of these debates at the start of the book, identifying what he calls traditionalist and revisionist camps. The traditionalists contend that European military and technological superiority, caused by a number of interrelated factors unique to European society, were crucial to European dominance of the globe in the modern era. In addition to greater technical skill and competence, proponents of European military superiority argue that early modern European armies pioneered repetitive drilling, the use of training manuals, and tactical innovations such as volley fire. Revisionists contend that there were many dimensions of the Military Revolution present in other parts of the world, particularly China, and that the Military Revolution is a flawed concept at best. Andrade admits that when he started writing the book, he was firmly in the revisionist camp (pp. 9, 307), but over the course of his research he came to occupy a more moderate position informed by his extensive reading of the primary sources. In short, while the Dutch held no superiority in sheer firepower or discipline over the Chinese, their broadside sailing ships and “renaissance fortresses” (also known as artillery fortresses or trace italienne) were in fact superior to what the Chinese (and presumably most other non-Westerners) possessed at the time. Nevertheless, even these technological advantages could be negated by superior leadership and adaptability, as was the case in seventeenth-century Taiwan (pp. 321–327).

These conclusions are important on a number of levels. First, they demonstrate to students in particular the need to follow the evidence and not let preconceived assumptions determine one's interpretations of the data. Second, they demonstrate the importance of the human factor in history. As Andrade notes, leaders and leadership mattered. Too often these days it seems that historians and social scientists want to devise grand theories that leave out the human element. Along these lines, however, it is worth noting a couple weaknesses of the book. First of all, Andrade's wholesale acceptance of Koxinga's supposedly fervent Ming loyalism is questionable. Plenty of evidence in the sources suggests that Koxinga's loyalties were first and foremost to himself and that the cause of Ming restoration was a convenient cloak, worn when it suited him. Furthermore, far from coming off as a military genius or great adaptor, as the author suggests, Koxinga appears to have been a rather incompetent hothead when it came to military command. He repeatedly ignored sound advice, killed subordinates, and made both tactical and strategic errors. The Dutch come across as equally foolish, so calling Koxinga's activities "China's First Great Victory over the West" seems a bit disingenuous. Additionally, it would have been nice if the author had occasionally pulled himself away from the narrative to offer more in the way of comparative analysis. For example, how did the tactics used in this siege compare to those used elsewhere? A more comparative angle only would have strengthened his conclusions.

These minor criticisms aside, this is one of the few monographs that I can enthusiastically recommend to general readers, undergraduates, graduate students, and specialists alike. The author has a strong grasp of the sources and the debates and does a wonderful job of bringing history to life. Books like this make history worth reading and doing.

KENNETH M. SWOPE
Ball State University

MARY BROWN BULLOCK. The Oil Prince's Legacy: Rockefeller Philanthropy in China. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press. Washington, D.C.: Woodrow Wilson Center. 2011. Pp. xv, 242. $39.95.

The strongest tie between the United States and China was built through broad, deep, and long-lasting cultural and educational interactions. Many individuals and institutions contributed to the construction of that unique dimension in U.S.-China relations. While missionary enterprises and government programs have attracted plenty of attention from scholars, the role played by non-governmental organizations remains lightly cultivated and frequently misunderstood. Mary Brown Bullock fills the gap with her new book.

As the author of An American Transplant: The Rockefeller Foundation and Peking Union Medical College (1980), Bullock is anything but a stranger in the field of U.S.-China cultural relations. However, what she does in her new book is exactly what she did not do in her first monograph: write a comprehensive and up-to-date account of the Rockefeller family's philanthropic endeavor in China using a clearly defined theoretical frame. Approaching five generations of Rockefellers from the perspective of cultural internationalism, Bullock sheds much needed light on the important and unique role played by the Rockefeller Foundation and other philanthropic institutions funded by the Rockefeller family in the making of cultural and educational relations between the United States and China.

Drawing on diaries, letters, institutional archives, and numerous interviews, Bullock argues that it was the Rockefellers themselves rather than their advisers who shaped the oil prince's legacy in China. John D. Rockefeller, Sr. not only started the family's philanthropic involvement in China by making his first donation to missionaries in 1863, but also established "enlarging the boundaries of human knowledge" as the ultimate goal for all Rockefeller philanthropies (p. 14). He set lasting examples through founding the University of Chicago in the 1890s and the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research (now the Rockefeller University) in the early 1900s. When John D. Rockefeller, Jr., the first president of the Rockefeller Foundation and the first chair for the China Medical Board, began to expand the family's involvement in China in the 1910s, he kept the focus squarely on higher education and scientific medicine by choosing the establishment of the Peking Union Medical College (PUMC) as the first major project for the family's newly institutionalized philanthropy. John D. Rockefeller III played a key role in preserving the China Medical Board in the 1950s and re-establishing cultural and educational ties with the People's Republic of China in the 1960s. His son, John D. Rockefeller IV, oversaw the Rockefeller Foundation's return to China in the 1970s, resuming the family's support for research and education in science.

It was this deep and direct involvement of several generations of Rockefellers, Bullock points out, that was largely responsible for the Rockefeller Foundation's concentration of its resources on China and its rise as a major force in the making of U.S.-China cultural and educational relations. Besides tens of millions of dollars invested in PUMC and its nursing and public health programs, the Rockefeller Foundation provided generous funding for numerous educational and research programs in natural and social sciences at dozens of key Chinese and missionary universities like the National Central and Yanjing. The foundation also offered hundreds of fellowships and scholarships for Chinese scholars and students to conduct research or pursue graduate education in the United States. By 1950, the Rockefeller Foundation had spent $50 million in China while giving only $10 million in grants to Great Britain, the second largest recipient in the world. By 2010, the foundation had invested close to $800 million in China's science, medicine, and higher education, far exceeding the amount spent by any other American player in China.

As a major player in China, the Rockefeller Foundation, Bullock reveals, conducted itself differently in many areas, adding a unique layer to U.S.-China relations. Unlike most American missionaries and government officials who tended to impose educational and cultural programs upon the Chinese as an instrument to achieve their religious or diplomatic goals, the Rockefellers and their advisers were willing to adapt their agenda to meet China's needs and conditions. Instead of devoting resources to elementary, secondary, and undergraduate education as most missionary and government programs did, the Rockefeller Foundation committed to keeping PUMC a world-class institution and supporting graduate level training for Chinese scholars and students in science. It was this sharp focus on the so-called "elite" medicine and advanced research and training that made the Rockefeller Foundation's programs more congruent with China's national priorities and thus more conducive to a professional relationship that survived wars and revolutions.

Despite the challenge from the lack of full access to Chinese archives, Bullock has succeeded in bringing the study of U.S.-China relations to a new level with her nuanced narrative and insightful analysis on the Rockefellers' philanthropic endeavors in China.

HONGSHAN LI
Kent State University

ANDREW F. JONES. Developmental Fairy Tales: Evolutionary Thinking and Modern Chinese Culture. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. 259. $49.95.

This book presents a study of developmental thinking in modern Chinese literature and popular culture. Developmental thinking encompasses, according to Andrew F. Jones, both a "transitive sense as purposive activity" and an "intransitive" sense as evolution (p. 15). Both types, he argues, permeate China's modern literary works from the late Qing period forward (1890s), particularly those of Lu Xun, who is the major focus of the book. These types of thought also saturate fairy tales, a genre just emerging in the early twentieth century as a pedagogical tool intended to help transform children into useful adults. The thematic focus on evolution/development lends the book a strong coherence, although Jones is sometimes at pains to maintain the argument as he pursues various discussions down rabbit holes of narrative, signification, and genre. Nevertheless, Jones' well-crafted prose, impeccable sense of language and irony, wide-ranging curiosity, and eclectic interests make for compelling reading.

The book begins with a historically situated theoretical discussion of the emerging place of evolution/development in Chinese thought and cultural production, tracing the interest in China to the late Yan Fu's translations of Herbert Spencer and Charles Darwin in the nineteenth century. The oft-told tale of how Yan Fu rendered evolution into an updated but quasi-Confucian system of the natural world transposed to human society (both within and between groups/nations) gets a new spin with Jones's account, as he pays attention to the narrative imperatives and aporiae inherent in this rendering. He focuses on one of the most enduring metaphors of Chinese modern literature (and of human animal custodianship, e.g., in zoos): the iron cage, or iron house. As most classically deployed, the iron house is Lu Xun's cri de coeur: what would you do, Lu Xun asks, if people are sleeping soundly in an iron house from which there is no escape, and you have the choice of awakening them before they suffocate to death or of just letting them die in their sleep no wiser to their fate? This prison of "choice"—as much an individual one as a collective social and historical vise—is a narrative trap. Jones demonstrates, in five chapters, exactly how and why "choice" is both part of the imperative and aporia of narratives of developmental thinking itself.

In the first chapter, Jones delineates and illustrates the issue by rereading, in terms of the narrative contradiction within evolutionary thinking, Wu Jianren's early twentieth-century novelistic rewriting of the Dream of the Red Chamber. Wu's version sends the hero, Bao-yu, famously closed into his home in the original, out into the world where he entirely emulates the modern colonial project by collecting specimens and categorizing and taxonomizing them. However, Bao-yu's adventures end up being just a dream. The dichotomies of dreaming/waking and action/inaction—indeed, the entire ambiguity of the narrative enterprise and its associated problems of novelistic character development—render this Bao-yu "haunted by the past, a belated bystander to a history that has yet to unfold" and bereft of "even the consolation of agency" (p. 62). Jones renders Wu's Bao-yu as an encaged figure. He is unable to sleep, unable to wake, unable to save himself or others while subject to evolution and development beyond his control. By providing similarly complex readings of everything from fairy tales to children's pedagogical writings, Jones articulates, following Miriam Hansen, "vernacularizations" of universal knowledges (p. 66). The book opens to scrutiny minor stories of wolves, foxes, fish, and toys, as well as major literary works, such as Lu Xun's stories. There is much to be learned here, not only of a historical-literary-narrative variety but also in terms of how to read and open different kinds of texts to analysis.

I have several hesitations about this book. One important modern reference to iron houses/cages could be to Max Weber. Weber's notion of modernization and rationalization as an iron cage might have given Jones a global historical vantage upon the metaphor. While most theorists—including Jones—take the iron house as a cultural-historical meditation on China, one could also understand it as registering real doubt about modernization, industrialization, and capitalist society. Lu Xun's iron house could be made to speak to that issue (even though Jones fends off this type of analysis by deflecting the problem of "second naturing"). In other words, the problem of development is not merely a narrative imperative/aporia, but rather a deeply historical one linked to capitalist society. And a whole book about fairy tales, animals, development, children with nothing on gender (fox spirits anyone?) as an integral interpretive angle? Very strange indeed.

Despite these reservations, the book presents many pleasures and repays careful reading.

REBECCA E. KARL
New York University

DAVID STRAND. An Unfinished Republic: Leading by Word and Deed in Modern China. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 387. $65.00.

The 1911 Xinhai Revolution did not fail; it just did not succeed. In light of its lack of success, according to David Strand, a culture of politics (performing, speaking, acting out, brawling in public, speechifying) opened a political lacuna that a liberal democracy might yet fill.

Chapter one, "Slapping Song Jiaoren," figures female revolutionaries Tang Qunying, Wang Changguo, and Shen Peizhen engaging in violent, futile political acts while attempting to secure female suffrage. Chapter two, "Speaking Parts in Chinese History," asserts that earlier cohorts of public speakers prefigured political parties. Here the argument is that Qing-era speechifying meant that modern Chinese politics are by nature theatrical; political culture consists of "speech acts," whether these are efficacious politically or not; and that citizenship is measurable in terms of mass emotion. Chapter three, "A Woman's Republic," rediscovers internationalism in republican Chinese feminism. Although this has been heavily documented elsewhere, Strand contributes the interesting case of Carrie Chapman Catt, a U.S. women's rights activist who visited Chinese feminists.

Chapter four, "Seeing Like a Citizen," uses less well-known figures like Bian Baimei, a theoretician of modern banking, to argue that the act of looking must be construed as a political gesture. This least convincing chapter makes its points not empirically but with reference to political theory. "Losing a Speech," the fifth chapter, focuses on Lu Zhengxian, a major diplomat under both the Qing and the Republican governments. Lu gave a catastrophically bad speech in parliament, which Strand interprets as evidence that Republican culture is only visible in the "spectacular and unpredictable successes and stumbles of politicians, activists, and citizens" (p. 252).

In the sixth chapter, "Sun Yat-sen's Last Words," Strand casts Sun as a master rhetorician. Sun, Strand states, invented "modern Chinese political leadership as a rhetorical act and a collective exercise" and "created a public and political space that others" would occupy "through the infectious simplicity of his own formula of self-promotion and national salvation" (p. 240). This summation is consistent with Strand's general definition of republicanism as "the middle range of civic life . . . where the meanings of citizenship, patriotism, rights, and Leninist regimes struggled to find their footing" (p. 171).

Strand invokes a mixed group of canonical and contemporary political theorists to support his argument. These include Hannah Arendt, Kenneth Burke, James M. Burns, Judith Butler, Michel de Certeau, Gilles Deleuze, Paul J. DiMaggio, Frank J. Goodnow, Félix Guattari, Jürgen Habermas, Bruce Lincoln, Georg Simmel, Walter W. Powell, and Max Weber. These disparate philosophers meet loosely around a notion of the rhetorical power of speech. Strand uses them to support his thesis that performing "middle range" civics prefigures or substitutes for state or party political activity. Since the book is not intended to be an intellectual history, European, Chinese, and Japanese political theorists active at the turn of the twentieth century do not appear as potent advocates. On the contrary, Strand appears reluctant to engage with them. This book is an interpretive cultural history. It assumes a cultural-political terrain and explains self-expression in relation to cultural context. This leaves ambiguous how thinking, political philosophy, and strategy on the ground work in relation to the innumerable ideas and social practices that Strand calls "Republicanism." Strand's work equivocates over the question of what success, failure, political culture, and citizenship mean. Teleologies of citizenship are not a universal category in social history and where invoked must be demonstrated clearly. Public culture and civil society are evocative tropes, according to Frederic Wakeman, Jr., and they cannot empirically or historically be presumed to be social institutions or to emerge out of cultural contexts.

The point that the revolution of 1911 remains not a failure but rather unfinished is not a novel claim. It emerged in U.S. historiography in the late 1960s and has been advanced over the last five decades in the work of Chang Hao, Chang Peng-yüan, Bryna Goodman, Henrietta Harrison, Joan Judge, Don Price, Lucian Pye, Mary Rankin, Brett G. Sheehan, Wen-Hsin Yeh, and their students. Interestingly, this historiographic position found considerable purchase in official centenary anniversary celebrations in the People's Republic of China (PRC). Surely the grandeur of the unfinished revolution as spelled out in Strand's presentation would depart from the denouement anticipated in PRC historiography in 2011.

Historians of the Chinese women's movement and the history of Chinese liberation theory will enjoy Strand's detailed discussion of the centrality of suffrage and women's movements in the Chinese revolutionary tradition. He contributes to an already strong body of work established over the last few decades and adds suggestive evidence that one singularity of the long Chinese revolutionary tradition may be precisely the centrality of women's liberation theory, women and men's activist liberation struggles, and party-organized political practices.

TANI BARLOW
Rice University

ERIC C. RATH. Food and Fantasy in Early Modern Japan. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2010. Pp. xiv, 242. $49.95.

Japan is a land of food porn. Turn on a television at any time of day or night and you will find food. You may see a cooking show, but you are more likely to encounter celebrities taking delight in the smell, look, and flavor of anything from foie gras to ramen noodles. Eric C. Rath does not reference television programs in his monograph, but the books on cookery he describes gave their readers a similar opportunity to indulge vicariously in rare delicacies served at formal banquets centuries ago. Food as a source of pleasure beyond gustation has a long history in Japan.

This is not a book about foodways, restaurants, or even cooking per se. Rather, it is an exploration of the discourse of elite dining and the opportunities for fantasy it facilitated. Rath traces a progression in three broad stages in writings about food during the late medieval and early modern periods. In the fifteenth through early seventeenth centuries, works on cooking circulated only in manuscript, often in the guise of “secret transmissions” of esoteric knowledge from master to disciple. The texts focused less on actual cooking than on the ritual preparation of inedible food sculptures—fish and game birds carved to evoke sites of history or nature. By the late seventeenth century, a market had emerged for published works that introduced readers to the elaborate rules governing the preparation and consumption of lavish banquets enjoyed by the highest echelons of the samurai ruling class. Culinary writings in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries engaged in a playful discourse of food, rich with wordplay and literary references. Through all the changes, writings on cooking treated food as an object of intellectual pleasure rather than a source of nourishment or even sensory delight.

Rath frames the book around the question of how to characterize cookery before the nation-state. The literature on foodways generally treats “cuisine” as a peculiarly national—hence modern—phenomenon; sure enough, the idea of “Japanese cuisine” (washoku) is a product of the late nineteenth century. The book’s preoccupation with situating Japanese cooking in a timeline leading to national cuisine is odd, however, because Rath does not otherwise structure the work as a narrative of origins, or even as a critique of the tendency to nationalize cuisine. He does not invoke his texts as an expression of culinary print capitalism in the service of imagining a national community; nor does he urge us, in the spirit of Prasenjit Duara, to rescue cooking from the nation. Rather, he tells a distinctly early modern story of curious consumers tapping growing markets to indulge in aesthetic pleasures and fantasize about social climbing in a polity that offered few opportunities for mobility.

In fact, much of the book is descriptive, with detailed accounts of the contents and contexts of texts and erudite explanations of the historical and literary references packed into the names of dishes. Rath even provides a full translation of the Southern Barbarians’ Cookbook, a short collection of recipes for sweet and savory dishes prepared in a mostly Iberian style. The banquets that Rath describes are from an alien world. The dishes featured ingredients, such as crane and goose, that disappeared from even the most exalted diets 150 years ago. Even the sushi and tempura on the menus bore little resemblance to their contemporary iterations. The meals were presented on a series of trays, each with a fixed number of small dishes and soups, in a style called honzen ryōri, which is all but extinct in Japan today. Most alien was the abundance of items that were not meant to be eaten at all. Some were obviously intended solely for the eyes, but many others appeared (and perhaps even were) completely edible, though to touch them would have been a terrible faux pas. Just showing up to a banquet required considerable knowledge and sophistication.

The most fantastic of the fantasies recounted in the book involves Endō Genkan’s (fl. 1694–1702) instructions for hosting a visitation by the shogun or other high lord. The preparations begin three years in advance with the construction of an appropriate hall and culminate in the hiring of 230 chefs, servants, doctors, fire fighters, and security guards. Yet the instructions also warn the host not to commit a gaffe like “using a chopstick as a toothbrush” (p. 139) in the midst of the banquet.

This book emphasizes fantasy over food, and in so doing it unapologetically concentrates on formal elite practice and popular imaginings of it. Rath has almost nothing to say about commoners’ diets, or for that matter, even the mundane eating habits of elites off the banquet circuit. It is a fascinating work of cultural history even if it tells us little about real people’s meals.

DAVID L. HOWELL
Harvard University

PHILIP C. BROWN. Cultivating Commons: Joint Ownership of Arable Land in Early Modern Japan. Honolulu: University of Hawai’i Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 268. $52.00.

Studies of early modern Japan have hardly neglected rural life; indeed, the study of cities has lagged by comparison. But as Philip C. Brown notes, the study of agriculture has been neglected, and meanwhile a simplistic model of agrarian evolution has prevailed in the classroom. According to this, the cadastral surveys of the late sixteenth century established the class of honbyakusho who farmed to pay their taxes and grow cash crops. Living in self-governing villages, they traded land at will, such that new class relations including capitalist wage labor emerged over time. These changes were rooted in private property rights associated with a market-based “economic society,” and “such developments . . . transformed late-nineteenth-century Japan into a world-class economic and military power” by the early twentieth century (p. 9).

The real history is, Brown argues, rather more complicated. In perhaps one-third of Japan, forms of corporate farming under “joint ownership” coexisted with private family farming (p. 96). Shares of land (both paddy and dry fields) were periodically redistributed on the basis of equal shares per family, per capita, or the level of preexisting cultivation rights. The initiative for such “land division” (warichi) arrangements came from the villagers themselves, or in some cases (such as Kaga and Satsuma), the domain.

Brown discusses various explanations for the persistence of warichi throughout the Tokugawa era and even beyond the Meiji Land Reform of 1873. These include the desire to share risk in regions where landslides frequently destroyed crops, preserve equitable tax burdens, and maintain cooperative management of cooperatively reclaimed lands. But there is no single explanation for the widespread phenomenon. Brown’s deployment of topographical maps indicates only a thin correlation between the practice of warichi farming and the susceptibility of a region to flooding and landslides. He concludes it “impossible” to directly compare the “geographical conditions” of “warichi and non-warichi villages” (p. 43) and “no consistent, direct relationship between redistribution intervals and natural hazard risk” (p. 144). There were myriad reasons to maintain collective lands and reassign them periodically.

While at pains to note that “the socialist principle of allocating resources . . . based on need” was never operative (p. 69), Brown writes the “study of Japan’s experience reminds us that nonmarket and nontechnological social solutions have been viable and may remain viable today” (p. 5). Although he leaves it to the reader to draw any lessons, this perspective is valuable and the entire discussion of the complexity of landholding in Tokugawa Japan is engrossing.

This is not, however, a reader-friendly book. Space prohibits even a summary of the complex arguments and descriptive material Brown presents concerning the origins and rationale of warichi systems, the disputes they produced, and the nature of their twentieth-century persistence. The writing style is occasionally awkward to the point of obscuring meaning. For example, “From the standpoint of warichi’s potential to retard economic growth or to accommodate commercial crops, how long-maturing crops with potential commercial value were treated holds potential interest” (p. 163).

The haphazard unfolding of vital chronological detail may puzzle those unfamiliar with Japanese history (among those whom Brown wants to reach). The crucial fact that “samurai were forbidden from residing in villages or owning land” is mentioned only parenthetically, after Brown has substantially outlined his argument (p. 31). The whole issue of tenancy—rising throughout the Tokugawa era—is addressed only at the end of the book, in relation to the impact of the Meiji Restoration and the new land tax system. Here we learn, for example, that a “dispute settlement” in Kawaji village in 1786 “specifically notes that tenants were to be included in the warichi process.” Brown tells us that thereafter “rents were to be set villagewide” but does not explain how this happened (p. 182).

Given the many references to primary sources, one might have hoped for direct quotations to add color and depth to this work. But these are few and far between. The citation form is minimalistic, and sometimes the references are frustratingly vague. For example, when Brown adduces an example of a village official stopping a request for redistribution, he refers in a footnote to another above, cited to document peasants’ gift-giving to village officials “in many parts of Echigo.” The note refers to an archival primary source (monjo)—likely a cache of documents—“for sources” (p. 247). This is not very helpful.

The reader comes away from the work fully convinced that many early modern peasants embraced and preserved joint ownership systems for good reasons; that they made common lands increasingly productive and receptive to market forces; and that the warichi systems left a legacy that might (for example) “have made it easier to form tenant unions” in the early twentieth century (p. 187). All of this is important, and the work deserves the energy required to engage it. But one might have hoped for a clearer, more streamlined presentation.

GARY P. LEUPP
Tufts University

DENNIS J. FROST. Seeing Stars: Sports Celebrity, Identity, and Body Culture in Modern Japan. (Harvard East Asian Monographs, number 331.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Asia Center. 2010. Pp. xi, 337. $39.95.

Dennis J. Frost outlines the development of “modern sports celebrity” in Japan through a “transnational history” focused largely on four “stars” from sumo, track and field, baseball, and boxing. By looking at the discourse of celebrity surrounding figures ranging across the 1910s, 1920s, wartime, and the 1970s, each chapter thus opens onto a dense and distinct socio- and cultural-historical scene, offering the possibility of a novel perspective on the global articulation of modern regimes of sports, celebrity, and commodification as they intersected with transformations in bodies, gender, discipline, mass culture, nationalism, and identity.

Frost traces the advent of sports celebrity in Japan back to the seventeenth century, rapidly narrating the advent of popular ad hoc wrestling spectacles and body exhibitions that, through patronage, regulation, and ideological investment, were transformed into the invented tradition of sumo. The “stars” of this system emerged from new ranking practices and publicity, and from intertwined “big body” exhibitions (often without any athletic component). Frost’s account passes rapidly over this history; readers wishing for a fuller understanding of Edo-period body politics and spectacle, or of this transitional process, will need to look to the cited literature (R. Kenji Tierney in particular). Frost focuses his analysis in his first two chapters upon Hitachiya Taniemon (1874–1922), locating this champion as a “transitional figure” into modern, mass cultural sports celebrity. Enhanced by the ideological cachet of his “samurai” background, and spread through new forms of mass publicity, Hitachiyama’s public image in the early twentieth century, Frost argues, both set narrative standards for the “sports star” paradigm generally and facilitated the rewriting of sumo as an exemplary, and exclusively male, “national sport.” The focus upon celebrity, however, allows Frost to consider less “star”-focused phenomena only in passing: particularly, the contemporaneous dominance of university sports, including baseball, part of the late nineteenth-century energetic promotion of physical culture and athleticism throughout Europe and America, as well as Japan.

Chapter three, on Hitomi Kinue (1907–1931), a track and field star, considers the range of contentious issues invoked by Japan’s first female Olympian. Embraced as “Japan’s first international woman,” Hitomi was simultaneously the source of gender anxiety and speculation via her international victories, androgynous appearance, economic independence, and long-term same-sex cohabitation—a legacy summarily dismissed by heteronormative biographical reimaginings in the 1980s and 1990s. While her victories and life became bound up within mass cultural debates and the fantasy of the “modern girl,” her premature death in 1931 energized ongoing contention over women’s physical education, “abnormality,” and state regulation of women’s bodies.

Chapter four treats Sawamura Eiji (1917–1944), the star pitcher, war casualty, and namesake for the eponymous pitching prize. Frost situates Sawamura’s rise at the moment of baseball’s professionalization and corporate promotion, after decades of highly popular amateur university and secondary school leagues. Sawamura’s initial fame, for three strikeouts of the visiting Babe Ruth, fits within a larger story of promotional tours between Japan and the United States instituted by the Yomiuri Shimbun, the newspaper sponsoring Sawamura’s team, which developed the Yomiuri Giants as Japan’s first professional baseball team. Frost explores these exchanges through contemporaneous media accounts; again, the focus upon the public as opposed to institutional level of celebrity leads away from the convergences that made such cultural exchanges feasible and profitable.

Detailing both Sawamura’s and baseball’s propaganda involvements, Frost’s account finds both sport and star fully integrated within national military commitments; Sawamura played a wartime role comparable to those of Ted Williams and Joe DiMaggio. In Sawamura’s case, his willingness to make personal sacrifices cost him first his vaunted pitching ability and finally his life. Frost identifies both the myth of a persecuted sport, and the “postwar re-remembering of baseball’s wartime past” free of militarism, as a continuation of American wartime propaganda under the supervision of the Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers. He describes this process as part of an effort to divert blame onto “warlords” while promoting a racially paternalistic reformist political agenda. But Frost’s account of this reductive propaganda is itself all too brief: it gives scant attention, for example, to the interested self-rehabilitation of some of the same media institutions central to his narrative. Frost passes too quickly over the immediate postwar context for Sawamura’s reimagining into a generalized “postwar” context that encompasses biographies produced in the 1980s. Thus, Frost misses an opportunity to fit Sawamura’s 1947 memorialization within a broader pattern of cultural promotion by newspapers seeking to distract their readers from both recent war boosterism and postwar labor conflicts. Shōriki Matsutarō, owner of both the Yomiuri Shimbun and the Yomiuri Giants, who was still in Sugamo Prison as a Class-A War Crimes suspect in 1947, exemplifies this conjunction of interests.

In the final chapter, on boxing champion Gushiken Yōkō (1955–), Frost briefly describes Okinawa’s marginalization in order to give context to Okinawan expressions of pride in Gushiken’s victories and to biographical accounts of Gushiken himself. Frost notes how such expressions indexed both fraught identification with and against mainland Japan, and “dramatic differences” internal to Okinawa itself. For Frost, the figure of Gushiken helped mediate and tame such differences—and their concrete political accompaniments (military bases, inequity)—by making them consumable as a form of “spectacular difference.”

A brief epilogue considering Ichiro Suzuki (1973–), inadvertently underlines the book’s weaknesses. Frost’s examples seem too spread out, leaving obvious gaps between his rapid expositions of the topics at hand. As a consequence of Frost’s focus on the publicity aspect of celebrity, his trope of “transnational co-constitution” frequently flattens into reflective forms of positionality against either a generic “West” or the United States. We miss the coevalness inherent in, for example, Hitomi’s participation in the international expansion of women’s sports and physical education, and the inherent transnationalism of commodification and professionalization. In following the formulaic biographical narratives of the sports stars, Frost does not always provide much guidance in contextualizing the particular effectiveness of specific narrative choices in a given historical moment. While this may be the “first critical examination of the history of sports celebrity outside a Euro-American context,” Frost’s book only begins to sketch the outline of an adequate understanding of this history.

WILLIAM MAROTTI
University of California,
Los Angeles

E. TAYLOR ATKINS. Primitive Selves: Koreana in the Japanese Colonial Gaze, 1910–1945. (Colonialisms, number 5.) Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2010. Pp. xv, 262. Cloth $60.00, paper $24.95.

The appearance of two important books on Japan's colonial past with radically different perspectives in the same year suggests a healthy advancement in the debate over how history should view Japanese imperial activity in early twentieth-century Asia. In contrast to the negative description of Japan's actions toward its neighbors as "beastialization" and "grotesqueing" found in Mark Driscoll's Absolute Erotic, Absolute Grotesque: The Living, Dead, and Undead in Japan's Imperialism, 1895–1945 (2010), E. Taylor Atkins uncovers a more positive, symbiotic relationship of respect developing between the Japanese and Korean peoples. It was a period characterized by Japanese "enthusiasm for quotidian Koreana, and the concomitant faith that this interest constituted a viable conduit for intercultural union" (p. 2). He challenges the view that Japan sought to obliterate Korean culture by tracing a Japanese interest in Koreana that represented a "first Korean wave," a precursor to the contemporary wave that has popularized Korean movies, K-pop music, and peninsular travel among Japanese. Additionally, Atkins's study advances two other points: that the colonial experience forced Japanese to reflect on their own historical and modern identity, and that the colonizers' gaze fundamentally transformed both Japanese and Koreans (p. 3).

Atkins offers one of the more comprehensive considerations of the Japanese administration's use of "culture" in his challenge of the widely held view that Japanese assimilation policy aimed to eliminate Korean-ness. The bunka seiji (culture rule) reform administration (1920–1931), introduced after the 1919 March First Movement, allowed Koreans access to their culture, for example through an indigenous press. Atkins considers whether this policy aimed to encourage Korean adoption of Japanese culture, retention of Korean culture, or creation by the two peoples of a third, hybrid culture. By maintaining ambiguity over purpose, he argues, the colonizers preserved "maximum flexibility." This approach convinced all but the hardline anti-Japanese nationalists that "they had heard and heeded the lessons of March 1919" (p. 38). Perhaps. But "Japanization" was the ultimate goal of assimilation as outlined in 1910 shortly after the Japanese annexation of Korea and periodically throughout the 1920s and 1930s. Koreans were supposed to adopt the most advanced Asian culture of the time, that of the Japanese. Many Japanese criticized this approach, or advised flexibility in its implementation. But official rhetoric emphasized the Korean people's gradual assimilation in spite of discriminatory practices that often undermined this aim.

Some Japanese, as Atkins documents, took an interest in researching Korean culture, perhaps in protest over Japan's rhetoric of assimilation. Yanagi Muneyoshi, a renowned expert on Korean ceramics, wrote frequently about this subject. Koga Masao, who came to Korea as a child, was recognized as an expert in Korean classical and folk music (p. 165). Atkins writes that "Korea [became] the earliest 'brand name' to make a major splash in imperial Japanese popular culture." Photographic collections and travel guides introducing Korea also gained popularity in the colonial homeland during this period (p. 184). The author's depiction of the Japanese geisha and the Korean kisaeng in this context presents one pertinent illustration of Japanese interest in Koreana. The perceived "rusticity" (p. 181) of the kisaeng suggests that Japanese collectors and connoisseurs often focused on the nostalgic quality of Korean items, emphasizing how they evoked Japan's primitive past rather than representing any unique Korean quality.

In Atkins's analysis, the Japanese imagined Koreans as their "primitive selves," as if their gaze situated Koreans "into a mirror through a time warp" (p. 57). This impulse helped justify Japan's colonial mission in two ways. The recognition of a primitive self reinforced a sense of racial kinship that made the development of Koreans along a Japanese-style trajectory seem all the more possible. Unfortunately, the same logic also justified a hierarchical colonial system that placed Japan in a dominant role. Atkins aptly displays these two impulses by examining Japanese views on traditional Korean white clothing. The garb, in the colonizers' mind, lacked creativity and efficiency; it was colorless and required daily washings to keep clean. Such clothing, according to one colonial ethnographer, reflected the cold, dull, sad, severe, and simple characteristics that defined the Korean people themselves (p. 72). Yet, the distance was temporal rather than spatial—the oddities of Korean cultural artifacts "reminded" Japanese observers of practices that they had shed centuries ago.

Though lacking in Korean-language sources, this book makes an important contribution to ongoing discussions concerning the Japanese-Korean colonial past. Atkins highlights the extent to which Japanese colonialism contributed to Korea's modern development and the development of the colonizer-colonized relationship over a thirty-five-year period. He also initiates discussion on questions regarding Japanese attitudes toward the rhetoric of colonial assimilation. To what extent did it influence their images of the Korean people? Finally, this monograph identifies a Japanese legacy present in post-liberation Korea, and underlines the need for broader consideration of its post-1945 influence on the peninsula.

MARK E. CAPRIO
Rikkyo University

RIEKO KAGE. Civic Engagement in Postwar Japan: The Revival of a Defeated Society. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 195. $85.00.

Historians of twentieth-century Japan have for some time rejected the notion of August 1945 as a complete break, with history restarting on a blank slate after Japan's defeat in World War II. We now discuss the "transwar" period and the many ways that postwar developments were built on prewar and wartime experiences. Rieko Kage argues that prewar associational activities and the experience of wartime mobilization enabled rapid growth in civic engagement in the early postwar period. Kage's argument will not surprise historians of wartime and postwar Japan, but this book makes a valuable contribution by directing this insight to an audience beyond the fields of history and Japanese studies. For example, social scientists such as Theda Skocpol have concluded that defeat in war should lead to decreased civic participation, not more. Kage's clearly written and carefully organized book aims to show that this assumption, based on studies of the United States, does not hold true for Japan or for a number of other countries.

She does this first by showing that civic engagement (meaning membership in a broad range of groups from religious to recreational) grew significantly in the decade after 1945 in Japan, and that differences between regions correlate with differences in levels of prewar civic activity and wartime mobilization. Kage then adds data on twelve countries in North America and Europe, concluding that higher levels of wartime mobilization, and not whether a nation was on the winning or losing side in the war, were associated with greater postwar increases in associational activity. One might question whether correlation proves a causal relationship, but her argument seems to make intuitive sense and deserves further study.

Next Kage offers two case studies of associational growth in early postwar Japan: the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA) in the cities of Kōbe and Sapporo, and the Kōdōkan judo association in Yokohama and Fukuoka. In the case of the YMCA, she concludes that it survived longer into the war and grew much more rapidly in postwar Kōbe than in Sapporo because it had been larger and more active in the prewar period. Sapporo's YMCA grew slowly after 1945, even though the city had suffered far less damage than Kōbe, because of its prewar weakness. Judo, says Kage, illustrates the same phenomenon: where it was strong before the war (Fukuoka) it recovered quickly; where it was not (Yokohama), it lacked the legacies that would have enabled quick growth after the war.

Despite the discipline-specific jargon of a proposed "general theory" of postwar growth in civic engagement expressed in a complex mathematical model involving independent, dependent, and control variables, there is much of interest here for historians. First, Kage reconfirms the importance of continuity across the supposed divide of August 1945. Second, she looks at a period, and at types of associations, that have not often been studied by historians of postwar citizens' groups. Historians' interest in more explicitly political activism has led us to focus on protests against the renewal of the U.S.-Japan security treaty in 1960, or the Vietnam War, or the serious pollution that became a national issue in the late sixties and early seventies. Kage's extensive archival research points the way for new lines of inquiry by historians.

It is not clear that the case studies contribute much to proving Kage's argument. Kōbe, Yokohama, and Sapporo are by no means typical Japanese cities, and despite the growth of the organizations she studies, their membership numbers were tiny in comparison to Japan's population of over 84,000,000 in 1950. Kōbe's YMCA grew from 124 members in 1945 to 472 in 1947 and kept increasing rapidly; Sapporo's counted 130 members by 1954. There were just over 8,000 judo association members nationwide by 1949. One might also question Kage's answer to the "so what?" question of why this growth in association membership was important. She hypothesizes that it enabled more rapid postwar reconstruction by efficiently generating and transmitting information regarding what needed to be done in rebuilding Japan. This may well be true, but the only data presented on information exchange is the volume of mail sent. Who sent that mail and to whom, what information it contained, and how this relates to associational activity are unknown.

This book offers a provocative challenge to received wisdom, and suggests a number of avenues for further research. The questions raised, as Kage notes, are particularly relevant in a time of debate over state-building and democratization. Given the frequent comparisons of the disasters of March 11, 2011, to Japan's wartime destruction, this book may also offer insights into the place of civic activism in the recovery process now underway.

TIMOTHY S. GEORGE
University of Rhode Island

TIRTHANKAR ROY. Company of Kinsmen: Enterprise and Community in South Asian History 1700–1940. New York: Oxford University Press. 2010. Pp. xiii, 252. $99.00.

While the question of economic growth has stimulated much academic and public debate in light of globalization, a simpler issue has suffered neglect in comparison: how do economies actually function? The question becomes insistent when we turn to the old, traditional economies that characterize the bulk of societies in history. An exclusive preoccupation with economic growth distorts our perspective on the past and even on the present. The terms in which the debates on growth are couched are quite unsuitable to answering the question how an economy—any economy—actually functions. Systems of economic organization that have survived a transition to the modern age demand particular attention in that respect.

Tirthankar Roy's book, a synthetic survey based mainly but not exclusively on secondary sources, is of interest as a contribution to this much neglected subject. Although he does not ignore the comparative historical reasoning behind the wealth and poverty of nations, he refuses to be entrapped within the parameters of the growth debate as outlined by development economists. Consequently, he can address the issue of how stable economies function in the long term, and how they can be explained in terms of their viability in providing for the material needs of populations across generations.

Basically, Roy is concerned with two questions: how did cooperative communities function in the earlier economic organization of Indian society, and why did these communities of material activity become unstable during the colonial period? The exploration of these issues reveals to him that material activities are both market driven and conditioned by the relationships of power and honor prevailing in society.

From the outset, Roy's analysis underscores the economic importance of lineage, caste, and community. He adds an original contribution to this list: "the endogamous guild." Such guilds were endogamous communities of kinsmen among merchants, artisans, peasants, and workers. They played a key role in the economic organization of Indian society. The professional guilds found in medieval Europe and Qing China are quite different from this type of organization because the hereditary guilds of India used marriage ties to fashion cooperative collectives in various occupations. Heredity, marriage, and occupation imparted a caste-like character to what Roy calls the endogamous guild. Certainly it was more closed and less mobile than the medieval European guild, which was a purely professional association. Roy concedes that the endogamous guild was a caste-like formation (p. 133), but despite the similarity he maintains that it was not the same as a caste (p. 21).

One reason why he persists in making the distinction is perhaps because the Jews, Syrian Christians, Parsees, Muslims, and Armenians also had the same hereditary, endogamous, professional associations, yet these communities did not have caste. The matter will become clear in the context of the Indian social formation as a whole. Society in India was shaped like a beehive, in which each cell was an endogamous unit, enjoying autonomous management of personal concerns, such as marriage, inheritance, and faith. The system incorporated Hindus, Buddhists, Jains, Jews, Syrian Christians, Parsees, and Muslims. Some of the lineages among these communities followed hereditary occupations, but not all.

Strong community bonds, backed by the authority of headmen, checked disputes within the community of merchants and artisans through arbitration and compromise. This system facilitated long-distance trade, but the European East India companies had an altogether different system of trade, and the Indo-European trade, as Roy shows, was full of friction. Danish missionaries in Malabar during the 1710s witnessed a high degree of artisanal and mercantile skill and conceded that this was an economically advanced society in no way inferior to any nation "in relation to trade, and the things of this life" (quoted on pp. 42–43). In the long run, however, as Roy points out, the gain of any exclusive and hereditary collective might carry a cost for society as a whole, especially as global trade gathered momentum. The persistence of caste-like collectives might have impeded the growth of a free market.

Roy gives us a sensible analysis of old Indian business organization, and how it coped in the modern age. But more than that, his book contains insights about the structure of Indian society. The term endogamous guild may not be quite exact, but it does suggest how communities not included in formally caste-bound Hindu society might have been absorbed into that social formation.

RAJAT KANTA RAY
Presidency College

NILE GREEN. Bombay Islam: The Religious Economy of the West Indian Ocean, 1840–1915. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xvi, 327. $90.00.

Nile Green's book on "Bombay Islam" is in many respects a pathbreaking work that will significantly influence scholarly interpretations of the relationship between Muslim religious thought and organization, and the new worlds of colonialism in the nineteenth century. Green's book focuses on Bombay as a rising center of communication, trade, travel, industry, and publishing in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. He argues that Bombay's central position as a "modern" node of trade, production, and print dramatically influenced what he calls the "religious economy" of the entire western Indian Ocean. Drawing on a range of previously untapped nineteenth-century published works in Urdu, Persian, Arabic, and English, Green gives us a richly textured and physically grounded picture of the myriad forms of Muslim organization and ideas circulating and competing for support both among the emerging new classes of industrial Bombay and among transoceanic groups linked to Bombay, from Iran to South Africa.

One of Green's central arguments in this book is that the influence of different types of religious leaders in this context is best understood in terms of a competitive market model. The key to Green's interpretation of religious change is a model of supply and demand. Green discusses this phenomenon in complex and nuanced ways, but at root he presents competition for support among religious leaders, Sufi orders, and reforming anjumans as essentially a competition among what he terms, "firms," appealing to a consuming, if segmented, religious public. The success of these "firms" lay largely in the degree to which their message gained traction with different groups, driven by demand. This framework provides a structure for the establishment of Bombay's overseas influence as well, as successful religious leaders, often Sufis, used their reputations to establish multiple "franchises" at far-flung locations around the Indian Ocean. Such a model underlies one of the strengths of Green's book: his grounding of an expanding world of print and debate in the broader contexts of circulation, migration, and social change—that is, in a world of shifting consumer demand.

Green's other major contention is connected to this vision of the "religious economy." He argues strongly for the central importance in this period of an "economy of enchantment" in which miracle stories and Sufi authority expanded. He thus rejects the idea that colonial modernity in Bombay encouraged a strong, internalizing, reformist Islam, as has sometimes been argued. Though reformist religious organizations were certainly present in the nineteenth century, and play some part in his story, the religious economy itself was one dominated by a custom-laden Islam that expanded rapidly in the context of the new commercial city and its publishing markets. This form of Islam expanded, in Green's argument, because it retained the broadest appeal, giving what he calls "Customary Islamic firms" (in most cases, Sufis) an advantage over their more reformist competitors.

These are important arguments, and they give Green's work a socially grounded dynamism. Green's notion of a "religious economy" driven by market competition helps him to make sense of the great diversity of competing Muslim publications, Muslim leaders, and Muslim ideas in this period. He not only provides insight into the religion of the new working class in Bombay but also suggests the importance of this milieu to the critical reformulations in Muslim religious thinking shaping a broader Indian Ocean world. Most notable in this regard is his important discussion of Bombay's centrality in the development of Sufism and Aga Khani neo-Isma'ilism in Iran. Green tells us less about what linked Bombay Islam to the larger development of Muslim thinking in India, although he does suggest the critical connections between "Bombay Islam" and both its Hyderabadi and Konkan hinterlands. He also notes the importance of Bombay's British colonial governing structure, ostensibly neutral in religious matters, in providing a framework for Bombay's "religious economy." But there is less discussion of the city's Muslim neighborhoods, or of the shifting local templates of identity associated with public observance such as Muharram, than we find, for example, in the work of Jim Masselos.

Perhaps the most troubling aspect of Green's work arises with respect to the relationship between his market model of religion and his emphasis on the ongoing—and even expanding—importance of customary, mediational, and patronage-based Islam. How are we to make sense of a world in which religion is defined at once by individual consumers, whose freedom of choice profoundly shapes the direction of religious ideas and religious organization within a market model, and by a mediational world in which it is not free market choice, but clientage and intercession, that is at the heart of religious attachment? Green at times hints at some of the tensions implicit in his analytical models, but we never get any sustained discussion of them. If scholars are to follow up on the exciting world that Green has opened up, and on his use of market terminology in exploring religious change, such questions will require more theorization.

DAVID GILMARTIN
North Carolina State University

SUGATA BOSE. His Majesty's Opponent: Subhas Chandra Bose and India's Struggle against Empire. Cambridge:

Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 388. $35.00.

Sugata Bose's biographical tribute to his great-uncle, the Indian nationalist politician Subhas Chandra Bose (1897–1945), is a gripping tale of a life of anticolonial struggle and of a quiet, religiously oriented individual who spent much of his adult life in prison or in exile, tormented by his colonial overlords, becoming a politician, a warrior, and a legend and inspiration to some after his death. The pace and tension of the book's prose at times approaches Patricia Highsmith at her best. As a trade book, it also eschews some of the scholarly paraphernalia that enable a more critical engagement with its contents. Academic circles have long had in Leonard A. Gordon's Brothers against the Raj: A Biography of Indian Nationalists Sarat and Subhas Chandra Bose (1990) a careful and detailed account of the lives of Subhas Bose and his elder brother Sarat. Sugata Bose's book is not likely to replace Gordon's account.

The author provides an engaging narrative of Subhas Bose as a youthful follower of the Hindu mystic Vivekananda, a student leader in Calcutta, a candidate for the Indian Civil Service examinations in Cambridge, his political apprenticeship under the Bengali lawyer and Congress leader Chittaranjan Das, his imprisonment without trial in Burmese prisons from 1924 to 1927, and his return to politics as a charismatic leader of the Indian youth movement. Sugata Bose provides good accounts of Subhas Bose as President of the Congress with the approval of Mohandas K. Gandhi, the Congress's presiding moral deity in 1938, and then without it in 1939, leading to Gandhi's campaign of non-cooperation against the elected leader of his own organization.

Biography is far less a methodology than a genre that shapes the ends of its practitioners, rough-hew them how they will. One might have wished for a more contextualized narrative; as it happens, only the book's main protagonist emerges as a personality in his own right. There are references in passing to social and political theorists that Bose read (Friedrich Nietzsche, Henri Bergson, Sigmund Freud, Oswald Spengler, V. I. Lenin, Leon Trotsky, Alexander Herzen, Henry David Thoreau). These references could have been developed to provide an intellectual history of the individual whom the author presents as a more appealing alternative for the leadership of the Indian nationalist movement than either Gandhi—too prone to mysticism and irrationality—or Nehru—too disconnected from the spirituality of his countrymen.

A large part of the book is devoted to Bose's life as an exile in Europe in the mid-1930s, and again as a voluntary émigré during World War II. A question that is never addressed head-on is to what extent Bose was an enthusiast of European fascist ideas. The fact that he considered himself a socialist, often expressed his displeasure or disagreement with aspects of the Italian or German dictatorships or with Japanese imperialism, and had Jewish friends in Germany and Austria, or that he wrote in his autobiography of the need for a “synthesis” between socialism and fascism, is not a substitute for a more nuanced intellectual history that engages seriously with what these ideologies were. The book remains at the level of the encounters of leaders: Bose “was not the first prominent Indian visitor” to encounter Benito Mussolini and be impressed by him (p. 94). His meeting with Adolf Hitler could be compared to Franklin D. Roosevelt’s meeting with Joseph Stalin, where Roosevelt said he was glad to see the latter although he was in fact “not pleased to meet a totalitarian dictator who had presided over campaigns of mass murder” (p. 221). The comparison of Stalin and Hitler in this context is unfortunate and ill-judged.

Once World War II enters the narrative, biography gives way to adventure story (the great escape from India via Afghanistan and the Soviet Union to Germany in 1941) and then, with a pause for breath for the period of waiting in Germany, to military history, with its accounts of the submarine voyage to Japan, to the Indian National Army and its campaigns and marches. Military failures or almost-successes are contrasted with successes in integrating Hindus and Muslims into an idea of Indian nationhood that was in the process of being made irrevocably impossible in India at the time. Bose’s death, the trials in India of the Indian National Army personnel, and their unexpected contribution after the death of their leader to mass mobilization and agitation against British rule, are movingly told. The author manages, however, to narrate the passing of a King Arthur and at the same time to deflate the legend of a once and future king. He documents Bose’s death in a plane crash in Taipei on August 18, 1945, recording nonetheless a number of hopeful Netaji sightings in the period after his death by persons imagining the leader awaiting an opportune moment to lead his nation once again. Or perhaps he debunks only the legend of a physical return, for he does choose to speak of a “legacy” of Subhas Bose for the Indian nation to uphold or recover.

BENJAMIN ZACHARIAH
University of Sheffield

OCEANIA AND PACIFIC ISLANDS

NICHOLAS THOMAS. Islanders: The Pacific in the Age of Empire. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2010. Pp. x, 336. $35.00.

Nicholas Thomas has done it again: written a tour de force that increases what we know of Pacific peoples and their worlds. Intentionally inverting the conventional point of departure that sees Pacific Islanders as naïve, inert casualties of European imperial designs, Thomas shows that a far more accurate perspective takes seriously their adroit abilities to adapt to unprecedented events and to utilize Europeans for designs of their own. Thomas never defends European violence or suggests that the horrific moments of European colonial ventures in the Pacific were anything but inexcusable. What he does do is make the case that Pacific Islanders had a resilience—due, in part, to autochthonous understandings about political intrigue, conquest, warfare, power, and, yes, empire—that made them victimized without being victims in any clichéd way.

Unlike his earlier In Oceania: Visions, Artifacts, Histories (1997), here Thomas employs something of a punctiliar approach that uses a multitude of small, seemingly isolated historical moments to create a larger overall image of events, movements, and transitions in the Pacific from roughly 1790 to 1890. Many of the people in this history appear only for a page or two, and one is struck less by the dearth of information about these individuals than by the fact that so many lives are interwoven into the vast narrative that is this book.

The book is divided into two parts, although the transition from the end of the first to the beginning of the second is hardly noticeable. The first part, “The Bible and the Gun,” is subtitled “Contact, Commerce, Conversion,” and this alliterative description captures the essence of the first 160 pages. Part two, “The Tribe and the Army,” is given elaboration as “Labour, Land, Sovereignty,” which is as good as any other triad of words to describe the second half of the book. Each part consists of five chapters, the titles of which are snippets of quotations from individuals—European and Islander—whose tales are told within, many of which whet one’s interest and anticipation: “If King Georgy would send him a vessel”; “The smell of burning flesh is not nice”; and “Man-o’-war all same old woman!”

Thomas notes that the book is “about the ways Islanders and Europeans came to deal with each other, and put up with each other, in the kind of world we call imperial” (p. 25) with the intention of making the twin points that the “lives of the peoples of Oceania were already complex, unstable and political, before the arrival of Europeans” (p. 12), and that “[f]or as long as there had been Islanders in the Pacific, they had travelled and traded extensively. They had regularly taken great risks to seek out new lands. They had long had dealings with people who were more or less unlike themselves” (p. 13). The effort is successful in that Thomas shows over and over again, in prose that is smooth and engaging, the ways in which Pacific Island people exploited and sometimes augmented the (often violent) moments foisted upon them.

The more-than-expected number of typographical errors does little to detract from the book. What does detract, however, is the shortage of maps. It seems unlikely that most readers will have a thoroughgoing knowledge of the geography of every Pacific archipelago and atoll, and many of the accounts require detailed knowledge of locations of bays, islets, and terrain in order to gain maximum understanding. A reviewer is required to have an atlas and/or search engine close at hand; an everyday reader is unlikely to be inclined to do so, and as a result, the full potential of the book can go untapped.

Finally, the reader may wonder why, in his treatment of western Oceania in the latter parts of the book, Thomas gives the impression of approaching and then walking away from the roots of topics such as so-called “cargo cults” and the revived interest in kastam. He does, however, seem to promise “a succeeding book” (p. 25) that deals more narrowly with Melanesia, which will almost certainly address these, and other, phenomena. Those interested in Pacific history can only hope that that book appears sooner rather than later.

In conclusion, Thomas says about Robert Louis Stevenson’s A Footnote in History (1892) that Stevenson’s book “remains important as an expression that Islanders could be approached . . . because Europeans and Islanders were at least recognized as inhabitants of the same world and the same time, caught up in events that gained momentum and unraveled, that changed lives and ended them, on both sides” (pp. 283–284). I cannot speculate about whether, or to what degree, Thomas views himself and this book in the same light, but I cannot think of a more apt summation.

ALEXANDER H. BOLYANATZ
College of DuPage

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

DAVID MASSELL. Quebec Hydropolitics: The Peribonka Concessions of the Second World War. (Studies on the History of Quebec, number 24.) Ithaca, N.Y.: McGill-Queen’s University Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 242. Cloth $95.00, paper $32.95.

Hydroelectricity, it seems, has powered much of twentieth-century Quebec history. Today the government-owned Hydro Quebec is the largest producer of hydroelectricity in the world; the main developer of hydropower in the region of eastern Quebec under consideration, the Aluminum Company of Canada (now Rio Tinto Alcan), is the world’s largest producer of aluminum. But the story is more than one of scale. “Hydropolitics” contributes to many of the narratives that combine to explain the province’s history. David Massell effectively explores the intersection of many of them. He focuses on opposite extremes: on one hand, the elite corporate and state actors and, on the other, those whose lives were most severely affected, the indigenous Innu (or Montagnais). Each was almost entirely ignorant of the other, a fact that only adds to the drama and significance of this story.

Massell examines the Saguenay River and North Shore watersheds north of Quebec City, a region—in the eyes of business and government—of extraordinary potential for power generation. Already in the 1920s, in a move symbolic of the Quebec Liberal government’s subservience to American business, James Duke was allowed to convert Lac Saint-Jean into a massive reservoir, flooding farmlands without notice or compensation. But it was the inexhaustible wartime demand for aluminum, the reduction of which requires vast amounts of power, that would transform a much broader landscape. Overnight, Canada, and particularly the Saguenay, became America’s prime source of aluminum ingot. This required the transformation of the watershed as a whole as new dams were built, particularly along the Peribonka River, to create large reservoirs to ensure a steady and predictable supply of water for the new and expanded hydroelectric facilities. As well, it meant the rapid expansion in the size and power of Alcan, the Aluminum Company of Canada.

All of this touched a number of nerves. As elsewhere in North America, the monopolization and control of natural resources by large corporations raised objections and posed state action. The whole issue was particularly explosive in Quebec because these Anglo-Canadian and U.S. businesses sparked deeply rooted nationalist sentiments. In the early 1940s, the Quebec government of Adélard Godbout, generally seen as a reformist interregnum bracketed by the authoritarian and pro-business governments of Maurice Duplessis, had the difficult task of placating nationalist sentiment while seeking, at the same time, to respond to the demands of both Alcan and the war effort. Massell significantly revises our understanding of these governments, arguing that the distinctions between them were fewer than initially thought and that throughout state bureaucrats did their best to defend what they saw as the province’s long-term interests, even in the context of wartime emergency. Nonetheless, governments and bureaucrats were materially and ideologically constrained, and there was little self-reflection about the development model that Alcan represented.

This is an important study in wartime economic governance. As Massell explains, “the war didn’t simply accelerate resource development in this case; it also checked its pace and changed its nature” (p. 171). While state managers were often faced with difficult and even unpalatable options, Massell reveals the dynamics of the relationship between business and the state, and he demonstrates that there were real options on the table for governments. Governments both used, and were constrained by, the growing economic nationalism of Quebecois citizens, although Massell does not fully explore this dynamic. He argues that provincial governments were increasingly responsive to the demands of the region’s non-aboriginal population because they could vote, but there is clearly more to it than that. Support of the agrarian mission of the Quebecois, particularly in the region of agricultural colonization such as the Saguenay, spoke to an older nationalism that politicians ignored at their peril.

By contrast, aboriginal interests could be ignored. To governments, the seemingly vast areas affected by hydro development were only of concern because of the corporate timber rights that would be sacrificed by flooding. But disrupting the environment had dire consequences for the Innu hunter-trappers who could no longer depend on this land for their lives and livelihoods.

All of this is essential to understanding modern Quebec. Hydroelectric development encouraged the flowering of neo-nationalism in Quebec, and the continuing conflict with aboriginal peoples spurred their own sense of identity. Although huge challenges remain, the processes described by Massell underscore the novelty and significance of the “nation to nation” agreement with the James Bay Cree as preliminary to expanded hydro development in northern Quebec in 2002.

JAMES NAYLOR
Brandon University

CHRISTOPHER H. HAMNER. Enduring Battle: American Soldiers in Three Wars, 1776–1945. (Modern War Studies.) Lawrence: University Press of Kansas. 2011. Pp. xi, 281. $29.95.

“Everything in life is overrated except death,” declared a twenty-one-year-old soldier during the invasion of Iraq in 2003. The surprising thing is not that a young, fit man might balk at the ugliness of a battlefield death, but that any person might imagine that it could be otherwise. War is a monstrosity: it is the most destructive activity known to humanity. Carl von Clausewitz in Vom Kriege (On War, 1832) made the point strongly, observing that when approaching the field of battle, “life begins to seem more serious than the young man had imagined. Suddenly someone you know is wounded; then a shell falls among the staff. You notice that some of the officers act a little oddly; you yourself are not as steady and collected as you were . . . The air is filled with hissing bullets that sound like a sharp crack if they pass close to one’s head. For a final shock, the sight of men being killed and mutilated moves our pounding hearts to awe and pity.” On the field of battle, there is no escaping pain, sorrow, grief.

So how does it happen that young men and women can be persuaded to step into the fray? What motivates these individuals? Has their motivation changed over the centuries? Christopher H. Hamner sets out to answer these questions in the context of three wars in which American soldiers fought: the American War of Independence, the Civil War, and World War II. The omission of World War I is strange and never justified. Hamner starts by setting up a number of “straw men.” It is simply not the case that historians employ a “one size fits all” explanation for combat motivation. The value of group cohesion has been one important explanation, but it has many critics. Hamner is also certainly not the first to point out that ideological motivations work particularly well prior to recruitment and in training, but have a tendency to crumble under fire. And any historian worthy of the title will draw attention to the significant differences between armies in the eighteenth and mid-twentieth centuries.

Nevertheless, Hamner does make some worthwhile and convincing arguments. The strength of his book lies in the careful distinctions Hamner draws between three very different military conflicts. He draws particular attention to the way that battlefield experiences became progressively more isolated, forcing individual combatants to forge much more independent ways of reassuring themselves and remaining combat effective. The chapter on military training reveals massive shifts in the way soldiers were mentally and physically prepared for the rigors not only of combat but also of those long and often tedious periods behind the lines, when morale might be especially fragile. The management of fear and other emotions became increasingly important in training, giving rise to the military psychologist. Crucially, by World War II soldiers were being taught to think of their environment as “controllable”: they made choices and were responsible for the consequences of those choices. Mateship or comradeship had little influence in making the best choices. Indeed, it could hamper effective military action. Conspicuous displays of heroism took second place to an emphasis on technical competence. Paradoxically, Hamner notes that this meant that soldiers of later armies were more likely to be forgiven slight “lapses in stoic façade.” Emotional bonds became less important in combat motivation than a shared sense of controllability.

As Clausewitz reminds us, war “is no pastime; it is no mere joy in daring and winning, no place for irresponsible enthusiasts. It is a serious means to a serious end.” Hamner successfully illustrates the dramatic influence that technology and battlefield environment made to ensuring a desired end. His book will be read not only by other historians but also by military strategists seeking to wage war more effectively. It is a pity, therefore, that he does not address the other problem related to war: how to motivate people (including politicians) to avoid it.

JOANNA BOURKE
Birkbeck College, University of London

CHRISTINE STANSELL. The Feminist Promise: 1792 to the Present. New York: Modern Library. 2010. Pp. xix, 503. $35.00.

This sweeping synthesis of feminist ideas and politics in the United States from the American Revolution to the War on Terror simultaneously illuminates and provokes. Christine Stansell skillfully weaves a progress narrative: women’s rights have advanced significantly, despite persistent inequalities among women, between women and men, and across nations. The book moves through eighteenth-century democratic revolutions; nineteenth-century moral reform, abolitionism, temperance, and suffrage; twentieth-century New Women, legal recognition, and consciousness-raising; and the possibility of reproductive rights, sexual freedom, and bodily control. Through discussions of disapproving antebellum ministers, anti-suffragists, and opponents of the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA), Stansell reinforces the emerging scholarly consensus that feminism developed in relation to anti-feminism. She historicizes essentialism, racism, and xenophobia but curiously skips women’s complicity with empire. Reflecting the transnational turn, she shows the interplay of feminism in the United States, Britain, and France and concludes with a perceptive analysis of a global feminism driven by non-governmental organizations that became the stage for the political engagement of liberal feminists when the Reagan ascendancy blocked domestic influence.

In a move that some will find annoying, Stansell casts the history of feminism into a family drama in which the daughters rebelled against the mothers, though ostensibly fighting the power of the fathers, and were constantly disappointed by the brothers, who failed to reciprocate their loyalty in the anti-slavery crusade or subjected them to sexist oppression in the New Left. Black women prove the exception as they closed ranks with their men to defend a beleaguered community. The politics of the mothers sought to improve the lives of women and children without challenging the domestic norm, sexual respectability, or gender conventions; that of the daughters, where Stansell's sympathies lie, defiantly insisted on "dramatic rearrangements in marriage, motherhood, sex, and male psychology" so that women could "act in the world exactly as men do" (p. xvi). When the activism of mothers and daughters ran parallel, as with the Nineteenth Amendment and the legalization of abortion, women gained major results. Sometimes the mothers paved the way for the daughters, as with the legislative and legal victories of the 1960s and early 1970s. Stansell insists that these divisions are not strictly generational, but except where historical actors deployed kinship metaphors, this narrative device distorts: the same woman, like Jane Addams, could be both a rebellious daughter and a political mother.

Through analysis of texts, Stansell generates a deep, but limited, feminist genealogy. Present are not only standard Euro-Western shapers of feminist thought but also black feminists. However, Stansell barely mentions other women of color. Wage earners and lesbians also rarely appear, and labor feminism gets short shrift. So do feminist organizing among clerical and other pink-collar workers and the grass-roots efforts of the welfare rights movement. New York City and Washington, D.C., tend to dominate the later twentieth-century narrative. Most disappointing, the book skips over the 1930s, the New Deal, and World War II (except for Rosie the Riveter). It thus neglects Left feminism among white, Asian, Latina, and, especially, black women in the Communist Party. Stansell ignores their shaping of the concepts of the double day, triple oppression, and intersectional identity. Through omission, she replicates earlier literature that claims Eleanor Roosevelt and other New Deal women were not real feminists because they opposed the ERA.

But it is too easy to conclude that this story merely reinforces what Chicana feminist theorist Chela Sandoval has named "hegemonic feminism," the conflating of white, middle- and professional-class women with the universal so that other women enter the story only when their history intersects with that norm, rather than on their own terms. Stansell's study offers an original take on the standard trajectory. She rejects both separatist (women apart from men) and maternalist (arguments for social change on the basis of motherhood) visions of feminism. Instead she champions the heterosexual union of women and men struggling together for "economic parity, religious tolerance, human rights, sexual expression, bodily ease and health, education, and the dignity of human attachments" (p. 395). She reserves particular scorn for rescuers, associated with radical feminists who demonize men and cast women as victims. She finds wanting temperance matrons who would save wives from drunkard husbands, anti-prostitution crusaders who would remove migrants from sex traffickers, and violence-against-women activists who reduce global "crimes against women" to sexual assault—all of whom ignore larger political, economic, and social contexts. Moreover, Stansell is highly critical of sisterhood declarations that more privileged U.S. women have deployed against male power, which have obscured their relative advantage and involvement in maintaining subordination.

Stansell passionately argues for the intertwined fate of feminism and liberal democracy. Limits aside, this survey is as bold as the women it admires, who struggled to realize the democratic promise of political equality, human dignity, economic fairness, and self-determination.

EILEEN BORIS
University of California,
Santa Barbara

DANIEL K. RICHTER. Before the Revolution: America's Ancient Pasts. Cambridge: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 502. $35.00.

A well-crafted scholarly synthesis is worth its weight in gold. It introduces undergraduates and non-academics to a vibrant field of study, helps graduate students prepare for exams, allows harried instructors to craft up-to-date lectures, and gives specialists a new way to conceptualize their field. Daniel K. Richter's book succeeds on all of these counts. Although its interpretive framework is not an unalloyed success, its lively narrative and astounding range of learning make it an exceedingly valuable volume.

Richter argues that colonial North American history can be understood as the accumulation of "six sequential cultural layers" laid down by groups he calls progenitors, conquistadores, traders, planters, imperialists, and Atlanteans (p. 4). The progenitors were the residents of "medieval" North America and Western Europe who established enduring patterns of trade, religion, and power. On both sides of the Atlantic after roughly 900 C.E. "strikingly parallel agricultural revolutions produced strikingly different civilizational forms" (p. 4). These developments shaped the actions of the conquistadores, the sixteenth-century Protestant and Catholic adventurers who sought glory and riches in the New World. The encounter between the conquistadores and American Indians paved the way for two very different groups of Europeans in the seventeenth century: traders, who built on Native customs of exchange and alliance, and planters, who created agricultural colonies, many of which depended on the unfree labor of indentured servants and, later, Native and African slaves. From approximately 1660 to the middle of the eighteenth century, the imperialists sought to bring these fractious and far-flung colonies under greater metropolitan control. By their own standards they achieved a measure of success in the first half of the eighteenth century, fostering international trade that enriched the European metropolises even as that commerce increasingly relied on the immiseration of a bound African workforce. Finally, the Atlanteans were the residents of eighteenth-century North America who created a hybrid culture from the previous layers of American Indians, Europeans, and Africans. The connections among these groups were, according to Richter, forged primarily out of the eighteenth-century consumer revolution.

The section on the progenitors is the most innovative. Here Richter includes a chapter on medieval North America, focusing on Chaco Canyon and Cahokia, and one on medieval Western Europe. The comparisons and contrasts between North America and Europe are fascinating. Always attentive to differences, Richter also shows how the great cathedrals of Chartres and Salisbury were physical embodiments of spiritual power in a way not unlike Chaco Canyon's ceremonial centers. This point is reinforced in one of the three beautifully produced "photo essays" between sections, which include a total of eighty-eight illustrations. While the book's subsequent sections will be less surprising to specialists, they still make for compelling reading. Overall, Richter successfully sustains his argument about the six layers of colonial American history and the impact of each on subsequent ones.

But Richter's implicit analytical framework, a hybrid of new and old perspectives, is somewhat problematic. The book owes a great deal to recent scholarship on the Atlantic world, with its emphasis on the interplay among the peoples and products of Europe, Africa, and the Americas. Yet as its title suggests, the book is also yoked to an earlier paradigm of colonial America as the history of the proto-United States. The book starts off broadly, covering material from present-day New Mexico and France and many points in between, but gradually narrows to focus on what would become the first thirteen states of the Union. The benefit of this approach is narrative coherence: the story moves confidently toward the Seven Years' War and the imperial crisis that created the United States. But there are tradeoffs. Richter downplays the Caribbean; this might make sense looking backward from today's United States, but it is hard to justify when thinking about early modern European empires. In part because the Caribbean is slighted, slavery is not central to Richter's analysis and is instead relegated to a ten-page section in a chapter on free and unfree labor (pp. 346–355). More surprisingly, the center of the continent makes no appearance after the section on progenitors, aside from a discussion of the Pueblo Revolt. As an expert on Native North America, Richter knows that some of the field's most exciting recent books have featured the Native peoples of the Great Plains and eastern Rocky Mountains—Comanches, Utes, Shoshones, Osages, Karankawas—as powerful actors in the colonial period and beyond. But Richter is unable to work those histories into a story of the coming of the American Revolution.

Nonetheless, Richter has refined decades of scholarship into a scintillating synthesis. Readers of all levels will profit from his effort to bring order to an ever-expanding field.

ERIK R. SEEMAN

State University of New York at Buffalo

KEITH THOR CARLSON. The Power of Place, the Problem of Time: Aboriginal Identity and Historical Consciousness in the Cauldron of Colonialism. Buffalo, N.Y.: University of Toronto Press. 2010. Pp. xix, 375. $32.95.

A decade ago I wrote an essay for Blackwell's A Companion to American Indian History (2002) entitled "Wanted: More Histories of Indian Identity." I could not have wished for a response more exemplary than this history of the lower Fraser River watershed's indigenous people, now commonly known as Stó:lō. Keith Thor Carlson's sophisticated account of shifting collective Aboriginal identities not only shows that such studies can be edifying and interesting; it shows why they are essential for understanding Indian tribes or First Nations.

Carlson addresses questions he encountered during a decade of living and working as a historian among the Stó:lō. He returned to graduate school intent on explaining controversies and inconsistencies that have attended the application of the Stó:lō name to various populations and organizations. He aimed to produce scholarship meaningful for Aboriginal readers while "retaining a critical analytical gaze" (p. 10). Because he pursued this goal judiciously and followed a chief's advice to write what Stó:lōs need rather than want to hear, readers of many sorts will find the result of Carlson's labors meaningful. They will get a "fresh look at the way various factors influencing identity relate to each other" (p. 31).

The book describes a precolonial world of diverse autonomous communities with fluid memberships and abundant opportunity for "supratribal identification." Intercommunity relations ensured access to dispersed food resources. Together with a shared understanding of the spirit world, they also promoted a sense of regional collective identity (p. 68). But some group configurations changed even before European colonization due to catastrophes such as floods and epidemics. Later, indigenous narratives about those wrenching events functioned as license for comparable changes necessitated by colonization. A chapter about five specific postcolonization community migrations, amalgamations, and fissions illustrates this effectively.

Succeeding chapters examine consequences of colonial authorities' efforts to curtail aboriginal mobility and impose multiple "tribal" identities based on place.

Small community reserves, band membership lists, and the potlatch ban tended to isolate local groups and frustrate accustomed ways of fostering collective Stó:lō social identity. Meanwhile, however, off-reserve employment brought people of different bands together, and officials' failure to uphold colonial law prompted angry band leaders to take joint political action. By 1906, the date at which Carlson ends the account rather abruptly, Stó:lō identity was assuming its modern character: a principally political alliance of bands whose organizational alignments shift as "proponents of various expressions of . . . collective identity" advance "sometimes competing objectives" (p. 25).

Readers will appreciate the book's many maps and creative diagrams but may find the surprisingly numerous typographical errors distracting.

Stó:lō proximity to large urban centers makes them significant in British Columbia and Pacific Northwest history. But this study of their internal and external relations deserves attention well beyond that region. Like the Stó:lō themselves, it makes sense of group identities by telling tales of change in those identities. Historians in many fields can learn from it how to show collective identities "not only as situationally created through relationships, but also as emerging from unexpected historical events" (p. 28).

ALEXANDRA HARMON
University of Washington

GAIL D. MACLEITCH. Imperial Entanglements: Iroquois Change and Persistence on the Frontiers of Empire. (Early American Studies.) Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2011. Pp. x, 330. $45.00.

Gail D. MacLeitch attempts to put Iroquois history in the quarter century before the American Revolution into sharper focus. She insists that her work "reconceptualizes the Iroquois experience in economic and cultural terms and highlights the Seven Years' War (1756–1763) as a crucial period" (p. 3). The book describes the impact of a rising mercantile British Empire fixated on obtaining commodities, markets, and territories that hastened Iroquois incorporation into a market economy. While the English demanded Indian labor, land, and resources, Iroquois men and women found ways to adapt to these changes in imaginative ways. The author appears surprised by the adaptability of the Iroquois to change and to the stream of events, a process long described by anthropologists Anthony F. C. Wallace and William N. Fenton.

MacLeitch is best when she describes Indian-white relations in the Mohawk Valley. Her conclusions conform to those presented in excellent fashion by David L. Preston in The Texture of Contact: European and Indian Settler Communities on the Frontiers of Iroquoia, 1667–1783 (2009). The Mohawks there had strong ties of family, trade, military alliance, and religion with their white neighbors in the valley, including Dutch, English, Palatine German, and Scots-Irish settlers prior to and during the Seven Years' War. After this conflict, things deteriorated as a result of rapid white settlement, land sales, and the consequences of the Treaty of Fort Stanwix (1768). The Mohawks adapted by acquiring livestock, becoming day laborers, selling crops to their white neighbors, and serving the British military as workmen, guides, and interpreters at forts. Although they adjusted to a cash economy, the Mohawks at the same time maintained certain traditions, including requesting and receiving wampum as payment for goods and services. Strangely, MacLeitch uses a 1794 document to evaluate the Iroquois economy of the early and mid-1770s. Despite significant archaeological evidence to confirm class distinctions, the author seems surprised about economic disparities in native societies.

Much of MacLeitch's work is not new scholarship. The only new information is in a well-written chapter on English-Iroquoian perceptions of gender in both cultures. Yet, even in this area, the author appears unfamiliar with the rich anthropological literature on Iroquoian women, which she claims is "sparse" (p. 253, n. 15). Moreover, she does not cite Kees-Jan Waterman's impressive edited work "To Do Justice to Him and Myself": Evert Wendell's Account Book of the Fur Trade with Indians in Albany, New York, 1695–1726 (2008), which clearly shows that Iroquois women, including the distant Senecas, adapted to the new global economy much earlier than the Seven Years' War and successfully navigated the commercial world of Albany from at least the 1690s onward.

MacLeitch's work is too concentrated on the Mohawk Valley and reveals a lack of understanding of the people and geography of Seneca Country. The Seneca were the most populous of the Six Nations. She, as too many contemporary historians but not most anthropologists, groups all of the Six Nations as one unified cultural-political entity before the Seven Years' War. Unlike most other Iroquois—the Cayugas being the other exception—the Senecas, long before the Seven Years' War, looked westward to the Ohio Country as well as eastward toward Onondaga. Moreover, not all of the member nations of the Iroquois League united together against all opponents in the Beaver Wars, although the Senecas fought in more of these conflicts than any of the other nations. Linguistically, Seneca is far different from Mohawk and Oneida. These distinctions did not arise in the Seven Years' War. By 1763, the Senecas had a multicultural identity, with refugee nations and descendants of white captives living among them in their territory.

Unfortunately, there are other problems with this work. Map one, labeled "Iroquoia ca. 1720" (p. 30), fails to show Senecas at and beyond Lake Erie, even though they had already defeated the Wenro, Neutral, Huron, and Erie Indians and extended their territory between 1638 and 1680. Map five, labeled "The Iroquois in British North America, ca. 1770" (p. 176), indicates neither the existence of Seneca villages along the Genesee and Allegheny Rivers nor the presence of numerous Native refugee populations in Iroquoia. Even though MacLeitch makes use of the Sir William Johnson Papers and other standard primary materials on the history of colonial New York, she is not selective enough in using secondary sources. Her treatment never adequately addresses the Senecas' strained relations with Johnson, and these Indians' key role in Pontiac's War is hastily described. We learn little about Old Smoke and nothing about Kiashuta (Guyashuta), key figures in the events of the period between 1755 and 1776. One cannot simply separate economic and cultural forces from discussions of leadership.

LAURENCE M. HAUPTMAN
State University of New York,
New Paltz

PHIL BELLFY. Three Fires Unity: The Anishnaabeg of the Lake Huron Borderlands. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press. 2011. Pp. xxxvii, 203. $35.00.

Phil Bellfy lightly revised his doctoral dissertation Division and Unity, Dispersal and Permanence: The Anishnaabeg of the Lake Huron Borderlands (1995) for publication as this book, which addresses indigenous peoples of the Lake Huron region from contact to the present. As most texts concerning the Anishinaabeg focus on experiences in one region or another of the Lake Superior borderland, the attempt to add the Lake Huron borderland to this body of literature makes a crucial contribution to the field. Bellfy sets out "to examine the cultural, social, and political aspects of the Anishinaabeg who have lived in, and continue to live in, these Lake Huron borderlands in order to determine how the imposition of the Canada-US international border running through their homeland affected them and continues to do so today" (p. xvi). He takes pains to demonstrate that for the Anishinaabeg the U.S.-Canadian border is an arbitrary division cutting through their ancestral lands; they freely crossed and recrossed it at different points for different reasons. Moreover, chiefs from both sides of this arbitrary line regularly attended treaty meetings with the United States and Canada. Bellfy also examines the process of drawing the border, as it was not completely defined for all of the islands in Lake Huron until late in the nineteenth century, making issues of land cession and occupation very interesting and illustrative for borderlands scholars.

Unfortunately, as Bellfy was not trained as a historian, historical methodologies are underutilized in this work. In particular, the text is not written from the premise that culture informs actions. Since the book devotes only a page and a half to the ethnography of the Anishinaabeg, the cultural, social, and political aspects historically integral to understanding Anishinaabeg decisions and actions are not found in this work. Native people are not represented as if they have strong political agency (except in the contemporary epilogue), but rather as a two-dimensional entity buffeted about by French, British, Canadian, and American policies. No attempt is made to define the social and political life of the people in this region independent from Euro-American actions, as Bellfy uncritically accepts the assertions of mid-twentieth-century scholars that people of this region had little organization and based everything on "individual liberty" (p. 15). Historical analysis of the primary documents does not support this argument, and attention to more of the scholarship published since 1995 by U.S. and Canadian scholars such as Michael Angel, Heidi Bohaker, Jennifer S. H. Brown, Rebecca Kugel, David Andrew Nichols, Laura Peers, Daniel K. Richter, Susan Sleeper-Smith, Bruce White, and Michael Witgen, among others, could have significantly improved the author's attention to these issues related to his central thesis.

In addition to these general concerns, there are a few specific problems with this text. The Three Fires Confederacy referenced in the title is not mentioned until the conclusion and is never clearly defined. As a result, the text builds no argument concerning the continuity or disruption of any unity this confederation may have created during the historical period covered by the book. The author also assumes that individuals signing treaties for specific land cessions lived in those locations at the time of the treaty, whereas most scholarship agrees that treaty gatherings brought together leaders from across the region, including those who did not occupy the lands under discussion. As a result, his assertion that chiefs frequently moved on the basis of where they signed treaties must be taken with a grain of salt. There is no question that chiefs and peoples did move during periods of displacement, such as Indian removal, and at times even varied residence among branches of the extended family based on a variety of factors, but treaty records are not indicators of chiefly residence in a specific location. Rather they indicate the interest of regional leaders in what was perceived as their national territory regardless of where Euro-Americans drew the U.S.-Canadian border, and their collective decision making concerning territorial issues.

Despite these weaknesses, the book is still of some help to scholars of borderlands and of Great Lakes Indian history due to its numerous detailed maps and the tables it includes of both U.S. and Canadian treaties in the region. Bellfy also has analyzed the signatures on these treaties linguistically to create tables identifying which treaties each chief signed despite the lack of standardized spellings for the Anishinaabeg names. However, ignoring the practice of passing on chiefly names within hereditary lineages, Bellfy has omitted the names of chiefs "unlikely to have even been alive at the time in question" (p. 117). The conclusion, which summarizes indigenous border protests in the region over the past thirty years, may also be of use for undergraduate students. Otherwise, this text has little to offer U.S., Canadian, borderlands, or Anishinaabeg historians.

CARY MILLER
University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee

ANTON TREUER. The Assassination of Hole in the Day. St. Paul, Minn.: Borealis Books. 2011. Pp. xix, 295. $25.95.

The discourse on indigenous leadership traditions is a significant trend in American Indian studies today. Moreover, insofar as leadership is integral to reinstating traditional governance practices, both leadership and governance can be understood in the context of modern indigenous history, particularly with regard to the herculean endeavor that tribes made adjusting to a world radically different from the one in which their pre-reservation ancestors lived. Symptomatic of these changes are the leaders or “chiefs” that emerged from the conflict with American imperialism. Hole in the Day the Younger (Bagone-giizhig) was one such leader; as controversial as he was charismatic, he forged a new notion of indigenous leadership in the fires of treaty-making and warfare.

Anton Treuer’s book makes a valuable contribution to the understanding of a much-maligned leader. Too often, Hole in the Day has been dismissed as a “treaty chief” and as an aberration in an era when Indian agents and traders were conniving for Indian land, using bribes and alcohol to get their way. Because of his status as a transitional figure—who witnessed the Ojibwe go from independent sovereign nations with which the Americans drafted a variety of treaties to casualties of westward expansionism and graft—many have judged Hole in the Day as being responsible, at least in part, for hastening the decline of the Ojibwe into reservation wards, as exemplified by their removal to White Earth. Treuer portrays Hole in the Day with all his weaknesses and insecurities on display, but he appreciates the historic leader’s skills as a tribal politician, a diplomat, and an orator. Indeed, as a reflection of the times in which he lived, Hole in the Day was an immensely complicated figure: “Though not a hereditary chief, he was a traditional leader with enormous, undeniable power. He used that power on behalf of his people, but he also used it for personal gain. While much is known about Bagone-giizhig, interpreting that knowledge is a daunting task. He espoused and practiced many conflicting beliefs. He lived in two worlds, yet he was a complete and functioning individual” (p. 181).

It is debatable whether or not any Indians ever “lived in two worlds.” By and large, they remained in the isolated world of the reservation, while periodically venturing into American mainstream society, be it for work, school, or politics. American Indians have long maintained a tenuous relationship with American society; useful as symbols of a “new world,” they have also been seen as a “problem” to be solved through modernization and assimilation. Living in two worlds implies a balance between white and Indian that is probably more fantastic than realistic. Having said this, Hole in the Day was the kind of leader whom Ojibwe elders would condemn for his blatant disregard for local customs. Yet in the aftermath of his assassination, his actions may also be regarded as a product of necessity. In other words, because the Americans were bloated with their own power and self-importance, indigenous communities like the Ojibwe needed an equally impressive leader who was not intimidated by American grandiosity.

Treuer does a commendable job organizing his discourse around the ideas and values that are meaningful to the Ojibwe community while being accessible to the general reader who may not be as well acquainted with Ojibwe culture and history. More specifically, Treuer contextualizes Hole in the Day’s innovations as a leader within the traditional leadership practices of pre-reservation Ojibwe, providing an enlightening exposition on key Ojibwe words regarding chiefs and their relationships with their communities. Treuer then turns his attention to the elder Hole in the Day (both father and son bore the same name) and the precedent he set for assuming leadership over the entire Mississippi Ojibwe community, as opposed to just a single village as was customary. Equally important is the historical analysis of Ojibwe-Dakota relations, which were far more nuanced and dramatic than what is typically signified by the phrase “traditional rivals.” While never achieving an alliance against white settlers (a possibility that was discussed over several years), as Treuer observes, the Ojibwe and Dakota often ceased hostilities on their own terms and even ostensibly comprehended as their common concern the problem of land cessions and the number of American immigrants moving into their territory. Hole in the Day’s story, however, is also about the factionalism that plagued virtually every tribe, including the acrimony that prevented these communities from ever forming a united front and instead allowed them to fall prey to the manipulations of traders and government agents. Ultimately, though, Hole in the Day’s story is the kind of tragedy that occurs when a once powerful and respected (some might say feared) leader surrenders to temptation, turning pride into arrogance. In that sense, Treuer’s book is a lesson upon which Ojibwe and non-Ojibwe alike ought to reflect.

DAVID MARTÍNEZ
Arizona State University,
Tempe

DAVID D. HALL. A Reforming People: Puritanism and the Transformation of Public Life in New England. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 2011. Pp. xvii, 255. $29.95.

Anyone seeking knowledge about New England religious history soon becomes indebted to the wide-ranging scholarship of David D. Hall. Whether one is drawn to American Puritanism through the achievements of the ministry, the Antinomian Crisis, witchcraft, popular religion, or the changing history of church-state relations, Hall has written a book at some point in his career that is essential reading. This study demonstrates anew the qualities that have made his work so distinguished: thorough knowledge of English Puritan backgrounds, meticulous research into New England town records and the history of the book, a wide historical context and a long temporal perspective, careful regard for scholarship both recent and traditional, convincing argumentation, and clear, vigorous prose blessedly free of academic jargon and scholarly pretense.

The book begins with the modest lament that its first title, "Why They Mattered," might have been preferable. I doubt it. Hall is intent on avoiding two opposing traditions that consider the Puritans as hypocritical autocrats pursuing intolerance (Nathaniel Hawthorne) or forerunners of liberty and democracy (George Bancroft). Because both views require anachronisms, Hall pursues an impartial understanding of reformed Protestantism as it adapted to New World conditions during the first generations of settlement (1620–1660). He avoids familiar theological thickets (the Covenant of Grace, Preparationism, "Federal Theology," "Sanctification vs. Justification"), preferring to emphasize long-neglected but vital civic ideals: "consent," "participation," "proportionality," "godly rule," and "equity." What emerges is a portrait of late Jacobean Englishmen reforming not only the Anglican Church via the congregational way but also the very nature of a civic commonwealth. Quite apart from Enlightenment understandings of terms like "Liberty," "Republicanism," or "Democracy," New England's Puritans transferred power from property toward church membership, expanded the "liberties" (rightful powers) of people and deputies against the magistrates, while developing customs of petitioning and hand-written circulars as means of protest and change. Hall's subtitle points toward his conclusion: American Puritans transformed public life by making it more participatory for more citizens, however those changes may now be labeled.

The evasiveness of Puritan social ideals only made those ideals more desired. The term "equity," Hall observes, has not seemed important to historians of seventeenth-century New England. Hall then quotes eleven passages in which the term is crucial, including the Massachusetts Freeman's Oath and writings by William Bradford, John Davenport, and Nathaniel Ward. These passages prompt reflections on exactly what the goal of "equity" might have been. The term was clearly akin to equality, fairness, impartiality, and justice but synonymous with none of them. All men and women deserve equity, but not in equal ways, because all are not equal. "Equity" might momentarily surface in a judicial decision or governor's decree, but it was imbedded in no institution, no procedure. It was elusive and ungraspable but not chimerical, because it had biblical authority (Psalm 72) and must be sought in the spirit of Christian love (Pauline caritas) rather than meritocracy. To Hall, Puritan ideals gathered power not because their proponents were particularly rational, as Perry Miller concluded, but because covenants based upon those ideals so empowered them that "authority and liberty became intertwined" (p. 158).

Hall's admiration for Puritan achievements does not blind him to compromises and human failings. Nonetheless, his historical glass is rather consistently half full, not half empty. A revealing chapter on town land allotments emphasizes the determinative value of "proportionality" and "equity" in modifying property inequalities and curtailing gentry status. One wonders, however, whether Hall's absorbing account of land distributions in Cambridge, where land allotments of a hundred acres or more were given only to church members, was evidence of an equitable proportionality or the rule of the saints? Hall's summary of the ways the churches encouraged participation incurs a similar problem: "The Congregational Way licensed new versions of participation; the men who were members electing a minister and voting on candidates for membership; the deacons collecting gifts for purposes of charity; the elders intervening to rebuke the wayward" (p. 74). Here, to be sure, are acts of election, charity, and social equity, but they were all performed by "the men who were members," by the deacons, and by the elders. Is this "participation," the rule of the saints, or perhaps both? Once more we are returned to the unknowable statistics of church membership. What percentage of the adult townspeople were saints and therefore able to vote in colony-wide elections as well as (after 1647) for local measures and local offices? Does empowerment of a people occur when voting rights reach twenty-five, fifty, or one hundred percent? Accurate, comprehensive voting records do not exist. Nonetheless, in the wake of American cultural denigration of everything the word "Puritan" is supposed to represent, it is bracing to have this book as perhaps the best corrective to date.

JOHN MCWILLIAMS
Middlebury College

CRAIG YIRUSH. Settlers, Liberty, and Empire: The Roots of Early American Political Theory, 1675–1775. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 277. Cloth $90.00, paper $25.99.

The thesis of this book is that residents of British North America for a century prior to independence understood themselves not merely as "colonists," but as "settlers." Craig Yirush believes that "The term 'settler' better captures their ambiguous status in the empire, for while they were subjected to metropolitan control, they were also agents of empire in their own right, appropriating native land and establishing local authority in a quasi-autonomous manner" (p. 4, n. 12). Whatever the particulars of governance in each colony, it is argued, all these new societies were created by persons who believed that they or their forebears had made the perilous voyage to the New World, wrested a livelihood from a strange environment, and beaten back the challenge of hostile native inhabitants, all with negligible help from the British government.

To a Rip Van Winkle like myself, returning to the field after a forty-year absence, certain things stand out. First, John Locke is back, but he is not Carl L. Becker's benign prophet of natural rights. The settler propagandists discussed in the middle chapters of the book (Jeremiah Dummer, John Bulkley, Daniel Dulany, Richard Bland) found in Locke a rationale for the acquisition of private property in a state of nature and the violent dispossession of previous inhabitants. Second, the settler ideology carefully depicted here puts Thomas Jefferson's important A Summary View of the Rights of British America (1774) in a new light. Rather than scrutinizing Jefferson's library of foreign books and the possible influence of this or that mentor, readers are encouraged to understand Jefferson to have recapitulated a well-established narrative. He ornamented it with the claim that the Anglo-Saxons who settled England, like the English who settled North America, left behind "any claim of superiority or dependence asserted over them by that mother country from which they had migrated" (The Papers of Thomas Jefferson, edited by Julian P. Boyd et al., I [1950], p. 122).

Viewing the world from within the ideological tunnel vision of settlers brings with it some serious limitations. Commendably, this book "does not make any claims to comprehensiveness, still less to be constructing an all-encompassing explanatory paradigm for early American political thought" (p. 19). But the indifference of settlers on the ground to the claims and humanity of Native Americans and African American slaves is all too evident in the writings discussed. Yirush "takes seriously the rights of the Native Americans" (p. 18). However, his central protagonist is the frontiersman in whose eyes the Native American was an obstacle to be eliminated. A poignant chapter describes the dispossession of the Mohegan Indians from approximately 20,000 acres in northeastern Connecticut. Various entities in Great Britain from time to time stood up for the rights of the Mohegans as original possessors of the land and valuable allies against the French. Ignoring the rulings of royal officials to this effect, "the towns that had been founded on the Mohegans' land continued to expand, and none of the landholders were ejected" (p. 125). As for slaves, they do not appear in the index or the text. The wagons that carried settlers into the Southwest were often followed by African Americans in chains, but we hear nothing about them.

Finally, the particular interests of persons and communities involved in overseas commerce tend to be neglected. The British government is portrayed by this book as persistently driven by the desire to reap the commercial benefits of empire (e.g., pp. 16, 22, 84–87). Americans, by contrast, are presented as principally concerned with political practices and ideas. Once again using Jefferson's Summary View as an ideological litmus test, Yirush writes that Jefferson's description of the "ill effects" of British "trade regulations paled in comparison" to his condemnation of parliament's course of conduct beginning with the Stamp and Sugar Acts (p. 249). This is not quite accurate. In his Summary View, Jefferson described the Hat Act as "An instance of despotism to which no parallel can be produced in the most arbitrary ages of British history" (Papers, I, pp. 124–125). More consequentially, he asserted that "the exercise of a free trade with all parts of the world [was] possessed by the American colonists as of natural right" (Papers, I, p. 123). When, two years later, the Second Continental Congress acted on this proposition by opening American ports to the world, it was a de facto declaration of independence.

The root system of the Liberty Tree extended more widely and deeply than the shared ideas of the colonists as settlers within an empire. By the 1760s they wanted to manage their entire economy for themselves.

STAUGHTON LYNDE
Independent Scholar

MICHAL JAN ROZBICKI. Culture and Liberty in the Age of the American Revolution. (Jeffersonian America.) Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press. 2011. Pp. x, 288. $35.00.

Modern Americans hold the founding fathers to the wrong standards. As a result, both those who celebrate them as heralding a new epoch of liberty and those who condemn them for denying liberty to so many have missed the point. Michal Jan Rozbicki's extended essay argues that by imposing a modern understanding of freedom on the founders, we have misconstrued the revolutionary generation's achievements, while consigning historians to increasingly fruitless debates about liberty's triumph or betrayal.

Rozbicki argues that eighteenth-century definitions of liberty presumed inequality. Liberty and its privileges belonged to specific groups of people in particular ways rather than being the universal property of all people. The ability to exercise liberty—to vote, to hold office, to be protected from arbitrary arrest—distinguished one class of men from another. People grouped at the top of society had the most liberty, people grouped closer to the bottom less, little, or none.

Scholars of the Enlightenment may parse Rozbicki's erudition, but what matters in the American context is that these assumptions about liberty structured the goals of those who challenged British authority and then designed new constitutional arrangements. According to Rozbicki, the founders prized stability and never intended to do anything other than protect and extend a political order in which they governed on behalf of "the people," comprised of various social and moral inferiors. Cutting off the colonial gentry from the Old World politically was the British Empire's post-1763 infringement on these provincials' prerogatives; distinguishing the colonial gentry from the Old World philosophically was their lack of attachment to inherited rank based in land and entitlement to office. Liberty allowed these men to think of themselves as a meritorious privileged class not a traditional aristocracy. Property-holding requirements for the franchise, before and after independence, also expressed this logic. One had to be qualified to enjoy greater liberty. Rozbicki thus contests the notion that the founders were hypocrites for denying liberty to slaves, women, Indians, and poor people. Such denials were consistent with the founders' notion of liberty as privilege. Similarly, Rozbicki rejects the notion of the Constitution of 1787 or the Federalist Party in the 1790s abandoning a commitment to universal freedom. The founders could not betray what they did not seek.

Because some historians have insisted on the radically modern nature of the American Revolution, Rozbicki also has to explain how the “preservationist” (p. 81) impulse of the founders produced a more democratic society. Where did ordinary people get the idea that the revolution was about their own liberty? Rozbicki’s understanding of culture as a structure of language and symbols that creates meaning and explains reality is crucial to his answer. For the author, culture flows in one direction, from elite members of “the speaking class” (p. 152) to everyone else, producing “an informational spill . . . to the collective mind” (p. 190). The gentry used sweeping language to enlist those with less liberty in the fight against the British and to accept the governing structures that supplanted monarchy. The cultural language of liberty got ahead of practice, and the catching-up process changed the nation forever. A cascading list of people decided to bid for actual inclusion in the polity rather than remain content being represented by their superiors. Some founders, by promoting education, expressed expansion of liberty as a goal, but the author insists that all factions of the gentry wished to stave off universal liberty in the present.

By defining culture and describing politics almost exclusively from an elite perspective, what Rozbicki pitches as a novel formulation actually favors an established narrative of liberty’s contagious spread from the few to the many. This storyline still retains some explanatory power, but treating ordinary eighteenth-century colonists as vessels for elite ideas about liberty has significant limitations. The Great Awakening’s religious revivals prompted ordinary women and men to challenge authority, to exercise choice, and to prize their own spiritual sensations over the wisdom of established authorities. Meanwhile, the cultural forums in which ordinary colonists made sense of their personal and political lives were more influential than the author allows. In parlors and slave quarters, along docks and dirt paths, in bedrooms as well as council chambers, colonists sought power, defined liberty, and manipulated symbols and language.

The gentry had reason to fear that ordinary people—slaves running to British lines, backcountry Baptists contesting planters’ social authority, enraged New England townsmen ready to march on occupied Boston—had gotten out in front of them regarding liberty. Critiquing elite founders for their shortcomings and hypocrisy is not a mere invasion of present-minded definitions into past discourse. Caught up in the maelstrom of events, the founders’ definitions of liberty had to be far more fluid, less certain, and less unified than this intriguing study indicates. Some debates cannot be settled.

DAVID N. GELLMAN
DePauw University

BENJAMIN H. IRVIN. Clothed in Robes of Sovereignty: The Continental Congress and the People Out of Doors. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 378. $34.95.

On July 12, 1778, the Continental Congress of the United States welcomed the French minister plenipotentiary, Conrad Alexander Gérard, with a mix of extravagant pageantry, delicate etiquette, and a nervous cognizance of American inferiority. The Pennsylvania Packet dutifully reported that the Almighty “hath stationed America among the powers of the earth, and clothed her in robes of Sovereignty” (p. 176). The central question that Benjamin H. Irvin ponders throughout this informative book is whether Congress had attained real authority during its revolutionary tenure or just its trappings. At the same time, he argues persuasively that the ongoing American debates about these trappings were vital to understanding the origins of the United States.

Deftly deploying a variety of scholarly methods, Irvin analyzes the emblems and rituals of the Continental and Confederation Congress from 1774 to 1783. (The book devotes more attention to the earlier years than the final years of this period.) During the American Revolution, Congress sought to cultivate civic virtue and national cohesion, foster good civil/military relations, and establish its legitimacy to a candid world. Congress hoped to create meaningful expressions of sovereignty and power via its printed currency, diplomatic overtures, holidays and commemorations, and artifacts such as medals, monuments, and ceremonial swords.

These were tall orders for Congress for several reasons. First, the only “honor culture” Americans knew was the monarchical and aristocratic culture they had inherited from Great Britain. Delegates to Congress worried, therefore, about whether it was acting in accordance with its republican ideals. At the same time, the delegates constantly fretted that their efforts at inculcating loyalty and pride were being outmatched and upstaged. Ambivalent toward pomp and celebration, Congress hosted a number of ceremonies that called for solemnity, humility, and frugality. Rhetorically this was a nod to republican virtue, but the nation’s penurious circumstances also necessitated thrift. As Irvin demonstrates, Congress was not always a pillar of eminence, unity, or even solvency. Its efforts, therefore, were sometimes haphazard and contradictory. When Congress was weak (as was often the case, given its constitutional limitations, the nation’s economic woes, and the army’s military setbacks), other parties stepped in with their own rites, symbols, and interpretations. These expressive rivals included army officers and soldiers, the general public “out of doors,” the nation’s loyalist and British opponents, and the country’s French and Indian allies.

One of Irvin’s great strengths is that he ably invokes the cultural, military, political, and social contexts that inform his findings. As a result, he is able to interpret contemporary literary and iconographic productions (the publisher was generous with images) that would otherwise be incomprehensible to a casual reader. Irvin organizes his material well, following a roughly chronological narrative while presenting his weighty themes and evanescent symbols in a series of coherent essays. Some themes recur, such as the ways in which distinctions of race, class, and gender underpinned the ways that “members of Congress perpetuated a social hierarchy very much at odds with the democratizing impulses of the Revolution” (p. 13).

The author also asserts that the American people did not just passively accept the rites of Congress but “embraced, rejected, reworked, ridiculed, or simply ignored them as they saw fit” (p. 18). Overall Irvin’s treatment tilts more heavily toward the clucking concerns of Congress than the people out of doors, but he also proves his point about the reciprocal nature of these symbolic displays. One might quibble with Irvin’s choice to limit his observations to the congressional seat of Philadelphia, which acts as a stand-in for the American public. This focus on the wartime capital leaves the author with less to say about how these symbols and ceremonies were disseminated to the rest of the new nation.

This is a book about the Revolutionary War years that is only lightly connected to pitched battles and military concerns, and for that reason Irvin is able to build bridges between the colonial past and the national future. Readers should not expect a comprehensive overview of the political history of the Continental and Confederation Congresses during the war. Yet within Irvin’s enjoyable book, they will learn a great deal about how the leaders of a modern republic established, maintained, and fumbled the emblems of national identity.

BENJAMIN L. CARP
Tufts University

SETH COTLAR. Tom Paine’s America: The Rise and Fall of Transatlantic Radicalism in the Early Republic. (Jeffersonian America.) Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 269. $35.00.

Thomas Paine’s role in the making of American independence has always been contentious: to his acolytes, he belongs with Thomas Jefferson among the founding fathers and has been denied his rightful place in the pantheon chiefly because of his deism; to his detractors, he was and remains libellous (respecting George Washington), a drunkard, and a “filthy little atheist” (in Theodore Roosevelt’s words) who is rightly written out of the sacred narrative. Getting the right balance between these assessments is difficult, given the ongoing reverberations of some of the basic disagreements in perspective, especially concerning religion.

Seth Cotlar’s elegantly presented and well-researched book rightly commences with the assumption that Paine’s reputation in his lifetime hinged more upon his political than his religious opinions. Particularly after Rights of Man was published (1791–1792), Paine represented a new form of populist republicanism in which classical reference points—a focus on civic virtue and an aristocratical balancing of a popular constitution—were seemingly swept aside in favor of what contemporaries (after 1793–1794) feared was essentially a mob-based, Jacobinical interpretation of democracy. Paine’s exile in France (1772–1802) did little to assuage fears about his association with extreme radicalism. Neither did the publication of The Age of Reason (1794, 1796) or his contretemps with Washington. Paine became, in Cotlar’s words, the epitome of “the foreign agitator, the atheistic anarchist” (p. 2), an image that would often re-emerge in popular perceptions of American radicalism. Eradicating Paine meant cleansing the ideal of democracy itself, particularly by shedding its French associations. The contest over Paine thus in fact masked a much larger political struggle between more and less populist variants on the ideal of democracy.

To Cotlar political ferment in the United States during the 1790s was shaped dramatically by the numerous exiles driven from Britain by William Pitt’s repressive policies. Political debate remained rooted to a substantial degree in European reference points, rather than moving swiftly into an American exceptionalism. Paineites flirted with cosmopolitan ideals and with more radical interpretations of property rights and egalitarianism than those embraced by American revolutionaries or the liberal political economists whose principles supposedly underpinned the revolution (Cotlar recognizes this as a crude misrepresentation). French, British, and Irish experience led many Americans to focus more upon active citizenship through debating societies, public meetings, and the like.

This is a persuasive portrayal of the origins of a number of anti-elitist democratic trends in the United States. Paine’s role in this process was curiously double edged in exporting “French” (but as much Nonconformist) ideas of democracy to the United States through the Rights of Man. Cotlar claims this sold as well as Common Sense (1776) there during the 1790s (50,000–100,000 copies), but other evidence suggests at least 500,000 copies of the latter were sold. Paine also used the United States as the model of a society in which government was minimized; this vision, he would soon concede, did not generally suit Europe with its vastly greater poverty. (Cotlar does not develop this theme, which certainly helps to explain Paine’s popularity in the United States). But more than anything, Paine epitomized the self-made political activist and populist statesman who had arisen from humble circumstances to become the confidant of presidents and (eventually) emperors. Paine was “a figurehead of a very different sort” (p. 39) from Washington: he could be imitated rather than merely worshipped. But enthusiasm for Paine had largely disappeared by his return from Europe. Now regarded as an electoral liability, he was shunned even by many of his former friends.

This is by far the most focused study of the reception of the Rights of Man in the United States. It offers a compelling portrait of attitudes toward “French principles” in the 1790s and of how, as in Britain, public opinion began to shift away from such principles with the “anti-Jacobin” reaction of the second half of the decade. Cotlar’s account of egalitarian tendencies in the 1790s is particularly novel, though there is more to be said about the Godwinian component in this story and also about the role of literary utopianism—the Scottish emigrant John Lithgow’s “Equality: A Political Romance” (1802), which appeared in Philadelphia, fits clearly into the debate assessed here. Cotlar also explores a reluctance to embrace Smithian liberalism as wholeheartedly as many commentators today seemingly assume that most early Americans did. If such perspectives were marginalized by 1800, agrarian radicalism in this period clearly sowed the seeds of Jacksonian, Owenite, and other forms of egalitarianism from around 1820 onward. Cotlar’s fine study thus offers a much more nuanced, if contested, vision of the 1790s in the United States than has often been presented, and one much closer to European debates in the period.

GREGORY CLAEYS
Royal Holloway,
University of London

CHRISTOPHER J. LUKASIK. Discerning Characters: The Culture of Appearance in Early America. (Early American Studies.) Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 319. $45.00.

As a fan of double entendre, I appreciated the title of Christopher J. Lukasik’s book. It nicely captures his focus on attempts to practice discernment through physiognomy, the late eighteenth-century “science” of reading faces, while highlighting the people doing the discerning. In addition, it references at least two meanings of character that are central to the book: a person’s innate qualities—which physiognomy ostensibly revealed—and a figure in a work of fiction. Lukasik is a scholar of literature, and literary works frame his thoughtful study, but many (if not all) of its arguments are not only deeply historicist but also historical, deftly charting the relationship between appearance and social hierarchy.

Following the lead of scholars who have characterized the American revolutionary era as one in which anxiety over how to “read” people accurately increased, Lukasik explores “how a variety of cultural forms imagine the visibility of distinction and the dynamics of social space” (p. 10). In a world in which consumer goods and the habits of gentility could be readily acquired, some Americans began to shift the indices of character—often read as a synecdoche for class—from bodily performances to the theoretically immutable face and its involuntary features. Such attempts to make character legible and fixed underpinned what Lukasik calls the “physiognomic fallacy,” the “false opposition between a model of character read from performance and one read from the face” (p. 21), that would trouble early American society and its literary productions.

Establishing the power of print culture, Lukasik begins with the work of Johann Kaspar Lavater, whose widely disseminated and illustrated Essays on Physiog- nomy (Physiognomische Fragmente zur Beförderung der Menschenkenntnis und Menschenliebe [1775–1778]) provided people with guidelines for reading faces. Although physiognomy helped white Americans create racial distinctions, Lukasik argues that its reception had as much to do with establishing distinctions among white men at a time when American society had jettisoned aristocratic ideas of rank. It was not, of course, an either/or proposition; just as a lack of discussion of complexion does not mean the absence of race, neither does a focus on men indicate that gender was not an operative category in creating social distinctions, analysis that Lukasik might have developed more fully.

In fact, as the book shows persuasively, the seduction stories of the early republic were shot through with physiognomy’s potential power to “unmask” the rakish male follower of Lord Chesterfield’s cynical prescriptions for performing status. Chapters two and three detail the vexed relationship between reading books and reading men, particularly for young women who consumed novels. But did sentimental fiction make women more or less susceptible to mistaking the cultural capital of the libertine—fine clothes and pretty words—for actual socioeconomic capital? For every sensible female character who read the rake as a rake, another failed at physiognomy, as the creation of female dyads helped instruct the nation’s young women. Rich interpretations of four novels bear out Lukasik’s interpretation of physiognomy as a “counter-practice” to Chesterfieldianism, followed by a smart discussion of Charles Brockden Brown’s Ormond; or, The Secret Witness (1799) as a critique of physiognomic discernment. In this tale, faces deceive just as fully as any other index, and judgments of character must be communal and secured through reasoning over time, not an individual’s momentary assessment.

Disagreement over the power and (literal) place of faces in the new nation informs a chapter on visual culture as well. While some, such as Philip Freneau, thought that portraits and the galleries that displayed them commemorated undeserved access to wealth rather than republican virtue, for Hugh Henry Brackenridge they helped to exclude the socially undeserving. As Americans debated concepts of public interest and how best to serve it—as well as who should secure it—cultural forms such as portraits became tools for properly ordering the republic.

The book’s final two chapters trace the “Changing Face of the Novel” and are more expressly and narrowly literary in their arguments, as Lukasik himself acknowledges. They will likely satisfy scholars of early American fiction more than historians of the period. Yet those who know the second quarter of the nineteenth century will enjoy the learned readings of James Fenimore Cooper and Herman Melville and should be able to draw some of the contextual connections that are less evident than earlier in the book. By the antebellum period, other “sciences” of difference challenged physiognomy’s reign, but the task of reading people continued to inform the content and function of fiction.

Lukasik shows that Cooper was less concerned with discerning the absence of character than exploring the invisibility of its presence, uncovering the “invisible aristocrat.” One is reminded of the poor but lovely and virtuous servant girl of eighteenth-century sentimental fiction who turns out to be well born. And, in a final inversion and unmasking of the physiognomic fallacy, the title character of Melville’s novel Pierre; or, The Ambiguities (1852) is seduced by the power of a female face and its likeness to his father’s, renounces his family and inheritance to atone for his father’s sins, comes to realize that he has mistaken a look for a face, and, ultimately, dies due to his lack of judgment, all the while preserving his distinguished family’s unblemished name. Such was the fraught relationship between physiognomy and social distinction in early America, one that Lukasik outlines with the precision of silhouette.

KATE HAULMAN
American University

PETER J. KASTOR. William Clark’s World: Describing America in the Age of Unknowns. (Lamar Series in Western History.) New Haven: Yale University Press. 2011. Pp. 344. $45.00.

In William Clark’s World, Peter J. Kastor considers the relation between representations of the North American Far West and the westward expansion of the United States. In contrast with many works about Meriwether Lewis, William Clark, and the Corps of Discovery, Kastor’s study concentrates on the aftermath of the Lewis and Clark expedition rather than the journey itself, and on the career of the underappreciated and long-lived Clark instead of the words of the poetic and doomed Lewis.

This focus on Clark and post-1806 perceptions of the Far West enables Kastor to explore the question at the heart of his insightful and intriguing book: how did the United States move from the apprehensive understanding of the regions beyond the Mississippi evident in the productions of Clark and his peers in the early decades of the nineteenth century—an understanding in which the transcontinental destiny of the republic was less than manifest—to the brash approach to far western expansion characterizing the 1830s and 1840s? Kastor grounds his response in a wide and thorough examination of explorers’ journals, geographic treatises, personal and governmental correspondence, and many well-selected and elegantly reproduced maps. He traces Clark and his contemporaries through the mazes of the nascent United States publishing industry that would make the Far West known to Anglo-Americans. He navigates with Clark around the rudimentary structures of a U.S. government that was trying to determine the best approach to North America’s western reaches.

Instead of offering a full biography of Clark, Kastor uses Clark’s life as the narrative center of a larger story of national transition. As Clark moved from western explorer to frontier administrator, the eastern republic’s tentative probes into the western unknown gave way to the United States’ conquest of a continent. In Kastor’s subtle and perceptive rendering of events, early nineteenth-century administrations were far more concerned with the governance of territories acquired by the Louisiana Purchase than with novel imperial projects. The earthy, practical explorers working for them produced portraits of the Far West in which the region’s perils stood out as much as its promise. In part, this was because the region was filled with fearsome mountains, unforgiving deserts, imposing Indian nations, and jealous representatives of foreign powers. It was also because explorers seeking fame, fortune, and position had every interest in emphasizing the difficulties of the obstacles they had deftly and heroically overcome.

As early as the 1810s, however, advocates of western expansion could begin to use the achievements and works of Clark and his contemporaries selectively in support of a more aggressive approach to the Far West. Western enthusiasts could draw valleys and rivers from the maps and journals of western scouts while omitting the Indian communities commanding them. They could add expansive U.S. boundaries to maps that had highlighted physical features rather than political claims. As the imperatives of multiplying, franchise-wielding, land-hungry Euro-Americans displaced concerns about the difficulties of western settlement, the most zealous proponents of territorial acquisitions could simply disregard the cautions of Clark and others.

These expansionist imperatives raise the most substantial question about the western representations Kastor so knowledgeably and lucidly considers: to what extent did the way some Americans depicted the Far West affect the way other Americans acted toward it? Kastor’s book emphasizes the power of representations to shape reality by influencing behavior, but the book offers many indications that rising demands for far western lands were producing visions of the region as much as they were being generated by them. It often appears that Anglo-Americans were coming to the Far West regardless of what figures like Clark had to say about it.

This points to one limitation of Kastor’s semi-biographical approach. The great virtue of centering on Clark is that his tangible life makes accessible the often abstract topic of spatial representation. The semi-biographical structure of the book, however, often obliges Kastor to follow the trajectory of Clark’s life rather than the logic of key arguments. This pulls the book away from the kind of sustained ratiocination needed for a really conclusive statement about the connections between geographic representation and expansionist reality.

Biographical conventions also draw attention away from one of Kastor’s great achievements. Authors of biographical or semi-biographical studies are often compelled to trumpet the important or representative features of figures like Clark. But Clark’s less significant and typical qualities are in many respects more instructive. A persistent puzzle of the Lewis and Clark Expedition is why it is so fun to write about but so difficult to integrate into the larger historical narrative of the United States. Kastor suggests an answer. Western accounts and images like Clark's that emphasized western dangers and the rare heroism needed to surmount them ill suited a burgeoning United States that would come to deny all barriers to the western movement of tens of thousands of ordinary people. Kastor skillfully and appropriately uses Clark as a guide through issues of western exploration, representation, and expansion. In doing so, he helps us to see that Clark was, in his relation to some of the larger trends of the nineteenth-century United States, a guide pointing to a North American past rather than the American future.

PAUL W. MAPP

College of William and Mary

ANDREW J. LEWIS. A Democracy of Facts: Natural History in the Early Republic. (Early American Studies.) Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2011. Pp. 204. $39.95.

Once in a while a book pulls together the scholarship of a generation, synthesizes it into a coherent and persuasive account, and thus becomes the platform from which new scholarship must necessarily launch. This is one of those books. In this survey of how Americans thought about and practiced science from the 1780s to the 1840s, Andrew J. Lewis uses archival research and perceptive analysis to deepen our understanding of science in the early American republic. To some degree, Lewis tells a familiar story. One well-known arc of change is the shift in this period from natural history as a unified investigation into all terrestrial natural phenomena to its disaggregation into modern sciences like geology and zoology. Another theme is the concern to root American identity in the natural world, a topic that has become a virtual cliché among scholars of early American science. However, this book is about much more than either of these concerns: Lewis is interested in how people think, and that makes all the difference.

In five chapters, each structured around a story, Lewis examines the tension between claims by elite men to authoritative knowledge and assertions by more ordinary men of the right to think for themselves, as well as the tension between establishing matters of fact and the processes of reasoning from those facts to causality and meaning. Chapter one recounts debates over swallow submersion, the belief that as winter approaches swallows sink into ponds and hibernate until the return of warm weather. Observations by credible witnesses of swallows seeming to plunge into water in the fall and of torpid swallows warming themselves in the spring sun were pitted against assertions that examinations of bird anatomy and experiments in which swallows plainly drowned when plunged into water made swallow submersion implausible. Here educated men's desire to lead an "empire of reason" (p. 16) was undercut by their aspiration to distance themselves from what they saw as the premature and inaccurate systematizing of Europeans (epitomized by the degeneracy theory of Georges-Louis Leclerc, comte de Buffon) and by more modest men's belief in their own abilities to observe natural phenomena reliably. Hence the epistemic valorization of credible eyewitness testimony, coupled with widespread hopes that the American natural world would have possibilities for knowledge undreamt of in Europe, shifted Americans toward "a democracy of facts" in which any credible man could participate. While elite men were successful in establishing formal science in college curricula, learned societies, and publishing ventures, Americans moving across the Appalachians in pursuit of economic opportunities found elites' knowledge of natural history of variable benefit as they sought to commodify natural resources. Chapter three addresses interpretations of the origins of the great mounds found in the trans-Appalachian West. The refusal of white Americans to believe that contemporary Native Americans were related to ancient mound builders has drawn many historians' attention as an example of race-making in the early republic. Lewis acknowledges this issue but here concentrates on how and why the nascent field of archeology reopened a space for speculation about phenomena, especially among non-elites. In the 1820s the development of a "theology of nature," the subject of chapter four, similarly contributed to the reopening of a space for thinking about causality, particularly in the emerging field of geology. In the final chapter, Lewis describes how educated men, now often specializing in geology, successfully obtained government patronage from states eager to locate mineral deposits and canal routes. Thus Lewis analyzes the reasons for the initial diminution of elite credibility in realms of science, the rise of widespread participation in natural "fact-making," and the slow reassertion of the claims of educated men to superior knowledge, as well as the broader movement away from system-building and causal explanation followed by their relegitimation, however "unsteady, unstable, [and] sometimes unconscious" (p. 1) these movements were.

This book should find a wide audience. Lewis builds on the work of a generation of historians of science who have shown how critical the participation of people beyond the educated elite was to the development of science, how diverse and interpenetrated the subjects of science were before the development of modern disciplinary divisions, and how thoroughly scientific inquiry was embedded in wider cultural developments. Historians of the early republic will find a jargon-free account of this aspect of their era. While they will certainly also notice the absence of attention to race and gender, this omission allows Lewis to tell a complicated story clearly. Historians of nineteenth-century science will find this an admirable case study useful for comparative work. The citations are a guide to virtually all of the important recent literature on this subject from both sides of the Atlantic, which graduate students embarking on related projects will appreciate. Lewis has written a thoughtful and valuable book.

SARA S. GRONIM
Long Island University

JENNIFER GRABER. The Furnace of Affliction: Prisons and Religion in Antebellum America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 234. $39.95.

Jennifer Graber's richly detailed study of antebellum evangelical Christianity's life behind the bars of New York state prisons feeds a longstanding scholarly appetite for stories of believers who cannot keep their cultural meddling from adulterating the faith. While secularization models abound, Graber freshens that story considerably, investing prison reform with explanatory power more commonly assigned to evangelicals pursuing broader cultural renovations such as antislavery and temperance. She finds bitter irony in the reformers' redemptive quest for inmates' souls that yielded by mid-century to a new "religiosity of citizenship" that gave moral respectability to a prison system based upon punishment, revenge, and physical deprivation (p. 177).

Graber traces an evangelical strategy that began with late eighteenth-century appeals to replace harsh physical penalties with spiritual regeneration as the fruit of criminal justice. New York prison officials initially warmed to the prospect of giving ministers access to a captive audience in exchange for regular exhortations aligned with their own priorities: obedience, rigid discipline, and hard work that could stoke the profitability of convict labor. Here Graber revitalizes the classic work of Paul E. Johnson and Mary P. Ryan in exploring the negotiations between prison officials obsessed with order and marketplace values and evangelicals seeking spiritual dividends.

Not surprisingly, Quaker initiatives begin the three-stage process of confrontation and compromise that frame her argument. Beginning in 1797, Thomas Eddy sought to make New York's Newgate prison a nurturing, restorative "garden." Spurred by Quaker confidence in an Inner Light that could regenerate even the hardest hearts, Eddy produced few conversions and even less obedience. Unimpressed with the Newgate experiment, state officials at Auburn prison turned to the heavier disciplinary hand of Elam Lynds, forcing prison clerics to accommodate a more punitive order or face irrelevance.

Under Baptist chaplain John Stanford, Eddy's garden became a "furnace of affliction," where limited suffering and deprivation could turn the guilty from sin to salvation. State officials welcomed the facade of moral respectability Stanford's ministry offered, even as they stressed "workshop profit" and "stricter forms of bodily discipline" (p. 71). Following Stanford's lead, Chaplain Louis Dwight fueled the furnace at Auburn, presiding over what Graber explains as a fundamental religious transformation. By accepting harsh discipline as a gateway to the penitent prisoner's heart, Dwight effectively turned prison order and profit into goals of Christian outreach. For Graber, this transformation is instructive of Protestantism's democratic cultural dilemma: believers committed to historic faith principles now found themselves in a secular culture that would tolerate Christianity only on its own terms. "Claiming public space," Graber concludes, now "demanded a slow altering of the Protestant faith" (p. 101).

Graber locates the reformers' final capitulation at mid-century amid the dark corridors of Sing Sing prison and a growing political conflict over how to control a new tide of urban crime and violence. While Democrats wanted to isolate and punish law breakers, their Whig opponents demanded moral reform devoted to character and behavioral change. With spiritual aims pressed to the margins by both sides, clerics such as John Luckey came to accept the prison as a "hell on earth," where hapless inmates could only pray for deliverance from its walls (p. 158).

Graber's study is itself an open call to reform. "Americans incarcerate," her opening declarative for both introduction and epilogue, establishes a clear indictment of the nation's current prison system as the embarrassing legacy of historic failures. She lays much of the blame at evangelical Christianity's doorstep, and her work certainly affirms that prison officials and cooperating chaplains prostituted religious muscle and language to serve pragmatic material purposes. In the process, however, she delivers something less and something more than she claims at the outset. First, her argument that prison ministries were primary agents of broader secularization among evangelicals needs more visible demonstration beyond the penitentiary walls that house most of this work. Second, Graber's most powerful indictment arrives in her conclusion and does not derive from the clerical actors or compromising strategies that are center stage in most of her study. Instead she points to doctrinal impairments that shackled reformers from the start. Scholars distracted by the reformers' intentions and meliorating efforts, she argues, fail to appreciate the dark potential of Protestant theology itself, resting on principles of "redemptive suffering" and humanity's naturally "degraded status" before God (pp. 182–183). Such an assessment invites the conclusion that this embedded theological flaw assured a tragic outcome from the outset.

A passionate interpretation that will fire debate rather than dampen it, this beautifully written and deeply researched volume makes a valuable contribution to our understanding of early American prison reform and to the broader debate over evangelicalism's impact on antebellum American culture.

MARK Y. HANLEY
Truman State University

JULIE WINCH. The Clamorgans: One Family's History of Race in America. New York: Hill and Wang. 2011. Pp. 416. $35.00.

In this book Julie Winch presents a captivating, strictly narrative history of an interracial, multiracial, ultimately transracial family. The saga begins in late eighteenth-century St. Louis, with a Frenchman named Jacques Clamorgan who fathered a number of children with African American women. The tale continues through several generations of extended, blended households, and climaxes with Jacques's grandson Cyprian Clamorgan, who, in the mid-nineteenth century, passed back and forth across the color line depending on his economic and political desires. In the early twentieth century, Louis Clamorgan, another of Jacques's descendants, made this transition every day, just by going from home to work in downtown St. Louis and back again; at his job everyone understood he was black, while his neighbors in the suburb of Maplewood saw him as white. The characters are nothing short of fascinating. Jacques was also ingenious and ruthless, willing to double-cross anyone, including Ester, mother of some of his children, and seemingly lacked a moral compass. He made—or at least alleged—a staggering fortune from land speculation and political corruption. Eventually Jacques laid claim to over 1,000,000 acres. Cyprian—who, understandably, went by a number of aliases—inherited more than a modest measure of his grandfather's character. He was a writer, entrepreneur, self-styled lawyer, halfhearted politician, and all-around cad. He was even a failed assassin: he tried to kill a political rival in New Orleans in 1868. St. Louis, and secondarily New Orleans, afforded such early American men-on-the-make ideal places for self-invention. This frontier is, in fact, a character in the book, and a complex one at that: land was paramount, death relentless, and race permeable. Winch leaves readers with a visceral feel of the streets of St. Louis and the seductive possibilities the town offered, from the shifting imperial claims of the late colonial era to the urban swirl of the late nineteenth century.

Winch brings to life a haunting example of the complexity of American families. The Clamorgan family trees are knotty. Death robbed adults of spouses and children of parents. Men and women betrayed their mates, and some rejected marital monogamy. Parents were occasionally indifferent to and even abandoned their offspring. Thankfully, other relatives stepped into the breach, behaving admirably and selflessly. Jacques's mate Ester stood up to him when he tried to defraud her of her property and then stood in for him when the children he fathered with another woman were orphaned. Members of the Clamorgan clan watched out for younger relatives, loaning one another money for business ventures and giving bequests to needy kinfolk. They also became estranged over property disputes and personal affronts. They were, in sum, an all-American family. Mostly, though, they sued—and happily so for history.

What was most unique about the Clamorgans was not how they shifted racial identities but rather the wealth of evidence they produced in the process. We must not underestimate the resolve and detective skills of Winch, who uncovered this family story by scouring the archives and newspapers, piecing together their heartbreaks and outrages from court records, and untangling the endless intrigues made possible by (intentionally) byzantine land deeds. She was abetted by the fact that the Clamorgans were such a litigious lot. Much of her evidence comes from decades upon decades of court cases. Some cases involve criminal behavior, but most centered on the vast fortune that Jacques amassed (on paper) in the late eighteenth century and that his heirs coveted and contested for the next hundred years or so. The treasure trove of family materials also included Cyprian's book, The Colored Aristocracy of St. Louis, as well as a cache of long-hidden letters found in 2003 by the new owner of an old Clamorgan home.

Having done a prodigious amount of research, Winch seems determined to let the Clamorgan family story unfold on its own terms, absent claims of historiographical meaning and unadorned by historical comparisons—including, most obviously, to the now-famous Heminges of Virginia. The historical context of the Clamorgan story is only sporadically analyzed. Historiography is basically ignored, including in the footnotes; the brief bibliography of secondary sources appears to consist only of works offering specific historical information about the Clamorgans and the places and times they lived. Some readers will find this frustrating, others a missed opportunity, and others still a welcome and daring take on narrative writing—or, as did I, all three. But all should find the Clamorgans a fascinating family and this book a fine recounting of their experiences along the Mississippi River and at the crossroads of race in America.

LORRI GLOVER
Saint Louis University

DAMIAN ALAN PARGAS. The Quarters and the Fields: Slave Families in the Non-Cotton South. (New Perspectives on the History of the South.) Gainesville: University Press of Florida. 2010. Pp. xi, 259. $69.95.

Comparative history presents challenges for the scholar. It is difficult for area specialists not to criticize the coverage given to their bailiwick and easy for them to overlook the new knowledge that the comparisons yield. Damian Alan Pargas, however, is likely to satisfy historians of antebellum northern Virginia, the low-country, and the sugar parishes both with his fine understanding of those discrete labor and production regimes and with the fruit born from his comparisons of these regions. Pargas's criticism of the work to date on slave family life and work experience focuses on the degree to which research has made claims of slave agency based on realities in the cotton South. This book argues for a historiographical "middle ground" because regional variation based on different agricultural staples "was the most important underlying factor in the development of slave family life—not because it dictated the experiences of slave families . . . but because it confronted them with a basic framework of boundaries and opportunities" (p. 4).

This conclusion is based on deep research on two counties and one parish representing the profound variation in the antebellum South. Fairfax County, Virginia, had a shrinking population of slaves during the decades under study and was transitioning away from tobacco production in favor of grains. As a result, Fairfax County provides an example of a slave regime with tighter boundaries in part from greater isolation for the slaves, an inflexible set of expectations for labor and family life, and thus limited opportunities for "family-based internal economies" (pp. 88–89). By contrast, South Carolina's premier rice-growing county, Georgetown, was characterized by a highly developed and mostly stable slave society with dense patterns of slave residence that resulted in higher levels of family cohabitation and a task labor system that left time for internal economic production for the enslaved families. Slaves in St. James Parish, Louisiana, experienced a regime of intense labor but higher levels of family stability and economic prospects than in Virginia. However, the disproportionate number of males meant that many slaves had low prospects for family life.

Pargas's thematic organization considers labor experience, internal slave economies, family formation, stability, and contact during the day. Forced separation is treated in its own chapter, which gives this vital topic its due. Of particular note is the way the decline in a slave society such as that of Fairfax County led to higher rates of forced separation, while stable and dense ones like the lowcountry or growing sections such as St. James reduced the likelihood of family separation. This conclusion emphasizes change over time as a crucial factor in assessing forced separation for any regime or region.

One of the best chapters focuses on the spatial aspects of slaveholding and the variations among the three regimes under discussion. By examining patterns of housing, proximity of plantations, and available travel routes between slave villages, Pargas deepens our understanding of familial relationships and the material realities slaves faced in developing partnerships across plantations and from region to region. In addition, the author takes into account demographic changes over the course of the antebellum period and blends them nicely with anecdotal evidence. In the future, our understanding of spatial considerations could be made more sophisticated if Pargas or other scholars employ geographic information systems to map these regions alongside a cotton district to better account for change over time in housing and working patterns.

As fine as the book under review is, it could have been even better if illustrated with photographs and especially with maps. Maps might have reinforced the different spatial and terrain circumstances between the field and the quarters that existed in the sugar parishes and in northern Virginia. Since space is a genuine area of concern for Pargas, demonstrating the different densities of residence in each of the three regions would reinforce his arguments. Change over time in each region is given some attention, but the nature of the sources, with the exception of census data, makes it difficult to get at this. Finally, in his concluding chapter it might have been helpful had Pargas taken the full extent of these regimes as a statistical whole and considered them in direct comparison to the entire cotton South. After so much careful work comparing Georgetown County, Fairfax County, and St. James Parish, the reader's understanding and the author's analysis might have benefited from comparing all four agricultural systems over time in the book's summation.

These shortcomings are minor ones and do little to undermine the thrust of this book. Pargas makes a strong case for linking our understanding of slave family life and work to regional agricultural regimes, whether cotton, rice, sugar, tobacco, or grains.

JAMES TUTEN
Juniata College

L. DIANE BARNES, BRIAN SCHOEN, and FRANK TOWERS, editors. The Old South's Modern Worlds: Slavery, Religion, and Nation in the Age of Progress. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 331. $29.95.

What was "Old" about the Old South? Remarkably little is the conclusion one draws after reading this volume of essays on the social and economic history of the antebellum American South. In fact, as editors L. Diane Barnes, Brian Schoen, and Frank Towers make clear, the Old South was not really old at all; rather it was at the van of the market revolution, its cities grew bounteously, its planters and merchants acted rationally, its railroads and manufacturing facilities proliferated, its preachers and politicians laid claim to the language and symbols of modernity, and even enslaved people hoarded cash and personal possessions. Southerners—of all races—appeared to be modern minded and globally interconnected. The region bounded forward in an age of progress, and although slavery lent a peculiar tenor to southern social relations, southern people evinced a willingness to be "up with the times," the editors contend (p. 10).

There were, of course, multiple paths to modernity across the Western world. According to the editors, the South charted its own "modern course," albeit one distinctly shaped by its regional commitment to liberal capitalism and racial slavery (p. 12). Like the antebellum boosters of old who urged slaveholding planters and merchants to invest in rail lines, marketing depots, steam-powered processing machinery, and local manufacturing, the contributors to this collection contend that modernity was as much cultural as economic. To be sure, local conditions shaped the forces of capitalism in diverse ways, but as the authors repeatedly insist, the Old South enjoyed the blessings of progress, it flourished as part of the global economic order and pulsed to the sounds of railroad whistles, cash changing hands, telegraph wires buzzing, and bankers profiting from the fruits of human capital. Replace the modes of communication (exorcize slavery) and it seems rather modern indeed.

The editors challenge Elizabeth Fox-Genovese and

Eugene Genovese's often quoted maxim that the slave South was the "bastard child of merchant capitalism and developed as a non-capitalist society" (p. 7). In a series of conceptually linked essays grouped into five subsections, contributors consider the role of the South in national and global debates on modernity, the place of slavery in a modernizing society, material and commercial progress in the antebellum South, and modern impulses within southern religion, gender relations, and Native American societies. They conclude with a synoptic review of the Old South. The usual benchmarks of nineteenth century modernity—the American North and Great Britain—are replaced in this volume by more modest transnational competitors. In one of the best essays in the collection, Towers suggests that southern cities grew in ways comparable to that of other commercialized slave societies, such as Cuba. Other direct comparisons are employed indicating that southern farmers were embedded in global commodity markets and that Asian and Latin American competition imperiled planters across the region. The editors are not alone among historians in addressing the South's global position. In 1974 Robert Fogel and Stanley Engerman argued that had the South been independent in 1860, it would have been the fourth richest country in the world, the sixth largest cotton producer, and had a railroad infrastructure which surpassed Europe's. Although comparative historians have extended this debate still further, comparing the nineteenth-century South with Russia, Italy, and Prussia, this volume does not place the South in a global league table of international competitiveness. Instead, it encourages readers to chart the impact of modernity on southern society, the institution of slavery, and the processes by which modern, commercialized relations shaped local lives.

As the contributors indicate, the forces of modernity impacted practically every antebellum southerner. Peter Onuf and Matthew Mason underscore how southern nationalists argued for the compatibility of slavery with economic and social progress, while Schoen and Steven Deyle contend that planters and slave traders operated as relatively advanced capitalists who embraced innovation and modern business and banking practices. Larry Hudson draws attention to cash accumulation and sophisticated market behavior among slaves. James Huston, Towers, William Thomas, and Barnes all suggest, in various case studies, that the southern economy was evolving and that the future of slavery was by no means doomed in 1861. Middle-class entrepreneurs, these scholars argue, adapted slave labor to industry, they invested in diverse commercial ventures, and articulated an "advanced vision for [their] economic and social future" (p. 175). Charles Irons, Andrew Frank, and Craig Thompson Friend add considerable nuance to the volume by demonstrating how missionaries, Amerindians, and both homosexual and heterosexual men appropriated modern ethical, trade, and gender values to blur distinctions and complicate traditional binaries. In the final section, Marc Egnal provides a defense of the Genoveses' "non-capitalist" thesis before Edward Ayers and Michael O'Brien contextualize the pace and place of southern modernity.

O'Brien's perceptive conclusion asks whether modern elements were "determinative or marginal" in southern society (p. 306). The collection argues for the former, but on occasion its authors overstretch their thesis. Southern planters were not always "creative risk-takers" (p. 72). In fact, many were risk averse, and they were more often price-takers than price-makers in the market. Nor did they always invest "massive capital" (p. 73) in new technologies such as sugar evaporation pans; some did, ninety-five percent did not (see Documenting Louisiana Sugar, www.sussex.ac.uk/louisianasugar). Despite these reservations, historians will find many of these arguments to be familiar. During the 1970s and 1980s, scholars vigorously debated the pre-capitalist nature of the antebellum South. That debate has receded and almost all scholars in the field now agree that slavery was highly adaptable, rational (including risk-averse) business practices prevailed, a bourgeois middle-class flourished, and modern impulses coexisted among premodern non-market relations. That the South exhibited modern tendencies will thus surprise few readers, but the degree to which those values determined social and economic relations remains open to conjecture. Frederick Law Olmsted, one of the most perceptive commentators on the antebellum South, agreed that there was progress in the Old South, but in contrast to the North where "there was a constant electric current of progress," in the South, he observed, "every second man was a non-conductor and broke the chain" (see Olmsted, A Journey in the Seaboard Slave States [1856], p. 622). Olmsted was right; to fully grasp the nature of the Old South, historians need to address the "non-conductors" and consider how they influenced and restrained southern modernity. These "non-conductors" are largely absent in the book under review but perhaps most problematic of all, the volume stops short of the Civil War when the South's economy, infrastructure, and population underwent its sternest test. Did southern modernity influence the capacity of the Confederacy to mobilize and equip its armies, and how ready were bourgeois southerners to embrace a modernizing centralized state? Was antebellum modernity, in short, fundamental to the performance of the Confederate states? Without addressing those questions, the contributors to this collection evade the acid test of whether the Old South was really modern after all.

RICHARD FOLLETT
University of Sussex

STEVEN E. WOODWORTH. This Great Struggle: America's Civil War. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield. 2011. Pp. xiii, 407. $29.95.

Steven E. Woodworth opens this book with a chapter that briskly traces the political divisions over slavery before John Brown's raid on Harpers Ferry and then devotes the remainder of the book—save seven pages on domestic developments and ten pages on Reconstruction—almost entirely to the war's military and political events. It is a skillfully told tale, brimming with striking prose: P. G. T. Beauregard's grandiose plans before the First Battle of Bull Run were "all moonshine and nonsense" (p. 52); Joseph E. Johnston was "the war's foremost retreator" (p. 110); William T. Sherman was the "war's master of turning movements" (p. 281). Benjamin Grierson's mounted raid had more of an impact on Ulysses S. Grant's Vicksburg operations against John C. Pemberton than did George Stoneman's comparable cavalry sortie on Joseph Hooker's Chancellorsville campaign against Robert E. Lee, explains Woodworth, because "Stoneman was not Grierson, Lee was not Pemberton, and, most of all, Hooker was not Grant" (p. 203). Woodworth also has a storyteller's gift for the interesting anecdote; this reviewer, for example, did not know that Albert Sidney Johnston, mortally wounded at Shiloh, had in his pocket the very tourniquet that could have saved his life.

Not surprisingly, given the focus of his previous scholarship, Woodworth insists that both sides devoted too much attention to affairs in Virginia. He pulls few punches when assessing military generalship, evidencing no sympathy for recent efforts to restore the reputation of George McClellan. Woodworth gives higher marks to Braxton Bragg, blaming the disappointments in the invasion of Kentucky, at Stones River, before Chickamauga, and at Chattanooga on the self-serving, conniving failures of his subordinates. In Woodworth's reckoning, Grant towered above all others, demonstrating an unusual grasp for the relationship between military and political events, overseeing an "operational masterpiece" (p. 200) at Vicksburg and grinding down Lee's Army of Northern Virginia in 1864–1865. Acknowledging that Grant could make mistakes, he attributes those errors to Grant's insistence on focusing on what he was doing, rather than worrying about the actions of his foes. "As long as he kept the momentum he was by far the most dangerous general of the war," writes Woodworth, "but when something happened to halt his momentum, whether enemy action or the orders of a superior, he became vulnerable" (p. 87).

In his forays into political matters, Woodworth takes great pains to destroy old shibboleths regarding slavery and states' rights. Consistent with the present scholarly consensus, he insists that slavery caused the war. He repeatedly points out inconsistencies in postwar southern assertions about the importance of states' rights, effectively noting the ironies of the South's determination to have a strong federal Fugitive Slave Act and willingness to use the central government to enact wartime conscription. Dismissing revisionist notions arguing that Abraham Lincoln was too slow to abolish slavery, he contends that the president "was . . . deeply committed to ending slavery as soon as he could do so in a way that would have a chance of surviving both politically and militarily" (p. 137). In so doing, he emphasizes Lincoln's fear that Roger B. Taney, the conservative chief justice, would overturn any premature federal action.

Woodworth has earned the right to write the book he wants to, and to deal with the subject matter he prefers to. Even so, this reviewer would have welcomed his greater engagement with recent scholarship. The text largely ignores, for example, any systematic examination of the reasons why Civil War soldiers fought, an issue which would seem to have been particularly relevant to the book's military/political bent. Discussions of the war's impact on American notions of the role of the federal government and on our collective historical memory are likewise absent. Woodworth's brief handling of the roles of women in the war harkens back several decades; while correctly pointing out that the overwhelming majority of women during the period considered soldiering to be "man's work" (p. 135), his failure to even mention debates regarding the expansion of their public roles seems striking, especially given his assertion that, in the twentieth century, "a constitutional right to privacy was to become a code word for abortion rights," just as "a constitutional right to property had in the mid-nineteenth century become a shibboleth for the defense of slavery" (p. 136).

In sum, those seeking a well-written, forcefully argued, traditional overview of military and political issues will find Woodworth's book a welcome addition to the literature. Those hoping for exposure to broader themes and the incorporation of more recent scholarship should look elsewhere.

ROBERT WOOSTER

Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi

FRANCES M. CLARKE. War Stories: Suffering and Sacrifice in the Civil War North. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 251. $35.00.

For more than a century, Americans have consumed realistic and bittersweet (often simply bitter) accounts of war and the effects of war. This has left many readers, including historians, unable to stomach, much less understand, the moralistic and overtly triumphal fiction and non-fiction produced during the American Civil War. In her excellent book, Frances M. Clarke offers a nuanced and moving interpretation of these sincere efforts to make sense of the carnage, sacrifice, and disappointment of war. Rather than seeing them as "mere curiosities" reflecting their "Victorian origins" (p. 3), Clarke argues that Civil War stories showed not only how northerners justified the unprecedented blood and treasure expended to preserve the Union, but also how they articulated the values that sustained them via stories of suffering and perseverance by soldiers and civilians.

But not all suffering meant the same thing, and not all sufferers were equally noble. Indeed, members of the lower classes and African Americans were largely absent from the stories Clarke analyzes. The hardships they endured elicited pity more than admiration and, as a result, were thematically useless to middle-class authors and readers. And while acknowledging that Confederates also suffered, northerners believed southern society was too corrupted by slavery for its suffering to have any redemptive value.

The book's chapters work outward from the ways in which individuals took meaning from sacrifice to the methods by which Americans sought to demonstrate to the world how their sacrifices represented the best in republican virtues. Clarke shows how the notion of "idealized suffering" (p. 25) developed by antebellum reform movements and evangelical Christianity played out in several different contexts: the service and death of a single middle-class officer, as preserved in the voluminous scrapbooks compiled by his father; the shared assumptions of wounded soldiers and medical workers that pain and death were meaningful when sustained in the service of a victorious Union; the insistence by civilian volunteers that their individual and communal efforts to aid soldiers contained a moral component; the North's vigilance in confronting European—especially British—contempt by showing that the Union's reliance on sometimes amateurish and innocent volunteers represented the strengths of American democracy rather than its weaknesses; and the ways in which Yankee amputees attempted to exert their masculinity and self-reliance in the years immediately following the war. Clarke's epilogue briefly but movingly follows these themes into the Gilded Age, when several cultural trends—veterans' growing emphasis on their unique experiences, the wretched state of race relations, and the rise of social Darwinism—would make "many of the assumptions that underpinned . . . tales of suffering and benevolence" (p. 176) seem rather antique and render their optimism rather naïve. During the latter part of the century, as industrialization, sectional reconciliation, and gender and class conflict came to dominate society, "tales of exemplary Union sufferers, selfless volunteers, and unprecedented benevolence would be few and far between" (p. 177).

These brief descriptions inadequately describe the book's finely reasoned, truly useful arguments. Clarke takes the popular culture of the Civil War North at face value, although that does not mean she accepts it uncritically. She effectively acknowledges the vast literature on civilian mobilization, soldiers' lives, memory, and other crucial components of the era's historiography, challenging, among others, George M. Fredrickson's interpretation of the Sanitary Commission as a harbinger of industrial-era bureaucracy.

It would have been instructive for Clarke to have investigated a little further how these same attitudes played out in the Confederacy. Many of the ideas that formed the basis for responses to suffering were American values, rather than merely New England values. That said, expanding the book's scope to include Confederate notions of sacrifice might have disrupted the tight focus of her argument, not to mention the symmetry of the evidence. Slavery did, of course, cast a long shadow over virtually every intellectual and social facet of the South, and the vast outpouring of war-time literary examinations of sacrifice that appeared in the North were less present in the resource-strapped Confederacy. A possible entry point for Confederate sacrifice might have been the epilogue; even as northerners began to reject the seemingly simplistic patriotism of the war stories that had so moved them in the 1860s, southerners made their versions a key component of the Lost Cause.

This is a tightly argued, superbly written, and convincing interpretation of an often overlooked slice of American culture. It really is a model for grappling with the issues raised by the cultural manifestations of war in any era. As such, it is a worthy partner to Drew Gilpin Faust's This Republic of Suffering: Death and the American Civil War (2008), another book that looks at the meaning of the great cataclysm of the Civil War in original and intimate ways.

JAMES MARTEN
Marquette University

JAMES MARTEN. Sing Not War: The Lives of Union and Confederate Veterans in Gilded Age America. (Civil War America.) Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 339. $39.95.

In this study of America's Civil War veterans in the Gilded Age, James Marten seeks answers to the questions "How did veterans live, and how were they seen to live?" (p. 5). The result is a sensitive, judicious, and thought-provoking book. Marten focuses on the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, but his conclusions raise further questions and invite comparisons to the experiences of veterans and their fellow Americans' attitudes toward them in other generations.

Marten entitles his chapter headings with phrases from Walt Whitman's 1867 poem "A Carol of Harvest," later republished as "The Return of the Heroes," a poignant treatment of the return of soldiers to their homes and their struggles in readjusting to postwar life. The chapters cover demobilization and homecoming; veterans' disabilities and the varying responses of civilians to them; the commodification of the war and of veterans' memories; "soldiers' homes" built with public funds for disabled or poor veterans; pensions and "veterans' preference" for government jobs; and finally veterans' self-identities as distinct and forever set apart from non-veterans who could never fully understand their experiences and perceptions. In each section, he describes a variety of white veterans' experiences and, even more fully, the profound ambivalence of other citizens toward the veterans themselves. In the chapter on soldiers' homes, for example, the public was torn between sympathy for the men in them and disgust for those who drank heavily and committed petty crimes. Moreover, by settling in their homes, veterans sacrificed most of their independence, "manhood," and status in a Gilded Age society that valued vigor, self-reliance, and prosperity. And while a large majority of the public and Congress often agreed that the disabled and impoverished saviors of the Union deserved pensions, at other times civilians opposed these “handouts” and resented veterans for demanding or even applying for them. Civilians were also torn between sympathy and disgust for men who suffered from what was becoming recognized as “alcoholism,” and were just beginning to understand the symptoms of what would later be called “shell shock” or “post-traumatic stress.”

Marten admits that his study is neither comprehensive nor fully representative. First, he believes that most Civil War veterans adjusted better to postbellum life than those who receive the bulk of the coverage in his book. He helpfully suggests, however, that the experiences and struggles of the latter were almost certainly relevant to a lesser degree for those who seemed to have adjusted comparatively well. And he convincingly argues that, as in the Vietnam era, the struggles of those who were most physically or emotionally scarred profoundly affected how other citizens came to view veterans as a whole. Second, Marten’s text does not study the experiences of black Civil War veterans, and he explains that attempting to do so would add several layers of analysis and make his study unwieldy—thus pointing to another fruitful area of research.

Finally, as Marten concedes, the narrative is heavily weighted toward the experiences of northern veterans. Still, he is able to remind readers that ex-Confederates’ postwar lives were different in several ways. Southern veterans received even more respect and sympathy from fellow southerners than Union soldiers enjoyed in the North, and almost none of the suspicion and disdain. When they received government support they received far less, partially explaining why there was virtually no opposition to state pensions or soldiers’ homes in the southern states. At the same time, their efforts to prosper or even survive in the postbellum southern economy were even grimmer than those of northern veterans. And partly because they became ossified in marble in southern culture, the gap between them and their fellow citizens was just as wide as it was in the North. Veterans in both sections were anxious about their reputations and zealous to preserve their manhood and independent status. For ex-Confederates, however, their determination to do so was exacerbated by the humiliation of defeat, the region’s economic struggles, and the challenges that emancipation and Reconstruction offered to white supremacy.

This study is informed by wide-ranging primary research. Marten also benefits greatly from previous studies on postwar reconciliation, commemoration, and popular memory; Gilded Age culture; Civil War pensions and veterans’ homes; and veterans’ experiences, and he often quotes from them. However, he does not blindly follow the lead of other historians as much as he stands on their shoulders. The final virtue of this book lies in its tone and in Marten’s sensitivity. He is neither overly sentimental and fawning nor condescending in his treatment of Civil War veterans. He is clear-eyed about their struggles, successes, and faults, and fully in touch with their humanity. Thus, while Marten recognizes the chasm between veterans and civilians of their own day, he succeeds admirably in bridging the gap between “the old soldiers” and modern readers.

ROD ANDREW JR.
Clemson University

SUSAN J. PEARSON. The Rights of the Defenseless: Protecting Animals and Children in Gilded Age America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 260. $45.00.

Scholars seeking to explain why the only late nineteenth-century organization prepared to act to protect children was the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (ASPCA) have been satisfied to point to humanitarianism. In this insightful, illuminating book, Susan J. Pearson probes that explanation in a lucid intellectual and cultural history of the connection between animal and child protection that explores both its rhetorical and institutional dimensions. In doing so, she resituates Gilded Age reform movements, too often lost between the fervor of activity in the antebellum and Progressive eras, as the beginning of the “long Progressive Era,” a moment of key transformations that combined sentimental and liberal language, merged older status-based views of hierarchy and dependence with a newer language of rights, and intertwined private and public power.

Pearson shows how the persistence of sentimentalism as a culturally salient and politically important force in postbellum American life lay at the heart of the vision that shaped humane societies concerned to protect both animals and children. Through this lens, animals and children appeared as similar beings, both speechless and helpless, unable to act on their own behalf, and innocent and pure. Crucially, both were capable of forming intense emotional bonds and reciprocal relations, including with each other. These close cultural associations saw animals incorporated into the emotional order of domesticity, as pets whose care aided the development of children and helped provide the “affective glue” that constituted the family. The same disciplinary regime of kindness applied to animals and children, with the character of both vulnerable to being ruined through cruelty and redeemed through kindness. While Pearson extends her analysis of the sentimental strain of humane reform in a discussion of how the similar spirit of the violence toward animals and children—the “slippery slope of passionate violence” that constituted cruelty—linked their protection, it is her deft analysis of the rise of pet keeping and location of animals at the heart of the family that is the transformative insight, one that highlights that the child-centered family channeled both sentimentalism and liberalism, and one that opens the way to recognition of how reformers merged those two apparently opposed visions and extended rights discourse.

The defenselessness of animals and children provided an obstacle to granting them rights, implying dependence at odds with the independence required of classical liberalism’s rights-bearing individual. To rec-oncile that opposition, humane reformers articulated what Pearson labels sentimental liberalism, arguing that rights could rest on capacities such as feeling and sentience and thus be extended to the weak, dependent, and helpless. In making this argument, they not only participated in the debate about rights provoked by the end of slavery; they also imported the rhetoric and cultural symbols of abolitionists. Claims for rights centered on proving that animals felt pain and had the capacity for domestic affections, both among themselves and with humans. Humane reformers also traded on the success of first person narratives and literary representations of slavery, searching for their movement's Uncle Tom's Cabin, a text that would draw readers into imagining themselves in the position of animals. 1890 finally saw the discovery of such a text, Anna Sewell's novel Black Beauty. If the novel contributed to convincing Americans that animals suffered, granting them a sentience that brought them into the circle of rights-bearing beings, Pearson notes that the focus on suffering had the drawback of reinforcing difference and dependence and precluding recognition of equality, granting rights without equality and consonant with protection. Crucially, that vision was not anachronistic, but reflected a complex world in which it was increasingly unclear how much control individuals could exercise over their own lives.

Anti-cruelty workers stood not just at a moment of transformation in liberalism, but also at a crossroads in transformations of governance. They formed hybrid organizations that pursued law enforcement, going beyond the charity tradition to create an active masculinized form of the humanitarian that saw private charities endowed with public police powers. Pearson's exploration of these changes echoes the terms of recent literature, with her real contribution being to illuminate the transitional nature of this moment: while using law, humane reformers retained many of the assumptions and much of the language of earlier activists, relying heavily on moral suasion and faith in the ameliorative effects of education and exposure to suffering. They saw law as transformative, not just punitive, and they used law enforcement to initiate a range of interventions that fell short of prosecution. Such nuanced analysis is the hallmark of this compelling book; much more than a case study of humane reform, it should be required reading for anyone seeking to understand the humanitarian sensibility and the trajectory of reform responses in modern America.

STEPHEN ROBERTSON
University of Sydney

DAVID G. SCHUSTER. Neurasthenic Nation: America's Search for Health, Happiness, and Comfort, 1869–1920. (Critical Issues in Health and Medicine.) New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 203. $42.95.

Although scholarship on neurasthenia is not new, this fascinating study utilizes the diagnosis to delve into the cultural effects of rapid “modernization” in the United States: capitalism, industrialization, and urbanization in the fifty plus years following the American Civil War. Within diverse geographies, David G. Schuster links a range of cultural production to medical definitions of nervous illness, charting changing understandings of subjectivity, the emotions, the self, alterations in definitions of masculine/feminine, conceptions of the relationship of mind and body, and turns toward spirituality and more healthful lifestyles. He explores how practitioners, from physicians to lay healers, commercializing patent medicine pushers (the predecessors of several contemporary drug companies), religiously oriented groups emerging from the “New Thought” movement, and even organizations such as the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), with its commitment to “muscular Christianity,” attempted to help people cope with this protean “dis-ease.”

Physical debility and mental anguish were not new to the nineteenth century, but the author assumes that in the past people stoically accepted such experiences as part of daily life. In contrast, an industrializing economy with new cultural entailments held out different possibilities: a transportation revolution, technological advances which increased production in agriculture and manufacturing, expectations of a steady rise in the standard of living, and the spread of education to a self-defining middle class with coherent and recognizable aspirations to social mobility, culture, and comfort. Accompanying these changes was the rise of a self-defining, increasingly hegemonic, “scientific” medical profession promoting novel psychiatric and physiological approaches to the cure of illness.

Schuster argues that the neurasthenia diagnosis thrived on the false promises of the booming economy's material progress, generating rising expectations that American lives would be filled with “happiness, peace and stability.” Faith in the market and the belief “that good health could be attained through therapeutic activities and purchases” fueled a growing intolerance of “unhappiness and discomfort” (p. 6). When anxiety, debility, exhaustion, and depression emerged as unexpected byproducts of rapid change, professionalizing physicians moving toward specialization and standardization were quick to respond by legitimating neurasthenia as an illness in need of medical treatment.

Then, as now, physicians diagnose but cannot always cure. What interests Schuster more than therapeutic outcomes are the ways neurasthenia shaped aspects of nineteenth and early twentieth-century American society and culture. He unearths a range of default assumptions linked to the disease's delineation. For example, Americans took pride in the class and nationalist entailments of the illness, which author George Miller Beard emphasized in his famous study, American Nervousness: Its Causes and Consequences (1881). An avid enthusiast of scientific research and an enemy of spiritualism, Beard's description of neurasthenia was not only racist but underscored American exceptionalism by arguing that U.S. society, unique in history, was the most “modern” on earth. Unfortunately, he asserted, American citizens who lived their lives as active, competitive, politically aware brain-workers were the most susceptible to the disease.

As physicians rose to the occasion to make sense of these new and unsettling experiences of mind and body, even they were divided among alienists, psychiatrists, neurologists, and general practitioners. They never gained complete control of treatment. Several groups and lay individuals interested in the disease published popular books, while beginning in the 1870s and accelerating thereafter, the information on neurasthenia became widely available to the public, training people in self-diagnosis.

By the 1880s, journalists and writers took up the subject, and neurasthenia found its place in popular culture and literature: patent medicine companies hawked “restorative medicines” and electric belts, while sports camps and vacation sites for adults advocated various forms of exercise and “lifestyle” changes. The advertising industry also took up neurasthenia. Individuals suffering from the disease were crucial to founding three different religious/spiritual groups: New Thought, Christian Science, and the Emmanuel Movement. The YMCA also responded, adding swimming pools and sports activities to its offerings, preaching healthy minds in healthy bodies. In the decades after 1900, various prescriptions for physical exercise eventually made their way into school curricula. Reverence for the myth of the frontier along with the handicraft, physical culture, and health resort movements were all partial responses to a quest for solutions to American nervousness.

Men and women suffered equally from the disease. A wonderful chapter on gender and health documents the subjective illness accounts of several articulate and introspective individuals, both male and female. These authoritative insights into their own subjectivity found in diaries and correspondence with physicians reveal much about how much damage the rigidity of prescribed gender roles wrought among certain individuals. Many sought tools to push back against the conventional notions of masculinity and femininity that hampered their full self-realization.

By the 1920s, the neurasthenia diagnosis was in decline; psychiatrists replaced it with a new umbrella term, “anxiety neurosis.” By the 1950s, popular parlance preferred “nervous breakdown.” But although the term disappeared, “dis-ease” still haunts us. Chronic fatigue syndrome, bipolar disorder, fibromyalgia, post-traumatic stress, irritable bowel syndrome, and other depressive disorders are our contemporary equivalents. Drug companies still advertise directly to consumers, urging self-diagnosis and treatment. Meanwhile, social and economic changes—increased work hours for less pay, speedups inherent in the contemporary technological innovations of free market capitalism, and myriad forms of self-exploitation—remain unanalyzed. These latter issues are addressed only by an insightful few, while more than a century after neur-asthenia’s heyday, capitalism’s tail still wags society’s dog.

REGINA MORANTZ-SANCHEZ
University of Michigan

LINDA V. CARLISLE. Elizabeth Packard: A Noble Fight. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2010. Pp. xii, 259. $40.00.

In 1860, Theophilus Packard committed his protesting wife Elizabeth to the Illinois State Hospital for the Insane in Jacksonville under the supervision of pioneering American psychiatrist Andrew McFarland. As Linda V. Carlisle notes in this book, “McFarland was about to learn what Theophilus Packard knew: Elizabeth Packard could be a troublesome woman” (p. 78). Carlisle’s biography of this “troublesome woman” provides a comprehensive study of Elizabeth’s life and her almost thirty years of work lobbying state legislatures to enact laws to protect the civil rights of the mentally ill and married women. Although Carlisle observes that Packard might be perceived as the antithesis of her contemporary, the better-known Dorothea Dix, her study suggests that Packard’s quest to protect the civil liberties of the insane derived from similar motives—to protect some of the most vulnerable in American society.

Although little known today, Elizabeth became a public figure in the 1860s after she emerged from the asylum and helped bring about the passage of Illinois’s “Packard’s Law,” which provided individuals the right to avoid commitment to an insane asylum by having a jury trial to determine their sanity. In describing how Packard became a champion for the civil rights of the mentally ill, Carlisle sets her life within the context of pre-Civil War America. At this time, the author suggests, “ideas about gender, religion, and insanity were fluid” (p. 15). In this context, Carlisle argues that Packard became a “transitional woman” (p. 5) whose actions, behaviors, and beliefs troubled notions of women’s place in society and contested orthodox religious and psychiatric practices.

Drawing on a variety of sources including Elizabeth’s books and letters, Theophilus’s diary and letters, as well as Dr. McFarland’s correspondence and reports, Carlisle tracks Packard’s life from her marriage to an older Calvinist minister, migration from Massachusetts to Ohio, then Iowa, and finally Illinois, and the birth of her children. Although in many ways a conventional spouse, Elizabeth believed in Swedenborgianism and spiritualism to the great distress of her husband. She also associated with abolitionists and women’s rights advocates in New York’s burned over district during a visit there. Fearing that his wife’s beliefs and behavior threatened their children, Theophilus committed his wife to an asylum.

Carlisle is most successful when she details Elizabeth’s life, particularly her commitment and the sensational trial to determine her sanity held after she was released from the state hospital. After the trial, she campaigned for changes in insanity laws and laws related to married women across Massachusetts, Connecticut, Iowa, New York, and Maine. To support herself and her lobbying efforts, Packard wrote numerous books and pamphlets, including The Prisoner's Hidden Life, or Insane Asylums Unveiled (1868), in which she described her experiences in the Illinois State Hospital for the Insane using the language and imagery of Gothic horror and romance. Packard's writing earned enough to purchase multiple homes and support her family and her estranged spouse. Moreover, her relentless efforts to change civil commitment laws produced a number of victories as states began to require more protections for those deemed mentally ill.

While describing Packard's travails, Carlisle also introduces the reader to the practice of nineteenth-century psychiatry as she describes the growth in insane asylums and the creation of professional organizations such as the Association of Medical Superintendents of American Institutions for the Insane. Using the story of Dr. McFarland, Carlisle shows how early practitioners of psychiatry in America worked to establish the credibility and authority of their profession.

However, Carlisle's analysis of Packard's battle to reform the law of insanity is weakest when the author relies on notions of separate spheres. While Packard herself may have drawn on the ideology of separate spheres to explain her life and struggles, this well-documented study would benefit from a more critical approach to the concept and perhaps a deeper engagement with current theoretical constructs in American women's history. Aside from these quibbles, readers will learn a great deal about Elizabeth Packard's efforts to change the laws related to sanity in the nineteenth century and why they mattered.

ELIZABETH M. SMITH-PRYOR
Kent State University

WILLIAM SERAILE. Angels of Mercy: White Women and the History of New York's Colored Orphan Asylum. New York: Fordham University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 287. $27.95.

New York City's Association for the Benefit of Colored Orphans, more commonly known as the Colored Orphan Asylum (COA), was the first orphanage in the United States dedicated to the care of African American children. In this book William Seraile carefully traces the evolution of the COA for over a century, from its founding in the antebellum era to the closure of the orphanage in Riverdale (the Bronx) in the mid-twentieth century. Relying primarily on COA annual reports and meeting minutes, Seraile sets out to demonstrate how the COA's goals, ideology, and relationship with New York City's black community changed over time.

Founded in 1836 by two Quaker women, Anna Shotwell and Mary Murray, the COA was originally located in Manhattan. Just two years earlier in 1834, a bloody anti-abolition riot had rocked the city, demonstrating the contempt that many whites felt toward blacks. Vicious mobs specifically targeted black homes and churches during the melee. Within this racial climate, a group of white women decided to establish the COA to provide medical care, schooling, and racial uplift to impoverished and orphaned black children.

Like many white activists during the antebellum era, the managers of the COA routinely patronized black clients, claiming that it was the responsibility of the COA to rescue them from lives of primitive culture, vice, and immorality. This dismissive view of African Americans also spurred the managers to rely on an indenture system that placed older children in low-paying domestic jobs as servants and laborers. In spite of this paternalistic attitude, the views of the founders were complex. As Seraile documents, the majority of the founding women came from Quaker families in Manhattan. Many of them embraced abolitionism and viewed their work with the COA as an extension of their activities in assisting the African American community. Moreover, these women routinely admitted the children of fugitive slaves. In spite of this support for abolition, the female founders adopted an apolitical public stance in their views of slavery. Seraile suggests that the women hid their political views because they feared offending potential donors during their near constant fundraising campaigns.

Seraile traces the various relocations of the COA, from its first building in Greenwich Village to its final location in the Bronx. Due to the rapid growth of the orphanage in its early years, the founders raised funds to construct a new building on Fifth Avenue between 43rd Street and 44th Street in 1843. During the New York City Draft Riots in 1863, however, mobs attacked the building and set it on fire after looting it. The female managers were able to evacuate all of the 200 children. Following the riot, the orphanage was temporarily housed on Blackwell Island until it relocated to a new building in Harlem. By 1883, over 300 children resided in the Harlem house, which remained the only orphanage dedicated to the care of black children in the city. COA managers embraced an industrial education program in which children received training for domestic jobs. At the turn of the century, the orphanage moved to a larger facility in the Bronx. At this Riverdale location, the COA adopted a cottage system in which children of different ages lived together in relatively small groups with "cottage parents" on the property.

Another change that occurred in the early twentieth century was that white managers of the COA began to make a concerted effort to include African Americans in leadership positions. In 1939, the COA finally named an African American woman to the board of trustees. In 1942, New York City passed an anti-discrimination law that required all city agencies to aid residents regardless of race. As a result, the orphanage began accepting white children and changed its name to the Riverdale Children's Association. At that same time, the orphanage began to place children in foster homes rather than housing them at the Riverdale location, which ultimately led to its closing.

Seraile situates his analysis within the historiography of nineteenth-century female activists and most notably relates his work to Anne M. Boylan's The Origins of Women's Activism: New York and Boston, 1797–1840 (2002). In particular, he emphasizes the accomplishments as well as the shortcomings of the founding women of the COA. Seraile illustrates how white women in benevolent societies drew upon their domestic experiences to take responsibility for the welfare of black children. At the same time, however, he is also quite blunt in his criticism of how white women at the COA adopted policies that reinforced the social and economic inequality facing black New Yorkers.

Seraile's book is a valuable contribution to the history of New York City and to studies of women reformers.

JANE E. DABEL
California State University,
Long Beach

DAVID A. ZONDERMAN. Uneasy Allies: Working for Labor Reform in Nineteenth-Century Boston. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 312. $28.95.

David A. Zonderman has written a rich case study on an underexplored topic—nineteenth-century labor reform in Boston—by investigating the alliances between working- and middle-class reformers. Given the many challenges in organizing, particularly across class divides, the effort is worthwhile. Zonderman's thesis is stated in his book's title: namely, it was quite challenging for working- and middle-class Bostonians who supported labor reform to come together. Arguably, it was even harder to achieve results, but the author spends less time focusing on reformers' limited successes than he does on their motivations and ideologies. The book shows how a dozen reform organizations originated, grew, and collapsed over the course of the 1800s. Thus, his monograph is a history neither of Boston's nineteenth-century working class nor of organized labor in that time and place; rather, it studies labor reform campaigns. Zonderman chose Boston because it was a "vibrant center for labor reform organizations throughout the nineteenth century" (p. 6). He makes a convincing argument that it was as typical as any large industrial city in the era; alas, he makes few overt connections to other cities, either in the text or notes, which would have enriched the book.

The text is divided into two sections: from the 1830s through the 1870s, and the final decades of the century. Of course, labor reform was among many movements that arose in the 1830s (although Zonderman does not make that point), some of which gained momentum in the mid-century; Boston's labor reformers viewed their efforts as the first step in a broader attempt to overhaul American society. After the Civil War, the eight-hour movement dominated the agenda, with numerous groups supporting this cause. Finally, at the century's end, new middle- and upper-class organizations appeared, part of the emerging Progressive movement, that were far less willing to engage working-class Bostonians as equals. Zonderman persuasively demonstrates that these new associations "saw workers more as objects of reform than as partners in the cause of social justice" (p. 240). This strategic shift to top-down was, at least partially, due to the changing composition of Boston's working class, increasingly Catholics and Jews from Southern and Eastern Europe. The book ends around 1900, essentially with the demise of cross-class labor alliances, although they soon refreshed themselves in groups like the Women's Trade Union League.

In the introduction, Zonderman does a good job laying out his main arguments and interest in the intellectual history of labor reform activists and their organizations. However, the reader can get lost when learning about numerous short-lived organizations that promoted the eight- or ten-hour day, tenement labor regulation, labor unions, and the like. After a while, the chapters seem to run together because the issues and battles seem to repeat themselves. Since Zonderman's gaze is tightly focused, even related matters in Boston receive little attention. The reader does not learn about anarchist or other radical groups whose members were not "reformers." Zonderman does spend time discussing the intellectual origins and ideas of Christian Socialism in Boston, yet he barely mentions Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward or the nationalist movement. While there is value in documenting the efforts of cross-class labor reformers at a level of detail that no one has attempted before, it would have been even better if the author had made more connections to similar individuals, groups, and battles in Boston and nationwide. For instance, Zonderman discusses the role of the Knights of Labor in Boston in approximately three pages. Similarly, he devotes just a few pages to the Gilded Age's best-known labor-related events, like the 1877 Great Uprising or eight-hour strikes of 1886. Zonderman's primary research is quite rich, but the book would be stronger if it was better connected and contextualized to related matters in Boston and beyond.

If someone is looking for a history of nineteenth-century Boston's working class and union history, Zonderman's text will provide helpful insights, although it is no survey of these topics. This book is also useful for social movement activists today—regardless of their focus—in terms of forming alliances with people of different class backgrounds.

PETER COLE
Western Illinois University

MARIA I. DIEDRICH. Cornelia James Cannon and the Future American Race. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press. 2010. Pp. xii, 267. Cloth $80.00, paper $28.95.

Cornelia James Cannon (1876–1969) was a popular essayist, outspoken feminist, and Progressive reformer obsessed with the need to preserve the white race in America. She used her prolific pen in the 1920s and 1930s to clamor in popular magazines for immigration restriction, birth control, and sterilization of the unfit. Maria I. Diedrich has produced a beautifully written and wonderfully insightful biography of Cannon that skillfully situates her as a representative of that pioneering generation of white, middle-class, female reformers during the Progressive era.

The book is organized into ten chronological chapters. The first two describe Cannon's childhood in Minnesota and then her remarkably shallow education as a member of Radcliffe's class of 1899, where she was taught by condescending professors such as William James and eugenicist Charles Benedict Davenport and her classmates included Gertrude Stein (who would become her life-long nemesis). Cannon would always be a devoted supporter of Radcliffe, which in 1965 bestowed on her the "Founder Award."

Chapter three shows how Cornelia James began her career as a reformer by doing volunteer social work in the slums of Boston. She married renowned physiologist Walter B. Cannon, and the couple performed their duty to the race by producing five children (one of whom grew up to marry Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.) while maintaining friendships with such eugenicists as Robert M. Yerkes, Edward M. East, and Robert De Courcey Ward.

Chapter four shows how World War I, during which Walter Cannon served in Europe, liberated Cornelia by forcing her to make decisions independently of her spouse. She became involved in the women's suffrage movement and the effort to stamp out venereal disease. Chapter five depicts the newly empowered Cannon agitating after the war for immigration restriction and birth control as a form of negative eugenics. After the 1929 Crash, Cannon—like most eugenicists—blamed the Great Depression on biological exhaustion and opposed the "dysgenic" reforms of the New Deal that allowed the poor to survive and propagate their inferior kind.

In chapters six through nine Diedrich provides a detailed analysis of Cannon's sentimental, propagandistic, and rather mediocre novels (the most successful of which, Red Rust, made it onto the bestseller lists in 1928). Cannon wrote these reductively biologicistic and didactic works in order to disseminate her eugenic discourse of racial xenophobia.

The final chapter briefly covers the last thirty years of Cannon's life, when the former supporter of coercive sterilization for the unfit transformed herself after World War II into a staunch advocate of family planning in the Third World. This was a pattern typical of many eugenicists. Interestingly, in the 1950s Cannon opposed McCarthyism and guardedly supported the socialist experiment in the USSR. She died in 1969 at the age of ninety-three.

As Diedrich relates the events of Cannon's life, two pervasive (and convincing) themes continually reoccur: first, that race—"the ultimate definer and corruptor" (p. 8)—is the key to understanding the American experience; and second, that Cannon, and all of the other members of her social world, were thoroughly unaware of how white privilege and male privilege continually prescribed their attitudes and behavior.

I am struck by the similarities between Cannon and Madison Grant (the subject of my book, Defending the Master Race: Conservation, Eugenics, and the Legacy of Madison Grant [2008]). Both Cannon and Grant were progressive conservatives who initiated reform in order to preserve the status of their race and class. Both evinced an all-pervasive anxiety that the white race was being submerged due to the deluge of immigrants and the tragedy of race suicide. But both possessed an almost religious faith that science would ensure the success of their reformist agenda via the massive biological engineering project known as eugenics. The main differences between the two were gender and the fact that Cannon produced volumes of letters and memoirs.

Maria Diedrich does a masterful job of providing an empathetic portrait of Cannon. We feel that we understand this ambitious, vivacious, and witty woman, even as we decry her biologicistic monocausalism. Furthermore, Diedrich perfectly balances the story of the individual with the history of her time, class, and gender. This thoughtful and perceptive book should be read by anyone interested in feminism, Progressivism, racism, eugenics, or the art of biography.

JONATHAN PETER SPIRO
Castleton State College

JENNIFER M. ROSS-NAZZAL. Winning the West for Women: The Life of Suffragist Emma Smith DeVoe. Seattle: University of Washington Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 256. $26.95.

In this book, Jennifer M. Ross-Nazzal explores the life of one of the least well-known but most important leaders in the American equal suffrage movement. Not as prominent as Susan B. Anthony, Carrie Chapman Catt, or Alice Paul, Emma Smith DeVoe waged a four-decade battle to obtain the ballot for American women. Ross-Nazzal traces DeVoe's organizing efforts in several midwestern and western states ranging from Illinois and Iowa to Idaho and Washington. The author begins with DeVoe's early years in the Dakota territory promoting temperance reform. Her experience with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union both introduced her to the world of politics and steered her into her first equal suffrage campaign. Ross-Nazzal argues that DeVoe's experience in the South Dakota suffrage campaign helped convince her of the best tactics and strategies suffragists should employ. Femininity and a less confrontational style, DeVoe concluded, would be a more effective strategy to convince male voters to grant women the ballot.

Despite the failure of the South Dakota campaign, DeVoe's efforts captured the attention of national voting rights leaders, who hired her as lecturer and organizer for several state suffrage drives. Gaining national prominence meant that DeVoe crossed paths with numerous regional and national reformers. The author provides wonderful insights into the personal and ideological conflicts that characterized the national movement. Catt and other leading members of the National American Woman Suffrage Association (NAWSA), for example, butted heads with DeVoe and western suffragists over tactics and the different political culture of western communities. DeVoe criticized organizers who insisted on imposing a national strategy on western state campaigns, which, more often than not, alienated important local coordinators who supported the cause.

By the early twentieth century, Emma and her husband had moved to Washington, where she managed that state's successful 1910 campaign, spawning similar triumphs in other western states over the next few years. However, the Washington battle also involved one of the low points in DeVoe's life. In 1909 she hosted the NAWSA convention at the Seattle Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition, where a public confrontation with a competing state suffrage leader ended with DeVoe's dismissal by NAWSA officials. Following the Washington victory, DeVoe formed a new organization, the National Council of Woman Voters, which advocated for a national constitutional amendment. This led, the author argues, to DeVoe's brief alliance with Alice Paul's more radical Congressional Union. DeVoe's presence softened the image of that national organization, though Paul's continuing militancy soon made it impossible to maintain their tenuous relationship. Chalking up victories in more and more western states, the author suggests, also influenced the national debate over equal suffrage. Female voters in western locales both undermined the tired arguments espoused by anti-suffragists and also pressured their states' congressmen, who could no longer ignore newly enfranchised women.

One important contribution of Ross-Nazzari's study is that she examines the life of a leading suffragist after winning the vote. In the 1920s, DeVoe relinquished the non-partisan style she had promoted in suffrage campaigns and became involved in partisan politics. She joined Washington's Republican Party and fought a valiant effort to gain a greater voice for women within the party. DeVoe also wrote numerous newspaper columns publicly criticizing Democrats in the 1920 presidential election. This brief glimpse into post-suffrage politics suggests that the larger goal of equal voting rights may have only temporarily muted women's natural partisanship, which might help explain the lack of a women's voting bloc that many Americans expected to materialize following the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment.

Ross-Nazzari's book is an excellent complement to the literature on woman suffrage in the American West. Reminding scholars of the significance of the West to the national suffrage movement, the author provides insight into the inner workings of voting rights campaigns, including the tactics, strategies, conflicts, and even backstabbing that gave life to this movement. Moreover, she indicates the importance of regional difference in shaping state and national campaigns. Yet, as with many biographies, placing DeVoe at the center of the story can distort her actual role in the numerous efforts with which she was involved. Nevertheless, scholars will find this volume a welcome addition to current studies of the crusade to gain political equality for women.

JOHN PUTMAN

San Diego State University

MARCELLA BENCIVENNI. Italian Immigrant Radical Culture: The Idealism of the Sovversivi in the United States, 1890–1940. New York: New York University Press, 2011. Pp. viii, 279. $50.00.

Marcella Bencivenni's book rigorously documents and vividly recounts the astonishing range and productivity of two generations of radical Italian culture in the United States. With two staunch conservative Italian Americans currently sitting on the Supreme Court, most Americans might be surprised to learn that the Italians in America represented one of the most radical ethnic groups to come ashore during the mass wave of immigration between the late nineteenth century and the early decades of the twentieth. Long thought to be merely "amoral familists" with a myopically focused obsession with family, a deference to the Catholic Church, and insistence on clinging to the conservative values of patriarchy, nationalism, and tradition, many migrants from both the north of Italy and the Mezzogiorno (the south and islands of Sicily and Sardinia) instead arrived in the United States already imbued with a radical tradition rooted either in socialism or anarchism. Culturally, many had been formed by participation in agrarian leagues or the numerous case del popolo in Italy. Others, like the anarchist Bartolomeo Vanzetti, disembarked as apolitical immigrants, but their experience of the brutal conditions of an unbridled capitalism radicalized them.

Bencivenni has organized the seven chapters of her book into two thematic sections and what might be considered five case studies: essays on the Italian American radical press; the stage and theater; literary radicalism; and studies of Arturo Giovannitti, "the poet and prophet of labor," and radical cartoonist Fort (Fortunato) Velona. Broadening the definition of the "political" to include cultural production might not seem so innovative, but in the field of Italian American studies it is a welcome theoretical move. Bencivenni argues that "class alone cannot explain the soversivi's radicalism." That radicalism was "rooted in cultural as well as social experiences—shaped by their ethnic identity and immigrant experiences as well as by their internationalist credo and commitment to working-class revolution" (p. 3). Bencivenni's book demonstrates how this radicalism "embodied a complex system of traditions, institutions, and values that immigrants brought with them from Italy and adapted to new American circumstances" (p. 3).

Chapter one, "Italian American Radicalism: Old World Roots, New World Developments," reminds us that economic and social conditions for the millions of landless peasants, day laborers, and artisans of the Mezzogiorno declined precipitously after the unification of Italy in the nineteenth century. Once the technologies of the telegram and steamship were available, many Italians expressed their opinion of the new nation state by emigrating. Emigration and the phenomenon of brigandaggio are perhaps the most eloquent indictment of the new Italy. Italians brought with them experience in the many società di mutuo soccorso (mutual aid societies) and fasci dei lavoratori (literally “bundles” of workers), labor unions, and agrarian leagues. Craftsmen could point with pride to their participation in guilds that traced their histories back to the Middle Ages.

The radical movement had its own internal contradictions and dissent that Bencivenni points out. As much as they may have argued for the emancipation of the workers, many radical leaders stubbornly retained patriarchal ideas about gender roles and relations. Politically, anarchists, socialists, communists, syndicalists, and anti-fascists were often bitter enemies, fighting among themselves almost as much as they did against fascists in America and their supporters. Chapter two, “The Sovversivi and Their Cultural World,” describes the rich offerings for the men and women who placed themselves against church and political authorities, capitalism, and the prominenti (Italians and Italian Americans who had achieved prominence in the New World, often at the expense of their fellow emigrants). They belonged to various Circoli or Università Popolare; attended political picnics, dances, theaters, and dinners; and brought with them from Italy the traditional May Day celebrations. Chapter three, “A Literary Class War,” documents the extraordinary vitality and extent of the radical press, with hundreds of newspapers printed across the country. Incendiary topics included race (support of African Americans), anti-militarism, anti-clericalism, anti-nationalism, and “the woman question.” Almost as important was the radical theater, dealt with in chapter four, since it reached an audience nearly as large as the press. Chapter five, on literary radicalism, rescues from obscurity some unjustly neglected writers (male and female), while Giovannitti merits a chapter of his own. The eighteen anti-fascist cartoons of Velona in chapter seven amply demonstrate his ability to convey a sophisticated critique of Benito Mussolini’s regime to a wide audience, often in very clever ways.

In her conclusion, Bencivenni argues that, although the sovversivi were always a minority, they managed to forge a critique of American culture and capitalism that was not just reactive but proactive. Sadly though, “the American environment refined those ideas, transforming, and eventually erasing, Italian radicalism” (p. 223). Hence those two conservative Italian Americans on the U.S. Supreme Court today.

STANISLAO G. PUGLIESE
Hofstra University

RACHEL SCHREIBER. Gender and Activism in a Little Magazine: The Modern Figures of the Masses. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2011. Pp. xi, 182. $104.95.

Boldly conceived cartoons and drawings made the socialist monthly, The Masses, a uniquely modern publication. From its founding in 1911 until government suppression forced the magazine out of print in 1917, its pages featured a range of images supplied by painters of the Ashcan School, illustrators from the Arts and Crafts movement, and career cartoonists, alongside some of the most radical writers of the day. Their images fused realism with modernism to convey the impressions, aspirations, and goals of workers and the political Left. In this book Rachel Schreiber thoughtfully examines how the magazine simultaneously complicated and reinscribed the period’s gender conventions.

The Masses had a strong feminist bent, as Margaret C. Jones observed nearly two decades ago, yet Schreiber provides the first serious analysis of its gendered imagery. The first chapter explores how drawings by Robert Minor and other artists contrasted a muscular working-class manliness with the “inferior masculinity” of effete capitalists and bloated fat cats. Women rarely figured as workers in the magazine’s images, Schreiber notes; when they did, they represented the evils of the industrial workplace—typically the sweatshop—rather than workers in their own right. Given Minor’s more nuanced drawings in other publications, Schreiber suggests that The Masses’ editors deliberately promoted “the muscular male working class figure to heroic status to further their political aims, leaving female workers . . . to serve only as symbols for the adverse aspects of individual labor” (p. 60). The exception to this rule was the figure of the mother, the magazine’s generic marker of working-class privation. In the second chapter, Schreiber demonstrates how, in the cartoons of Art Young and others, “downtrodden mothers appeared regularly, and remained obdurate and unchanging in The Masses throughout the magazine’s run” (p. 69). Unlike the Gibson Girls and scientific mothers of mainstream advertising, The Masses’ gallery of sorrowful mothers, poor families, and (hinted) infanticide revealed the hardships of modern, industrial capitalism. It was a conception of family life that saw women as passive victims, worthy of sympathy; it did not challenge traditional views of women’s role as primarily maternal.

The Masses’ artists did challenge some characteristics of mainstream gender stereotypes, notably working-class women’s sexuality, as Schreiber shows in the third chapter. Ashcan artist John Sloan’s contributions, among others, depicted women partaking of the new sexual freedoms, offered a spirited critique of Comstockery, and showed steady support for family limitation. Where traditional iconography conflated working women’s sexuality with prostitution, The Masses’ artists blamed prostitution on capitalism and male greed and retained a strong sense of women’s agency in choosing prostitution out of a range of unpalatable options. (A few of these images seem to contradict Schreiber's male/female dichotomy in the earlier chapters; this is particularly true of one striking omission, an image that appears in other works, which refigures Adam and Eve as a weak male protected by a giant Amazon.) Overall, Schreiber demonstrates that such images, by depicting women as sexual agents, offered a welcome counterpoint to white slavery hysteria in mainstream media.

Schreiber's most compelling chapter compares the impact of the European war in images in The Masses with those in contemporary progressive publications. In the early 1910s, suffrage artists such as Annie Lou Rogers developed an iconography of maternal pacifism that critiqued both militarism and exaggerated masculinity. Rogers' work was notably absent from The Masses' imaginary, however; Schreiber speculates that The Masses' editors saw women primarily as victims of militarism, forced to supply the war machine with either soldiers or munitions. The contrast is revealing, though short-lived. As Americans debated intervention in the European war, suffrage papers gradually adopted a pro-preparedness stance that squeezed out the older dissent; early depictions of women's maternalist pacifism declined, and suffrage images increasingly resembled conventional pro-war propaganda, depicting women in ways that anticipated the conservatism of the postwar years. Meanwhile, The Masses' images remained more consistently antiwar, right up to the magazine's 1917 suppression by the post office, but relied on "conventional representations of gender, even while claiming to critique the status quo" (p. 154).

The contrast points out the central irony of Schreiber's analysis: that The Masses challenged economic inequality in its visual culture but often resorted to traditional gender conventions to do so. In the end, she hedges, characterizing this failure to envision a new way of seeing women as social actors as "evidence of just how entrenched and resistant to change gender ideologies can be" (p. 163). This does not detract from the book, which has great value for historians (although some may quibble with the book's chronology in a few places); it raises questions that inevitably confront scholars of the visual past, particularly the ways in which seemingly "universal" symbols can reproduce the very culture they seek to change. In this sense, it is not surprising that The Masses' "bold" images were, in some ways, less radical than its words.

AMANDA FRISKEN
State University of New York,
College at Old Westbury

EDWARD O. FRANTZ. The Door of Hope: Republican Presidents and the First Southern Strategy, 1877–1933. (New Perspectives on the History of the South.) Gainesville: University Press of Florida. 2011. Pp. xii, 295. $69.95.

Edward O. Frantz's study is an engaging addition to recent books that have re-examined the evolution of the Republican Party's attitude toward questions of race and section in the decades after Reconstruction. Frantz aims to shed light on how, in rhetoric and policy, the party of Abraham Lincoln became, by Ronald Reagan's time, "the party of the white South" (p. 2). Frantz focuses on a series of presidential tours through the South as key indicators of the Republicans' abandonment of their role as champions of African Americans' rights. In a chronological narrative he offers vivid accounts of the planning and execution of the tours as well as reaction to them by the press, northern and southern, and black and white citizens.

The motivation for Rutherford B. Hayes's conciliatory southern tour preceded the alleged Compromise of 1877, the impact and demonstrability of which modern scholars doubt. Hayes had long embraced a let-alone policy toward the South. As a candidate for president, he had signaled his intention to end federal military intervention, provided that the region's leaders would agree to uphold the new constitutional amendments. Early in his term, after he had secured such assurance from leaders in Louisiana and South Carolina, he withdrew the troops. A few months later Hayes went south to tout sectional and racial harmony. Before his term ended, however, southern white leaders had reneged on promises of fair treatment of blacks. When Democrats in Congress sought to repeal voting rights legislation by attaching riders to appropriations bills, Hayes repeatedly used his veto to save Reconstruction election laws. By 1880 he had concluded that southern white recalcitrance required Republicans to place issues of section and racial justice again at the top of their political agenda.

President Benjamin Harrison's southern swing was part of a larger nationwide tour that had a variety of objectives. He urged southerners to transcend past racial and sectional prejudices and embrace the Republicans' nationalistic economic program, which, he said, promised prosperity for all. Harrison addressed his hosts respectfully, but he also lectured white southerners on the sanctity of the law, thereby presenting a thinly veiled endorsement of African Americans' constitutional rights. Moreover, in messages to Congress and otherwise, he forcefully pushed for new legislation to protect blacks' right to vote. The Lodge or Federal Elections Bill of 1890, which came within a whisker of passage, would have gone far to upend the oppressive racial settlement in the South. Before he left office, Harrison became the first American president publicly to condemn lynching.

As Frantz shows, the William McKinley administration proved to be the pivotal turning point in the Republicans' abandonment of African Americans. After the defeat of the Lodge Bill, three circumstances rendered McKinley's course all but inevitable: the "legal" disfranchisement of blacks by southern states, the Democrats' 1894 repeal of Reconstruction-era federal voting-rights laws, and Booker T. Washington's 1895 Atlanta Compromise speech, which seemed to sanction a general submergence of blacks' political rights. Mobilizing support for the Spanish-American War and subsequent peace negotiations, McKinley forbore solicitude for African Americans in his drive to rally white southerners to the cause of national unity.

President Theodore Roosevelt's 1905 tour followed McKinley's example. After offending white southerners by dining with Washington at the White House and making unpopular patronage decisions, Roosevelt visited the region to make amends. Although on one occasion he condemned lynching, he generally saluted southern patriotism and urged blacks to acquiesce in gradual change. His trip soured his relations with the black press, which hit rock bottom after Roosevelt's impulsive mishandling of the 1906 Brownsville affair.

In 1908 William Howard Taft campaigned in the South, reprising a strategy dating back to 1884 when James G. Blaine had swung through West Virginia, appealing to New South interests to reject sectional prejudice and benefit from Republican economic policies. In his inaugural address, Taft declared that the Fifteenth Amendment should be observed, but he considered it entirely consistent with the amendment for states to disfranchise the "ignorant" of both races. During a tour early in his term, Taft fell victim to southern mendacity; he reveled in the warm greetings of whites who had no intention of giving him real support. In an epilogue, Frantz chronicles Herbert Hoover's doomed attempt to build a white southern Republican Party after winning several southern states over Catholic contender Al Smith.

Underlying this depressing narrative is the utter intractability of southern racism. No amount of presidential propitiation could break dominant white southerners' fanatical determination to retain power through one-party control at whatever cost. Although ill-served by his publisher's editorial staff, Frantz writes lively prose. Readers interested in the devolution of Republicans' commitment to racial justice—the descent from the party of Lincoln to the party of Reagan—will reap substantial rewards from this fascinating and disturbing book.

CHARLES W. CALHOUN
East Carolina University

DONNA A. BARNES. The Louisiana Populist Movement, 1881–1900. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 2011. Pp. xx, 318. $45.00.

Donna A. Barnes has made an important contribution to the body of existing statewide studies on Populism in the South. Her book is the first major work on Populism in Louisiana to appear since William Hair's Bourbonism and Agrarian Protest: Louisiana Politics (1969). When discussing Populism in the South, much of the scholarly focus has been on attempted explanations of why "biracial coalitions" between African Americans and white southerners did not succeed. Most famous are the cases of Populism in Georgia, Texas, and North Carolina. Barnes looks at Louisiana, arguing that the principal organization of African Americans with regard to the Populist movement, the Colored Farmers' Alliance (CFA), "a parallel organization of the whites-only Alliance" (p. 85), was out of sync with the needs of most rural African Americans (largely cashless sharecroppers). Barnes states that the CFA employed strategies that were more appropriate for landowners with cash to support the organization's projects. That, combined with high rates of illiteracy among African Americans and white Louisianans' racist attitudes, led to only moderate mobilization among African Americans by white Populists, argues Barnes. A black and white independent coalition would never be consolidated, let alone developed, in the state.

Explaining the inability to initiate or sustain biracial alliances in the Populist movement has long been a project among scholars of the period, beginning with C. Vann Woodward in the late 1930s. Populism became equated with racist actions, most famously in Richard Hofstadter's The Age of Reform: From Bryan to F. D. R. (1955). Efforts to counter this narrative came in the 1960s, for instance with Walter Nugent's The Tolerant Populists: Kansas, Populism and Nativism (1963), and in the 1970s with Lawrence Goodwyn's The Democratic Promise: The Populist Moment in America (1976). Emphasis was placed instead on the economic commonalities between rural African Americans and their poor white counterparts. Nevertheless, the perspective articulated remained that of white Populists.

The idea of looking at Populism from the perspective of African Americans is only beginning to be considered more fully. (Jack Abramowitz's "Accommodation and Militancy in Negro Life" [Ph.D. dissertation, Columbia University, 1950] did so but had a marginal impact on subsequent historians.) Black farmers, sharecroppers, and agrarian workers were not merely an "appendage" to the white-led Populist movement, as John Hicks characterized them in The Populist Revolt: A History of the Farmers' Alliance and the People's Party (1931); they were building a movement of their own that was, at times, in tactical alliance with the white-led movement. Charles Postel's The Populist Vision (2007) and my own In the Lion's Mouth: Black Populism in the New South, 1886–1900 (2010) are recent efforts to look at African American Populists as having a separate movement with their own leaders, organizations, and interests.

Barnes follows in the footsteps of most historians of Populism. For instance, she repeats the concept of the CFA being white-led, since its general superintendent, Richard M. Humphrey, was white (p. 85). What is not discussed is how Humphrey was chosen by sixteen black leaders of the organization to engage the white press and lobby in Congress on their behalf. Moreover, Barnes discusses how African Americans benefitted from a "ready-made diagnostic framework" (p. 88), alluding to the existing white Farmers' Alliance, but she fails to examine the networks of black organizations that articulated many of the same concepts of economic cooperation and uplift.

Notwithstanding this critique, Barnes's book is extremely valuable in detailing the history of Populism—white Populism—in Louisiana. Her study is steeped in archival research—some of which builds on the work of others, notably Joel Sipress—and offers a clear chronology of Populism as it moved from agrarian-based organizing to electoral politics.

Ultimately, Barnes offers a critical account of the rural white farmers' movement in the state through the framework of competing sociological theories—"Resource Mobilization, Political Process, and Framing theories" (p. xvii). While her theoretical explanations/descriptions may be of some interest to historians, and of particular interest to historical sociologists and those concerned with social movement theory, the new archival findings she brings forth are of value to all. Barnes should be highly commended for delving into a less-studied manifestation of southern Populism, highlighting new archival records, and contributing to the ongoing debate regarding the possibilities and limitations of the white movement in the South.

OMAR H. ALI

University of North Carolina at Greensboro

GERARD N. MAGLIOCCA. The Tragedy of William Jennings Bryan: Constitutional Law and the Politics of Backlash. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 238. $40.00.

Constitutional scholars have in recent years examined the relationship between political movements and Supreme Court decision-making, generally with an eye to the ways that successful political parties and movements have brought Court decisions in line with the dominant political regime. In this book Gerard N. Magliocca considers the ways in which unsuccessful parties and candidates can influence Court decision-making. He is specifically concerned with showing that late nineteenth-century constitutional decisions were influenced by the rise of the Populist Party in the early 1890s and by William Jennings Bryan's defeat in the 1896 presidential election.

Magliocca advances as "a central theme" that Bryan "was the greatest constitutional figure at the turn of the twentieth century" (p. 3), but his "unique constitutional contribution was not in what he did; it was what the fear of him and his followers caused others to do" (p. 5). Magliocca's principal argument is that Justices' concern about the growing appeal of the Populist Party caused them to "change the law in response to the goals and arguments of reformers" (p. 117), most notably in a series of decisions from 1894 to 1896. He argues that aspects of the Court's ruling in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (1895) invalidating a Bryan-sponsored income tax law suggest "the Justices were chafing to attack the Populists" (p. 80). Meanwhile, the Court's decision in U.S. v. E.C. Knight (1895), narrowly interpreting the commerce clause in a case involving the Sherman Antitrust Act, "reads like a direct response to the Populist agenda" (p. 74). The author also discerns a connection between Populists and Plessy v.

Ferguson (1896), in that "the Justices threw their weight behind the strategy of using race to drive a wedge into the reform coalition" such that "Plessy aided the enemies of Populism just as much as, if not more than, Pollock did" (pp. 94, 95).

By Magliocca's account, Bryan's 1896 loss to William McKinley had a further impact on the Supreme Court. In part, this was because "the Populists still posed a threat, and over the next four years political and legal elites took additional steps to codify the mandate of 1896 and to ensure that the spirit of reform would not make a comeback" (p. 115). Additionally, "the Justices took McKinley's victory as a sign that they could expand on the principles that they had articulated right before the election" (p. 119), such that the outcome served as a "green light" and "alter[ed] the balance within the Court in favor of those who wanted more protection for property and contract rights, less protection for civil liberties, and greater deference to the states on racial questions" (p. 119). The author points to rulings in 1897 in Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co. v. Chicago and Allgeyer v. Louisiana, which applied the takings clause against state and local governments and protected a liberty of contract against state regulation. These decisions, along with Maxwell v. Dow (1900) declining to apply criminal procedure guarantees against state governments and Giles v. Harris (1903) upholding state disfranchisement measures, were "transformative cases that elaborated the principles flowing from the mandate against Bryan" (p. 126). In fact, Magliocca argues, Bryan's influence was so strong that it was only once "the specter of Bryan was removed" after his third presidential defeat in 1908 that political and legal elites "felt free to relax their resistance to reform" and permit some Progressive policies to be sustained, although most doctrinal innovations from the 1890s remained intact (pp. 133, 134).

At one level, this original analysis is likely to provoke debate about whether Bryan's influence on the Supreme Court was as significant as Magliocca claims—to the point that Bryan "exerted more influence over constitutional law than anyone else at the turn of the twentieth century" (p. 149). Conventional accounts have tended to explain constitutional developments in this period primarily by reference to broad currents in political and constitutional thought that gained ascendance at a time when the Court was grappling with a new set of economic conditions and the legitimacy of governmental responses to these changed circumstances. The challenge is to determine what specifically is achieved and how much ultimately is gained by giving such prominence to Bryan and his 1896 defeat that cannot otherwise be explained by standard accounts and to sift through Magliocca's particular claims in this regard. However, at a broader level—and this is likely to be the book's key contribution—by calling attention to the possibility that unsuccessful political movements can influence Court decision-making, Magliocca may prompt a renewed focus on such movements among scholars who have been fruitfully engaged in specifying linkages between political regimes and constitutional development.

JOHN DINAN
Wake Forest University

MARK D. HERSEY. My Work Is That of Conservation: An Environmental Biography of George Washington Carver. (Environmental History and the American South.) Athens: University of Georgia Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 290. Cloth $69.95, paper $24.95.

Mark D. Hersey's book is gracefully written, exhaustively researched, insightful, and compelling. Its author offers an honest assessment of the subject's personal flaws and his accomplishments as a scientist and social/agricultural reformer.

Hersey cuts through the "Peanut Man" myth to reveal the real George Washington Carver. He unravels the complexity of the individual, the scientific field in which he worked, and the society in which he dwelled. Other books have done something similar, but they stop short of probing Washington's conservation impulses. This monograph is devoted to pursuing that examination. In so doing, it positions itself in southern, environmental, and African American history.

Carver was more than a scientist or the one-dimensional all-star in black history highly mythicized in elementary schools and social memory. He was an advocate for improved conditions and opportunity for southern black farmers. In the ecologically depleted landscape of Alabama's Black Belt in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Carver was moved by the abject plight of southern blacks, who were wedded culturally and socially to the land. Their livelihood depended on new kinds of sustainable agriculture, which in turn depended on sustainable relationships with the natural environment. Carver had astute answers for the greater economic independence of black farmers, but the region's entrenched social and economic structures impeded innovation, and Carver gained no advantage with his outsider credentials.

A year after Booker T. Washington's "Cast Down Your Bucket" address at the Atlanta Cotton States Exposition, he recruited Carver to launch the Tuskegee Institute's new department of agriculture. It was God's choice that he should go to Alabama, concluded the religious-minded Carver, who also believed that divine will had led him to study agricultural science. Immediately upon completing his graduate work at Iowa Agricultural College in 1896, he relocated to the Black Belt, very much a foreign place and a cultural shock to the socially sheltered midwesterner.

At Ames, he had been integrated into the virtually all-white society and academic community. He had a stable of friends, smart and supportive mentors, and a well-equipped school that valued his presence and endowed him with a fine education. The realities in Jim Crow Alabama were stark. Indeed, Carver barely escaped lynching. Racism and poverty were overt and black disfranchisement nearly complete. All were manifested in the feudalistic nature of the share-tenant system.

The two-crop economy (cotton and corn) and the ways of agriculture seemed equally medieval to Carver. Soil erosion and silted rivers and streams were already a problem worsened by the food demands and market prices during World War I. For a time, farmers could buy new land for less than they could "manure" old worn-out land (p. 63), and when they did stimulate crop growth they turned increasingly to inorganic fertilizers, which took a heavier toll on the land and the water. Tuskegee had its own issues. Washington could not fulfill many of the promises he had made when recruiting Carver. He micromanaged the institute and expected more out of the scantily funded and poorly equipped agriculture department and its head than either could possibly deliver. Carver, nevertheless, remained optimistic about changing things, and the "limited funding," promoting creative frugality, proved "a blessing of sorts in shaping his environmental vision" (p. 89).

Colleagues and locals regarded Carver as eccentric. His dress seemed beneath that of a college professor, and he was pedantic and somewhat aloof. But he was very much in touch with the real world, especially conventional farming practices that sustained the racial status quo but not the land. Carver's own lack of resources helped him identify with the region's struggling black farmers. Drawing from an ecological understanding of the interconnectedness of the elements, he devised numerous alternative farming practices that cost the farmer up-front labor but saved him/her money, easing dependence on the landowner. Carver even made dietary recommendations, publishing bulletins with cost-saving food recipes that made use of what grew naturally in the area. His most famous, How to Grow the Peanut and 105 Ways of Preparing It for Human Consumption, published in 1916, contributed to his mythic sobriquet.

Throughout his tenure at Tuskegee, Carver was fighting not only racism and poverty but the growing artificiality of agriculture. He was known as a pioneering chemurgist, although in reality he bucked its trends. For example, he discouraged the use of commercial fertilizers, once referring to the typical inorganically grown tomato as a "hull or shadow of the savory, nutritious, palatable vegetable it should be" (p. 173). Chemurgists were moving agriculture toward corporate farming and the development of farm products as industrial commodities, such as cellulose and ethanol. But Carver remained always committed to the independent farmer and the land.

So too is Hersey. His work reminds scholars of the importance of the land to understanding the southern past, something pioneers of the field appreciated but their successors forgot. Southern historians and others should put Hersey's book at the top of their reading list.

JACK E. DAVIS
University of Florida

ANDREW P. HALEY. Turning the Tables: Restaurants and the Rise of the American Middle Class, 1880–1920. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 356. $39.95.

In this book Andrew P. Haley offers a persuasive and engaging analysis of how dining at restaurants became an integral part of the lives of the American middle class. Locating the change in the period between 1880 and 1920, Haley maintains not only that the middle class was responsible for the growth of restaurants but that restaurant-going became a critical channel of middle-class formation.

From the opening of Delmonico's in New York City in the 1820s and throughout much of the nineteenth century, restaurants were the preserve of the American aristocracy. Elite establishments served extravagant, multicourse meals in elegant surroundings. The French menus and high prices announced the social standing not only of the restaurant but of the clientele as well. But such restaurants were not welcoming to the growing middle class of urbanites who, especially in the post-Civil War decades, wanted and could afford to eat out. Snooty waiters and French menus intimidated middle-class eaters who were unschooled in the language and etiquette of fine dining. Prices, moreover, were steep and many a middle-class diner felt unsatisfied if not cheated by the experience. This was exactly, according to Haley, the purpose of such places: to distinguish the aristocracy from the middle class. At the same time, he contends, the response of those dissatisfied middle-class diners constituted a "middle-class revolution in public dining that transformed the class structure and the cultural hierarchies of the United States" (p. 45).

Middle-class men and women effected this transformation by making other eating choices and inventing a more "cosmopolitan" approach to restaurant dining. They patronized the small ethnic eateries that began to flourish in immigrant neighborhoods, the moderately priced lunchrooms that offered day-time and evening meals, as well as the chop houses, ice cream parlors, and coffee and cake saloons that sprouted throughout the city. Clerks, managers, female shoppers, bachelors who were unhappy with boarding house food, and housewives who were too tired to cook used their middle-class purchasing power and created a demand "that no successful restaurant owner could ignore" (p. 83). In doing so they were, according to Healy, exerting class power and "turning the tables" on a culture that valorized the elite. Working very much in the mold of E. P. Thompson, Haley argues that a class can make demands unselfconsciously: voting with their pocketbooks and their feet in a growing consumer market, individual middle-class men and women had a collective impact. In the process the middle class both created and defined itself.

Haley suggests that restaurants became battle grounds where the middle class—asserting its right to enjoy itself in public eating spaces—waged a form of class warfare. Some battles were more successful than others. The fight to end tipping, perceived by the middle class as "an elusive passkey to service and status," failed (p. 175). But restaurateurs slowly did change their establishments to reflect the needs of their middle-class patrons. As English replaced French on the menus, restaurants offered simpler, more modestly sized, and lower-priced plated dinners. And, perhaps most importantly, women, once denied the right to dine in public restaurants without a male escort, began to be welcomed. Women who wanted to enjoy an evening meal alone at a restaurant risked their respectable reputations, because being an unescorted female in a public place still made a woman morally suspect. Restaurants apparently made exceptions for aristocratic women whose rank guaranteed their status as "ladies." Such respect, however "did not automatically extend to . . . their middle-class counterparts" (p. 151). So angry was prominent feminist Harriot Stanton Blatch, when she and a female companion were refused service at the elegant Hoffman House in 1907, that she sued the restaurant. While Blatch lost the suit, restaurants increasingly realized that they could not afford to ignore or alienate the growing numbers of middle-class female customers. By 1920 such restrictions had been relaxed and unescorted middle-class women joined the throngs of restaurant diners.

Haley relies heavily on the lively discussions and debates about eating out that appeared in newspapers and magazines during these decades and does an excellent job of using these sources to analyze how middle-class Americans altered the restaurant experience. His evidence fully supports his contention that leisure-time activities, like eating out, were critical in making the modern American middle class. I am less sure, however, that the language and metaphor of struggle that Haley deploys serve him well. In the context of the many challenges that middle- and working-class people faced during these decades, grappling with a French menu or being ridiculed by a haughty waiter do not quite seem to qualify as battles. Still, Haley's book reinforces the importance of consumption as a vehicle for class formation and does immeasurable service in exploring restaurants as one of the important sites where this occurred.

CINDY S. ARON
University of Virginia

DAVID STRAUSS. Setting the Table for Julia Child: Gourmet Dining in America, 1934–1961. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 324. $45.00.

Few of us remain unaffected by the remarkable change in American foodways over the past quarter century. Celebrity chefs peddle their savoir-faire and their wares; the Food Network broadcasts 24/7; books and blogs enjoin us to check vitamins, track pesticides, pay attention to the provenance of the food we eat, and concern ourselves with its sustainability. Gurus of every persuasion urge us to embark on our own food adventures, preferably exotic ones. Academics have not failed to profit by what many have proclaimed a revolution. Studies of food in one or another of its many forms have gotten at least a toehold in American universities and colleges as well as abroad.

David Strauss speaks to this food world in turmoil. He takes advantage of the now considerable scholarship on American foodways and also does a great deal of archival digging to explore the cultural phenomenon that he calls, with some exaggeration, the gourmet movement, which came before the food revolution and which he dates from the publication of Mastering the Art of French Cooking (1961, 1970) by Julia Child and her French co-authors.

The first chapters review Americans' utilitarian approach to dining, the claims of scientific cookery, and a pervasive distrust of sensuality. Would-be gourmets battled the nutritionists, on the one hand, and the moralists, on the other. Chapters three and four move into much less explored territory as Strauss examines the various gourmet societies across the United States in the 1930s. The self-consciously exclusive establishments, resolutely male ("the ladies" were not welcome), made it their business to further fine dining in the United States, which American parlance turned into "gourmet" food. For Americans "gourmet" meant fancy, and fancy meant French. Only in the loosest of constructions could these interlocking elites be considered a movement. "Network" seems the better term.

Exclusivity marked dinners and diners alike. Rigorously trained French missionary-chefs gave the stamp of authenticity to the elaborate banquets where the members of private clubs and dining societies celebrated the higher gustatory joys in a world far removed from the instrumental practicality of women's magazines and cookbooks. Strauss has mined the relevant papers including membership lists, menus (some of which are reproduced), and correspondence. He appends a useful essay on sources which covers manuscript collections, interviews, newsletters from newspapers and magazines as well as a judicious sampling of scholarship.

The next three chapters follow the vicissitudes of Gourmet, which began publication in 1941 with the avowed purpose of raising American culinary consciousness. But Gourmet, with its emphasis on travel narratives, particularly those of Samuel Chamberlain, and its general celebration of fine food, remained too true to its origins in heavily masculinized gourmet dining. Women read Gourmet, but it took several years and two chef columnists for the magazine to come up with recipes that could be attempted by the home cook unversed in the finer points of French cuisine.

Although it is incorrect to claim that Mastering the Art of French Cooking transformed the American food world (for Strauss it is a convenient benchmark), it was Julia Child who most effectively worked to translate the arcana of French cuisine into the American culinary lexicon. Child knew that any real change in American foodways had to pass through the women who, in the United States as elsewhere, then as now, do the lion-ess's share of cooking. With The French Chef on television in 1963, Child did what the clubs and societies and life-style glossy magazines such as Vogue, The New Yorker, and even Gourmet could not accomplish. She brought what Americans thought of as fancy French food (it was in fact cuisine bourgeoise) into the American kitchen.

The exclusivity cultivated by the gourmet groups yielded to the open arms of television. Cooking shows profited by and disseminated not only new knowledge but also new attitudes toward food. Strauss's final chapter on Julia Child and her principal co-author Simone Beck—he has mined the Child papers at the Radcliffe Institute's Schlesinger Library—gives a fascinating account of negotiating different understandings of French cooking, as the French woman's defense of authenticity invariably, at times poignantly, came up against the American's insistence on translation into American terms.

The catchy title of Strauss's careful examination of gourmet dining is, however, misleading. That Child on occasion frequented gourmet groups such as the Chevaliers du Tastevin emphasizes all the more her own inclusive, generous conception of French cooking. Unlike gourmet dining, the food revolution, following Child, laid a different table.

PRISCILLA PARKHURST FERGUSON
Columbia University

BRUCE E. STEWART. Moonshiners and Prohibitionists: The Battle over Alcohol in Southern Appalachia. (New Directions in Southern History.) Lexington: University Press of Kentucky. 2011. Pp. xii, 325. $50.00.

Bruce E. Stewart's new book makes a worthy contribution to our historical understanding of the liquor issue in modern America. Specifically, he examines the changing attitudes toward alcohol in western North Carolina during the nineteenth century that produced the region's strong support of a statewide liquor ban in 1908. This endorsement of prohibition is impressive given the region's earlier acceptance of local liquor distilling. Mountain dwellers, who, before the Civil War, had viewed moonshiners as honorable businessmen entitled to make a living, came to see them as a threat to social order by the end of the century. This changing attitude toward liquor advanced even as southern Appalachia residents were depicted, in the mass media, as a backward people who needed to be brought into the modern world. Stewart sees the social split over the liquor question as class based; middle-class reformers in urban areas promoted prohibition as part of their modernizing campaign.

Stewart begins in the antebellum period, noting the economic circumstances that encouraged whiskey production and consumption in western North Carolina. Middle-class town dwellers, viewing temperance as a badge of respectability, sought to curb the local liquor industry, but accomplished little because the larger population associated them with northern advocates of temperance and abolition. During the Civil War, distillers came under sharp attack for expending scarce grain and fruit resources in the manufacture of liquor. This criticism ended in the postwar years as food security returned. Federal officials' efforts to enforce liquor taxes during this period endeared the liquor industry to the local population, and its violent defiance of governmental authority was sometimes supported by local chapters of the Ku Klux Klan.

The last decades of the century brought the railroad into the North Carolina mountains, and with it came middle-class professionals who championed a new South based on commerce and manufacturing. Such people initiated new reform efforts against the liquor industry, which they, like reformers throughout the industrializing South, saw as an antiquated deterrence to economic and moral progress. The religious campaign against the liquor men was joined by town dwellers who wished to shed the growing image of traditional southern Appalachia as backward and brutish. These reformers presented their anti-liquor efforts as a civilizing campaign aimed at moonshiners, the personification of that unrefined image. By the 1890s the townsfolk of western North Carolina had embraced the anti-liquor campaign. Numerous communities voted to ban liquor through local option and subsequently voted solidly in favor of statewide prohibition in 1908. Stewart acknowledges that religious issues played a role in North Carolina's decision to ban liquor, but he asserts that the modernizers' industrializing efforts joined those of evangelical religious groups already favoring liquor restrictions to create a considerable prohibition majority in western North Carolina.

While Stewart notes that prohibition's success was due to the joint efforts of evangelicals and modernizers, his focus on the latter places him among recent prohibition scholars who, tapping earlier studies by James H. Timberlake, challenge the more established assertions by Paul Kleppner, Norman H. Clark, and others that the liquor issue is best explained as a struggle between pietistic and liturgical religious denominations. They instead frame the liquor debate as an economic class issue. Stewart's stress on the desire for respectability as a primary motivation for prohibition reinforces this focus on economic class and ethnicity.

The author's extensive examination of the middle-class stance toward prohibition eclipses discussion of the working class. Railroad construction projects brought modernizers to the mountains, but also wage-earners to staff these massive construction projects and subsequently to maintain and operate the railroad lines. Stewart acknowledges this but says little about this population's recreational habits, despite the extensive scholarship that presents liquor consumption as a central feature of turn-of-the-century working-class culture.

Focusing on western North Carolina, Stewart largely ignores the influence of statewide politics on the dry campaign in the mountains. He does not address the disfranchisement of North Carolina's black population and its impact on statewide prohibition efforts, nor does he examine the influence of gender attitudes on both sides of the liquor question.

These limitations, while noteworthy, are perhaps beyond the scope of this extensive study. Though identifying areas for future research, they should not detract from the book's highly significant contribution to the understanding of prohibition. Stewart sheds light on a region and a topic that have been egregiously under-examined. Regional studies such as his offer a more nuanced understanding of the historical liquor question in modern America.

JAMES E. KLEIN
Del Mar College

ANTHONY MORA. Border Dilemmas: Racial and National Uncertainties in New Mexico, 1848–1912. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 379. Cloth $89.95, paper $24.95.

Anthony Mora has written a thoughtful extended essay on the racialization of citizenship and the demarcation of distinct communities in the context of the U.S.-Mexico border region. Situating his story in southern New Mexico territory (1848–1912), Mora focuses on the border cities of Las Cruces and La Mesilla. These two towns, together with Doña Ana, form the eastern boundary of the valley of Mesilla, a fertile agricultural district on the floodplain of the Rio Grande that marks a three-way border between New Mexico, Chihuahua, and Texas. All three communities were founded in the nineteenth century: Doña Ana as a settler colony of El Paso in the early 1840s, and Las Cruces and La Mesilla in the crucible of the U.S.-Mexico war. Under the terms of the Treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, following the U.S. invasion of Mexico (1846–1848), Las Cruces fell just north of the binational boundary. Several hundred New Mexican families responded to the Mexican government's colonization efforts in Chihuahua, settling the communities of Guadalupe, La Mesilla, Refugio, and Santo Tomás de Iturbide. Located just five miles south of Las Cruces, La Mesilla fell into the territory that was the object of the Gadsden Purchase of 1854, placing the fledgling Mexican colony yet again under the aegis of U.S. military and civilian authority. A second southward migration established Ascensión in northwestern Chihuahua for those Mexicans who feared the loss of property, security, and dignity under U.S. control in La Mesilla.

New Mexico was governed as a dependent territory for fifty-eight years; the delay in achieving statehood—despite repeated formal applications to the U.S. Congress—forms a leitmotif for Mora's discussion of racialized national identities. Six substantive chapters weave a multilayered tapestry of local and regional histories, following an approximate chronological order. Chapter one sets up Mora's argument that Euro-Americans—his preferred term for Anglo-Americans who settled in New Mexico and dominated territorial governance until the twentieth century—defined Mexican in racial terms: that is, as an immutable category of difference and inferiority, in contrast to Mexicans living in New Mexico, whose concept of mexicanidad was rooted in the cultural performance of citizenship, ritual, and the sense of community. Chapter two examines the contrasting vernacular architectures and landscapes of Las Cruces and La Mesilla. The urban grid for La Mesilla, a planned Mexican town, had its roots in the presidios of Bourbon New Spain, although Mora does not acknowledge these colonial antecedents. The salient difference between the two communities at mid-century was the division of town land into individual plots in Las Cruces—following U.S. legal norms—and the persistence of communal grazing lands in La Mesilla, surrounding the central plaza, church, and residential lots. Chapter three turns to religion to argue that church construction was altered by French bishops and francophile clergy during the second half of the nineteenth century in an attempt to replace Mexican traditions with “modern” Euro-American Catholicism. Chapter four couples race and gender, referring to legislation aimed at Mexican women that restricted women’s employment in public venues and to the subordinate relations that hardened between Euro-Americans and Mexicans, as some Mexican women found work as domestic servants in the homes of wealthy newcomers from the eastern United States. The last two chapters return to the themes of statehood and region. Mora argues that Euro-Americans fashioned a regional identity to compensate or elide the perceived racial differences between themselves and the Mexicans who still formed the majority of the population, while Mexican elite families espoused their claims to New Mexican identity, defending their status as equal citizens and the right to maintain their cultural practices. Yet, not all Mexicans in New Mexico—especially those in La Mesilla—eagerly embraced U.S. citizenship, and some explicitly identified with Mexico.

Mora develops his argument through the language of locally produced texts, mainly newspapers, published interviews, and the papers and memoirs of a few prominent New Mexicans. While reminding us of the importance of discourse and memory for the construction of regional identities and cultural boundaries, the book’s message would have been strengthened by a deeper archival base and a broader historiographical framework. Mexico drops out of the story after the first chapter, and Mora develops his tale of two cities without reference to the social networks that would have connected them to border towns in Chihuahua and trade routes deeper into Mexico. Mora frames his study around the binary division between Euro-Americans and Mexicans, referring to indigenous peoples rarely and mainly as hostile raiders; only in the epilogue does he acknowledge them as historical actors with a central role in the formation of New Mexico. Mora leaves it to future scholars to integrate these regional spaces into the social history of

New Mexico and “larger discussions about Mexico’s national identity” (p. 289).

CYNTHIA RADDING
University of North Carolina,
Chapel Hill

BRIAN D. BEHNKEN. Fighting Their Own Battles: Mexican Americans, African Americans, and the Struggle for Civil Rights in Texas. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 2011. Pp. xix, 347. $45.00.

Most histories of the fight for civil rights are written in shades of black and white. Not in Texas. With its large Mexican American population, civil rights in Texas by necessity encompassed three colors: white, black, and brown. Unlike most other southern and southwestern states, where a single narrative (black or Chicano) dominates civil rights history, Texas presents two related, yet distinct, civil rights storylines, which complicate the history of the fight for civil rights there.

Brian D. Behnken explores this dual civil rights narrative. He notes how African Americans and Mexican Americans might have seemed natural allies in the fight against de jure and de facto segregation. Both groups faced a similar mix of legal exclusions, informal discrimination, and threats of violence from the dominant white Anglo establishment—what Behnken defines as “a dual Jim Crow system” (p. 5); both groups organized to fight this discrimination in similar ways, adopting both legal and direct-action reform strategies. Yet, as the title of Behnken’s book makes clear, each group largely fought its civil rights battles alone. Although there were occasional instances of collective action, on the whole, “blacks fought for their community, while Mexican Americans fought for theirs” (p. 11).

Behnken places the blame for these groups’ failure to act in concert—which he argues “might have had greater success than the two individual struggles” (p. 11)—on a mix of social, economic, and political factors, including “cultural dissimilarities, class tensions, organizational and tactical differences, and geographic distance” (p. 11). However, Behnken places the greatest blame on the issue of race itself.

Although African American and Hispanic Texans faced similar legal and informal constraints, their available options in fighting these constraints differed. Unlike blacks, who had no choice but to take on Jim Crow segregation directly, Mexican Americans had the option of playing the “white” card. Legally, Mexican Americans were classified as white. By stressing their “whiteness,” Mexican Americans could thus separate themselves from other minority groups (such as blacks) and in this way gain some measure of protection from discrimination. This whiteness strategy, which Mexican American leaders promoted from World War II through the mid-1960s, damaged relations between African American and Hispanic Texans. Blacks rightly saw this effort as reinforcing the legitimacy of Jim Crow; they came to view Mexican Americans as “competitors who took political power away from African Americans and monopolized government aid programs" (p. 9). In the mid-1960s when Mexican Americans began to move away from a "whiteness" strategy, blacks condemned this shift to "brown power" as a "disingenuous, opportunistic" (p. 226) tactic aimed at riding the coattails of the successful civil rights and black power movements and taking advantage of the legislative gains (such as the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965) for which they had fought.

For their part, Texas blacks adopted many of the dominant Anglo attitudes toward Hispanics as "foreigners who took jobs away from the native born" (p. 9). They saw Hispanics as anti-civil rights and anti-black; in response, they "lashed out violently at Mexican Americans on several occasions" (p. 10). The result, once again, fostered distance rather than unity. Hence, even when individual leaders from both groups sought common ground, the results were of limited effect and duration. In the end, each group decided to allow the other side to fight its battles alone.

Although the idea that race and the "whiteness" of Mexican Americans stood in the way of black-brown solidarity is not new (a point Behnken himself acknowledges), Behnken's book brings to the table a detailed examination of these parallel and competitive civil rights movements in Texas. By examining African American and Mexican American civil rights struggles in Texas side by side, Behnken makes clear the similarities and the differences between the two groups in their fights for equal rights. In so doing, he shows just how possible an alliance of the dispossessed could have been—and how racism within both communities doomed the effort. It was both groups' acceptance of the racism underlying Jim Crow segregation—the very thing that each fought with regard to itself—that undermined the possibility of cooperation.

Well written, soundly researched, and persuasively argued, Behnken's study is a welcome addition to the history of civil rights in Texas. The book reminds us that to view the issue of civil rights in only black and white (or brown and white) terms is to miss the many complexities of a complicated yet important story.

CHARLES L. ZELDEN
Nova Southeastern University

PRISCILLA A. DOWDEN-WHITE. Groping toward Democracy: African American Social Welfare Reform in St. Louis, 1910–1949. Columbia: University of Missouri Press. 2011. Pp. xviii, 300. $44.95.

Priscilla A. Dowden-White's book offers a counterargument to those historians of urban African American life and activism during the interwar years who focus on protests and social and labor movements rather than on social welfare reform. These scholars oftentimes assert that black social welfare reformers—for example, those in the National Urban League (NUL)—proved too accommodating to powerful white interests, rendering ineffective their fight to end racial and economic inequality. According to Dowden-White, such historians have stressed the "powerlessness of elite black reformers in the face of white industrialists' hegemony—at the expense of the broader range of African American community organization efforts" (p. 7).

Dowden-White argues that black social welfare reformers chose their strategies and tactics based on the belief "that broadened economic opportunities, social justice, and the rhetoric of American democracy belonged equally to blacks and to whites" (p. 5). She discusses the leadership and the agenda of organizations for racial equality from 1910 to 1949, when legally sanctioned racism and institutionalized segregation were most entrenched. Dowden-White narrates how reformers developed—groped toward—effective approaches to community organization and built interracial alliances to undermine segregation and promote the drive for democracy. She highlights how reformers debated social work theories and researched black urban conditions when structuring their campaigns against, for example, segregation in housing and health care. Dowden-White takes issue with several historians who play down social welfare reformers' use of social action as a tactic within the broad range of social work strategies to force white Americans to regard black Americans as their equals. She sees St. Louis reformers as particularly skillful in shaping the black freedom struggle, as they demanded concessions from the white elites. Dowden-White shows that black social welfare reformers proved modestly successful in their endeavors at a time when numerous white St. Louisans, and white Americans generally, regarded segregation as beneficial for the common good.

Black and white social welfare reformers tailored their agenda for black empowerment and racial equality according to conditions in St. Louis, a "border city" between the North and the South. In that segregated city, black townspeople faced racial discrimination in housing, education, health care, and other areas in economic and civic life but freely exercised the franchise and worked with white residents who believed that black Americans deserved their full civil rights. In addition, some factions among the city's white elites wanted to avoid interracial violence, showed a willingness to include African Americans in various projects to improve urban life, and fostered interracial cooperation. More importantly, talented, tireless black leaders like George E. Stephens, Jr., and Susan Vashon and white allies like the influential Roger Nash Baldwin built and led social work, neighborhood club, and block unit movements to challenge segregation along two major lines of attack. On one hand, they emphasized the equal in "separate but equal." For instance, reformers mobilized the black community in a fight that resulted in the establishment of a tax-supported black hospital to ensure that African Americans received high quality health care within the segregated medical system. On the other hand, reformers sought to stop the spread of, if not end, segregation. They saw their battles against city ordinances in favor of neighborhood segregation culminate in victory in the late 1910s when the United States Supreme Court declared such ordinances unconstitutional. Yet, their attempts to stop the widespread use of homeowners' racially restrictive covenant agreements proved futile during the interwar years. They were most effective in winning support for black St. Louisans when their objectives did not threaten powerful, entrenched special interests that had access to or control of labor markets and political or financial resources. Nevertheless, leading social welfare reformers propelled the St. Louis chapters of the NUL and the League of Women Voters and their allied organizations into the forefront of the civil rights struggles of the interwar years.

The book under review, an in-depth, nuanced account, combines early twentieth-century social work, urban, and social history. One of the book's major contributions is its exploration of African American social welfare and community organization activism. It looks at another side of the history of the black freedom struggle that led to the post-World War II direct mass action phase of the civil rights movement in St. Louis, a topic covered in Clarence Lang's Grassroots at the Gateway: Class Politics and Black Freedom Struggle in St. Louis, 1936–1975 (2009). Furthermore, Dowden-White's monograph is on the leading edge of a wave of recent publications that re-examine social welfare reformers, such as Felix L. Armfield's Eugene Kinckle Jones: The National Urban League and Black Social Work, 1910–1940 (2011). This is a thoughtful book about black social welfare reformers who constituted, according to Dowden-White, the center of the anti-racism vanguard during the interwar years.

CHARLES L. LUMPKINS

Pennsylvania State University

CORNELIUS L. BYNUM. A. Philip Randolph and the Struggle for Civil Rights. (The New Black Studies Series.) Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2010. Pp. xix, 244. Cloth $75.00, paper $25.00.

Cornelius L. Bynum's fine study focuses on A. Philip Randolph's life-long commitment to social justice for all working-class Americans. By exploring the intersections of race and class, Bynum presents a more complex analysis of Randolph's evolving social and political thought as he developed into an effective labor and civil rights leader from the 1910s to the 1960s. By examining the intersectionality of class and race, Bynum explains the often contradictory motivations behind Randolph's actions and leadership decisions, especially when these categories overlapped with Randolph's attitudes toward gender issues and religion. Bynum's narrative demonstrates how Randolph consistently evolved from the hard lessons learned in each phase of his activism, by showing how several critical decisions Randolph made as a social movement leader, like calling off a strike or a march, resulted from his deepening understanding of interest group politics and belief that the executive branch of government was where African Americans could best exercise political leverage (p. xv).

Finally, Bynum's work reflects the trend of recent scholarship that connects Randolph's early labor activism (class) with his civil rights (race) agenda.

Bynum divides Randolph's evolution from the poor son of an African Methodist Episcopal (AME) minister to a nationally known labor and civil rights leader into four periods. The first period, at the turn of the twentieth century, was characterized by Randolph's close connection to a stable, religious family in the South where his race separated him from the social and economic opportunities available to most American boys. Bynum illustrates how Randolph's early religious faith was deeply connected to black empowerment through the living example of his parents. As Bynum points out, religion for Randolph was "less about salvation than faithfully persevering in the face of relentless racial persecution" (p. 25). In the second period, the years just before World War I, Bynum describes Randolph's migration to Harlem as one of the "talented tenth." During this period, Randolph blended his race-conscious religious values with a class consciousness as he joined the Socialist Party. Bynum's narrative seamlessly weaves together the various social and political venues available to the young Randolph in "Harlem's radical political climate during and after the war," where he could explore "his class sensibilities more fully" (p. 74). Bynum's analysis is especially helpful in explaining Randolph's intense opposition to Marcus Garvey's "racial self-sufficiency" program at a time when Randolph "firmly believed that only interracial class cooperation could effectively overcome the inequitable conditions created by racial discrimination" (p. 81).

Randolph's third intellectual transition came as the editor of the Messenger magazine during World War I and the early 1920s. In this section, Bynum inserts "the issue of gender in terms of manhood and masculinity" because these ideas were "prominent in Randolph's thinking about and articulation of genuine social justice" (p. xi). Using numerous examples from Randolph's Messenger, Bynum shows how the magazine's bold, unapologetic rhetoric helped to define "a new and decidedly race-conscious standard of conduct for African Americans in the postwar years" (p. 96). Messenger editorials, which endorsed manly and militant behavior by all African American males, advocated black self-defense, collective action, and economic boycott tactics, argued that racial prejudice would cease when it "ceased to pay." Bynum correctly concludes, "In connecting their economic and social agenda rooted in a class critique of industrial capitalism to New Negro ideology, Randolph and the Messenger hoped to co-opt the growing racial sentiment of the emerging ghetto and direct it toward more class-based outlets" (p. 99). In this section, Bynum devotes one paragraph to "New Negro" women and their role in serving the New Negro manhood movement. Although Bynum's race-class-religion analysis enhances the understanding of Randolph's evolving political philosophy, the rather glaring omission of how and where women figured into Randolph's activism undercuts his thesis regarding Randolph's deep commitment to social justice.

In the final section, from the 1920s to the 1940s, Bynum argues that in the hard years it took for the Pullman porters union to be recognized by both the American Federation of Labor (AFL) and the Pullman Company, Randolph learned three important lessons on the necessity of blending race and class consciousness: that blacks faced special obstacles in the workplace; that existing labor laws did not protect black workers; and that only through concerted political effort by blacks themselves would they gain their political and economic rights. In his fight for the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, and later for the Fair Employment Practices Commission, Bynum's scholarship reveals more clearly than before how Randolph successfully crafted a coherent political philosophy based on a race and class consciousness that reflected the spiritual aspirations and the economic hopes of the black masses.

CYNTHIA TAYLOR

Dominican University of California

LUTHER ADAMS. Way Up North in Louisville: African American Migration in the Urban South, 1930–1970. (The John Hope Franklin Series in African American History and Culture.) Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 2010. Pp. xiv, 272. $49.95.

Luther Adams connects the story of black movement within the South to the better-known narrative of the Second Great Migration. That migration, which is understood generally as the movement of five million black southerners to the North and the West between 1940 and 1970, has received more attention from historians during the past decade. Yet scholars have not yet fully explored the relationship between the migration that crossed regional boundaries and the migration that occurred within a single region. African American men and women who chose to leave the South during this time period frequently moved within the region before heading out of it entirely. Their journeys often took them from a rural southern landscape to a southern city, or from one southern city to another, and then to a northern or western metropolis. Typically, scholars of the Second Great Migration have studied the southern movements with an eye toward understanding the final relocation to the North or West. The intra-regional migration, in and of itself, has garnered scant attention. To tighten the discussion, it might be helpful for scholars to develop terms to describe the migration's varied components.

Adams astutely blends the story of migration with the tale of civil rights and urban renewal, providing a nuanced picture of race relations within Louisville, Kentucky, during the second half of the twentieth century. More than 17,000 African Americans migrated to the city between 1930 and 1970. New Deal policies helped to encourage the move, as Agricultural Adjustment Administration payments led to both ■ reduction of the acreage under cultivation and the mechanization of farm work, and the National Recovery Administration's requirement of equal wages, while a step forward in terms of social justice, deprived black workers of their value as low-cost employees. During World War II, the migrants found that those hiring at the Louisville industrial plants discriminated openly against black workers, even in the face of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's Executive Order 8802. And any gains made during the war were short lived; when white male soldiers returned from the front, the majority of blacks and white women were summarily discharged.

Adams finds that Louisville, as a city of the Upper South, beckoned to migrants with the promise of improved social conditions. In Louisville, blacks encountered what might be termed "polite racism"; the city had, for example, more black police officers than any other city, although they were assigned only to black segregated areas. Whites in Louisville prided themselves in being relatively progressive, but the city had widespread residential segregation and very limited economic opportunities for its black residents. The strides Louisville made toward integration can be attributed to a concerted effort by the civil rights community, rather than any pre-existing progressive attitudes. At the same time that Louisville appeared to offer an improved lifestyle for black migrants, it was still considered to be part of the South, and truly "home" in a way that was not necessarily safe. Violence and oppression were apparent, but the space also felt familiar and important. Adams claims that while the city "was a site of oppression, it was also a site of resistance," and he does an excellent job of recounting the varied forms this resistance took, including the open housing movement, the desegregation of public schools and public accommodations, and the fight against discriminatory hiring practices (p. 57). In this important book, Adams offers a fine study of Louisville's local civil rights activism as well as an account of intraregional migration.

Adams writes, "in their zeal to understand black migration in the urban North, historians seemingly overlook the fact that while more than five million African Americans abandoned the South during this period, an equally large number chose to remain, often relocating to southern cities" (p. 6). I would like to know the extent to which Adams feels that this was an active choice on the part of those who stayed in the South, or to what extent, if any, could the story be interpreted as an interrupted or unrealized migration to the North. Of course, life unfolds for everyone in unexpected ways; some migrants who resettled permanently in the North were surprised that life events never led them back to the South. Were any of those who stayed in Louisville equally surprised that they never found themselves in Chicago, New York, or Los Angeles?

LISA KRISOFF BOEHM

Worcester State University

THOMAS BRUSCINO. A Nation Forged in War: How World War II Taught Americans to Get Along. (Legacies of War.) Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press. 2010. Pp. xi, 348. $39.95.

In this study, Thomas Bruscino examines how white veterans embedded ethnic and religious pluralism brought home from World War II in the American Cold War consensus. Bruscino builds his thesis on a mix of sources, including letters, memoirs, government documents, and the GI Roundtable pamphlet series produced during the war by the American Historical Association. His well-written, accessible narrative will interest both scholars of war and society and the general public.

The World War II military experience, Bruscino argues, taught white American GIs to unite across ethnic and religious boundaries in order to win the war. From the humiliations of boot camp to the terrors of combat, and even during the long periods of tedium in between, white American GIs learned to depend upon, and even love, people who were different from themselves. Focusing primarily on the Army infantry, Bruscino finds numerous soldiers commenting both on the diversity of their units and the bonds of brotherhood that carried them throughout the war. The multi-ethnic "band of brothers" so popular in recent Hollywood portrayals, he discovers, was not a myth.

The crux of Bruscino's argument, however, is what happened when the war ended, and more than fifteen million servicemen came home to a civilian nation far less tolerant than they now were. Particularly through various veterans organizations, including the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars, as well as political campaigns, veterans worked diligently to apply the lessons they had learned in the armed forces to the home front. They defined the war's meaning, at least in part, as the obligation to respect ethnic pluralism, fight discrimination, and defend religious freedom. As a result, Bruscino argues, domestic anticommunism, however extreme at times, usually refrained from scapegoating ethnic and religious identities. The political culmination of those efforts, according to Bruscino, was the election of John F. Kennedy as the first Catholic president in 1960.

Bruscino's findings, as he rightly notes, underscore the tragic significance of the decision to segregate the armed forces racially during World War II. If Italians, Irish, Germans, Mexicans, American Indians, Catholics, Protestants, and Jews, once so divided, could get along so well during the war, imagine the social impact that a truly desegregated World War II military might have had. But, alas, that did not happen. Indeed, Bruscino's focus on the leadership of national veterans organizations and the military in the postwar years more than the veteran rank-and-file leads him to overstate the unity of white veterans on the war's meaning and its implications for the postwar world. American GIs, the majority of them white, male, and straight, may have learned very well how to get along with each other but not necessarily how to get along with anyone else. Moreover, Bruscino misses the opportunity to gauge the depth of white veterans' new-found tolerance by examining the testimony and records of congressional hearings or state, regional, and national veterans conventions held throughout the postwar years. In these venues, veterans often testified on or debated the most polarizing issues of the day, such as the renewal of the Fair Employment Practices Commission or the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947. Bruscino does not provide that window into the rank and file for the postwar era, making it harder to determine the depth to which ethnic and religious tolerance really took root. Nonetheless, his book is a solid and entertaining assessment that further humanizes the generation of veterans who played such an important role in shaping the postwar United States.

JENNIFER E. BROOKS
Auburn University

MICHAEL CULLEN GREEN. Black Yanks in the Pacific: Race in the Making of American Military Empire after World War II. (The United States in the World.) Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2010. Pp. x, 207. $35.00.

What was the nature of the African American military experience in Asia during the late 1940s and early 1950s? Michael Cullen Green attempts to answer that question by exploring the thoughts and actions of black GIs who participated in the American occupation of Japan and the Korean War. It was through the evolving relationship between African American GIs and Asian-Pacific people and the making of the American military empire that black GIs perceived themselves as American citizens.

Analyzing primary sources culled from military and National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) records, oral testimony, and the African American press, Green argues that the efforts by black GIs to achieve higher socio-economic status in the emerging American century prohibited any inter-ethnic bonds that they may have established with Asian populations while serving abroad during the immediate post-World War II period. American reconversion woes during the middle to late 1940s and the rapid expansion of American military spheres of influence in Japan and South Korea encouraged African American servicemen and civilians to reconfigure their racial politics to meet the demands of empire. By the end of the Korean War, a desegregated army and an increased American military-based economy further problematized encounters black servicemen shared with Asian friends and foes alike and would have a profound impact on African American-Asian relations.

Organized thematically, the book examines the African Americans who served in the American military in East Asia and their encounters with Asian peoples after World War II through the dual lenses of personal consumption and African American-Asian sexual and romantic relationships. Green demonstrates how harsh living conditions stateside outweighed familial pressures and generational views of military service in ways that made enlisting in the army quite attractive for young African Americans at the time. "The American military offered what American civilian society would not: decent wages, low-cost housing, adequate health care, affordable commodities, and job security," he contends (p. 10).

At the same time, the massive transfer of black service personnel from Europe to the Pacific after 1945 and fundamental shifts in government recruitment policies increased the number of African American GIs in occupied Japan, thus exposing them to the accoutrements of American democracy that eluded them at home while bringing them in closer contact with Asian peoples. But intimate relations between black servicemen and their Asian partners were doomed from the beginning. Stringent American military regulations barring marriage, strict American immigration laws, and the black press's negative coverage of the motivations of Asian women worked alongside Japanese and Korean pseudoscientific myths about race to produce bouts of suspicion and hostility among black GIs and Asian indigenous populations. Public debate over the fate of the offspring of African American-Asian couples opened a new chapter in the making of American military empire as American policymakers and black domestic interests in the fate of the GI babies yielded to growing support for the war in Korea and to American Cold War imperatives during the 1950s. Green concludes that by the end of the war, African Americans interpreted their roles in the army in ways that produced irreparable fissures in African American-Asian relations.

While insightful at times, Green's analysis is somewhat myopic. First, his heavy reliance on the reflections of those who voluntarily entered the army at the time tends to overshadow the perceptions that black draftees may have had regarding Asian combatants and civilians. Second, his exploration of the racial and sexual encounters between black GIs and Asian women and the implications that these relations may have held for future African American-Asian bonds of fellowship comes up a bit short. For example, Green points out that the fractious relationship between black GIs and Asian civilians in Japan, Korea, and later Vietnam "seemed once again to doom a generation of Afro-Asian children to physical, economic, and emotional exploitation" (p. 146). However, not once while discussing the experiences of the African American-Asian progeny does he ever consider how they may have perceived the dilemmas they faced. Indeed, the reflections of the heirs of this experience are often overlooked. Having said this, the study clearly points the way to future avenues of inquiry to be considered in order for us to fully understand the complexities of this epochal moment in the African American experience in the post-World War II U.S. Army.

ROBERT F. JEFFERSON, JR.

University of Alabama at Birmingham

Jackson: University Press of Mississippi. 2011. Pp. xi, 440. $55.00.

Although cotton has probably been the subject of more historical studies than any other crop grown in the United States, few of these works focus on the history of this crop in recent times. Thus, we know a great deal about the U.S. cotton industry during its antebellum rise to power and about the transformation of the industry as a result of the Civil War. Studies abound on the cotton industry's reconstruction along retrograde lines in the late nineteenth century and about the inefficiencies and economic and social pathologies associated with the reconstructed industry in the period from the late 1860s to World War II. Only a handful of works have treated cotton's post-1945 revival, however, and none so systematically and methodically as the book under review.

In many ways, the division between the pre- and post-1945 history of cotton is understandable. As D. Clayton Brown points out more than once, the post-1945 history of cotton cultivation in the United States bears little resemblance to the cultivation history of the crop during the preceding century and a half. From the late eighteenth century through World War II, cotton cultivation in the United States was labor intensive, largely non-mechanized, and dependent almost entirely on animate power sources. With the demise of slavery and the subsequent transformation of southern agriculture, cotton cultivation, formerly relatively efficient, was rendered inefficient and technologically backward, with an oversupply of undercapitalized, low-productivity black, white, and, in south Texas, Mexican American farmers eking out livings on tiny, scratch holdings. After World War II, this situation changed quickly and dramatically.

Over the course of one generation—roughly from 1950 to 1970—the U.S. cotton industry, long associated with poverty and underdevelopment, shed such associations once and for all and, in so doing, increasingly found its place in the landscape of modern American agribusiness. It was out with the mules, the walking plows, the sharecroppers (on whom the U.S. Census Bureau stopped compiling statistics after 1959), and the tarpaper shacks; it was in with tractors, mechanical pickers, consolidated and capital-intensive holdings, and spiffy farm homes with the latest urban amenities. Such changes accelerated and intensified after 1970, and today the small number of cotton farms remaining—about 18,600 in 2009 as opposed to 1.5 million in 1945—are among the most modern and efficient in the entire United States.

Brown chronicles this transformation in great detail in his study, which is by far the most thorough and comprehensive scholarly account of the modern U.S. cotton industry yet to appear. The subtitle of Brown's book is A Cultural, Political, and Economic History since 1945, and the author really does try to back up this claim. He devotes attention, for example, not just to standard agricultural concerns—mechanization, seed breeding, crop finance, markets, the eradication of the boll weevil, environmental problems, and the like—but also to topics ranging from the politics of farm subsidies to commercial advertising and branding campaigns to the rise of professional trade associations such as the National Cotton Council of America and Cotton Incorporated. Indeed, he finds space in his account for lengthy discussions of the evolution of the U.S. textile industry, the place of cotton in southern music and literature, and the history of Memphis, which he refers to as the epicenter of the Cotton Belt.

D. CLAYTON BROWN. King Cotton in Modern America: A Cultural, Political, and Economic History since 1945.

Among the most interesting sections of the book are those on cotton's protracted, multipronged "war" against synthetic fibers and on the westward movement of the industry in the postwar period, particularly to the plains of west Texas and to the San Joaquin Valley of California. These areas—and others in Arizona and New Mexico—pioneered many of the practices that subsequently came to characterize cotton agribusiness in older cotton regions such as the Mississippi-Arkansas delta and, to a lesser extent, the South Atlantic states.

Brown is stronger on narration and description than on analysis, some important work on cotton by economic historians is missed—that by Alan Olmstead and Paul Rhode and by Wayne Grove and Craig Heinicke immediately comes to mind—and the author's research, by and large, cuts off in the middle of the last decade. These quibbles aside, this book represents an impressive scholarly effort, for which Brown deserves considerable praise.

PETER A. COCLANIS

University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

CHRISTOPHER MCKNIGHT NICHOLS. Promise and Peril: America at the Dawn of a Global Age. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. 445. $35.00.

In this book Christopher McKnight Nichols puts contemporary debate over the U.S. role in the wider world in historical perspective. He tracks American ideas about isolationism, internationalism, and political and military interventionism from the late nineteenth century through U.S. involvement in World War I to collective security issues in the war's aftermath and (briefly) the neutrality debates of the 1930s. Often taken to be wizened, embittered, and irrelevant to post-1941 American politics, isolationism is a somewhat neglected tradition that Nichols seeks to restore. His sympathetic reading of isolationism's ideas among key opponents of American colonial and military actions abroad is deserving of close attention. William James, Randolph Bourne, W. E. B. Du Bois, Jane Addams, and the Women's League for International Peace and Freedom leader Emily Greene Balch in intellectual life, and Eugene Debs and William Borah in politics—all are analyzed as part of a constantly changing intellectual disposition.

Nichols makes three essential points. First, isolationism and internationalism should not be considered as purely political phenomena, but intellectual and cultural as well. He locates foreign relations in a context that includes the perspectives of pacifism, socialism, missionary endeavors, and Progressive reform. Second, isolationism and interventionism abroad have often been closely related. The same people could, at different times or in different ways, advocate both positions. Third, isolationism and its alternatives were not themselves monolithic. Acknowledging that the United States could not be a nation sufficient unto itself in the modern world, Nichols divides isolationism into broad camps of political (allowing or encouraging other interactions) and protectionist (walling the United States off economically or demographically) isolationism. This typology hides a myriad of positions, however, and the exposition of this complexity takes precedence in Nichols's account.

Modern controversies over isolationism had their origins, Nichols argues, in the acquisition of an American formal empire in the 1890s. The catalyst was "large policy" thinking expressed by architects of empire such as Theodore Roosevelt, Henry Cabot Lodge, and Alfred T. Mahan. They were prepared to intervene in other countries to assert American power, through colonial rule, use of the Roosevelt Corollary to the Monroe Doctrine, and participation in faraway wars. These were advocates of American independence of action, though interventionists differed on whether muscle-flexing should occur only in the Western Hemisphere, or be deployed more broadly. In the course of analyzing opposition to these Rooseveltian "large" policies, Nichols offers a substantial re-evaluation of pre-World War I American anti-imperialism.

With Woodrow Wilson, the "large policy" took a new turn toward liberal internationalism. Wilson's adherence to the protocols of neutrality qualified him to be both isolationist (incurring the enmity of ex-president Roosevelt) and advocate of interventionism designed ultimately to create a new liberal world order. Opposing this stance was Bourne, who drew on American exceptionalism to argue for a non-interventionist internationalism. Bourne would exemplify in the development of American immigrant diversity a model for the world in peaceful cultural interchange.

Throughout, key critics of "expansion" and interference in foreign wars favored building the internal strength of the United States through reform. Generous attention goes to philosopher James's search for the moral equivalent of war at home, but this idea was also attractive to Progressive imperialists. Although Roosevelt gets a negative treatment as an advocate of the "large policy," Roosevelt himself sought to strengthen the United States domestically by (selective) reformist actions to restrain "bigness" and by conservation of natural resources. Some of his actions could provide flesh for James's suggestions on this latter subject (p. 96) and show the strength of Nichols's underlying arguments about the complex mingling of isolationism and internationalism.

While Nichols's main interest lies in the ideas of those he terms isolationists, his explanations depend on the social underpinnings of opinion in the broader sphere of American life. Non-governmental organizations favoring internationalism, such as the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), did not simply prepare the way for or bolster American state power abroad, Nichols understands. YMCA leader John Mott was one of many acting out an ethic different from "large policy" assumptions: Americans could act internationally on a non-governmental level without coercion or military action. Nichols's formulation here comes close to the concept of soft power. But, through sheer association, the YMCA and Mott became rather more entangled with Wilsonian foreign policy than Nichols shows (serving overtly political and ideological as well as humanitarian functions). Soft power and hard power were difficult to separate.

Others before have treated most parts of Nichols's story, but not as constituents in an ambitious synthesis. If the complex taxonomy of isolationist positions portrayed here will baffle some readers, and raise questions over the applicability of the term "isolationism" to his depictions of diverse movements, this is a thoughtful and important contribution to the intellectual history of U.S. foreign relations and to scholarly understanding of the forces shaping a broader U.S. international engagement in the twentieth century.

IAN TYRRELL

University of New South Wales

MATTHEW FARISH. The Contours of America's Cold War. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 2010. Pp. xxvii, 351. $25.00.

In this study, geographer Matthew Farish examines the "imaginative geographies" that emerged in the United States during the 1940s, 1950s, and early 1960s. The title is slightly off base; although Cold War developments are explored in depth, much of the analysis focuses on World War II. Farish's main concern is the intellectual response to the global engagement forced on a previously parochial United States by foreign dangers, real and imagined, during the mid-twentieth century. In grappling with geopolitical challenges, the mid-century scholarly community reconfigured its spatial conception of the world. As a result, academic geography faced its own challenge as the zeitgeist surrounding its core concerns shifted. Farish thus tells two intertwined stories, one of changing geographical ideas found across society at large, the other focused on the response to such changes by professional geographers.

In considering academic geography, Farish confronts a central paradox of the discipline. Just as the demand for geographical knowledge and methods surged due to the global commitments that accompanied World War II and the Cold War, university-based geography was increasingly marginalized, denigrated by social and natural scientists who found its methods inadequately rigorous and its main concerns insufficiently weighty. As Farish shows, albeit in an oblique manner, geographers did not rise adequately to the challenges posed by this intellectually hostile atmosphere, and as a result their discipline began to decline.

The Cold War American global imagination has often been framed as anti-geographical, as it was widely assumed at the time that technology was obviating distance and that the spread of modern, scientific civilization—essentially that of the United States—was erasing local cultural distinctions. Farish, however, shows that mid-twentieth-century global discourse was intensely geographical in its own terms. In doing so, he explores four distinct spatial scales: global, continental, regional, and urban. At each level, he argues, military thinking constrained and molded conceptualization. At the global scale, Farish describes a totalizing bifurcation of the world into positive and negative realms, which portrayed the United States as both centrally located and besieged by other landmasses. Continental discourse, he contends, depicted North America as a "cybernetic continent" that could be guarded from atomic attack by high tech warning installations. At the more local level, military intelligence agents along with anthropologists re-envisioned the region as an "abstract tool [used] for instrumental objectives" (p. 139) rather than a simple area amenable to straightforward description. At the level of the city, Farish argues, civil defense considerations outweighed all others; as urban cores came to be seen as uniquely vulnerable to nuclear attack, mass suburbanization was heavily encouraged.

Although focused on geographical matters, the book occasionally moves further afield, delving into such subjects as military psychology and information technology. Farish links such excursions to his central themes through a Foucauldian analysis of postwar American society, one that emphasizes the militarized and masculinist mindset of social engineering. Through most of the text, Farish deploys his theoretical armature with reserve and precision, using it to illuminate key points but never dragging his readers into the thickets of post-structuralist exegesis.

Farish's final chapter, however, is a different matter. Although labeled "conclusion," it does not provide an overview of the book's main themes or a meditation on its ultimate significance. Instead, the concluding chapter takes on yet another scale of the geographical imagination, that of outer space. Here he begins with a straightforward description of the 1956 motion picture Forbidden Planet. When he turns to analyze the film, however, Farish veers into the kind of abstruse, name-dropping theorization that once threatened to turn a large segment of human geography into an annex of postmodernist literary studies. For example, he writes, "But the philosophical dislocation of objective science has produced an alternate 'horizon of intelligibility,' which Michel de Certeau has dubbed science/fiction." Noting that the unreal multivocality of fiction haunts the singular privilege of science, de Certeau proposed an interspace, or heterology, at the juncture of these two categories" (p. 243).

Farish's turn to ponderous poststructuralism is unfortunate, as his substantive chapters provide valuable insights into the geographical imagination underpinning intellectual culture in the mid-twentieth-century United States. His exposé of the military's influence on geographical scholarship and the development of the social sciences is especially compelling. Farish has dug deeply in the archives, and has synthesized a large array of disparate materials into a compelling story of intellectual militarization.

MARTIN W. LEWIS
Stanford University

JENNIFER FROST. Hedda Hopper's Hollywood: Celebrity Gossip and American Conservatism. (American History and Culture.) New York: New York University Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 281. $35.00.

Confronting the complex, ambiguous, and contradictory personae of a politically predisposed movie gossip columnist for the Los Angeles Times, Jennifer Frost produces a sincere yet thoroughly researched examination of Hedda Hopper's rise and decline with precision and skill. Refusing to shy away from Hopper's reputation as "unpredictable and ruthless," "cold-blooded," "vicious," "fascist" (p. 1), Frost launches her study by acknowledging the controversial image that Hopper herself fabricated. That image was distinguished by conservative verbal politics and a flamboyant visual style, evinced most notably by her attention-grabbing hats. But it was Hopper's "nasty reputation [that] dominated her career, persists today, and overshadows her historical significance" (p. 1). Dismantling her contentious reputation to re-establish Hopper's importance as a cultural and to some extent political icon who navigated the cinema industry while promoting her conservative views from 1938 to 1966, Frost attempts to reposition Hopper as both gossip columnist and American conservative.

This work succeeds in accomplishing two goals. While it presents itself as a biography of Hopper, it also is a critique of how Hopper is contextualized within twentieth-century U.S. sociocultural history. Exploring Hopper's political views, Frost refers to her as a libertarian who "embraced antistatism" (p. 35), aligned herself with conservatives who feared big government as a threat to personal liberty, and endorsed anticommunism. This led her to join J. Edgar Hoover and the House Un-American Activities Committee during the red scare as they targeted actors such as Paul Robeson and Larry Parks and studio executive Dore Schary, among others.

In eight chapters, Frost demonstrates how Hopper sought to create her own style and establish her appeal with fans by positioning her next to contemporaries, most of whom she was in competition with, such as Louella Parsons, Sheilah Graham, Jimmie Fidler, Sidney Skolsky, Edith Gwynne, Ed Sullivan, and Walter Winchell. Relying on Hopper's gossip columns and a range of other sources to read Hopper's intentions and interpret how fans responded to her, Frost unveils the power that Hopper wielded over careers, studio executives, and politicians.

When Hopper interviewed James Roosevelt, son of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, regarding his impending divorce, she was deemed by Time magazine as having "'set a new record for keyhole journalism'" (p. 17). She employed foot soldiers, studio press agents, and social gatherings to provide her with the ammunition needed to fill her columns. Hopper wrote "'words that wound or silence that kills'" (p. 29) and made conscious decisions about what to reveal and what to conceal, leaving many in Hollywood fearing her attention.

Navigating Hollywood in a period when her conservative views were not popular, Hopper was reminded that she was a gossip columnist and not a politician. Frost suggests that "Hopper's politics . . . were primarily ideological—whereby longstanding conservative ideas and beliefs determined the political positions she took—and she never wavered in her dedication to using her column in the interests of her political agenda" (p. 35). She shows that Hopper was not above using racial epithets, as she did when black athlete Jackie Robinson visited her home, an act that was in direct contrast with her support of black actor James Baskett, whom she endorsed to receive an Academy Award for his role in Song of the South (1946). Hopper denounced claims that she was antisemitic; yet when Louis B. Mayer, MGM production head, wanted her to use her influence to assist his daughters in obtaining admission to an exclusive private school that excluded Jews, she refused.

Targeting entertainers in Hollywood was part and parcel of Hopper's political agenda, yet her politics extended beyond this arena. Hopper used her celebrity status to elevate the Republican Party, advocate for women's rights, campaign for Republican candidates, and destabilize Democratic opposition. Frost suggests that Hopper's political interests may have been an extension of her own ambitions.

Frost ends the book by coming full circle. In the beginning she reveals that the young Hopper was an aspiring actress; toward the end of her career, Hopper played herself, a gossip columnist, in Sunset Boulevard (1950). This casting would not have occurred if she had not cultivated, crafted, and fashioned her reputation.

The work succeeds in reconstructing Hopper's politics, unveiling her contradictions objectively, and allowing her personae to emerge. Frost grounds her work in film scholarship regarding spectatorship and reception studies. Most of all the work fills a void in the literature in terms of how gossip columnists shaped the movie industry and influenced the lives of Hollywood stars. What remains unresolved is whether Hopper was indeed an unsuccessful actress who turned to writing gossip columns. Or was she a frustrated divorcee who failed to create a life for herself after her marriage disintegrated and targeted those in the industry? Or was she a small-town girl who was determined to make a name for herself at whatever cost? Or was Hopper not motivated by any particular interest other than becoming ing a renowned gossip columnist who, by the end of her career, may have regretted her predatory style?

CHARLENE REGESTER

University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

SUSAN ZEIGER. Entangling Alliances: Foreign War Brides and American Soldiers in the Twentieth Century. New York: New York University Press. 2010. Pp. xi, 299. $45.00.

In this book, Susan Zeiger sheds light on generations of “war brides” whose marriage to American servicemen and subsequent immigration to the United States generated intense public debate and discussion throughout the twentieth century. Defining war brides as a “special category of female immigrants” and a “cultural construction,” Zeiger shows how “intercultural marriages” involving foreign women and American servicemen during and immediately after World War I, World War II, the Korean War, and the Vietnam War were never simply private and individual matters but rather public affairs that had much to do with national and international politics. To illuminate the deeply politicized nature of the war bride phenomenon, Zeiger traces three major dynamics that contributed to the “construction” of foreign war brides: American government policies on fraternization, marriage, and immigration; American public reactions to the entry of foreign women into postwar society; and the thoughts and perspectives of war brides themselves.

The picture of war brides that emerges out of the book is rich and multilayered. Far from homogeneous, foreign war brides were a diverse group of women who came from more than one country or region. During and after World War I, primarily European brides, especially French and German women, became the focus of public attention and discussion. Following World War II, Asian and especially Japanese women arrived as a new group of war brides, playing a role in postwar alliance making and facilitating a transition in United States-Japan relations. Through the Korean War and the Vietnam War, yet another group of Asian women, this time Korean and Vietnamese war brides, stepped into the center stage of public debate, reflecting American ambivalence and anxieties about wars that achieved neither closure nor resolution.

Throughout the study, Zeiger highlights the complex ways in which race, gender, and sexuality intersected to inform war brides’ experiences as well as American public responses and reactions. Perceived as “other women,” war brides were often subject to intense suspicion by the American government and public, who understood their racial-national differences in gender and sexual terms and viewed them as dangerous seducers who posed threats to postwar American society. These dynamics were made even more complex when foreign women were involved with minority servicemen. Within the context of Jim Crow racism and anti-miscegenation laws that informed domestic racial dynamics in the United States, minority and especially

African American soldiers’ involvement with white European women heightened public concerns and anxieties about racial mixing, resulting in a further proliferation of discourses and practices concerning gender, race, and sexuality. The strength of Zeiger’s analysis is particularly evident in chapter five, “Interracialism, Pluralism, and Civil Rights: War Bride Marriage in the 1940s and 1950s,” where she offers fascinating accounts of war brides, minority soldiers, and postwar civil rights mobilization. Tracing the stories of white European women who married African American servicemen, Zeiger reveals how some of these women came to experience American racism in personal terms and participated in civil rights struggles in order to defend their spouses. While challenging racism in their newly adopted country, however, these women did not necessarily challenge gender inequality but rather upheld traditional expectations by being mothers and wives and fulfilling the postwar ideal of American womanhood. The ways in which gender, race, sexuality, and nationality intersected in these women’s lives were far from obvious or predictable.

Zeiger’s project is part of the ongoing endeavor of scholarship in which researchers such as Cynthia Enloe, Elaine Tyler May, Katharine Moon, Sandra Pollock Sturdevant, and Brenda Stoltzfus continue to point to the significance of women and gender in our understandings of international relations. Drawing on this tradition, Zeiger situates the stories of war brides at the center of her analysis of wartime mobilization and postwar demobilization and illustrates how seemingly mundane grassroots experiences of foreign women who married American servicemen open a window onto geopolitics of war, nation, and empire. Culling varied and sometimes obscure tales of war brides from various parts of the world, Zeiger makes a clear case that excavating women’s experiences from historical obscurity is a crucial component in scholarly understanding of the nation’s past. Furthermore, as the book provides “a story of deep and continuing uneasiness with internationalism on the part of Americans” (p. 9), it offers opportunities for critical reflection on American encounters with racial and national others. Against the backdrop of current and sometimes excessive celebration of “multiculturalism” and “globalism,” the monograph provides a much needed reminder of America’s involvement in racism and xenophobia in the past that has shaped and continues to inform American domestic and international practices vis-à-vis racial and national others.

MIRE KOIKARI

University of Hawai‘i at Manoa

CHRISTINE YANO. Airborne Dreams: “Nisei” Stewardesses and Pan American World Airways. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 228. Cloth $79.95, paper $22.95.

Between 1955 and 1972, Pan American World Airways recruited a small corps of Japanese American flight stewardesses in order to add Japanese-language speakers to the famously luxe service on their Pacific routes. In this intriguing study, Christine Yano opens up the meaning of that initiative for both the airline and the women themselves, tapping some thirty or more oral histories that she conducted with former stewardesses. Identified as “Nisei” (second-generation Japanese Americans) regardless of their individual circumstances, these women domesticated international travel by blending the racially exotic appearance that embodied Pan Am’s promotion of global tourism with the comfort of a native speaker of English. In many cases, the Japanese-language abilities of these women were minimal due to the wartime dismantling of Japanese-language schools in Hawai‘i and the suppression of the Japanese language at home by cautious parents. This was a racial hire under the guise of language, Yano tells us, incorporating women’s bodies into the airline’s global strategies.

Yano blends three themes: the global ambitions of Pan American Airways, the minority status of the Japanese American stewardesses and their community, and the cosmopolitan lifestyle of the Jet Age. Of the three strands, she explores the Jet Age the least, noting that increased speed meant increased access to distant countries, but the deeper possibilities in this inherently technological periodization remain undeveloped. Importantly, the stewardesses occupy the center of the analysis, for Yano intends to invert the conventional hierarchy of history and biography, taking “the women’s lives and voices as the overarching framework within which the larger history of airlines, industries and nations may be ‘narrated, situated and embodied’” (p. 58). Yano argues that while Pan Am’s genius was to mesh corporate dreams with individual ones, the Nisei stewardesses quietly “carved out their own sense of self within its framework” (p. 162). They made many choices—defying family expectations of married life, appropriating elements of upper-class culture, accepting subservience to passengers in cabin service, rejecting the geisha image, circumventing the mandatory dress code, challenging the division of labor among the crew, declining invitations to after-hours parties—and Yano argues that both the acceptance and rejection of expectations should be seen as a constant assertion of self. Indeed, the book makes its largest contribution in an examination of racialized gender, of self-assertion within a powerfully conformist culture offered by family and corporation.

Historians who use oral histories will be sympathetic to Yano’s ambition to use the small details of everyday life to illuminate the larger issues of corporations and nations. The author achieves that in part by focusing on cultural meaning. To that end, Yano subordinates narrative to analysis and draws upon a wide array of secondary literature from the last decade to extract conceptual tools for her inquiry. Some will be disappointed that the voices of the women themselves do not constitute a larger part of the book, but Yano’s analysis makes us much more sophisticated listeners than we would have been otherwise. She acknowledges that the one weakness of her sources is that the women that she interviewed were recruited through employee social organizations that outlasted Pan American itself; their enthusiasm for the “Pan Am way” is not surprising, given their continuing engagement with that period of their lives. That she was able to recover the history of this small changing cadre at all is impressive and valuable.

Yano finds power in the concept of “frontier,” navigating this difficult terrain with scholarship from the new western history and borderlands as reference points. She deploys a refurbished concept of “frontier,” which she describes as a shifting zone of innovation and social contact lying on the margins or interstices of cultural networks. An anthropologist, she claims that the “frontier” works both as an emic and an etic; it is both how contemporaries understood the pioneering aspects of Pan Am, Nisei stewardesses, and Jet Age travel, and a heuristic concept useful for scholarly analysis. Her study persuasively shows Nisei stewardesses operating within a shifting zone in the interstices of cultural networks; they negotiated race, class, gender, and cultural difference in a new space created by technological innovation, all in the course of a simple cabin service. However, Yano clearly shows that Pan American executives like Juan Trippe understood their technological and corporate pioneering in terms sympathetic to the older ideological definition of frontier—an innovative space so far in front of cultural practice that the individual invents and dictates the new rules. These multiple meanings suggest that a single term is not as useful as it seems at first, flattening distinctions rather than sharpening them. Yet it would be a mistake not to embrace the notion of the aircraft cabin on an international flight as a “frontier,” and to miss the complex cultural analysis that Yano provides in this deft study of pioneering Japanese American women.

GAIL COOPER
Lehigh University

BARRY REAY. New York Hustlers: Masculinity and Sex in Modern America. (Encounters: Cultural Histories.) New York: Manchester University Press. 2010. Pp. xiv, 279. Cloth £65.00, paper £17.99.

Rather than the businessman’s suit of gray flannel, this book sees the New York hustler’s cuffed jeans and tight t-shirt as American masculinity’s representative mid-twentieth-century attire. In actuality and imagery, Barry Reay insists, the hustler is essential to understanding American male sexuality before the late 1960s. It is an author’s occupational hazard to overstate the significance of his or her subject, and Reay does so with hustlers. Nonetheless, the book provides fresh information and insight about the occupation of male sex work.

But Reay stalks bigger, more elusive game in this ambitious book. Even if his argument for the hustler’s centrality may not convince many readers, he lucidly and engagingly theorizes about male sexuality. At the very least, New York's hustlers make for an intriguing case study in midcentury manhood; but these few men are not shown to be—they are merely said to be—representative of American males in general. Because of his discoveries about hustlers, Reay makes a provocative argument that American male sexuality in the twentieth century needs a new periodization; while he does not conclusively demonstrate said necessity, this book will nonetheless spark scholarly conversations about the matter.

To examine the doings, self-definition, and symbolic significance of New York hustlers, Reay makes elaborate use of the large archive on Thomas Painter, Alfred Kinsey's "key informant" (p. 21) who himself studied, photographed, housed, and habituated Times Square hustlers. Additionally, Reay cleverly interprets an impressive array of other mid-century material: novels, plays, song lyrics, and paintings, as well as social scientific writing about hustling and about men in prison. Reay sees hustler types all over the place: in Arthur Miller's View from the Bridge and William Inge's Picnic, for example; in the persona of James Dean and the paintings of Paul Cadmus (surely no stretch there); in the portrayal of convicted murderers Richard Hickock and Perry Smith in Truman Capote's In Cold Blood (1965) and in Richard Avedon's photographs of the two.

To Reay, hustlers are the prototypical males of mid-century America, especially in how they defined—or, as Reay would have it—refused to define themselves sexually. Painter wrote Kinsey that a young hustler once told him, "Thank God I'm just a cocksucker and not queer" (p. 20); widespread refusal among hustlers to define themselves as homosexual, even though their livelihood required extensive homosexual activity, represented "a very different sexual regime" (p. 45), an "untidiness of categories" (p. 69) that was pervasive in the United States, Reay maintains, until the gay rights movement and its opponents reified a binary view of sexuality. According to Reay, until the late 1960s, the only American men unequivocally identified as homosexual by themselves and others were those who were effeminate in manner and often passive in their sexual activities.

The influence of Michel Foucault has familiarized us with the distinction between homosexual activity, widely found, and homosexual identity, constructed only at certain times in certain places. In American historiography, George Chauncey's Gay New York: Gender, Urban Culture, and the Making of the Gay Male World, 1890–1940 (1994) has been highly influential in arguing that a distinct gay identity began emerging in the United States in the late nineteenth century. Although that identity was initially confined to those men who were thought somehow womanly in manner and sexual practice, Chauncey maintains that a dichotomized male sexuality was firmly in place by the twentieth century's midpoint, with anyone who engaged in homosexual activity, regardless of his mannerisms or particular sexual practices, identified as gay. Reay insists that Chauncey assigned too early a time for the firm implantation of the sexual binary. "I am resisting," says Reay, "gay identity as a heuristic guide to the period before the late 1960s" (p. 253).

But Reay himself sometimes uncritically takes people at their word and then cavalierly assigns those words broad relevance. He assumes wide import in Richard Bruce Wright's recollection of the ambiguous sexual atmosphere of a Harlem Renaissance speakeasy: "Nobody was in the closet. There wasn't any closet" (p. 253). Reay accepts at face value John Cheever's and Roy Cohn's insistence, echoing the declarations of many a hustler, that, in spite of extensive sexual activity with men, they were not homosexual—because they did not fit an effeminate stereotype. Similarly, he points to Gore Vidal's differentiation of himself from Truman Capote by likening Capote to a woman. It ought at least to be considered that Cheever's, Cohn's, and Vidal's remarks attest more to a denial of self than to defiance of a sexual binary, that their gendered declarations might document the already firm implantation of the binary in American culture. Self-definition can be misleading as historical evidence, or even as a description of a historian's own work.

JOHN IBSON
California State University,
Fullerton

ROBERT WUTHNOW. Remaking the Heartland: Middle America since the 1950s. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 358. $35.00.

In this study, sociologist Robert Wuthnow counters accepted narratives of the Midwest as a region in decline. Rather, Wuthnow contends, the region is characterized by adaptation, much of it for the better, and survival. In the rural heartland (Arkansas, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, Oklahoma, and South Dakota) change, not stasis, was the common condition, and the declension narrative only pertains if images of historic midwestern stability are accepted at face value. Furthermore, recovery from the Great Depression took longer and was more painful in the Middle West than scholars and commentators have assumed, and lasted throughout the 1950s. The ensuing postwar readjustment was successful in terms of "bringing economic restructuring to the region, in redistributing the population to take fuller advantage of changing labor markets, and in strengthening its ties to other parts of the country" (p. 16). By 2000, the heartland states had experienced gross domestic product (GDP) growth rates that equaled or excelled those of other states, attracted new residents at a comparable rate with states in other regions, and become more diverse and more tolerant. Wuthnow concludes that the great American midsection is better off than it was sixty years ago.

The book is an ambitious and successful project. While Wuthnow's "multimethod research design" may not sound familiar to historians, the results look much the same as traditional historical research. He draws on statistical data and qualitative source material (oral history and interviews, newspapers, local histories, government documents, and memoirs) to show the ways in which Midwesterners altered farming techniques, reorganized business ventures and community life, and emphasized high quality public education. Edge cities became increasingly important in the region, because the office parks, corporate headquarters, and research labs located there helped retain midwestern university graduates and attracted outsiders. Readers will appreciate that the post-1950s period does not exist in a vacuum. In each chapter and to great effect, Wuthnow examines nineteenth- and early twentieth-century antecedents to explain the postwar period. One notable example of this is the way the author demonstrates how the rise of agribusiness after World War II did not represent a disjuncture with prewar conditions. Stories of the decentralization of the meatpacking industry from cities to rural areas of low wages and easy access to transportation need greater context, Wuthnow shows. Farm families of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries fought monopoly power through cooperation, both informal and formal, and actively sought greater control over price through ever greater market connections, efforts that prepared the way for major agribusinesses. Towns such as Garden City, Kansas exemplified this trend by welcoming and accommodating significant economic and demographic change.

The author is not always completely persuasive, however. The chapter on remaking midwestern identity is the least satisfactory of the book's seven chapters. Wuthnow claims that Middle Westerners retained a local and regional identity "by shaping the meaning of the various traditions at their disposal," simultaneously deemphasizing the region's Wild West past and stressing the stories of creative and dogged pioneers such as the Ingalls family, made famous by Laura Ingalls Wilder (p. 59). But changing perceptions about the Wild West as an increasingly mythical and remote place, both temporally and spatially, seem much more of an American phenomenon than a specifically midwestern one. Wuthnow's definition of the heartland is provoking. On the surface, the selection of the nine states as the heartland makes sense. These states occupy the great middle swath of the nation from Canada to the northern boundaries of Texas and Louisiana where there are few metropolitan centers and agriculture remains among the most significant economic activities. Yet Arkansas is undeniably southern and is an outlier in regard to educational attainment and other evidence the author presents. Excluding Illinois and Indiana, not to mention Ohio, Wisconsin, and Michigan, is odd, given the many similarities with Wuthnow's heartland states and their traditional midwestern association. Finally, the book would benefit from greater attention to the ways in which the ecosystems of the rural Midwest have been shaped by significant economic transformations. Irrigation is an important topic in the book, but there is little note of changes in water quality and availability, such as groundwater contamination related to livestock and crop production or the impact of irrigation on the Ogallala Aquifer. Despite these comparatively minor complaints, the book under review is a well-written, detailed, and persuasive account of change in the region.

J. L. ANDERSON

Mount Royal University

DAVID HAMILTON GOLLAND. Constructing Affirmative Action: The Struggle for Equal Employment Opportunity. (Civil Rights and the Struggle for Black Equality in the Twentieth Century.) Lexington: University Press of Kentucky. 2011. Pp. xiv, 248. $50.00.

The last two decades have seen a rise in book-length historical studies of affirmative action. David Hamilton Golland's work is a welcome addition to the literature and debates on this contentious issue. Focusing on Philadelphia, the title puns the particular focus he has taken on this key aspect of affirmative action, namely the struggle for equal employment opportunity for African Americans who for years were excluded from the construction industry and its trade unions.

Golland reminds us that "affirmative action" has been not just a public policy filled with ironies, interest convergences, and unintended consequences but also a struggle that at its heart challenges the privileges of white supremacy. The book's dust jacket features a 1963 photograph of black men and women picketing a construction site in Philadelphia, led by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and other civil rights groups. One picket sign reads: "Phila.'s Labor Bigots Must Go Also." Indeed, the NAACP and the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) locked horns over segregated trade unions both North and South in the 1960s. George Shultz, Secretary of Labor and Commerce under President Richard Nixon, once wryly commented that before the Philadelphia Plan the quota for blacks in the construction industry was zero.

Golland has successfully mined primary sources from government, labor, and civil rights organizations to debunk notions of Nixon as an affirmative action pioneer or civil rights president. He seeks instead to help restore to the historical narrative the important role played by popular forces campaigning for civil rights as sparks to this public policy, which he further notes was kept alive by certain government bureaucrats through the Johnson and Nixon administrations. Chapters one and two chart the Eisenhower and Kennedy administrations' reluctant response to civil rights movement pressure. Chapter three highlights federal officials' testing employment integration plans between the passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act and the 1967 introduction of the Philadelphia and Cleveland Plans. Chapters four and five use Philadelphia as a point of departure to view local and national battles over affirmative action in construction from 1967 to 1973.

"This book," writes Golland, "treats the two iterations of the Philadelphia Plan as the collective watershed moment in the origin of affirmative action" (p. 3). Tracing the history of that plan, Golland effectively contrasts it with progress or obstruction in other cities. Despite opponents' claims that this was a quota system, Golland points out that it was not, noting that civil rights leaders themselves were "leery of quotas" (p. 128). The plan did, however, require the construction industry and unions to set goals and timetables for training and hiring African Americans. Golland highlights the work of affirmative action advocates like NAACP Labor Secretary Herbert Hill and Assistant Secretary of Labor Arthur Fletcher, contrasted with Nixon's cynical usage of affirmative action to try to split the Democratic Party's labor and civil rights constituencies. That overt attempt was perhaps best exemplified with his appointment of trade union leader and affirmative action opponent Peter Brennan as secretary of labor.

Golland makes no apology for his affirmative action advocacy. This is not problematic in itself. But he encounters analytical gridlock by narrowly framing affirmative action as simply "positive steps" (p. 173) for "equal opportunity," with "preferences and quotas" being departures from what was "originally intended" (p. 5). Who intended this? What if "positive steps" alone turned out to be an insufficient remedy to combat discrimination? How do we undo historical white preferences in construction or anywhere else without introducing correctives that include some kind of black "hiring preferences," as Nancy MacLean put it in her discussion of the Philadelphia Plan (p. 173)? Golland also misreads "diversity" as a diversion from affirmative action public policy (p. 172), whereas Kimberle Crenshaw and others have noted that "diversity" became an affirmative action strategy after the 1978 Regents of the University of California v. Bakke decision banned minority admissions preferences and quotas in higher education.

The book is clearly argued and accessibly written—no easy task when trying to describe details of the construction trades, popular movements, labor organizations, and civil rights law. It is less successful in its broader view of the affirmative action struggle. In addition, some antiquated conceptualizations periodically pop up (e.g., "white backlash," pp. 119, 150). There is also the occasional odd generalization such as: "At the start of 1961, civil rights leaders could look back at two decades of progress in voting rights and public accommodation" (p. 33), suggesting a need for better editing.

Nonetheless, this is both a good scholarly and general read, not to mention teaching tool. Few historians have focused so much research on the construction industry and trade unions as one of the key sites of the modern affirmative action battle. With the U.S. Supreme Court possibly poised to overturn affirmative action, we need to see what we may lose with its dismantling.

PHILIP F. RUBIO

North Carolina Agricultural and Technical State University

LARRY GRUBBS. Secular Missionaries: Americans and African Development in the 1960s. (Culture, Politics, and the Cold War.) Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press. 2009. Pp. viii, 243. $34.95.

Larry Grubbs's book is a thoughtful account of the creation, implementation, and shortcomings of U.S. aid policy in Africa during the 1960s. Based on archival material, published primary sources, and a wide range of secondary works, this history utilizes the examples of Sudan, Ethiopia, Nigeria, and Congo to show that American aid policy toward Africa was flawed from the beginning and therefore had no chance for success. The book delves into cultural ideas ingrained in "secular missionaries" who executed development policies in Africa.

Shortly after his inauguration, President John F. Kennedy acted on his campaign promise to assist the development of African nations in order to ensure that they looked to the United States rather than to the Soviet Union for "leadership." To that end, he created the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) and the Peace Corps, and assigned them to promote development and modernization in Africa. While USAID focused on grants and technical aid, Peace Corps volunteers provided a variety of educational and community development services. Fittingly, Kennedy termed the 1960s the "Decade of Development" and brought into his administration leading experts on modernization theory and African affairs.

USAID's performance was stymied from the beginning by its cumbersome procedures, burdensome congressional oversight, and budget cuts. African governments were to abide by guidelines that were generally unclear as Ambassador William Attwood of Guinea noted: "You couldn't blame the Guineans for being confused in our procedures; we had trouble understanding some of them ourselves" (p. 133). USAID delayed aid to Somalia, Senegal, and other nations on the grounds that their development plans were poorly designed and did not include enough "self-help" projects, prompting Somalia's prime minister to complain that American aid "procedures are too slow, conditions too restrictive" (p. 132). In addition officials in Washington often failed to consult with leaders of African nations. Uncertain of the procedures, nations turned to American experts for help. Nigeria's development plan, for example, was written by an American economist, Wolfgang Stolper, who had limited knowledge of Nigeria's history. Little was achieved. Considered by the agency to be an emerging leader in Africa, Nigeria experienced a coup in 1966 and the following year was thrown into a civil war. In the Sudan USAID did a feasibility study of a road from Khartoum to Port Sudan, but the project was only completed in the 1990s by a company known as the Bin Laden Group. The Congo crisis exposed the tragedy of U.S. policy in Africa. The nation eventually fell under the control of Mobutu Sésé Seko, one of Africa's worst despots and a key U.S. ally in the region. And so went the story of USAID's involvement in Africa. By the mid-1960s the "Decade of Development" had turned into a "Decade of Discouragement," and policy makers rushed to provide an explanation.

The book is equally revealing about the role of race in the creation of American foreign policy. A very "white" agency, USAID ignored repeated requests from African American leaders to assist in the formulation of an African policy. When the American Negro Leadership Conference asked to provide input, it was marginalized while members of the white-dominated African Studies Association received uninterrupted access to Washington corridors. Increasingly, African leaders grew impatient with American racism. With limited success policy makers argued that Africans were backward and culturally inferior, and as a result modernization needed more time in order to succeed there. Even President Lyndon Johnson was not immune: "We just couldn't allow the cannibals kill a lot of people," (p. 147) he said in reference to the Congo crisis. Africa's allies in Washington such as G. Mennen Williams could not emancipate themselves from such views. Africans were used to their "communal ways of living," he wrote (p. 146). Washington bureaucrats dismissed Africans as "irrational," "too sensitive," "irresponsible," "provincial," and as a people with "deep personal insecurity" (p. 146). In a rush to scapegoat someone for failed policies, few considered that the African region received the least amount of U.S. aid. In addition, a colonial legacy of exploitive trade practices and recurring unfair policies from the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund thwarted Africa's overall development efforts. Given those forces, Grubbs's conclusion is apt: "Assigning Africans the blame for their misfortunes has freed Western governments and the World Bank from shouldering responsibility, which is one reason why representations of African barbarism persist in popular culture, the media, and officialdom" (p. 179).

Despite the strengths of the book, Grubbs's discussion of Peace Corps performance is a little superficial. While volunteers shared beliefs of Africa's difference, they lived and worked alongside the local community. Their work helped to tear down racial barriers and educate Americans about African societies. Returned volunteers have increasingly challenged the notion that globalization is just about economic imperatives, adding that it is also about human dignity, respect, and understanding. Also, it would have been helpful to place the analysis within the broader spectrum of the ideology of U.S. foreign policy.

But these weaknesses should not detract from this timely and insightful addition to the literature. Grubbs's book will encourage additional work on the performance of USAID, the Peace Corps, and the role of African Americans in shaping U.S. policy.

JULIUS A. AMIN
University of Dayton

STEFAN M. BRADLEY. Harlem vs. Columbia University: Black Student Power in the Late 1960s. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2009. Pp. ix, 249. $40.00.

While the Black Power and student movements of the 1960s and 1970s have each received ample attention from historians, the northern black student movement during this era has been somewhat overlooked. This has been due, in part, to the relative inability of historians of the New Left to fit black student groups within their analytical frameworks. The few studies we do have on black student protest in the North have tended to overcompensate for this problem by pushing white students out of the picture. Moreover, scholars who have focused on black student politics have largely failed to bring their stories down from the ivory tower and connect them to civil rights and black power struggles in the communities below. For example, few, if any, have placed black high school and college students in the same frame. The result is that the northern black student movement has been cast off on its own, isolated from both the New Left and the black power movement.

To be sure, bringing together the stories of black and white student protest in the 1960s is no easy task, and Stefan M. Bradley deserves much credit for doing so admirably in his study of campus activism at Columbia University. Columbia, in particular, became a key battleground for both the New Left and black power movements in 1968 and 1969 after it embarked on a plan to build a new gymnasium in Harlem's Morningside Park despite the vocal objections of black community leaders and organizations. For the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), mobilizing against this racist land-grab fit into its larger strategy of radicalizing the student body in order to build a powerful movement to challenge a range of university policies, including the administration's links with the Defense Department and its refusal to give students a meaningful say in campus affairs. For black student activists and Black Power leaders like H. Rap Brown and Stokely Carmichael, both of whom joined Columbia's black student protestors, confronting the attempt by this symbol of white privilege to seize a vital resource from a working-class black community was a critical test for the Black Power movement's ideas about local control and self-determination. Bradley concludes that both white students and black students ended up achieving their objectives, but they did so by abandoning "the racially integrated struggle approach" and "separating along racial lines" (p. 7).

This study attempts to approach the events that transpired at Columbia from many different angles—perhaps too many. In addition to telling the story of the so-called "Gym Crow" issue from the perspective of both Columbia's Students Afro-American Society (SAS) and its SDS branch, Bradley also examines the university's troubled relationship with the black and Puerto Rican communities of Harlem and Morningside Heights, provides an overview of similar black student protests at several other Ivy League universities, and tries to explain why university administrations at Columbia and elsewhere yielded to the demands of student protestors. This is an ambitious agenda, and the results are mixed. Bradley is at his best when he is exploring the relationship between the SAS and SDS, and explaining why SAS broke from what seemed like a powerful coalition. Black students at Columbia decided to go it alone, he argues, “so they could have an identity of their own” (p. 78) and so the university would be forced to deal with the issue of race on their terms. These feelings reflected the desire of black students, more than half of whom came from working-class families, to develop a sense of racial and class solidarity with the residents of Harlem and Morningside Heights. In addition, black students mistrusted the commitment of their privileged white peers to the plight of working-class communities. These are important perspectives that contribute to a clearer understanding of how Black Power ideology played out on college campuses in the late 1960s. However, Bradley does not deliver on his account of the relationship between the university and its neighbors, because his depiction of Harlem and Morningside Heights lacks texture. This is partly due to the book’s overreliance on published, campus-based sources and its lack of documentation from neighborhood sources. We thus learn little about the give and take that likely characterized the relationship between Columbia’s black students and community leaders. And, while Bradley frequently mentions Puerto Ricans as another community victimized by university policies, we are never sure of how they fit into the picture.

Despite these shortcomings, the book succeeds in complicating and enriching our understanding of the forces that shaped northern black student politics in the 1960s and 1970s.

ANDREW J. DIAMOND

Center for International Studies and Research (CERI)

FRITZ UMBACH. The Last Neighborhood Cops: The Rise and Fall of Community Policing in New York Public Housing. (Critical Issues in Crime and Society.) New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 233. $39.95.

In its 1968 report, the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders (the “Kerner Commission”) highlighted the difficult relations between African Americans and the police. The Kerner Commission echoed charges that the police frequently brutalized African Americans, particularly young criminal suspects, and many critics accused the police of being occupiers of a restive ghetto colony. Even during this turbulent period, however, a majority of African Americans continued to express their faith in the police in public opinion surveys, although opinions varied based on the respondent’s age. This should have surprised no one, because poor African Americans were more likely to be the victims of crime (unfortunately perpetrated by their neighbors) than any other group in American society. This is an insight that escaped most commentators at the time and most historians since.

Fritz Umbach’s book is therefore a welcome correction that engages many more topics than its narrow subtitle suggests, including the history of public housing, the war on poverty, civil rights, and the “procedural rights” revolution of the 1960s. Based on careful archival research into the New York City Housing Authority police department archives and interviews with both former officers and residents, Umbach’s book provides a bottom-up view of residents’ interactions with police.

Tenants, at least until the 1970s, saw the housing police as “our cops” largely because they were. At a time when the New York City Police Department (NYPD) was nearly completely white, the housing police were forty-five percent black and Latino in 1965, a proportion that increased over the next decade, and some housing police lived in housing projects themselves. Moreover, except for a couple of failed experiments with organizing the housing police hierarchically in precincts, housing cops patrolled the same projects on foot every shift, thus allowing residents and police to forge close ties. Police enforced community norms as well as housing authority regulations, and residents cooperated with police in reporting violations and disciplining their children. Some of the recollections in the book may seem tinged with nostalgia, but, as Umbach shows, New York’s housing projects generally had lower rates of violent crime than nearby neighborhoods. The housing police pioneered what became known as “community policing,” in which residents were empowered to take action in conjunction with police.

So why did the model fail? Umbach points to the procedural rights revolution sparked by poverty lawyers funded through the Office of Economic Opportunity as a key change. Efforts to exclude unmarried mothers with children, felons, and applicants with a history of behavioral issues from public housing failed due to a combination of extreme need—an increasing homeless population caused by gentrification and real estate speculation—and court cases charging the housing authority with using arbitrary and illegal discriminatory criteria for selecting applicants. Rules for daily conduct and a system of fines for violators ended on due process grounds, and after Escalera v. New York City Housing Authority (1970), evictions of drug dealers and others who preyed on their law-abiding neighbors became nearly impossible. Simultaneously, the growth of the underground economy made reliance on illegal income more necessary, so-called “ghost tenants” (persons not registered on the lease) more prevalent, and close ties to police more problematic. In Umbach’s telling, communitarian ideals clashed with individual rights and, unfortunately for the residents of New York’s housing projects, individual rights won and crime rates in the 1980s and 1990s soared as difficult residents and dysfunctional families accumulated.

The housing police had a role in the collapse of community policing too. They envied the better-paid and more prestigious NYPD and wanted a promotion ladder that the horizontal organization of the housing police (in which nearly everyone patrolled) could not provide. Residents’ demands for more police as crime rates rose facilitated a shift to a precinct model in which police were dispatched by car to trouble spots, and arrests and responsiveness to 911 calls became the measure of efficiency in a more militarized organization. The precinct model also created more supervisory positions for police and blurred some of the differences between police forces. Finally, the merging of recruitment lists and the assignment of new officers to the city police, the housing police, and the transit police according to a formula resulted in the housing police becoming whiter and more suburban even as the NYPD itself became more diverse. Community policing was dead before New York's three police forces merged in 1995.

Umbach embeds the agency of residents and police within larger processes of deindustrialization, gentrification, and the rise of the underground economy. Some will no doubt disagree with Umbach's emphasis on the role of difficult families in worsening community life while inexorably changing the relationship with police. But even if Umbach's account of the procedural rights revolution and its results could be more nuanced, he is right to emphasize the role of resident activists in demanding safer environments for their community. Safety, as Umbach notes, was a civil right too.

ERIC C. SCHNEIDER

University of Pennsylvania

EDWARD R. SCHMITT. President of the Other America: Robert Kennedy and the Politics of Poverty. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press. 2010. Pp. ix, 324. $39.95.

Dismayed by continued war and violence in the late 1960s, millions of Americans looked to Robert F. Kennedy to renew the idealism lost with the murders of his brother, John F. Kennedy, and Martin Luther King, Jr. In this thoroughly researched study, Edward R. Schmitt argues that the younger Kennedy's brand of idealism centered on a theme that John Kennedy had neglected and King championed near the end of his life: the elimination of poverty in the United States. Schmitt reveals both the dwindling significance of poverty to the national discourse and the personal values that compelled Robert Kennedy to dwell "on the tragedy of the poor" (p. 1).

Schmitt traces Kennedy's life from his boyhood through his political career and death with an eye on how his experiences shaped his relationship with the poor. Despite his privileged upbringing, Kennedy's early life and Irish Catholic identity engendered empathy for excluded minority groups and impoverished Americans. Friends depicted young Robert as a socially awkward outsider in prep school and at Harvard. Unlike his gallant older brothers (German flak guns killed Joseph in a bombing raid during World War II), Robert served in a less-than-glamorous capacity as a naval officer. The younger Kennedy lacked both the charisma and the heroic war story that propelled his brother into the national political spotlight.

Schmitt provides new insight into Kennedy's influence on federal civil rights initiatives and the early stages of the War on Poverty in his capacity as Attorney General. While Schmitt acknowledges that the Kennedys dragged their feet on civil rights to avoid alienating southern Democrats, RFK established his reputation as an ally to African Americans with his support for the rights of marchers (if not always their physical defense). The younger Kennedy also significantly influenced antipoverty policy as it expanded through the 1960s, particularly with his advocacy of community action. The administration emphasized programs organized locally by the poor themselves to reform dysfunctional economic environments that perpetuated poverty. RFK's boyhood friend David Hackett, appointed to direct the President's Committee on Juvenile Delinquency and Youth Crime, applied the theories of Columbia sociologists Lloyd Ohlin and Richard Cloward in experimental projects to curtail gang violence and narcotics trafficking. The Kennedy administration extended Ohlin and Cloward's ideas to antipoverty efforts in the Appalachians. President Lyndon B. Johnson, in turn, made community action the primary strategy of federal antipoverty policy on a national scale.

After his brother's assassination, Kennedy wanted to lead the War on Poverty, which Johnson declared in 1964. The mutual animosity between Johnson and the attorney general made such an appointment unlikely, but Schmitt makes a convincing case that Kennedy genuinely desired to become the nation's chief antipoverty warrior. Johnson appointed Kennedy's brother-in-law Sargent Shriver to direct the new Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) but might have been well advised to appoint Kennedy to the post. As New York's junior senator, Kennedy pushed LBJ aside as the champion of the impoverished. The OEO became embroiled in controversy and derided by critics from the right and left, including RFK. An appointment to OEO would have at least delayed Kennedy's political ambitions, if not derailed them altogether (as OEO did to Shriver's ambitions).

Arguably the most significant role Kennedy played in the national debate on poverty was his highly visible presence among the poor themselves. As a senator and presidential candidate, Kennedy regularly toured urban slums, Appalachian hollows, and Indian reservations. More than any previous politician, even LBJ, Kennedy embraced Latinos as a constituency deserving national attention. Schmitt portrays Kennedy's concern for minorities and the poor as heartfelt and genuine, not merely politically opportunistic. Indeed, Kennedy rejected the advice of advisors who discouraged the attention he devoted to poverty. At one point he labeled his advisors "a bunch of bastards" when they suggested he not waste precious campaign time on politically marginal "Injuns" (p. 204). He went out of his way to shake the dirty, calloused hands of coal miners or to speak with frightened ghetto or barrio children. He walked into shacks in the Mississippi Delta and was shocked to find American children in the late twentieth century who endured Third World hunger and squalor. By getting to know the poor personally, Kennedy created conditions for, in Schmitt's words, a rare and "honest dialogue with racial minorities and the poor in America" (p. 228).

Schmitt's portrait of Kennedy's intimacy with the poor makes the candidate's 1968 murder all the more tragic. The book may strike some readers as a bit too hagiographical, but there can be little doubt that Bobby Kennedy was the last American politician able to keep the nation's attention on the contradiction of entrenched poverty amidst great affluence, at least through the summer of 1968.

WILLIAM CLAYSON
College of Southern Nevada

JEFFERSON COWIE. Stayin' Alive: The 1970s and the Last Days of the Working Class. New York: New Press. 2010. Pp. 464. $27.95.

Jefferson Cowie's prize-winning book creatively interweaves three narrative lines: the anger and frustrations of the white working class, the attempts of politicians to mobilize those feelings electorally, and representations of working-class concerns in popular culture. For the first, Cowie frames his story around Dewey Burton, a Michigan Ford autoworker, whom national news reporters repeatedly represented as a typical worker. Burton, a self-described New Deal Democrat outraged by busing, welfare abuse, and his perception of diminishing opportunities for people like himself, still voted Democrat in 1972 despite misgivings about George McGovern, but by 1980 he was an enthusiastic Reagan Democrat. For his second theme, electoral politics, Cowie gives most attention (predictably) to Richard Nixon, George Wallace, Ronald Reagan, and George McGovern. The first three, Cowie contends, figured out how to speak to the Dewey Burtons of America while McGovern—and other liberal Democrats—did not. That difference, the author suggests, explains why American politics and culture shifted to the right in the 1970s and have remained there ever since. Cowie uses such cultural icons as Merle Haggard, Bruce Springsteen, and John Travolta to explain the emotional basis of this transformation.

Haunting these narratives is an underlying sense that it did not have to turn out this way. In the late 1960s a sudden upsurge in working-class protest seemed to suggest that those protests might transcend the class boundary between New Left college students and blue-collar workers. Strike rates increased and included not only conventional strikes within the normal collective bargaining model but illegal and unsanctioned wildcat strikes by the rank-and-file, directed at union bureaucrats as much as employers and focused on union democracy and quality of life issues as much as wages, hours, and benefits. The mostly young strikers at the Lordstown, Ohio, auto plant who explained their grievances sounded like part of the Woodstock Nation to many political analysts. Organizers for Miners for Democracy, Teamsters for a Democratic Union, Ed Sad-lowski's Fight Back campaign against the leadership of the United Steelworkers, and Cesar Chavez's United Farm Workers actively sought the support of New Left activists. Organizations like the Coalition of Labor Union Women, 9to5, the United Farm Workers, the Coalition of Black Trade Unionists, and the League of Revolutionary Black Workers raised gender and race issues in ways that suggested the labor movement, by responding to these concerns, could not only re-energize itself but also serve as a vehicle for transcending divisions among working people. Some politicians, most notably Bobby Kennedy just before his assassination, explicitly argued that Democrats could forge a new governing coalition by uniting people across cultural boundaries with common class concerns.

Cowie seeks to explain those lost possibilities. He emphasizes two themes. First, he argues that, "Class . . . died a slow death of a thousand cuts in the 1970s, but few problems sliced as deeply as how race and class were set against each other." Although the New Deal had linked "black and white working people politically . . . in popular discourse 'working class' still meant white. In the 1970s race and class were often at odds, trumping any possibility of . . . an interracial class identity" (p. 236). Second, when economic changes undermined significant parts of the old industrial working class, replacing them with a new service-based working class of "Women, immigrants, minorities, and, yes, white guys," there was "no discursive, political place for them comparable to the classic concept of the industrial working class" (p. 362).

It is easy to see why this is a prize-winning book. The author poses big questions, imaginatively links material from what are usually separate topical specialties, and writes with considerable literary flair. However, readers theoretically predisposed to think of class as a structural relationship as well as a discursive phenomenon may not be completely satisfied. While the author discusses such social and economic changes as increased capital mobility, international relocation of manufacturing capacity, new technologies, stagnant real incomes, interregional shifts within the United States, suburbanization, immigration, or changes in family structures and gender systems he does not analyze in substantial depth the relationships between these factors and the discursive failures he describes. It is perhaps symbolic that two of the sentences quoted in the previous paragraph are both in passive voice, leaving mute the question of who constructed or failed to construct these discourses in the ways they did.

RICHARD OESTREICHER
University of Pittsburgh

JUDITH STEIN. Pivotal Decade: How the United States Traded Factories for Finance in the Seventies. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2010. Pp. xvi, 367. $32.50.

Judith Stein has written a provocative and compelling history of the political economy of the 1970s in the United States. She traces what she sees as the devolution of the American economy from “The Great Compression” of the immediate post–World War II decades (a time when lower- and middle-class Americans saw their incomes increase at a faster rate than the incomes of the rich) to the more recent “Age of Inequality.” A number of excellent histories of the 1970s have now been published; Stein’s is one of the very best. It is an essential guide to economic policy in this critical period.

Stein begins by explaining why working-class and middle-class Americans prospered in the post World War II years and what factors contributed to the reversal of those distributional gains. Stein argues, almost in shorthand, that New Deal measures ended the maldistribution of wealth that had characterized Jazz Age America. She also pays homage to the role government-defended labor unions played in securing for workers a greater share of the national income. Stein is more concerned with what went wrong with this equitable model of political economy. Above all, she writes, “free trade was the snake in the postwar Garden of Eden” (p. 7). Stein lucidly explains that from the mid-1940s through the 1970s American policymakers willfully allowed allies to protect their domestic markets from American goods while opening U.S. markets to their products. She quotes George Ball, Kennedy’s undersecretary of state for economic affairs—and a one-time lobbyist for the European Economic Community—who claimed, “we Americans could afford to pay some economic price for a strong Europe” (p. 8). Much of the rest of Stein’s book tells us exactly which Americans would pay the price not only for a strong Europe and Japan but also for an interdependent global economy fueled by extravagantly rewarded capitalists seeking ever greater returns on their investments.

In making her case, Stein meticulously examines key economic policy decisions that affected Americans’ ability to maintain a strong industrial base and the well-paying jobs that base had provided wageworkers. She employs a wide cast of characters to tell her story, which focuses on the Nixon and Carter administrations. Organized labor leaders emerge as heroes in her history as they work tirelessly to protect American workers from foreign competition—competition, Stein shows, that was subsidized by unfair trade policy, a counterproductive focus on geopolitical and international strategic concerns, and too many politicians’ willingness to support international investors’ interests rather than those of American workers. Some unexpected heroes and villains do emerge in Stein’s account. The hard-nosed Texan John Connally, Richard Nixon’s secretary of the treasury, wears a white cowboy hat as he fights for domestic American industry, snarling “My philosophy is that all foreigners are out to screw us, and it’s our job to screw them first” (p. 40). George McGovern comes across as an economic incompetent who ignored the Democratic Party’s labor base while he snuggled up to movie stars. Consumer advocate Ralph Nader is castigated as a middle-class reformer indifferent to how his causes affected American workers. In general, the non-labor union Left—in other words, activists who can loosely be lumped together as New Leftists—is blamed for ignoring the plight of the American working class. Stein writes, provocatively (and I think misleadingly), that the “New Left vision contributed to the culture of anti-unionism” (p. 189).

But Stein is interested in far more than separating the good guys from the bad. More compellingly she analyzes how the New Deal Keynesian vision of domestic demand-management policies fell prey to American policymakers’ international economic decisions. She states: “The increased openness of the U.S. economy—integrated finance, floating exchange rates, global trade, unencumbered capital flows—reduced the potency of Keynesian policies in the domestic economy” (p. 206). Stein does not argue that demand-management policies would have been sufficient to maintain the American economy in the post-1970s world. She spells out how the decisions of the prior decades—especially bad trade policy—meant that American industry needed to become more productive and that new tactics would be needed to bring about such an improvement. Industrial policy, as championed by Lane Kirkland of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, as well as Democratic Party stalwart Walter Mondale, appears to be Stein’s preferred path. Stein spends her last chapters castigating “new” Democrats, including President Bill Clinton, for focusing too much on promoting capital formation and deregulation and not nearly enough on policies that would have supported and developed key domestic industrial sectors. While a political critic might wonder about Stein’s faith that old industries wedded to labor leaders in the mold of George Meany and carefully regulated by government bureaucrats are Americans’ best answer to global competition, historians, at the least, are in her debt for this passionate and broadly convincing analysis of recent American economic policy.

DAVID FARBER
Temple University

BRADFORD MARTIN. The Other Eighties: A Secret History of America in the Age of Reagan. New York: Hill and Wang. 2011. Pp. xix, 242. $26.00.

Once upon a time, following Ronald Reagan’s retirement, historians were surprisingly silent about his presidency. Disdain for Reagan was so ubiquitous among scholars that even spending time with his papers, let alone taking him seriously historically, was unseemly. At the time, Reagan scholarship was not for the faint-hearted—or the untenured.

Then, gradually, came glasnost. More and more historians starting understanding that Reagan was the greatest American president since Franklin D. Roosevelt—in the Time magazine person-of-the-year meaning—for better or worse. That phase culminated with Sean Wilentz’s The Age of Reagan: A History, 1974–2008 (2008). Wilentz, whom journalists have repeatedly dubbed a “liberal historian,” pronounced Reagan significant and not as destructive as he first seemed.

Inevitably, the reaction to the counterreaction has begun. Bradford Martin returns the historical conversation to where it began. Martin set out to prove that not every book about the 1980s “turns into a Reagan book” (p. ix). Still, the subtitle is misleading. This history is not so secret. It describes the protest movements that, Martin shows, were louder, larger, and more lasting than we remember.

Rejecting the new “Reaganocentrism,” Martin concentrates on “a sizable but less-trumpeted group of Americans” who dissented from Reagan’s “Morning in America” (p. x). Martin offers a different alphabet soup for readers to digest. Most books on the 1980s talk about the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), CNN and MTV, “not in my backyard” (NIMBY) and intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBMs), VCRs and PCs, mutual assured destruction (MAD) and Praise the Lord (PTL), and “USA, USA, USA.” Martin’s study is more politically correct, focusing on the Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy (SANE) and the Committee in Solidarity with the People of El Salvador (CISPES), the hardcore and punk rock music club CBGB (Country, BlueGrass, and Blues) and Skinheads against Racial Prejudice (SHARP), AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP) and People United to Save Humanity (Operation PUSH).

In eight well-structured, well-written chapters, Martin details eight expressions of the decade’s “progressive impulses” (p. xiv). He studies three grass-roots activist movements that advocated nuclear freeze, embraced Central American solidarity, and opposed apartheid in South Africa. He offers two case studies of cultural opposition, analyzing mainstream popular culture amid the “culture wars,” and the marginal post-punk or alternative scene. The last three chapters of the book explore the flowering of identity politics, emphasizing African American politics, feminist mobilization, and AIDS activism.

Turning from “the highly visible stage of national political life,” (p. xiv) Martin effectively paints a pointillist picture of what is often overlooked. We see less white male selfishness and more diversity, community, and engagement, countering the media stereotype and baby boomer guilt trip that portray youth as apathetic. These activists were more globally aware, more technologically savvy, less earthy, and far less likely to disrobe than their hippie older siblings—or parents. Their accomplishments included mainstreaming many of the transformations from the 1960s and 1970s that older activists feared were lost in the “backlash,” what I call the Reagan Reconciliation. Their activism resulted in cultural or social shifts that did not always make headlines and, most problematic for historians, prevented rather than precipitated some events. Just as one of President George W. Bush’s major accomplishments was averting another 9/11, one of the 1980s dissenters’ major accomplishments was that there was no Nicaragua War.

Martin describes the Democratic Party’s anemic drift toward the center, criticizing its “abandonment of full-throated progressive idealism” (p. xi). The book is particularly strong in describing the excitement of Geraldine Ferraro’s vice-presidential candidacy. But a book analyzing the 1980s opposition, even impressionistically, should at least mention Tip O’Neill, Mario Cuomo, and Jim Wright, none of whom are listed in the index.

The book also lacks a cumulative power. In his preface, Martin offers some integrative conclusions. But the rest of the book feels disjointed and anecdotal. Each chapter describes a different form of activism with little interrelationship or engagement with the broader story. In discussing Ferraro’s vice-presidential candidacy, Martin mentions hurriedly that she and Walter Mondale ran “against an incumbent who had revived the economy and restored a sense of patriotism to many Americans” (p. 155). This comment speaks to impressive Reaganite success that the readers of this book—and Martin’s heroes—tend to forget but should be integrated into the decade’s overall portrait.

Martin ends by showing how the other 1980s helped spawn twenty-first century America. Most notably, Barack Obama’s presidency stemmed from the messy, conflicted 1980s as well as the mythical 1960s. Martin’s welcome work helps to restore important balance to scholarly understanding of what remains a significant decade, the 1980s of Ronald Reagan and his opponents.

GIL TROY
McGill University

THOMAS A. STAPLEFORD. The Cost of Living in America: A Political History of Economic Statistics, 1880–2000. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2009. Pp. xviii, 421. Cloth $90.00, paper $29.99.

Economic statistics seldom spark historians’ imaginations, but they possess enormous power to shape economic perceptions and political decisions. Disputes over measurements that are both highly technical and deeply politicized set into sharp relief distinctions between surplus and deficit, growth and recession, stability and upheaval. By the mid-1970s, changes in a single number—the Consumer Price Index—directly affected the incomes of half of all Americans. Thomas A. Stapleford’s careful, nuanced, and sophisticated study draws on the histories of economics, science, and public policy to tell how this particular number came into being, and how cost-of-living statistics acquired meaning and influence in twentieth-century America.

Stapleford adeptly explores the complex political history of cost-of-living statistics as they developed in three distinct periods: the formative decades from 1880 to 1930, the mid-twentieth-century heyday of New Deal liberalism from 1930 to 1960, and the post-1960 era of neoclassical utility theory. Cost-of-living measures originated in early statistical bureaus as a form of “practical statistics” designed to address discrete, localized problems and special investigations connected to the “labor question,” but they gradually evolved into now-familiar forms of regularly collected wage and price data. By World War I, the Progressive social scientists who staffed wartime agencies aspired to standardized cost-of-living statistics as “crucial tools for rationalized, bureaucratic management of industrial relations” (p. 20). But the Weberian ideal of rationalized bureaucracy and depoliticized expert knowledge could never overcome the inherently political nature of gauging the cost of living. As Stapleford demonstrates, no amount of statistical technique could do away with the normative judgments involved in defining the cost of life’s basic necessities, especially as technologies and the quality of goods changed, and consumer habits and expectations shifted dramatically over time. During World War II, for example, economists at the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) clashed with labor unions’ own economic experts over the most basic questions of definition. Should cost-of-living estimates rely on the official prices set under wartime price controls, or on the high prices of scarce goods found in the black market? Did geographical relocation to take work in the defense industry constitute a voluntary choice, or an increase in the cost of living that wartime wage agreements needed to acknowledge? Where could one find the most reliable estimates—in the aggregate data produced by the neutral experts of the BLS, or, as labor unions argued, in the subjective, real life experiences of families faced with higher prices for lower quality goods? Although the BLS warned against reliance on individual experience, the labor unions’ economists reached for local, qualitative data as a proxy for national trends that they considered unmeasurable, and when the Bureau of Agricultural Economics produced estimates of increased cost-of-living figures that more closely matched the unions’ numbers, labor considered itself vindicated.

It is difficult to convey in a short space the analytical complexity of Stapleford’s study. The book succeeds admirably on several levels. First, Stapleford manages to describe advanced economic concepts and techniques in easily comprehended terms. Readers who have never taken an economics course will have little difficulty understanding, say, the workings and rationale behind the BLS’s assumption of a constant market basket in the 1940s, or professional economists’ enthusiasm for constant-utility approaches in the 1960s. Second, the book eschews simplistic explanations based on material interests and instead appreciates the real technical problems that economists faced as well as the political challenges, expectations, and aspirations—often unrealistic—that both economists and policymakers attached to numbers. Stapleford’s attention to organized labor also opens new research possibilities. Histories of knowledge production have tended to focus on academic and bureaucratic contexts, and scholars need to examine how other bodies, such as unions, corporations, trade associations, and credit rating agencies, also produce and deploy economic knowledge. Stapleford offers new insights into the history of institutional and neoclassical economics as well, particularly the in-stitutionalists’ emphasis on objective measurement even if it required ignoring important aspects of lived experience, versus the willingness of neoclassical economists to incorporate ideas about “satisfaction” and other subjective imponderables into economic analysis. Conventional accounts have contrasted the philosophical pragmatism of institutionalism with the neoclassical emphasis on elaborate statistical technique and a search for quantitative objectivity. To some extent, Stapleford turns the tables and thereby asks historians to rethink their assumptions about both methodological approaches.

Ultimately, the book also suggests the ways in which objectivity and the ideal of neutral, depoliticized knowledge undermine the possibilities for a healthy and vibrant national political life. Existing scholarship has pointed to the impossibility of objective, scientific representation of social reality, but Stapleford goes further and examines the corrosive political consequences of the Weberian vision of governance. The problem of objectivity lies not simply in the way it masks normative judgments, but in the illusion it creates of the possibility of simple, definitive answers, and the cynicism that arises when expert knowledge inevitably fails to produce incontestable, apolitical solutions. As a result, serious discussion of difficult choices by an engaged citizenry and functioning polity has moved increasingly out of reach. Stapleford concludes with the hope that a more modest conception of objectivity as “community consensus” might “allow economic statistics to serve a political purpose without being ‘politicized’” (p. 386). Given the polarized nature of contemporary political discourse in the United States, it is difficult to imagine how that might happen. But greater willingness of experts to acknowledge the inherently normative dimensions and political implications of their work might constitute a useful first step.

JESSICA WANG

University of British Columbia

LOUIS HYMAN. Debtor Nation: The History of America in Red Ink. (Politics and Society in Twentieth-Century America.) Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2011. Pp. 378. $35.00.

Exploring the origins of consumer debt in the United States has long been a fertile field for historians, yet few works have examined how the nature of personal debt has changed over time. Louis Hyman seeks to remedy this in his book, which traces the evolution of personal credit over the course of nearly a century. His analysis focuses on four intertwined themes: how consumers financed purchases, the types of institutions involved in personal lending, the role of government policy, and the technological innovations that made modern forms of credit possible. By identifying the ties among capitalists, consumers, and policymakers, he provides a better understanding of the business of personal lending and how debt has become such a mainstream element of American financial life.

Hyman opens by examining the rise of installment credit in the 1920s and its impact on both consumers and businesses. For consumers, this form of financing offered an affordable path toward a solid middle-class lifestyle, which in turn helped make being in debt more socially acceptable. Manufacturers, in turn, relied on credit to generate sales and finance retailer inventories of expensive goods like cars, a process made easier by forming a separate finance company. While banks were not significant direct lenders to consumers because of the risk involved, their role grew in the 1930s after participation in Federal Housing Administration (FHA) lending programs gave them a glimpse of the profitability and potential of personal finance.

One of the stronger sections involves the transition from installment credit (used to finance specific purchases) to revolving lines of credit that could be used to pay for a variety of consumer goods. It began in the 1940s following the Federal Reserve's enactment of Regulation W, an anti-inflation measure that restricted maturities on installment loans. To evade these rules, retailers gave customers lines of credit with no preset maturities as a way to finance goods normally paid for on the installment plan. Consumers embraced this new form of financing, because they appreciated the sense of control they had over both how much they could borrow, and how they could use the credit. Large retailers like department stores initially dominated the revolving credit market, with banks becoming more involved after improvements in technology led to the formation of the VISA and MasterCard networks. By the end of the 1970s, the universally accepted, bank-issued credit card was the dominant form of personal credit, and using "plastic" to finance consumerism had become a broadly accepted part of American life.

The rise of debt securitization is an example of how public and private forces converged to shape the availability of consumer debt. In the early 1970s, the Federal National Mortgage Association and Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation began buying and selling bonds backed by personal debt like mortgages, home equity loans, and eventually credit card receivables. This created a stable secondary market for consumer loans and gave lenders the ability to raise capital directly from individual and institutional investors. The result was billions in new funds for loans, and the entry of new financial institutions into the consumer credit business. None of this, however, would have been possible without improvements in technology and the sophisticated statistical models needed to analyze credit risk, track consumer accounts, and structure the sale of debt to investors. Unfortunately, the success of debt securitization became the core of the current financial crisis, as investor demand for these securities encouraged banks to lend more to consumers so those debts could in turn be securitized and sold.

Hyman is at his best when describing how necessity, chance, and basic capitalism influenced how and why businesses pursued different forms of non-mortgage credit, and these insights provide a solid contribution to the literature. Similarly, his analysis of the shortcomings of computer-based credit evaluation systems, especially as they relate to financial discrimination, is also compelling. However, the chapter on changes in mortgage lending practices, which emphasizes the role of the FHA in shaping how Americans finance their homes, is less persuasive. His conclusions would be better supported and more accurate if the key role traditional home lenders played in this complex process had been included. The work also would have benefitted from greater use of statistical tables on the levels of consumer debt over time, the inclusion of which would enhance its value as a reference source. Such issues, however, do not diminish the merits of this book whose readable overview of the history of personal debt in the United States will be of value to scholars new to the subject.

DAVID L. MASON

Georgia Gwinnett College

DAVID GARLAND. Peculiar Institution: America's Death Penalty in an Age of Abolition. Cambridge: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 2010. Pp. 417. $35.00.

David Garland's book poses this question: what explains the United States' continued use of capital punishment in the face of a worldwide abolition movement? Garland approaches the question not as a debate participant but as a detached sociologist (p. 7). His conclusion: American executions persist "because of the structure of the American polity" (p. 310). "America's federated system," he emphasizes, produces "state-by-state variation" (p. 160) with "local" control remaining a dominant feature (p. 122).

The book is an impressive work of scholarship. It explains the death penalty's demise in other Western countries—and even in places like South Africa—as it grapples with its persistence in the United States. It gives a compelling account of the racial prejudice that once spawned lynchings and that still plagues America's death penalty. It recounts how the U.S. Supreme Court, in 1976, retreated from its 1972 decision in Furman v. Georgia—the case that once declared U.S. death penalty laws, as then administered, unconstitutional (p. 206). And it persuasively explains how America's death penalty—now judged under the Court's "evolving standards of decency" test—has itself evolved as American society has changed.

Much of Garland's analysis is spot on. Pointing to lynch mobs in the Jim Crow South, Garland aptly argues that "local popular justice" (p. 32) has long been an American tradition. While prosecutors and judges in more centralized European states, he explains, are mostly "tenured civil servants," American prosecutors and state court judges must run for office (p. 48). The death penalty's popularity, especially in the Deep South, has thus made it difficult to outlaw executions nationwide. Capital juries also contribute—as Garland notes—to the death penalty's staying power (p. 49), especially since the Supreme Court allows “death-qualified” juries that systematically exclude death penalty opponents. Only sixteen American states now outlaw executions, though in many other states executions are extremely rare.

The Supreme Court, Garland writes, has adopted a rationalizing, democratizing, and localizing jurisprudence. The Court’s attempt to subject executions to legal rules—the “rationalizing” component—is rooted in the Fourteenth Amendment. Its “democratizing” and “localizing” jurisprudence is grounded in separation-of-power principles, with much control ceded to state legislators and the discretion of local prosecutors, judges, and juries (p. 262). “If the Court were now to declare the death penalty illegal,” Garland contends, alluding to language in the Constitution contemplating state-sanctioned killing, “it would have to set aside the letter of the law and reverse all the relevant precedents” (pp. 221–222). Yet, the Eighth Amendment—which now bars executing the insane, juveniles, the mentally retarded, and less culpable offenders—has itself, Garland acknowledges, already contributed to another facet of the Court’s jurisprudence: a civilizing and humanizing one (p. 262).

Garland masterfully explains why executions still endure in the United States, but his suggestion that the Constitution “limits the possibility” of capital punishment “being plausibly regarded as unconstitutional” (pp. 187, 222) is contestable. The Eighth Amendment unequivocally bars all “cruel and unusual punishments.” Although the Eighth Amendment originally applied only to the national government, the Fourteenth Amendment made the Bill of Rights applicable to the states. In guaranteeing “due process” and “equal protection,” the Fourteenth Amendment transformed American law, ensuring that the “cruel and unusual punishments” prohibition would trump any offending local practices. The Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, in fact, currently require prison officials to protect inmates from harm, and corporal punishments short of death have long been abandoned (p. 103) and struck down as unconstitutional.

That executions should be declared unconstitutional is supported by the facts that Garland so cogently presents. While mandatory death sentences for murder were once the norm, they have disappeared (p. 260). Death sentences are now discretionary and executions take place predominantly in a few southern locales (p. 201). Executions—far crueler than corporal punishments—have thus become “unusual,” less common even than being struck by lightning (p. 312). While death sentences are still infrequently imposed in an arbitrary and discriminatory manner, life-without-parole sentences are now the standard—or usual—punishment for first-degree murder.

The Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments—referencing “capital” and “life” or “limb”—contemplated gruesome corporal punishments and the death penalty’s infliction (p. 221). Those provisions, however, were put in place to protect individual rights when corporal punishments and mandatory death sentences were still prevalent. Indeed, the concept of judicial independence requires the Supreme Court to decide the Eighth Amendment’s meaning for itself. The Court’s continued deference to legislators (p. 275) and conviction-prone “death-qualified” juries to gauge “evolving standards,” particularly in the face of sporadic, discriminatory executions, actually contradicts that principle and the Court’s own obligation to assess independently what is “cruel and unusual.” Ear cropping and lopping off limbs are already part of a bygone era (p. 145). A truly principled Eighth Amendment analysis would bar executions, too.

Anyone wanting to understand America’s death penalty should read Garland’s superb book. But readers should remember that the fate of death-row inmates ultimately lies in the hands of the U.S. Supreme Court.

JOHN D. BESSLER

University of Baltimore School of Law

ERIKA DOSS. Memorial Mania: Public Feeling in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 2010. Pp. xvii, 458. $25.00.

Americans are manic about memory. From temporary roadside memorials to sprawling heritage corridors, the commemorative impulse has grown so powerful as to obscure who or what we hope to remember. This observation introduces Erika Doss’s survey of the nation’s current mnemonic landscape and sustains it at a surprising clip over nearly four hundred pages. In what may be the most penetrating contribution to American memory studies since Kirk Savage’s Standing Soldiers, Kneeling Slaves: Race, War, and Monument in Nineteenth-Century America (1997), Doss suggests that modern memorial culture is an index of our capacity for civil discourse. That it is, by her account, is cause for real concern.

Among the study’s most important contributions is Doss’s contention that memorials function today as “archives of public affect” (p. 13). Some historians may be unfamiliar with affect studies, which make significant claims for the critical examination of feeling. The presumption is that feeling of any kind, whether it is happiness or shame, is socially constructed and therefore worth interrogating for what it reveals about how and why we interact with one another. By asserting that memorials embody affect, Doss expands her analytical possibilities beyond categories like place, power, and identity, which have become de rigueur in scholarship concerning monuments.

Memorials, however, as Doss explains in her first chapter, are not monuments, at least not inasmuch as we recall the statue mania that prevailed until early in the last century. Commemorative genres like Savage’s standing soldiers made essentialist claims about the American past on behalf of a supposedly singular body politic. By World War II, though, doubts about the feasibility of visually representing collective trauma triggered a commemorative frame shift. Minimalist public art displaced figurative statuary as the preferred vessel for public feeling. Maya Lin's 1982 Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington, D.C., illustrates the point. Unlike their predecessors, the new memorials are "equivocal, unresolved, and ambivalent" (pp. 44–45). They foreground the experiences of individuals, especially those who have endured tragedy.

And yet, despite their focus on individuals, modern memorials demonstrate how vital the concept of nation remains even in our postnational world. Doss argues that national belonging, unmoored from geography by neoliberal statecraft, is increasingly understood in terms of emotional allegiance. Memorials are where one goes to become an "emotionally engaged member of the nation" (p. 56). Doss is quite forthright, however, in asserting that the unfettered curation of individual experience, as in projects like the September 11 Digital Archive, risks being "critically vacuous" (p. 74). Nonetheless, its popularity demonstrates how significantly emotion figures in national conversations about the past. In this regard, Doss's book recalls Roy Rosenzweig and David Thelen's The Presence of the Past: Popular Uses of History in American Life (1998), which arrived at a similar conclusion by surveying hundreds of Americans about their everyday uses of history.

Doss is more concerned to identify the cultural and political conditions that have privileged public feeling since the late twentieth century. To that end, she offers each of the book's remaining five chapters as studies in the excesses and possibilities of a particular vector of commemorative affect. In "Grief," for instance, Doss tackles stuffed-animal death shrines and public response to events like the 1999 Columbine High School shootings. She observes that the failure of mass media to put national traumas into social and historical context has conspired alongside other factors, such as the growing prominence of evangelical Christianity, to commodify the public act of grieving and prolong it well beyond what could possibly be healthy for anyone. The best kind of grief memorials, in Doss's opinion, are those like the AIDS Memorial Quilt, which make grief "ethically, socially, and politically beneficial" (p. 113).

Later chapters—one each for fear, gratitude, shame, and anger—similarly conclude that, if left unchecked, affect all too easily stands in for the civic dialogue that memorials can otherwise encourage. Doss's handling of the nation's various September 11 memorials, for instance, reveals the tendency of these sites to represent absence, rather than loss, thereby compromising our ability to confront the politics of terror in any meaningful way. In an especially poignant rebuke of the ongoing apotheosis of World War II memory, Doss illustrates how modern war memorials encourage a new American militarism by recycling the visual iconography of sacrifice and gratitude popularized by cinematic "war porn." "Shame," which contends with the memory of lynching and Japanese American internment, and "Anger," wherein Doss parses contests over the memorialization of Native American pasts, are particularly taut and will, I suspect, be heavily excerpted in the classroom.

Doss's great skill lies in sifting through dense cultural landscapes wherein images, buildings, objects, and utterances provide the richest source material. Some historians may prefer a longer view of today's affect in light of yesteryear's sentiment. Some public historians will want more first-person narrative from the people who flock to memorials. In all other respects, though, the book is a masterwork of American Studies. Meticulously researched, thoughtfully illustrated, and powerfully relevant, it is in some ways its own memorial to a genre of big-tent interdisciplinary scholarship that has grown too uncommon. One wishes that Doss had concluded by showing us how her insights might be operationalized in the daily work of monument makers and managers. Perhaps we would not even need this study had preceding generations of memory scholars done the same.

SETH C. BRUGGEMAN
Temple University

BRADLEY G. SHREVE. Red Power Rising: The National Indian Youth Council and the Origins of Native Activism. Foreword by SHIRLEY HILL WITT. (New Directions in Native American Studies, number 5.) Norman: University of Oklahoma Press. 2011. Pp. xviii, 275. $34.95.

Bradley G. Shreve provides the first monographic treatment of the National Indian Youth Council (NIYC), a Native activist organization that emerged during the 1960s and continues its work in Indian Country today. He contends that his book broadens our conception of the "origins" of "Native activism" by locating it not in 1969, with the much written about occupation of Alcatraz Island, but in August 1961, when a group of young men and women met in Gallup, New Mexico, to found an organization dedicated to realizing "A Greater Indian America."

Shreve's telling of the NIYC's history unfolds over an introduction, eight chronological chapters, and an epilogue. The first of these situates the book within the fields of American Indian history and Native political activism. From there Shreve reviews prominent early to mid-twentieth-century American Indian protest and reform movements. Chapters two and three detail how the Southwest Regional Indian Youth Council, a network of clubs at colleges and universities across the West, and the Workshop on American Indian Affairs, a six-week summer program for students, served as catalysts for the founding of the NIYC.

Chapters four and five recount the organization's tentative beginnings between 1961 and late 1963 and its embrace of direct action via the Pacific Northwest fishing rights movement shortly thereafter. Shreve suggests in the next three chapters that the NIYC moved toward militancy and experienced internal dissension during the latter half of the decade. The final chapter and epilogue do the important work of following the organization into the early twenty-first century. Rather than just being a relic of the 1960s, Shreve suggests, NIYC's legacy continues to unfold.

Shreve writes well and reveals a great deal about the leading personalities within NIYC, including Herb Blatchford, Clyde Warrior, Mel Thom, Hank Adams, and Bruce Wilkie. In addition, he wisely, if unevenly, emphasizes the role of women within the organization. In so doing he makes extensive use of archival collections, and the oral interviews Shreve conducted serve him well. The breadth of the latter, however, could have been more expansive, and while he mentions several of the women involved in NIYC, he focuses in-depth on only one. Moreover, Shreve's discussion of women avoids more complicated issues, such as how the Native youth movement might resolve if viewed through the analytical lens of gender.

Shreve's decision to make his primary contribution an earlier start date for the Red Power movement seems to sell NIYC's significance short. While he makes a convincing case for how his work fits into scholars' ongoing efforts to reconfigure our understanding of American Indian political activism, Shreve could have done more to demonstrate how the story he tells intersects with and contributes to scholarship on 1960s-era rights movements.

For instance, Shreve suggests that the NIYC stood apart from the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), organizations that "challenged the fundamental ideals and assumptions of their elders" (p. 4). NIYC members did praise "traditional" elders, but they had little good to say about the generation directly ahead of them. (They referred to elected tribal leaders as "little brown Americans" and the National Congress of American Indians as the "National Congress of Aged Indians.") In this sense, NIYC actually had a lot in common with SDS and SNCC. The New Left found much to celebrate about the Old Left; it was their parents' self-satisfied, suburbanized generation that they had a problem with. Plus, SNCC identified with "the people" rather than "so-called leaders." And what of historian Arthur Marwick's contention that the bright line separating "young" and "old" has been overdrawn? A close analysis of the relationship between NIYC President Clyde Warrior and NCAI Executive Director Vine Deloria, Jr., might lend support to it.

Finally, while Shreve certainly tells a detailed story of American Indian youth activism during the 1960s, he does not complicate the pre-existing metanarrative that places as its culminating moment the rise of the American Indian Movement. The two organizations may have intersected and even collaborated with one another during the 1970s and after, but we need to know more about NIYC members on their own terms and in (instead of over) time. Shreve offers a window into their thought worlds, in other words, but the view seems partially obstructed. It is further hindered by a celebratory tone that favors description over critical analysis.

These criticisms aside, Shreve has succeeded in writing an accessible and insightful one-volume organizational history of the National Indian Youth Council. His book helps prepare the ground for the next round of sophisticated intellectual and comparative histories that should take scholarship even further beyond clichés and worn-out narratives and deeper into the complex space of Native political activism during and after the 1960s.

DANIEL M. COBB

University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

BRIAN KLOPOTEK. Recognition Odysseys: Indigeneity, Race, and Federal Tribal Recognition Policy in Three Louisiana Indian Communities. (Narrating Native Histories.) Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 391. Cloth $89.95, paper $24.95.

The literature on the federal tribal acknowledgment process is reaching maturity. Brian Klopotek's new book fits squarely within the body of existing scholarship in its major conclusions and theoretical model; like others, the author finds that colonialism and racial oppression have unduly affected unrecognized Indian communities and that their legacies continue to infuse the government process, a hegemonic state project that denies many groups their rightful place as federally recognized tribes. The work is at once narrowly conceived yet broad in its theoretical and topical approach. The study focuses on three groups within fifty miles of each other in Louisiana: the Tunica-Biloxi Tribe, the Jena Band of Choctaws, and the Clifton-Choctaws. Through these communities, however, readers can see the problems and opportunities inherent in federal acknowledgment writ large. While the framework is not new, Klopotek's study is the first to examine acknowledgment policy as it affects the state of Louisiana, a major testing ground for tribal survival and notions about tribal existence in the Southeast.

The work's real contribution is its case studies, which reveal both the devastating effects of non-recognition and the pitfalls and opportunities that accrue after federal acknowledgment. Klopotek is an advocate for the tribes in his work. Through his accessible prose, readers learn that the Louisiana enclaves shared many of the same historical experiences: lack of federal trust protection led to shocking land loss; Jim Crow racism in the dichotomous black-white South left these groups a legacy of poverty, racial insecurity, and obscurity. Klopotek finds that white supremacist ideology encouraged others to deny the indigeneity of Louisiana tribes; the racial landscape also forced these tribes to adopt anti-black racism to protect their fragile position in society. Although claiming to detail three communities, the work really centers on the Jena Choctaws and Tunica-Biloxi. With valuable quotations, the author densely details the efforts of tribal leaders to secure federal aid in the twentieth century. The Louisiana groups took part in the 1960s Indian Renaissance, securing state recognition, formalizing their governments, obtaining federal grants, and after long, unconscionable struggles, the Tunica-Biloxi and Jena Band achieved recognition through the federal process. The study really shines in detailing how federal status affects tribes. Klopotek ultimately concludes that the federal imprimatur is no panacea. As the Tunica-Biloxi history shows most clearly, it has been a mixed blessing. Their newfound casino wealth has promoted community cohesion as individuals move back to the reservation for economic and cultural opportunities, yet it has also engendered growing pains, leading to difficult questions regarding who can enroll and why, class divisions, and a generational divide.

Klopotek too easily and often dismisses the work of other scholars who raise the possibility that certain groups may not be historical tribes or otherwise-defined longstanding Indian communities without offering empirical evidence that would refute their findings. Similarly, tribes that question other groups are painted as greedy, even racist, for their challenges to entities like the Clifton enclave, an admitted multi-racial community of European, Indian, and African descent with a contested history and identity. One clearly senses the author's idealism and political commitment to unacknowledged groups; he pleads for lawmakers to nurture indigeneity wherever it is found and pursue a more inclusive, liberal policy. However popular this ideological position is in academia today, to critics it has several flaws. In the Clifton case, the author offers theories as to why the group may not have evidence of its indigenous heritage, yet ultimately relies on the position that the group is an aboriginal people because its members say they are one. Post-World War II evidence that the group identifies as a Choctaw entity does little to dismiss the possibility that their ancestors may have chosen to accent an Indian identity for the benefits this could bring in the Jim Crow South. Discounting the sociological phenomenon of "optional ethnicity" or that "ethnic shifting" may have occurred in the past does not move the scholarship forward. Klopotek does not provide a linear history of the Clifton group, so his readers are left without a clear grasp of its community outlines. The time is ripe for scholars to begin discussing (as tribal leaders are already doing) the real chance that certain groups professing to be "tribes" may not be historical aboriginal enclaves. Those familiar with acknowledgment politics know that academic theorizing about the flaws of the current process and potential reforms seem to have little impact on acknowledgment decisions. While the author is laudable for his call for a new, liberal approach to recognizing tribes, labeling tribes and scholars who question unacknowledged petitioners agents of colonial and racial oppression seems unproductive. Without hard, empirical evidence demonstrating long-standing indigenous identity for groups like the Clifton-Choctaw, those with a vested interest in the outcome of acknowledgment cases will remain unmoved.

MARK EDWIN MILLER
Southern Utah University

MARK RIFKIN. When Did Indians Become Straight? Kinship, the History of Sexuality, and Native Sovereignty. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 436. Cloth $99.00, paper $35.00.

Scholars familiar with the work of historian Mark Rifkin will recognize the theoretically dense and analytically insightful prose in this book. The careful reading required pays off when one comes to the multiple moments of analytical revelation in which Rifkin insightfully links the emergence of sovereignty to the emergence of heteropatriarchy among Native peoples. Kinship becomes the vehicle with which to carefully navigate a criticism of the social, political, and intellectual uses of inherent sovereignty, which is "the uneven and fraught dynamics by which the settler state recognizes/disavows indigenous modes of peoplehood and indigenous peoples negotiate the shifting imperatives/contingencies of settler rule" (p. 17). Sovereignty is thus explicitly connected to a technique of settlement that has through time destroyed indigenous forms of kinship in favor of "bourgeois homemaking" and sought "to validate tribal autonomy through investments in native straightness" (p. 17). Straightness, which inspired the title of the book, is taken in its popular contemporary form (as an opposition to "gayness") and reformulated into a historical process of imposing linear logics into Native kinship and homemaking in order to scaffold settlement. Thus sovereignty emerges as an entanglement set on reorienting Native kin-based social structure away from its "queerness" and toward an image of the settler state. The literary readings following the introduction set out to "explore the role of settler politics and native presence in the emergence of normative discourse of sexual and familial (dis)order, and reciprocally, they trace the ways that such discourse have served as a key matrix through which to represent and regulate native decision-making, land tenure and resource distribution" (p. 38).

Rifkin's theoretical apparatus becomes a lens through which to examine some of the most influential works in American Indian historical literature and contemporary queer writing by Natives. The examination of literary works benefits from a consistent contextualization in the sociopolitical goals of U.S. Indian policy; this helps connect historical moments throughout the trajectory of "straightening" Native peoples. One of the most impressive applications of Rifkin's analysis comes in chapter one, which takes up the ways a historic disrecognition of the fluidity in Native social institutions acts to construct racial boundaries between white and Indian. A Narrative of the Life of Mrs. Mary Jemison (1824), the captivity narrative of a white woman among the Seneca during the eighteenth century, has largely been unquestioned by scholars as a firsthand account of captive life. Here, however, the work is used to tease out depictions of Indians as lacking the ability to obtain the "privatized intimacy" and "familial formations" integral to American national identity. Jemison's story relies on a "racial grammar" that "depends on a vision of native identity that is soldered to procreative couplehood, rather than imagined in terms of clans and other more expansive forms of kinship-based collectivity" (p. 98). Rifkin's analytical lens does not simply critique the Narrative; rather he rereads Jemison as firmly rooted in Seneca kinship by adoption, marriage, bearing Seneca children, and having been a clan matron.

The chronological construction of a straight Indian in the image of a settler continues through the middle chapters, which move from the effects of mid-nineteenth-century civilization policy to allotment. Through the institutions of civilization, such as boarding schools, the Bureau of Indian Affairs slowly chipped away at Native kinship, which contained the fundamental ethics and values of most Indian communities (and their queerness). The various techniques of civilization, such as allotment, emphasized the settler institutions of heterocoupling, the nuclear homestead, and privatized kin relations. The author's use of literature, primary historical documents, and historical analysis constructs a foundation for the final chapter, which insightfully contextualizes Craig S. Womack's Drowning in Fire (2001), a novel about Creek culture and the problems faced by queer-identified Natives. The book comes full circle to reengage how heteropatriarchy became an aspect of what many Natives consider to be tradition. Rifkin does not analyze Drowning in Fire but instead places the text in conversation with broader contemporary concerns for the emancipatory aspects of a queer indigenous concept and the embeddedness of "imperial efforts to constrain, regulate, and disavow Native ways of being" (p. 277). Rifkin helps us understand Drowning as a "narration of intratribal homophobia" but also as an attempt at "reimagining native nationalisms by tracking how compulsory heterosexuality helps naturalize the foreclosure of modes of collective identity not sanctioned by Indian law and policy" (p. 277).

In the end readers may find themselves overwhelmed by the capillary intrusion of settler ideas into the foundational concepts on which many national level tribal authorities rest their claims to sovereignty. In this way, Rifkin reminds us that sovereignty is a selective, exclusionary, and straight concept.

BRIAN GILLEY
Indiana University,
Bloomington

STEPHEN C. TAYSON. Shakers, Mormons, and Religious Worlds: Conflicting Visions, Contested Boundaries. (Religion in North America.) Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 259. $34.95.

In a provocative sociological analysis of historical events and actors, Stephen C. Taysom interprets nineteenth-century Shaker and Mormon responses to social opposition. His interpretation relies on a broad range of interpretive tools, including organizational behavior, cognitive anthropology, ritual studies, and critical theory. He is to be congratulated also for bringing a comparative approach to subjects too frequently treated in isolation.

The first of the book's four chapters analyzes Shaker practices for achieving holiness. Taysom finds it remarkable that Shakers used an "absolutist rhetoric" when preaching separation from the world, but joined it in commercial, charitable, and proselytizing activities (pp. 10, 13). He interprets this as a failure of Shaker physical boundaries and argues that it led to investment of their separatist ideals in ritual, especially on the frontier where they lacked the "village" setting of their eastern counterparts. But even in the East, Shaker identity "would have been impossible without the catalytic spark provided by the outsiders" for whom they performed (p. 15). The second chapter comes to the same conclusion with respect to Mormons. Their hopes for physical separation were frustrated when mobs overran their holy cities in Missouri and Illinois. Thus, in Utah, Taysom argues, separatist ideals were invested in a narrower space—a temple—and individually embodied through its ritual.

The third chapter compares the significance of Shaker and Mormon views on marriage. The focus is not on the substance of these views, but on their strategic deployment as boundary markers: among the Shakers primarily to separate the weak from the strong inside the community and among the Mormons primarily to "exacerbate and prolong" a sense of "crisis tension" with outsiders (p. 129). Taysom's analysis is undermined by the unproven premise that polygamy did not serve the same function among the Mormons as celibacy did among the Shakers. This is an especially disappointing turn in his analysis, since one of the stronger contributions of the book is its discussion of how these contrary practices were rooted in identical aspirations to imitate godliness. Nevertheless, Taysom asserts that celibacy was for Shakers too critical a dimension of their identity to abandon or adapt, but not so for Mormons who only "chose to play up potential tension-building signs," i.e., polygamy (p. 135).

The fourth chapter compares Shaker and Mormon rhetoric during times of "internal boundary" crisis: one deemed real, the other manufactured. As in the previous chapter, Taysom accuses Mormons of posturing in service of hierarchal tyranny. In contrast, he represents Shakers as suffering a real crisis from too many converts motivated by economic need, not religious conviction. To purge this sin from the community, an "Era of Manifestations" erupted in the 1830s. As proof of the purge's legitimate aims, Taysom relies on its "organic," non-hierarchical origins (p. 162). This sets up the necessary contrast with the Mormon Reformation in the 1850s. Notwithstanding its occurring merely seven years after the impoverished pioneers entered the deserts of the Great Basin and two years after the last refugees from Illinois arrived, Taysom argues that these were years of peace and wealth that undermined insider boundaries comprised of hierarchical power. Consequently, the Reformation's demand for greater purity served to shore up that power. By not situating

Mormon rhetoric in Puritan jeremiad and enduring declension narratives, and by omitting the relation of the Reformation to, inter alia, the public announcement of plural marriage and reinstitution of temple rites, Taysom is able to cast the Reformation as a fraud upon the people by their despotic rulers. Unlike good Shaker folk who restored their community's "delicate balance" between insider and (should be) outsider, bad Mormon hierarchs "inflicted the crisis and claimed sole propertyship of the salve to heal it" (pp. 176, 195).

The sociological approach and purposes of this book are most clearly reflected in its concluding pages, which offer a typology for "high-tension religious groups."
 The stated goal of this typology is to moderate overreaction to such groups by showing that their rhetoric is an existential necessity, not a reflection of real world intentions. There is no little irony in this caution since Taysom himself at times seems to overreact to the rhetoric of the Shakers (in chapter one) and the Mormons (in chapter four). Nevertheless, the project's point is well taken and its venture into psycho-social explanations of historical events will make for a lively conversation in the classroom.

KATHLEEN FLAKE
Vanderbilt University

SARA DUBOW. *Ourselves Unborn: A History of the Fetus
 in Modern America*. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 308. $29.95.

Sara Dubow offers a nuanced analysis of how American perceptions of the social, legal, and political status of the human fetus changed over the last century. Fetal identity, she argues, was tied more closely to the social and political context of the times than to the advancement of scientific knowledge or theological assumptions of any given period.

Dubow begins with Progressive-era transformations such as rapid industrialization, urbanization, and immigration. Social commentators transferred anxieties and fears associated with such change to fetal imaging, as evidenced in the anti-abortion campaign and the rise of eugenics, pronatalism, and euthenics. A conflict emerged between embryologists in need of fetuses as specimens for laboratory research and doctors who treated the fetus as a living subject from the moment of conception in order to gain public support for the criminalization of abortion. Attention to the fetus increased by the mid-twentieth century with fetal exhibitions at fairs and museums, specimens in laboratories (the Carnegie Institute alone had 9,000 fetuses by 1944), and portrayals in scholarly monographs as well as in mainstream publications such as Parents, Newsweek, Time, and Life. While the World's Fair of 1933 displayed fetuses as "curiosities or specimens" (p. 40), the situation changed substantially by the 1970s when fetuses were transformed into "babies" and "human bodies." Concurrently, the legal interpretation of fetal torts evolved based on the increased value courts placed on science, and the long-standing practice of fetal research became highly contested and controversial.

Dubow offers a micro-analysis of events in Boston to demonstrate the politically explosive nature of fetal politics by the 1970s. Examining Dr. Kenneth Edelin's trial for performing a second-trimester abortion on a black teenager, Dubow concludes his prosecution was ultimately a referendum on abortion, not on his specific actions, which were legal at the time. The state also indicted, under an obscure grave-robbing statute, four doctors for transporting aborted fetuses from pathology to research laboratories in their effort to discover safe antibiotics for pregnant women allergic to penicillin. Pro-life advocates employed these cases to swell grassroots support for fetal protection. That such events occurred simultaneously with the busing crisis added to the race and class tensions exploding in the city, demonstrating the coalescence of racial and abortion politics. The analysis of these converging events is particularly strong: issues raised here led to the political realignment of many working-class Catholics from the Democratic to the Reagan Republican camp and dominated the politics of abortion into the twentieth-first century.

Fetal protection arguments also brought attempts to curtail women's reproductive and medical rights. New fetology specialists often branded women heroic if they were willing to allow risky intrauterine interventions while looking askance at women who refused such procedures. Doctors increasingly turned to court orders to force noncompliant pregnant women to accept recommended treatment. In the workplace, companies eliminated women from high-paying traditionally male occupations based on fetal protection justifications, yet men who faced mutagenic risks encountered no similar discrimination. Women in low-paid employment also met no exclusion: women banned from high-wage chemical industry jobs were not banned from low-wage agriculture work where they faced similar chemical ex-posure. In addition to private industry, states also evoked fetal health to prosecute women delivering infants with evidence of drugs in their system; women of color were ten times more likely to be prosecuted than white women. Thus fetal protection could be manipulated to serve various agendas. Courts have foiled such attempts, striking down forced medical treatments for pregnant women, workplace discriminatory codes, and prosecution for drug delivery to a fetus.

Yet attempts to manipulate fetal images continue.
 Pro-life advocates have used the film "The Silent Scream" to raise concerns over fetal pain. They have also linked abortion to breast cancer and to post-abortion psychological stress disorder. No scientific evidence exists to support fetal pain, increased risk of breast cancer, or mental health issues, yet these emotional and fear-inducing tactics have been effective in increasing attempts to limit severely or overturn completely Roe v. Wade (1973).

Dubow's work makes a significant contribution to our understanding of fetal history. The book sometimes strays from the fetus to the intricacies of abortion politics. The author could strengthen her analysis of the dichotomy the medical profession faced as some doctors fought to shield medical areas such as abortion from state interference while other doctors called on the state to force pregnant women to undergo medical treatments prohibited by their religious principles in order to protect fetal rights. The author overstates her case that the fetus was “a symbol that paradoxically embodied both the strength and the vulnerability of the American individual and of American democracy during those perilous times” (p. 7). Still, this work will quickly become a standard in the field. Dubow places fetal history within a broad historical context that makes the book valuable to scholars interested in twentieth-century gender, race, politics, and medicine.

SIMONE M. CARON
Wake Forest University

CARIBBEAN AND LATIN AMERICA

JONATHAN CURRY-MACHADO. Cuban Sugar Industry: Transnational Networks and Engineering Migrants in Mid-Nineteenth Century Cuba. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xiv, 264. $85.00.

Nothing so profoundly transformed the course and character of Cuban history as the expansion of sugar production between the late eighteenth century and the mid-nineteenth century. The title of the introduction to the book under review—“succumbing to cane”—was aptly chosen. Sugar production increased almost threefold from 17,000 tons in 1791 to 47,000 tons in 1821, and increased threefold again by 1841 to 162,000 tons. The number of sugar estates increased from nearly 230 at the end of the eighteenth century to almost 1,600 by the mid-nineteenth century, even as the average size of the estates increased from 400 acres to 1,400 acres, with estates between 5,000 and 7,000 acres not uncommon. Labor demands increased proportionally. The expansion of chattel slavery was as stunning as it was swift. The underreported colonial censuses offered an approximation of the changing demographics of the island: 85,000 slaves in 1791 increased to 287,000 in 1827 and increased again to 436,000 in 1841. By mid-century, the African-descended population of Cuba—free and enslaved—constituted a majority of the inhabitants of the island, with far-reaching implications.

The transformation of Cuban agriculture was in fact a triumph of technology. That Cubans arrived comparatively late to sugar production meant that planters could avail themselves of modern technology and indeed industrialize the production of sugar on a scale never before possible. Steam power increased the efficiency of sugar manufacturing. Railroad construction served to facilitate the expansion of production zones deeper into the interior: rail systems within the estates linked larger fields to bigger factories, rail networks linked estates with newly constructed port facilities, many of which were built in response to expanding sugar exports.

These developments are well-established themes in the historiography of late colonial Cuba, and are competently examined in Jonathan Curry-Machado's study of the transformation of sugar production in the nineteenth century. Not as well known, however, are the sources and methods of technology transfers, the character of the vast capital inputs that new technology required, and the complex transnational networks that were summoned into existence during the early decades of technology imports and sugar exports. All, Curry-Machado correctly notes, contributed to transforming nineteenth-century Cuban sugar production into “the most advanced in the world” (p. 25). That the technology applied to sugar production, principally in the form of steam-powered mill machinery and the railroads, was of foreign origins—largely British and North American—as were the engineers, technicians, and mechanics who supervised the construction sites, maintained the machines, and directed their use, has long been recognized but incompletely understood.

No longer. In this nuanced and richly-detailed account of the science and technology of sugar production, the role of the maquinistas—as the foreign technicians were known—has been properly recognized and their strategic importance at the center of complex transnational networks of trade and commerce, finance capital, engineering, and migration superbly documented. This is historical scholarship at its best, richly grounded in archival and manuscript collections as transnational as the subject of the book, including the national archives of Cuba, Spain, and England. The result is a compelling account of the global reach of nineteenth-century capitalism, informed by an expansive knowledge of the impact of technology on evolving land tenure forms and production systems, joined with an understanding of evolving labor systems within the larger context of the transatlantic slave trade and transnational sugar markets. All in all, this is a remarkable achievement.

No less important, Curry-Machado examines the complex patterns of the daily life of the maquinistas in Cuba as related to social customs, political attitudes, and race relations. The middle decades of the nineteenth century were years of deepening tensions, as the forces released by sugar production acted to deepen the contradictions of colonialism and set in relief the multiple and multifaceted ways that Cuban economic development could no longer be contained within existing Spanish colonial structures. These were the formative years of Cuban independence sentiment, with a generation of men and women coming of age in and formed by the anomalies of a dynamic capitalist system within archaic colonial institutions. The ways that maquinistas integrated themselves—or did not—into the world of the Cuban planter class were factors central to this process, and properly belong to the larger narratives of nineteenth-century Cuba. That Curry-Machado continually shifts his attention between the global and the local, moreover, provides a transnational perspective on what has hitherto been approached as principally national developments.

Curry-Machado has made a splendid contribution to the expanding historiography of nineteenth-century Cuba. In the process, he offers insight into a society in the throes of far-reaching transformations, the consequences of which reached deeply into the century that followed.

LOUIS A. PÉREZ, JR.
University of North Carolina,
Chapel Hill

WILLIAM F. CONNELL. After Moctezuma: Indigenous Politics and Self-Government in Mexico City, 1524–1730. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press. 2011. Pp. xviii, 316. $45.00.

William F. Connell presents the evolution of native political institutions and culture in Tenochtitlan México from 1524 to 1730. The sources used in this book's elaboration mainly come from Mexican archives and are related to public works, taxes, and property. The Codex Chimalpahin also provides a great amount of information. According to the author, the recomposition of pre-contact politics began in the sixteenth century with two occurrences. The first was renaming the core of the ethnic state or altepetl, together with its constituent units or calpollis, as the Parcialidad de México Tenochtitlan, and its four neighborhoods or barrios (San Juan Moyotlan, San Pablo Teopan, San Sebastián Atzaqualco, and Santa María la Redonda Cuepopan). The second was the establishment of a municipality or cabildo de indios. This organ of self-government was composed by one juez gobernador, four mayors or alcaldes, and a community of voters. While the alcaldes were elected officials, governorship was a hereditary office reserved for direct descendants of the royal family. Nevertheless, as in the past, electors had to take part in their selection when the order of succession was not clear. From the point of view of peninsular authorities, the most important tasks of the cabildo were to collect the taxes, known as Reales Tributos, that indigenous peoples owed to the crown, and to keep civility in the barrios. The first objective was reached by making the governor accountable for the contributions in front of the viceroy; the second by leaving Indians at liberty to forge their own games of power, providing the collection of taxes was not compromised. In those cases, governors could be replaced, and even imprisoned.

By the beginning of the eighteenth century a fully realized political system had been formed. It encompassed competitive elections, coalitions, patronage, and the manipulation of Spanish law and courts. The juez gobernador ceased to be a post held for life, and set aside for the members of the Tenochca lineage, and expanded to embrace noblemen or caciques, commoners, foreigners, and even men of mixed blood—mestizos. New actors succeeded in seizing the apex of the cabildo whenever they were able to assure the collection of taxes through wealthy guarantors or fiadores, and to elegantly intertwine the aforementioned elements of local government. That was the case of cacique Francisco Benitez Inga, from the Viceroyalty of Perú, who was appointed juez gobernador in 1659. Since mid-seventeenth century, governors had faced jurisdictional problems with the recently created position of alguacil amparador, whose duty was to extract the Reales Tributos from blacks and mulattoes of the city. The community of electors was pivotal in the new way to deal with power. After royal family members excluded themselves from native offices, the electoral body had to select not only alcaldes, but also the highest position in the civic hierarchy. According to the author, it was through the act of voting that the newcomers became legitimate leaders. In addition, over the course of two hundred years the assembly itself experienced profound changes. In the past, it had only been composed by noblemen; under the Bourbons, commoners with some experience in public affairs became part of it.

Well-researched and well-written, Connell's book portrays México Tenochtitlan politics from an interesting perspective. He does not begin with restrictive structures, but with a scenario composed of ambitious and smart actors, where the governor is the protagonist, and competition for office becomes an increasingly delicate and complex game. Especially important is Connell's view of the imminent decay of hereditary mechanisms for accessing governorship, and their replacement by indigenous and Spanish cultural routes to power. Equally relevant is the rebuttal of Charles Gibson's argument that continuity in the regime was provided by the annual rotation of alcaldes according to territorial criteria. What Connell affirms is that governors kept their clients in mayoralties for years, thanks to alliances with voters established by the time of their election.

Nevertheless, the evidence supporting Connell's point does not show adequately how those relations actually worked. Nothing is said, for example, about the rewards each actor expected to get from his performance. On the other hand, the characterization of cabildos as fiscal organizations does not translate their complete reality. As Connell himself mentions, they were also in charge of the administration of justice, with governors acting as corregidores or alcaldes mayores. Developing the content of that affirmation, together with some consideration of its religious implications, would have helped to give a clearer idea of who the jueces gobernadores were. Finally, it would have been desirable to have some discussion of Tlatelolco, the second indigenous municipal area that emerged in sixteenth-century México City from old Tenochca society. The author only mentions that, in contrast to ever-changing Tenochtitlan, it was stable. Future comparative research could provide insight into each parcialidad's particular political development.

CLAUDIA GUARISCO
El Colegio Mexiquense

DAVID TAVÁREZ. The Invisible War: Indigenous Devotions, Discipline, and Dissent in Colonial Mexico. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 384. $65.00.

This book is an innovative and meticulously researched history of the extirpation of idolatry campaigns that various branches of the Catholic Church launched against indigenous communities in central Mexico (the basin of Mexico, Toluca, and the Coahuila-Tlaxcala region) and Oaxaca from the sixteenth to the eighteenth centuries. Within this vast time frame, David Tavárez chronicles the investigations of the “apostolic inquisition” of the mid-sixteenth century, those conducted by the regular orders, and those of the post-1571 secular tribunals under the jurisdiction of the Provisorato de Indios. The author is to be commended, in particular, for unearthing previously unused or under-examined archival materials. Tavárez analyzes over 125 trials of roughly 900 “individual ritual specialists” whom courts accused of engaging in idolatry, sorcery, and superstition. He concentrates especially on those acts that most troubled the colonial church: sacrifice, divination, spell-making, and the possession of cosmological knowledge.

Tavárez’s analysis of this fascinating body of materials points him toward several conclusions. Most importantly, the variegated devotional practices across time, between regions, and even as articulated by distinct individuals within the same communities prompt him to argue against understanding colonial indigenous ritual practice as a monolithic phenomenon. Diverging from earlier scholars, who have tended to understand indigenous spirituality in the colonial era in terms of either syncretism (Nancy Farriss, Inga Clendinnen, and Serge Gruzinski) or the crystallization of indigenous vs. Christian spirituality (James Lockhart and Juan Pedro Viquiera), Tavárez argues for the existence of “a colonial archipelago of faith composed by hundreds of local cosmologies that incorporated insights and theories drawn from Mesoamerican and European beliefs” (p. 271). Beneath this variation, however, Tavárez does posit that one unifying trait characterized indigenous ritual practice in the colonial period: “epistemological dissent” from Christianity, which occasionally resulted in violent challenges to Catholic domination. Beyond this major conclusion, the author generates others: after the late sixteenth century, female commoners rather than male noblemen were more frequently accused of heterodox spiritual practices; in Central Mexico, accusations against native leaders diminished after 1571, while in Oaxaca, investigations of collective ritual practices continued at high levels beyond the late sixteenth century. Further, he cautions that the absence of consistency and the lack of increased rationalism among ecclesiastics’ application of disciplinary techniques demonstrate that these, although intended as public demonstrations of power exercised over the bodies of the ruled, should not be understood in strict Foucauldian terms.

Tavárez also offers a new framework within which to understand Mexican indigenous ritual practice in the colonial era: the “collective” and “elective” spheres. The former implies orientation toward communal well-being and the latter an act or belief directed toward private or familial gain. Tavárez effectively considers the distinctions between the two ritual spheres throughout the text, although his rationale for rejecting the more familiar concepts of “private/public” distinctions is not consistently clear.

Tavárez has undertaken an ambitious study of a key and hitherto insufficiently addressed issue in Mexican indigenous and religious history. His training in anthropology and history and his impressive command of indigenous cosmology and of Nahuatl and Zapotec allow him to track some of the linguistic subtleties that led Spanish clerics to distortions and misperceptions when parsing such phenomena as nahualtocaitl, a Nahuatl oral genre that allowed for the embodiment of deities. Tavárez is also scrupulous about substantiating each of his claims with evidence from his own sources and from the conclusions of previous scholars.

In spite of the book’s many strengths, this reader was occasionally left questioning exactly what subject this book hopes to reveal to us. Tavárez frames his study by qualifying the limitations he has self-consciously placed on its scope. In the introduction, he recognizes that, in part, he is studying official constructions of indigenous ritual practice, asserting that idolatry “became attached to specific practices only through the conjunction of legal discourses, doctrinal rhetoric, and specific accusations” (p. 3). And while one of his central concerns is how the traits and preoccupations of particular extirpators shaped the pursuit of idolatry, their influence, and the varying frequency and intensity with which they pursued prosecutions, are not always explicit in his conclusions.

This point aside, Tavárez has written an impressive and a scholastically rigorous book that will be welcomed by students and scholars of colonial Latin America, ethnohistory, colonialism, and religious history.

NORA E. JAFFARY
Concordia University

RACHEL A. MOORE. Forty Miles from the Sea: Xalapa, the Public Sphere, and the Atlantic World in Nineteenth-Century Mexico. Tucson: University of Arizona Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 230. $49.95.

This innovative and rigorous book will have a stimulating impact on the historiography of nineteenth-century Mexico. Rachel A. Moore focuses on the history of Xalapa and makes original claims about nineteenth-century Mexican politics and culture, the development of its public sphere, and the place of Xalapa and the state of Veracruz in relation to the Atlantic world and the Mexican nation. Moore deftly places public culture in space through multiple scales of analysis that include the circulation of commodities and news across the ocean, the relations between Cuba and Mexico, the everyday conditions of travel between Mexico City and the port of Veracruz, and the sociabilities rooted in Xalapa's press and public spaces. Social connections and the information that flowed through the city became key political capital for Xalapeños. Moore's analysis, however, goes beyond communications, and effectively builds on the category of the public sphere as an intersection of actors, institutions, practices, and ideas. The result is a very perceptive and empirically rich understanding of local and regional politics.

Moore demonstrates the central importance of reliable information in the construction of commerce, political alliances, and public opinion during a time of institutional uncertainty. Orality was as important as literacy in this regard. These dimensions of the public sphere, as explored by Moore, add up to a study that is socially and materially deeper than existing intellectual histories of public life in Latin America. Since the pioneering work of François-Xavier Guerra, those studies have added a political angle (inspired by Alexis de Tocqueville and François Furet) to the Enlightenment model first described by Jürgen Habermas. In Moore's analysis, citizenship, a central theme in the recent political historiography of Mexico and Latin America during the national era, is defined by access to the public realm. Thus, secularization is more than a liberal fiscal recipe for state building but also represents the opening up of debates about themes that were off limits in the past.

The chapters combine objects that are seldom treated together but that, in Moore's clear prose and careful organization, provide new perspectives on the history of political culture: the world of cafes and inns; the dissemination and reading of newspapers, pamphlets, and books; discussions about citizenship; the control of travelers and disease; the development of road infrastructure and the postal service; the circulation of letters; and commerce and finance throughout Xalapa. Travel literature, press debates, political manifestos, administrative and penal archives form the empirical basis of the book, allowing Moore to combine anecdotal evidence with broader arguments about geography, institutions, and culture.

Xalapa is the perfect anchor for such a study because it reflected the tension between Mexico City, the center of national politics but also a source of the unreliable information, and the Atlantic coast, which brought news, people, and goods from across the sea. Moore's analysis of Xalapa's role in the national space is supported by a constant comparison with the rival city of Orizaba, which enjoyed a closer relationship with Mexico City and was less open to people and products coming from the east. The route connecting Veracruz with Mexico City emerges from this book as more than an annoying but inevitable part of the voyage between the Atlantic world and the capital. The ability of Xalapeños to capture information and engage travelers was a defining aspect of their city's identity and political development, explaining its fraught relationship with Mexico City. In the name of hygiene and national defense, the capital tried to limit the mobility that was a key resource for Xalapa's inhabitants. Thus, federalism, for Xalapeños, meant the ability to freely move and to gather and validate information coming from the east and the west.

General and sometimes president Antonio López de Santa Anna, with his ideological metamorphoses and political cunning, personified this tension and is productively used by Moore to connect politics and culture. Moore, however, does so without losing sight of the difficult state-building process that made Santa Anna and other strong men of his ilk possible. Santa Anna, in Moore's view, was as interesting because of his participation in open discussions about the local autonomies that defined the nation as he was because of his centralizing instincts. This book is bound to elicit a reconsideration of the notion of caudillos as leaders whose charismatic appeal was accepted without much examination: they thrived, and were judged, in the public sphere.

PABLO PICCATO
Columbia University

MATTHEW D. ESPOSITO. Funerals, Festivals, and Cultural Politics in Porfirian Mexico. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press. 2010. Pp. xvi, 313. $29.95.

This book is an exhaustively detailed study of the origins and intentions of state-sponsored public rituals commemorating death in Mexico City during the reign of Porfirio Díaz (1876–1911). Matthew D. Esposito argues that as a central historical trope in the Mexican imaginary, official funerary and memorial events helped Díaz establish, legitimate, and maintain his lengthy authoritarian regime.

The book's six chapters are organized both chronologically and thematically, emphasizing the periods before and after 1890 as times of regime consolidation, expansion, and decline. The introduction explains the central theme of memorialization as "the active construction of official memory through the use of state ceremony . . . that allowed the state to control public space, time, memory, and ultimately behavior at regular intervals throughout the calendar year" (pp. 4–5). Setting the stage for the broader work, Esposito examines how Mexico City elites utilized memorialism as an integrated element in their efforts to establish hegemony, nationalism, and modernity in the newly industrializing and urbanizing country.

Chapter one discusses how a "death industry" emerged from the Federal District's stark reality of chronically low life expectancy and quotidian exposure to dying and death. Commercialization and increased regulations of funeral businesses, cemeteries, and traditional celebrations—such as the Day of the Dead—were hallmarks of Díaz government efforts to harness all aspects of the country's cultural practices. Although initiated during the liberal, anticlerical reform period of the nineteenth century, social segregation in once public burial grounds reflected public health concerns rather than efforts to wrest power away from the Catholic Church.

From 1877 to 1889, Mexico's federal government sponsored seventeen state funerals "to unite citizens and reconcile with the nation's troubled past" (p. 56). Chapter two explores how Díaz sought, by manipulating such events, to weave himself into the newly invented tradition of a heroic national past. Some attention is paid to the conspicuous exclusion of social groups such as workers, students, and women from state processions and how Porfirian elites attempted to control the state's official narrative through physical and discursive elisions of "alternative memories."

Chapter three looks more broadly at how Porfirian officials codified the ritual calendar and added holidays in order to cast "narratives of power and progress." Focusing on the popular holidays of the Grito de Dolores, military parades, civic processions, and memorial services, Esposito explores how elites utilized such events to assert their political legitimacy and authority and thus "cemented the imagined community of Mexicans" (p. 86). Esposito also shows how state-contrived holidays played a role in assertions of Mexican state sovereignty vis-à-vis the United States and explores their eventual transnational dispersion as part of the expanding cultural influence of the greater Mexican diaspora.

In a similarly extranational vein, the following chapter begins with the claim that "central to [Díaz's] political survival was selling the legitimacy of his regime to the world community" (p. 113). This thread, however, is not developed. Instead this chapter and the final two add considerable details concerning state funerals in the second half of the Porfiriato. These chapters feature Díaz's attempt to insert himself into a Holy Trinity with the national heroes Miguel Hidalgo (1753–1811) and Benito Juárez (1806–1872), and they also introduce the history of the lone commemorated female in the long list of state "pantheonization," Josefa Ortiz de Domínguez (aka La Corregidora).

At the outset, Esposito makes a number of bold claims and attempts to position his monograph within a historiography of Mexico that seeks to integrate cultural and political analyses of the nation-state and its inhabitants. Despite its in-depth examination of the subject, the book does not adequately explain its relevance and impact in broader national and metropolitan contexts. Although the practice of transporting artifacts and exhumed bodies for display and commemoration in the nation's capital was consistent with Díaz's attempts to centralize control over the provinces, Esposito—relying almost entirely on Mexico City-based archives—largely ignores the fact that the inhabitants of Mexico's many cities, states, and regions had divergent experiences that have been documented by several recent state-level histories. Furthermore, despite some attempts to link public rituals to the creation of a social habitus in certain areas of Mexico City itself (p. 91), the work never integrates the distinct spaces and neighborhood populations of the Federal District as constitutive elements of this primarily urban history. Although the book's focus on the cultural production of rituals of rule by Porfirian elites helps us to better understand political power in Mexico City, it does little to uncover how, if, and the degree to which hegemonic projects affected everyday Mexicans throughout the country.

These critiques notwithstanding, Esposito's detailed study and elegantly crafted depiction of elite Porfirian public ritual and hegemony in Mexico City will nicely complement courses on modern Mexico.

MARK OVERMYER-VELÁZQUEZ
University of Connecticut

JASON DORMADY. Primitive Revolution: Restorationist Religion and the Idea of the Mexican Revolution, 1940–1968. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press. 2011. Pp. x, 206. $28.95.

his book offers concise, valuable insights into religion in priista Mexico. Jason Dormady's central, convincing thesis is that restorationist religions—those premised on the recuperation of primordial religious purity—served as effective mediating structures linking state and society. This articulation, Dormady argues, was achieved by a combination of Israelite (even indigenista) theologizing, which provided a spiritual bridge to revolutionary nationalism, and by degrees of legal exceptionalism, through which local states multiplied the corporatist arrangements that classical liberalism disdained. Religious groups sacralized official ideology; they also negotiated informal recognition, such that they could own property and continue illegal religious practices. In sum, what Dormady suggestively calls "informal religious corporatism" (p. 5) allowed ecclesial bodies to regulate the stress of urbanization, state formation, and capitalism. The Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), meanwhile, appears in benign historiographical light as a defender of non-Catholic liberty. Indeed, the author stresses a subtle ideological affinity between the regime and churches that performed model patriotism (pp. 20, 29) rather than any crude state instrumentalization of religion.

Dormady builds towards this conclusion through three case studies. Chapter one explores Luz del Mundo (LDM), a Pentecostal movement founded in 1920s Guadalajara by revolutionary Eusebio González, baptized "Aarón" after Israel's high priest. Dormady's LDM is nationalistic, hierarchical, and even clerical: LDM grounded rural migrants to the city, for whom it offered quasi-Catholic structure plus revelation and economic self-help. Dormady disputes claims that LDM flourished on the back of a clientelistic pact with Jalisco's PRI—although actually he offers ample counter-evidence to this assertion. LDM's assimilation into the PRI's popular sector was deep; through judicial sleight of hand, Aarón was buried in sacred ground, not a municipal grave, while PRI oligarchs sold Guadalajara real estate to LDM.

Chapter two focuses on the Mormon schism known as the Church of the Kingdom of God in Its Fullness (IRDP), founded in the state of México by Margarito Bautista in 1922. Bautista, a Náhuatl-speaker and ex-

Baptist, blended Sonoran-style developmentalism with a providential reading of the 1910 Revolution as an epic reinauguration of true religion. Indeed, Bautista conceptualized 1910 as a struggle in which a Mormon tribe—the Lamanites, qua the Mexica—would restore the verities of “Eternal Mexico” that Catholicism had ruptured. Leaving aside this patriotic teleology, IRDP was also patriarchal in that community brides were reserved for polygamous elders (p. 85). Dormady strives, using anthropological evidence, to situate IRDP’s polygyny within Nahua culture, though the practice’s putatively autochthonous roots remain unclear.

The final empirical chapter studies the María Auxiliadora colony founded in 1940s Baja California by sinarquista Salvador Abascal. María Auxiliadora has been studied before, though Dormady is the first to mine Abascal’s memoirs so deeply. Even so, the sinarquistas seem misplaced, given that Abascal claimed no divine charisma: he was a militant with religious proclivities but, unlike Aarón and Bautista, no “God in embryo” (p. 65). The basic principle was therefore different than those of Hermosa Provincia or New Jerusalem; likewise, political manipulation of the colony seems more palpable, suggesting a different process. Lastly, the sinarquistas’ antimodernism, while necessary for the book’s thesis, seems overdone.

Cumulatively, however, Dormady’s book effectively challenges some celebrated scholarly assumptions, not least reification of the prístia state or the Protestant acculturation thesis. Religious pluralization in Mexico, Dormady shows, consisted of arreglos joining a variegated authoritarian state and multiple corporations. Dormady is admirably clear as to how religious pluralism in Mexico was built on, rather than against, corporatist values, and this in a legal penumbra: indeed, it was the uneven rule of law that created space for the tolerance of minority religions.

Despite these nuances, characterizing Mexico’s state as a U.S.-style “bastion of dissident religious traditions in the Western hemisphere” (p. 146) seems provocative, even triumphalist. Because, of course, the state did not simply defend minority rights but, for significant periods, injured those of the Catholic majority. Secularization, in other words, meant non-Catholic corporatism rather than impartial laicism. The restoration concept could also be fleshed out more: rather than a post-1940 innovation, this was a standard feature of Mexican radicalism kept alive during the revolution by religious groups such as the Mexican Catholic and Apostolic Church and intellectuals like Miguel Cabrera and Antonio Soto y Gama. What changed, perhaps, was the meaning of the restorationist trope, which developed from the New Testament ecclesiology favored by liberal Catholics to the Old Testament, covenanter primitivisms of prístia Mexico. Despite some caveats, this book is a strongly argued addition to the literature on religion in modern Mexico, one that well illustrates the patchy nature of religious modernization in the country and its relevance to broader political culture.

MATTHEW BUTLER
University of Texas

VIRGINIA GARRARD-BURNETT. Terror in the Land of the Holy Spirit: Guatemala under General Efraín Ríos Montt, 1982–1983. (Religion and Global Politics Series.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2010. Pp. xvi, 269. $55.00.

Virginia Garrard-Burnett’s examination of General Efraín Ríos Montt is one of the best available historical-political analyses of Guatemala’s brutal armed conflict. As Garrard-Burnett points out, historians and others have produced a great deal of scholarly and journalistic analysis of the horrific period of violence and destruction that Guatemalans suffered in the late twentieth century. While she focuses specifically on Ríos Montt and his eighteen-month rule, her study goes well beyond these chronological parameters.

Garrard-Burnett is arguably one of the most important contemporary historians of Protestantism in Latin America. In this slim volume, she not only demonstrates her deep and nuanced understanding of the evangelical movement in Guatemala but also explains the dynamics and contours of the political crisis that brought Ríos Montt to power in 1982. She gives the most plausible and sophisticated explanation to date of Ríos Montt’s violent campaign, as well as his populism and political longevity, and in doing so she also provides a succinct and beautifully written history of the role of religion in contemporary Guatemalan society.

Garrard-Burnett explores Ríos Montt’s populism and enduring presence in Guatemala and explains how he was able to reclaim a position of moral authority lost by the Guatemalan military during the chaotic and bloody rule of Romeo Lucas García (1978–1982). Despite the fact that in absolute terms Ríos Montt’s regime was more deadly than Lucas’s had been, the popular perception was that the counter-insurgency campaign of Ríos Montt restored both logic and moral clarity to the military. The role of Ríos Montt’s Pentecostal faith in promulgating that perception is not as straightforward as earlier scholars and critics have suggested. Garrard-Burnett claims that the appeal of Pentecostalism and of Ríos Montt himself were not rooted primarily in coercion and manipulation but rather in “the general’s vision of a new Guatemala, formed, as it were, from a potent admixture of religion, racism, security, nationalism, and capitalism” (p. 13). Therefore, Ríos Montt’s vision had genuine appeal in Guatemala’s particular political and social reality.

Garrard-Burnett includes in this book a brief but sophisticated chronology of violence (1952–1982) during the military period leading up to the coup that brought Ríos Montt to power. She then gives a very detailed account of Ríos Montt’s counter-insurgency strategy from March 1982 to August 1983. She avoids what she refers to as the “pornography” of violence, although she does recount the most important atrocities of the period in graphic detail. Although she claims that she seeks to avoid explicit descriptions of brutality, she is not entirely successful in this regard. Nevertheless, I think that the details of these horrors—especially incidents that are well documented and had significant political impact—are important for scholars to analyze.

Garrard-Burnett also provides an elegant and insightful history of Guatemalan religion during this period and describes the dynamic interplay among Catholic Action, liberation theology, and Pentecostalism. She outlines Ríos Montt's religious biography, underscoring his use of religious rhetoric to define his vision of a "new Guatemala." She deftly balances her analysis of the role of coercion in the rapid growth of Pentecostalism among indigenous Guatemalans in the 1980s, stating that Guatemalans used "evangélico identity as a shield with which to protect themselves" (p. 132). The author avoids, however, simplistic and counterfactual descriptions of the conflict as one between leftist Catholics and fascist Protestants supported by the United States, writing that "at its core, the Guatemalan struggle in the late 1970's and early 1980's was about competing moral discourses" (p. 142). Both of these discourses included explicitly religious elements that cut across lines of Catholicism and Protestantism.

Garrard-Burnett finishes the book with a thoughtful consideration of the role of U.S. foreign policy, media, and foreign evangelicals. In some ways, the order of the final two chapters seems off, as her most important observations and arguments are found in the penultimate chapter. Still, this does not really detract from the book's significance. I believe that this book and Francisco Goldman's account of the murder of Archbishop Juan Gerardi (2007) together provide the most revealing and insightful account of Guatemala's violent recent past. Both approach the topic by explaining more confined events, and both texts consider the question of violence by including an analysis of the role of religion and religious institutions. Each avoids simplistic binary explanations of the horrors that truly overshadow everything else about this history. I believe that Garrard-Burnett's book is one of the best political histories written on the subject to date.

RACHEL A. MAY
University of South Florida

TÁMIS PARRON. A política da escravidão no Império do Brasil, 1826–1865. Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira. 2011. Pp. 373. $49.90.

A meticulously researched contribution to recent scholarship on slavery in nineteenth-century Brazil, this book examines the politics of slavery within parliamentary debates on the slave trade and the future of the institution from the 1820s through the 1860s. While slavery survived the end of Portuguese sovereignty in 1822, the material fact of slavery, Tâmis Parron argues, did not "naturally" rest on, or produce, a proslavery politics in independent Brazil. A "politics of slavery" was "historically constructed and reinvented" in "a network of political and social alliances . . . [that] employed the most powerful agencies of the Brazilian national state in the interests of slave owners" (p. 18). Thus, Parron defends a return, after decades of fruitful research on the economic, social, and cultural history of slavery, to the study of the political contexts, practices, and discourses of slavery in the nineteenth century and to the much debated relationship between slavery and liberalism in Brazil. As Parron's research shows, it was in the "spaces of liberalism"—the parliament and the press—where Brazilian elites forged and defended claims about the ramifications of the slave trade and slavery for social, political, and economic order. Although Parron is not the first to argue that the maintenance of slavery did not mean that Brazilian liberalism was simply rhetorical, his rigorous reading of parliamentary debates reveals much about how liberalism and slavery shaped each other.

Throughout this book, Parron is attentive to past and current analyses of what Brazilian historians like to call conjuntura, historical realities produced in the convergence of distinct forces and circumstances. While previous scholarship has tended to privilege one group of agents in sorting out why the trade and slavery endured and then ended the way that they did, Parron insists that the final decades of slavery were defined at once by local and national responses to growing world markets, the institutionalization of liberalism, and mounting challenges posed by slave resistance and British abolitionism. Parron re-examines parliamentary and diplomatic documentation and restores to a certain degree the role of the British in both the end of the trade and the gradual abolition of slavery. He also weighs in on recent debates on the abolition of the trade by suggesting ways to integrate slave resistance into the Brazilian Empire's political history. To strike a balance between competing claims that slave resistance was either inconsequential or the principal impetus behind the end of the trade, Parron argues that while not all slave resistance and rebellion registered the same way within political culture, the rebellion of the Malês in 1835 had an undeniable effect on "public opinion." However, if that rebellion led some elites to call for the end of slavery, it also led others, ultimately more powerful, to defend the reopening of the trade (p. 233).

In the first three chapters, Parron examines the relationship between the illegal slave trade and political elites and institutions. Proceeding chronologically, he traces the ways in which international agreements and national legislation criminalized the trade in the 1820s and early 1830s, culminating in the 1831 law that declared free Africans illegally brought to Brazil. While some historians have dismissed this legislation as a superficial response to international pressure, Parron argues for analyzing the law and its genesis within the context of struggles over the boundaries of executive and legislative power, and recognizing some genuinely antislavery drive behind it. Thus, he explains the ascendance in the mid-1830s of a group parliamentarians that would become the core of the Conservative Party and their public defense of the trade (p. 85). Arguing that enslavement would bring material and social benefits to Africans and that the trade benefited all of Brazil, elites who were tied to coffee-producing regions in need of labor offered a political defense of illegal slave property and ensured that the trade would continue, in some years even grow. Contraband, facilitated by a lack of enforcement, went from being “residual” to “systematic” until under British pressure the legislature ended the trade in 1850 (p. 173). In the last chapter, Parron argues that after the trade ended, debates about slavery became less tied to partisan politics and shifted toward immigration as a parallel source of cheap labor and to strategies for enhancing the sale of slaves in the countryside. Here and throughout the book, Parron’s insights, founded on extensive research and historiographical critique, are sure to stimulate further debate among historians of slavery in the Brazilian Empire.

KIRSTEN SCHULTZ
Seton Hall University

AMY CHAZKEL. Laws of Chance: Brazil’s Clandestine Lottery and the Making of Urban Public Life. (Radical Perspectives.) Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2011. Pp. xvii, 346. Cloth $89.95, paper $24.95.

Established during the late nineteenth century in Rio de Janeiro, the animal game (jogo do bicho) gained popularity just as Brazil embraced modernity. Before long, it would become a near ubiquitous social practice that not only ran parallel to the rise of modern capitalism but also offered a critical perspective on “the ideologies that capitalism implies” (p. 3). As Amy Chazkel insightfully writes, games of chance “[have] both parodied and epitomized the ideas and practices of modern society by trading on the volatility of pecuniary value while short-circuiting the necessity for productive labor” (p. 3). In Brazil, jogo do bicho provided players the possibility (however slim) of making money without really having to work for it. Ordinary folks, in other words, could get in on the emerging global casino.

This intriguing study carefully considers the game from its modest beginnings up through its florescence as a virtual “culture industry” in Brazil. Not surprisingly, this process occurred in tandem with an ever-expanding state apparatus and legal system that sought to regulate illicit gambling. Chazkel points out that attempts to control jogo do bicho “derived as much from a desire to increase tax revenues as to punish wayward police as from a preternatural fear of the popular classes and their folkways” (p. 25).

The author covers an impressive array of topics as she traces jogo do bicho across the twentieth century. Her early discussion centers on the criminalization of the game as it gained popularity in Rio de Janeiro and other Brazilian cities. An early 1895 law first attempted to regulate gambling by ruling that wagering on games of chance (jogo do bicho as well as other athletic events) could only legitimately take place one day a week.

While police and government officials tracked down bicheros—as well as those who helped finance them (banqueros)—clandestine gambling too closely resembled the very economic principles upon which modern Brazil was then being established. The author informs us that “objects [namely tickets, paper money, notebooks, tip sheets, newspaper clippings, etc.] related to the animal game began to appear in random places” (p. 42). In so doing, jogo do bicho became notorious: a presumed threat to public order.

This process, of course, paralleled a wide number of other developments; transition to wage labor and a cash economy, professionalization/specialization of labor, advent of “leisure” time, enclosure of public space, rise of the modern state, advanced capitalism, and so on. With this, Chazkel notes the emergence of what was later dubbed the “informal economy” and incisively demonstrates how jogo do bicho colorfully epitomizes this social phenomenon.

Further, the author perceptively charges that criminalization of the game served as an indication of the changing relationship between the Brazilian state and civil society. “[C]riteria for arrest, not actual aggregate behavior” (p. 66) determined the difference. Thus, “[one] can understand jogo do bicho’s descent into the underworld, then, not so much as the result of preexisting social inequalities, but rather as defining new ones suited to and intelligible in a postabolition, republican, urbanizing age” (p. 67). The game became a signifier of a host of “disorderly tendencies in urban petty trading” unwanted by Brazilian elites (p. 68). Enforcement of legislation by police, judges, and politicians provided new opportunities for corruption and personal gain.

This fascinating history of jogo do bicho reveals much. As Chazkel writes “[t]he intertwined histories of elite and popular forms of playing with money forces us to question the artificial division between jogo and negócio, between play and business, that underlies both historical and contemporary conceptions of social history of the turn of the twentieth century” (p. 143). For the author, there was basically little difference between the criminalized game and its allegedly more legitimate commercial counterpart. Reflecting on Chazkel’s fine study, one cannot help but apply this point when considering the recent history of the stock market in the aftermath of the 2008 Wall Street debacle.

ANDREW GRANT WOOD
University of Tulsa

PAULA ALONSO. Jardines Secretos, Legitimaciones Públicas: El Partido Autonomista Nacional y la política argentina de fines del siglo diecinueve. Buenos Aires: Edhasa. 2010. Pp. 390. $75.00.

The period between 1880 and 1916 is one of the most studied stages of Argentine history. Those were the years in which Argentina turned into one of the main grain and meat exporters of the world. The country was transformed and experienced spectacular growth as it solved a host of problems, particularly those related to a political system dominated by the Partido Autonomista Nacional (PAN), which controlled the executive and legislative branches of the national government and a good many provincial governments as well. This formidable political machine has been variously labeled an "oligarchy," "ruling class" or "Generation of 80." Such designations are not inaccurate, but they contribute to an image of political power in Argentina being controlled by a small, unified group with limited fissures. This vision minimizes disagreements within the PAN and dismisses the diversity of party politics.

Paula Alonso's book attempts to correct this image of what political power is in Argentina, and especially assumptions about Argentinian elections. It covers the first two presidential periods between the years 1880 and 1892 (Alonso does not clearly explain why her analysis ends in 1892). There seems to be little doubt that the PAN constituted a hegemonic party facing only limited political opposition during this period. At the same time, the party lacked formal political organization, institutionalization, and internal structure. This made selecting presidential candidates a difficult process in which diverse actors exercised different degrees of influence, "but none of them enjoyed a complete control" (p. 16). Using the concept of "interoligarchic conflict" developed by Natalio Botana to refer to the struggles within the PAN, Alonso attempts to explain numerous and complex intraparty struggles. President, governors, legislators, and administrators formed alliances and competed among themselves for power. The political scene described by Alonso shows a poorly disciplined party without a defined hierarchy in which no single actor dominated and power remained fragmented.

Alonso also analyzes the complex relations between the central and provincial governments. This allows her to establish notable differences in the bases of power enjoyed by president Julio A. Roca (1880–1886) and his successor, Miguel Juárez Celman (1886–1890). Roca governed by concentrating power in his own person and attempting to discipline and subordinate the provinces' interests. This engendered a struggle with governors who resisted his efforts at centralization. By contrast, when Juárez Celman became president, he enhanced his relationship with provincial governors by giving them an important degree of political and financial autonomy. One of Alonso's most interesting arguments is that juarismo established "a dynamic in which power moved between provinces and the presidency" (p. 224). This strategy, more federal, made Juárez Celman the undisputed chief of the PAN, displacing Roca.

The book concludes by discussing struggles within the party following the crisis in 1890, the sudden end of Juárez's presidency, the reappearance of Roca, and the construction of a "modernist" faction that appropriated some of the juarists' strategies for building political power. Although it does not break with a historiographical tradition that focuses on governors rather than the governed, this study constitutes an important contribution to our understanding of the PAN and Argentinian politics at the end of the nineteenth century.

JUAN SURIANO

Universidad Nacional de San Martín

MARK A. HEALEY. The Ruins of the New Argentina: Peronism and the Remaking of San Juan after the 1944 Earthquake. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2011. Pp. xvi, 395. Cloth $94.95, paper $25.95.

On the hot summer evening of January 15, 1944, an earthquake reduced the capital city of the Argentine province of San Juan to shambles, killing around 10,000 people and leaving half of the surviving population homeless. This tragedy is the subject of Mark A. Healy's intelligent, well-researched, and exemplary political history. Healy traces the interaction between the national and the provincial government and, at the same time, offers a superb analysis of the role that the destruction of the city and its reconstruction played within the transformative Peronist project.

The book is divided into four sections corresponding to moments in the relationship between San Juan and the national government after the earthquake. Part one commences with an overview of the economic and social landscape of the province, followed by a detailed account of the earthquake, and ends by illustrating how relief efforts became a spring board for the ascendancy of Juan Domingo Perón. San Juan was among the poorest provinces in the country. San Juan's politics had historically been particularly violent, with governors rarely finishing their terms in office either because they were killed, toppled by the opposition, or removed through federal intervention. The earthquake has mostly been remembered as a pivotal moment in which Perón was catapulted from a second tier of the military regime that had taken over in 1943 to a major figure on the political scene. He launched relief operations, mobilizing massive popular support and displaying features of his political style that would be increasingly important in the coming years.

Part two address the ups and downs, the (few) starts and the (many) stops, and the dilemmas of reconstruction projects. To relocate or not to relocate the city; to reconstruct with or without adobe; to start at the center or the periphery; to prioritize public buildings or family homes; to rely on public or private (subsidized) construction; to employ national or local agents were many of the issues to be resolved. The reconstruction projects ranged from the very ambitious to the timid and, while imaginations ran wild at times, local and national politics intertwined uneasily, resulting in deadlock and paralysis in a phase full of contradictions, frustrations, and ineffectiveness.

Parts three and four are the most interesting sections of the book. Here, Healy takes us in slow motion through the emergence of Peronism as a labor-based mass movement, the mounting of opposition, and Perón's triumphal seventeenth of October and subsequent presidential victory. While these are well-known moments in the country's history, Healy examines them through the lens of San Juan. The initial rallies to collect funds for the victims and the early promises that San Juan would become critical in the forging of a new Argentina were significant to Perón's ascendance. These efforts, however, faltered after Perón became president, revealing the limits of Peronism. Still, while Peronism did not deliver in the physical reconstruction of the city, the province experienced a significant and long-lasting transformation of a different kind. The old political divisions subsided, and Peronism became the umbrella that embraced the many, until then, boisterous factions. Ultimately, reconstruction was not achieved under Perón's administration but under the military regime that deposed him. Still, the reconfiguration of power that had taken place in San Juan survived Perón's downfall.

Healy deserves much praise for the many accomplishments of this book. Argentina's history has a long tradition of being written either as a "national" history in which the provinces play no part (except for the province of Buenos Aires), or as multiple provincial histories with little relation to national governments, except when the latter intervened directly in a province's economy or politics. Healy overstates his case, however, when he argues that the interior remains unexplored (pp. 9–10), as the relation between the national and subnational powers has been an increasing area of research in recent years, including for the period he covers. It is nonetheless true that much research remains to be done, and his book offers a good example of how to intertwine the local and the national effectively. At times, however, this relation appears one-dimensional and the story unbalanced. The book pays considerable attention to the means by which the state imposed itself (with different degrees of success) in the province through federal interventions, the deployment of reconstruction "experts," and by transferring or withholding funds destined to rebuild the province's capital. Healy frequently portrays San Juan as powerless or reactionary, at the "receiving end" of national and provincial relations. Within San Juan itself, the book also centers on the many squabbles among the political elite and the professional groups in charge of reconstruction, with less attention being paid to low-income sectors of the population who were greatly affected by these events. The book would have benefited from a comparative analysis between the housing projects of San Juan and the many other housing projects that became hallmarks of Peronism elsewhere, particularly in the city of Buenos Aires and its surrounding areas.

What Healy masterfully underscores, however, is that the relation between the state and the provinces is a fundamental angle of analysis that deserves further attention. This book is an excellent example of the value of such an enterprise. It is also an innovative and creative contribution to the study of Peronism that ventures beyond traditional thematic and geographic perimeters. One only hopes that in the future many more will follow Healy's steps in breaking through those traditional boundaries.

PAULA ALONSO

George Washington University

JODY PAVILACK. Mining for the Nation: The Politics of Chile's Coal Communities from the Popular Front to the Cold War. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press. 2011. Pp. xx, 396. $84.95.

This book concerns the Communist Party of Chile (PCCh) and Chile's 1948 Law for the Permanent Defense of Democracy from the vantage point of workers in the country's coal-mining region. The 1948 legislation sought to eradicate the PCCh and politically neutralize its members. It was passed by both houses of the Chilean Congress with the support of President Gabriel González Videla (1946–1952). Chapter ten, "Democracy under Siege: González Videla's 'Damned Law,' Internment Camps, and Mass Deportations," details the law and its implementation. Earlier chapters all build toward understanding this controversial measure and how it affected the coal miners participating in municipal civic life through the PCCh. Jody Pavilack shows leaders organizing to improve the lives of their families, with little interest in things grand or global. She contrasts what the PCCh national leaders wanted and planned with what local leaders did and said. Communist coal miners locally suffered repression for how opponents perceived the PCCh nationally and internationally. According to the author, "Communist influence on the coal zone residents had little to do with programmatic decrees wired from party headquarters in Santiago or Moscow, as many reductive references to the 'Red zone' would have us believe" (p. 342).

The introduction and first chapter draw from established historiography to provide a quick grasp of coal mining in Chile from the 1850s to the 1920s. In subsequent chapters, with marvelous and well written detail, Pavilack examines the work and political lives of the miners and their families through 1952. She paints a picture of hope, frustration, and patience. The book's treatment of the 1940s adds important regional detail to the history of the Popular Front, especially the October 1947 coal miners' strike (chapter nine). Pavilack makes use of company and governmental archives, labor records, union and church files, newspapers and pamphlets, and several dozen interviews in order to expand beyond previous understandings of the PCCh in the mining south. Pavilack effectively relies on secondary sources for national context, although some Chilean specialists might quibble about occasional overreliance on one or another author. It is easy to believe that Pavilack has exhausted all possible records in her effort to piece together the growth of the PCCh and coal miner unionization in Lota and Coronel.

Pavilack compares the legislated proscription of the PCCh during the Popular Front presidency of González Videla with the military overthrow of the Popular Unity government of Salvador Allende (1970–1973). Her purpose is to call attention to how the 1947–1948 repression of the Left, and the PCCh in particular, were perceived at the time. She makes the points that Gonzalez Videla was elected with PCCh support, and that Allende's personally selected Commander-in-Chief of the Army, General Augusto Pinochet, led the 1973 coup. Thus Pavilack argues, "there emerges the figure of a traitor and the act of betrayal—with its multiple layers of meaning" (p. 344). Some readers may find her interpretation of 1973 too one-sided; there were supporters in Chile for the coup. The subsequent repression is another matter.

An excellent aspect of the book occurs in the final pages. Having shown through ten chapters the details of "worker-citizen" efforts culminating in the political events of 1947–1948, Pavilack then notes how early career involvement in the government and the military over these same years shaped the outlook of three subsequent Chilean heads of state: President Eduardo Frei Montalva (1964–1970), Allende, and Pinochet (1973–1990) (pp. 347–348). Thus, popular resentments and suspicions have deep historical roots in Chile.

Pavilack's book is a welcome addition to the historiography of mining in Latin America. The book makes clear that coal miners sought "decisive intervention of the state to rectify the fundamental imbalance of power between the 'progressive' proletariat and a bourgeoisie that was 'reactionary' in thought and practice" (p. 343). National leadership of the Popular Front professed to support improvements for mining families, while provincial governmental appointees and representatives in Congress defended the mining companies in their resistance to change. This book makes clear that the 1947–1948 attack on the PCCh, and the disenfranchisement of its members, were unfair when seen from the local level. By book's end, the reader knows that in 1947–1948 local Communist Party committee leaders were not concerned with global perspectives—they just wanted justice and equity for their people.

This book belongs on the shelf of anyone following twentieth-century Chilean politics, communist parties anywhere, and the politics of miners and mining everywhere. Lota's mining buildings are now protected as national monuments. The mines nationalized by Allende in 1970 were closed in the late 1990s. One of the oldest mines (Chiflón del Diablo/Devil's Draft) has been opened for tourists guided by retired miners. Pavilack's work is a monument to labor.

WILLIAM W. CULVER
State University of New York,
Plattsburgh

EUROPE: ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL

ERICH S. GRUEN. Rethinking the Other in Antiquity. (Martin Classical Lectures.) Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 415. $39.50.

In this book of panoramic scope, Erich S. Gruen challenges an entrenched scholarly interpretation of cross-cultural perceptions, assumptions, and practices in antiquity. Under the influence of Edward Said's powerful idea of Orientalism as a politico-cultural instrument for European triumphal chauvinism, classicists and ancient historians have been keenly attuned to a polarizing and self-affirming disparagement of an inferior "Other" in ancient texts (it is noteworthy that in Orientalism [1978], Said offered Aeschylus's Persians as his first example of the Western penchant for self-glorification by means of constructing inferior, "orientalized" others). As Gruen describes the phenomenon, "Denigration of the 'Other' seems essential to shape the inner portrait, the marginalization that defines the center, the reverse mirror that distorts the reflection of the opposite and enhances that of the holder" (p. 1). His project is to show that the so-called "Other" in ancient Greek, Roman, and Jewish texts has been overplayed to the point of gross caricature and misleading stereotype, that seemingly condemnatory statements of other ethnic and cultural collectivities in these texts have frequently been wrenched out of their proper contexts and profoundly misread, and that there is ample—and overlooked—evidence for a very different ancient view of foreigners, which created links and bridges through fictive common genealogies, kinship myths, and mutually enhancing ancestral legends. The thrust of this revisionist cultural history is one of interconnection and reciprocal respect, rather than any putative dichotomizing and alienating ethnocentrism.

This is a vast undertaking, and Gruen confesses that in this book "it receives treatment . . . through soundings rather than survey" (p. 352). Rethinking the Other in Antiquity is composed in two parts: "Impressions of the 'Other'" and "Connections with the 'Other.'" Chapters in part one discuss Persia and Egypt in the ancient Greek historical imagination, Greek and Roman views on Carthaginians, Roman ideas about Gauls, Germans, and Jews as they are reflected in the writings of Caesar and Tacitus, and the question of "people of color." Part two contains chapters on foundation legends, fictitious kinships manufactured by Greeks and Jews in relation to foreign peoples, and "cultural interlockings and overlappings."

Readers might feel that some of the terminology Gruen employs is in need of sharper definition and qualification. Two such examples are the terms "nation" and "race." In discussing Egypt in classical texts, Gruen notes that the portrait of Alexandrians in the Bellum Alexandrinum cannot be applied to all Egyptians. He writes, "the stereotype applies to inhabitants of that volatile city, not to Egyptian national character" (p. 108). Is the use of the phrase "national character" unproblematic in this context? Readers of Ernest Gellner, Eric Hobsbawm, or Benedict Anderson, for example, might well think that some explication is required before one can talk about "nation" or "national character" in the ancient world. In the chapter "People of Color," Gruen acknowledges that "race may be an altogether misleading and erroneous category" (pp. 197–198). Might it not be better, then, to avoid the term entirely, perhaps employing something like “color prejudice” (the phrase used by Frank M. Snowden, Jr. in a well-known book)? A good argument, after all, can be made that “race” and “racism” as we commonly understand those concepts had to await Gregor Mendel’s peas and Charles Darwin’s voyage on H.M.S. Beagle. Benjamin Isaac, aware of the problem, opted for the term “proto-racism” in his 2004 book on the subject.

Perhaps the point about terminology is close to quibbling, but two more substantive questions arise. First, the book may foster an ancient view of others that is too uniform and monolithic (as in the phrase “classical views” on p. 114). Was there an ancient Greek, Roman, or Jewish view of any particular foreign people? The answer to that question is bedeviled by the fact that we can rarely hear non-elite voices from antiquity, and Gruen’s “soundings” are taken almost exclusively from what we must call elite texts (on page 19, he acknowledges that literary texts may not have reached beyond their elite readerships). Next, contextualizing ethnic statements in the larger arguments in which they are embedded allows us to see that they are often fleeting and labile, serving the rhetorical needs of the moment (see page 132 on Cicero’s characterizations of Carthaginian character). Any “sounding,” therefore, must be treated with extreme caution, either as genuine evidence for ethnic prejudice or multicultural solidarity.

Notwithstanding these reservations, Gruen has produced an important book, impressive in its range, on a perennially timely question. Rethinking the Other in Antiquity will serve as a salutary corrective against the persistent scholarly tendency to see ancient Greeks, Romans, or Jews as unsavory, ethnocentrist chauvinists, helping us to replace that misguided notion with a much more nuanced and historically sensitive perspective.

CRAIGE B. CHAMPION
Syracuse University

KARL SHOEMAKER. Sanctuary and Crime in the Middle Ages, 400–1500. (Just Ideas: Transformative Ideals of Justice in Ethical and Political Thought.) New York: Fordham University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 269. $65.00.

Karl Shoemaker’s book fills an important gap in scholarly literature by tracing the institution of sanctuary from its early continental roots to its eventual abandonment in the early modern period, guiding the reader through sanctuary practices from late imperial Rome to the reign of Henry VIII. That such a broad overview finds room for the sort of anecdotal and narrative details that bring issues alive for a non-specialist reader is a tribute to the thorough research and meticulous planning brought to this volume.

Shoemaker begins his study in the late Roman Empire, presenting as a precursor to the concept of sanctuary Augustine’s belief that a sinner could redeem himself in the eyes of God and society by performing penance through priestly intercession. The “Ten Laws” attributed to Constantine—now known to be a forgery but accepted as genuine in the early Middle Ages—required a guilty person fleeing to a consecrated church to be defended. This privilege, however, was often denied to debtors and Jews, and—added in an edict of 398—the ever-felonious “purple dye fish collector” (p. 36). Shoemaker concludes that “Sanctuary drew on meanings embedded deeply in both ancient aristocratic and Christian traditions” (p. 43).

The turn to the incorporation of sanctuary into the early medieval sub-Roman territories presents the only weak point in Shoemaker’s narrative. As Daniella Fruscione has demonstrated in Das Asyl bei den germanischen Stämmen im frühen Mittelalter (2003), the concept of legal asylum was already present in Germanic tradition, facilitating the incorporation of Christian sanctuary into the laws of newly-converted territories. Although Shoemaker scatters references to such practices in pre-Christian Germanic territories, his account would be strengthened by beginning this chapter with a more focused discussion of the existing groundwork. As does Fruscione, he links sanctuary in post-Roman societies to the blood feud; the respite allowed settlement of the requirements of wergild. The institution also served a quasi-proselytizing function in admitting Jews only if they converted and the ever-belligerent Saxons only if they adopted the new religion of Christianity.

Shoemaker now moves to England; the primary focus of his study. In Anglo-Saxon England, resolution of offenses leading to sanctuary could be achieved by royal laws or by penance. Violation of sanctuary, concomitantly, came to be seen as a violation of the king’s protection, and at Canterbury also of the archbishop’s. Although hindsight views the Norman Conquest as a watershed, Shoemaker points out that “William claimed the English throne by right of succession, not sheer conquest” (p. 96). Continuity rather than change marked sanctuary law under the Normans: blood feud remained the primary context. This focus changed under Henry II, when abjuration of the realm by perpetrators of crimes replaced feud resolution as the primary purpose of sanctuary practice.

A new counterpart to sanctuary were chartered liberties, in which a person could live in peace, but also leave to conduct business. These refuges provided more permanent protection; concomitantly, they often sheltered offenders for prolonged periods, inspiring opposition that sounded the first knell for the demise of sanctuary.

In the thirteenth century, canon lawyers began to espouse punishment as a deterrent for future wrongdoing; a position that sanctuary law seemed to oppose. This approach moved to England by the end of the fourteenth century. Henry VIII’s secularization of sanctuary practice had nothing to do with his disagreements with the papacy: his purpose was to avoid abjuration, because he was afraid that Englishmen abroad were teaching military skills to the French. Despite his establishment of permanent sanctuaries in eight towns in England, the institution was near its end. “Once sanctuary was universally understood as an impediment to punishment and an invitation to further wrongdoing, the interest of authority in certain and exemplary punishment swept the field and the venerable privilege was no more" (p. 173).

There are few faults to find with this study. Substitution of "complimented" for "complemented" (p. 103) could have been solved by careful proof-reading. More concerning are issues of translation. Old English myndbyrde (p. 88) is simply copied from the source, resulting in a misuse of the dative case, and the use of "anyone" for "any" in a charter from Battle Abbey represents a literal rendition of the Latin that is ungrammatical in English (p. 103). A quotation from Pope Innocent III occurs in two different translations within the same paragraph, providing slightly different semantic scopes (p. 163). None of these details is germane to Shoemaker's discussion; nonetheless, readers who wish to pursue any specific instance of sanctuary law might be wise to consult again the primary source.

The overall narrative that Shoemaker has constructed of the rise and fall of sanctuary in England from its earliest roots on the continent to its demise under the Tudors is convincing and impressive. He provides an eminently readable account of an important historical institution, and I recommend it highly to both specialist and non-specialist readers.

LISI OLIVER

Louisiana State University

LYNDA L. COON. Dark Age Bodies: Gender and Monastic Practice in the Early Medieval West. (The Middle Ages Series.) Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 390. $65.00.

This is an investigation of the ideology of masculinity in early medieval Western monasticism. Except for one chapter on the Rule of Benedict, Lynda L. Coon concentrates on Carolingian monastic texts and architecture. The first and last chapter are on Hrabanus Maurus, abbot of Fulda (d. 856), as an exemplary monastic figure and a sophisticated biblical commentator. The chapters between discuss the eclectic nature of Carolingian culture, the commentaries on the Rule by Ardo Smaragdus and Hildemar, and the architecture of and hagiography produced in several great ninth-century abbeys, notably Fulda. Coon offers an analysis of monastic perceptions of the body through the prism of modern research on gender. In her epilogue, she concludes that "the bodies of Dark Age monks perform the opposition between the masculine and the feminine, the spiritual and the profane, the classical and the barbaric, and the saved and the damned. In doing so, monastic bodies make available to the historian of early medieval spirituality a wealth of material on the role played by gender in the Christianization of the early medieval West" (p. 253).

Coon's title reflects her view that early medieval churchmen perceived themselves as "consciously thwarting the uncivilized effects of the Dark Age" (p. 11). Carolingian monastic authors like Hrabanus or Hildemar tried to classicize an age they thought of as barbaric, not just by living ascetically but by adopting classical models of rhetoric (p. 11, n. 56). Monks were the heirs of Roman ideals of masculinity, including eloquence and self-control (constantia) (pp. 75, 125). A gendered monastic hierarchy was dominated by high-ranking adult males. These "voice men" with their "undefiled liturgical mouths" ranked highest, while the "body men" (boys, novices, excommunicates, and incompetent chanters) came last (p. 81). Accordingly, the inner precinct of the monastery, the claustrum, was the reserve of adult males who had achieved perfect self-mastery (p. 192).

Coon's reading of these major monastics is often refreshing, especially when she manages to escape from her self-imposed duty to "gender" everything in sight. Her comments on Hrabanus's exegeses are imaginative and her guided tour of the Plan of St. Gall, with its thorough survey of a vast body of German literature, is well worth taking. Yet this strength is also a weakness. "Gendering" her sources, Coon takes too many liberties. The Rule of Benedict and its ninth-century commentaries especially suffer from this treatment. For example, where Benedict stipulates that the abbot needs to distinguish between monks capable of understanding a verbal rebuke (honestiores) on the one hand, and the improbi who should be whipped on the other (RB 2.27–28), Coon reads this as an opposition between high-born literate monks and boys and lower-class monks (p. 95). She also assumes that Hildemar's commentary, written two centuries after the Rule of Benedict, maintained the same distinction (pp. 113–114), as did the Plan of St. Gall (p. 169). But Hildemar explicitly argued against any interpretation in terms of social status or learning: the improbi were monks, learned and otherwise, who, having resisted six successive attempts at verbal and corporeal correction, should be expelled—except those who had grown up in the monastery, for they should not be banished to a world they had never known. Pace Coon, most Carolingian monastic educators thought children should live at the heart of the claustrum, along with the "voice" who raised them. After all, these youngsters represented the future of the community.

Given her extensive bibliography Coon is aware of this, but she rarely engages with alternative views on her topic. Her priority seems to be her own gendering of the material at hand, arguing that boys and "body men" ranked lowest, because they were associated with female weakness. Ninth-century authors were more subtle, however. Brun Candidus did not think of St. Michael's crypt in Fulda as a "squat and dark" and therefore feminine space, as opposed to its light and masculine upper tier (p. 149). As Coon herself notes, to Candidus this crypt signified interiority. More in general, monastic self-mastery also entailed managing anger and violence, a problem as persistent in male communities as the control of sexuality. Finally, I see no evidence for ninth-century monastic authors perceiving themselves as cultural beacons in a sea of barbarism.

The notion of monks as the agents of a top-down process of civilization comes straight from nineteenth-century historiography, as does Coon's sharp divide between clergy and laity. As for gender, there is a wealth of recent work (e.g., by Janet L. Nelson, Pauline Stafford, Conrad Leyser, Albrecht Diem, and Rachel Stone) arguing that early medieval elite cultures were shaped by competing and interacting models of masculinity (and femininity)—monastic, secular, and otherwise. Coon has chosen to downplay such complexities, but underneath her at times modish rhetoric on Dark Age gender, there lurks an interesting and thought-provoking book.

MAYKE DE JONG
Utrecht University

RACHEL KOOPMANS. Wonderful to Relate: Miracle Stories and Miracle Collecting in High Medieval England. (The Middle Ages Series.) Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 337. $65.00.

This book sets out to challenge the idea that miracle collections were created to serve "the immediate political needs of monastic communities" (p. 2). It does so by asking why miracle collectors active in England between ca. 970 and ca. 1200 chose to gather accounts of miracles posthumously worked by saints and to write them up in Latin. Turning away from reception theory, Rachel Koopmans resists the trend for finding political dialogues between authors and imagined audiences concealed in hagiographical texts, preferring simpler, less speculative arguments based on what those authors say about their motives and what is known of their circumstances. Even if this approach seems to divorce text from context, it allows us to view these authors as agents with private concerns more powerful in shaping their work than the general anxieties of their age.

Chapter one contends that the living existence of any cult dwelt in its orality, not, as is often supposed, in its written Latin memorials. Colorful tales of the saints' miracles flitted around like butterflies, ever moving, ever changing; later some were processed, pinned in collectors' cases (in written collections), but these chloroformed specimens were merely a reminder of their living counterparts. Written records were not needed to sustain a cult. It is an argument that fits with John Blair's idea that obscure Anglo-Saxon cults could survive into later centuries solely on the strength of oral traditions.

Chapter two argues that the formulaic quality of Latin miracles, which scholars often take to reflect the editorial proclivities of learned authors processing raw information in accordance with literary conventions, was itself one product of orality; stories molded themselves to conventional templates before they were written down. In the grand scheme of the book, the opening chapters challenge our scholarly propensity to see text as a formative medium. In the case of miracle collections, the texts came not at the dawning of cults but at dusk, like Minerva's owl.

Chapter three examines England's first miracle collector, the French monk Lantfred, who made a compilation of miracles worked by the Winchester saint Swithun, ca. 980. Rejecting the argument that Lantfred did so to legitimize the reforms of the resident bishop, Æthelwold, Koopmans instead points to a tradition of miracle collecting at his home monastery of Fleury to explain Lantfred's interest in recording miracles for posterity. Here she overlooks a point that supports her case, for the only other miracle collector known in England at that time, the monk Abbo, who added some miracles to the end of his Passion of St. Edmund in the 980s, also came from Fleury.

Chapter four looks at the Flemish hagiographer Goscelin, who has long been regarded as a champion of English saints. From ca. 1080 to ca. 1100, he toured southern England and recorded the lives and miracles of many saints, supposedly—so the argument runs—to make them acceptable to Norman tastes. Koopmans rejects the idea that Goscelin envisaged such a project. Instead she explains his activity in terms of an endless quest for patronage and love of this genre. Indeed, he came from Saint-Bertin, where hagiography was appreciated as an art form.

Koopmans then contends that Goscelin started a trend; that until the 1090s, he was the only miracle collector in England; that others imitated his handiwork; and that Osbern (at Christ Church) was the first to do so. Here, the links in the chain are not so strong. Further work is needed before we can ascertain whether the genre revived through Goscelin's work or through Herman's at Bury St. Edmunds. (Koopmans, unfortunately, has been led astray by Antonia Gransden's misidentification of Herman as a certain Bertrann.) Leaving aside these matters of detail, the case for attributing the sudden burst of miracle collecting after the 1090s to the inspiration of individual initiatives is very attractive.

Osbern and Eadmer are the case studies in chapters five and six. Chapter seven argues for the late twelfth century what earlier chapters do for earlier periods, again rejecting the argument that miracle collections "were propagandistic texts aimed at the laity" (p. 131). Koopmans's most original research follows in chapters eight, nine, and ten. Here she focuses on the collectors of Thomas Becket's miracles, Benedict of Peterborough and William of Canterbury, redating the work of the former to the period 1171–1173. These last three chapters read well as a separate study, with their valuable appendices.

Koopmans's book, though bound to be controversial, is right to challenge the tendency to read politics and propaganda into texts primarily envisaged as devotional exercises. If anything, it lays insufficient stress on the religious impulse, which inspired miracle collectors to create these records for posterity, as testimony to the wonders God could work through the saints. Stylistically engaging and elegantly written, it proceeds with discernment from one sensible position to the next, always stimulating, ever sensitive to the human condition, and following all the best traditions of historical scholarship.

TOM LICENCE
University of East Anglia

LOUIS I. HAMILTON. A Sacred City: Consecrating Churches and Reforming Society in Eleventh-Century Italy. (Manchester Medieval Studies.) New York: Manchester University Press. 2010. Pp. xi, 272. £60.00.

Louis I. Hamilton's book provides us with a study of church dedication liturgies from the time of Pope Leo IX (1049–1054) to Pope Paschal II (1099–1118). Its chronological scope encompasses the investiture controversy, which played out in a period of demographic expansion, urban growth, communal formation, and a significant increase in church construction. Given the more frequent practice of dedication liturgies that resulted from church building, papal reformers rediscovered in dedication liturgies a form or paradigm for bringing order to the complicated and deeply contested world of eleventh-century Italy. Hamilton provides a thoughtful and interesting narrative of the process whereby men like Peter Damian, Anselm of Lucca, and Bruno of Segni learned to see with the rich symbolism of the liturgy, and to apply what they saw to the formidable tasks that confronted them as reformers.

Hamilton uses three organizing themes to tell this story: the symbolic significance of the liturgy; conflicts over the meaning and application of these symbols; and efforts of papal reformers to gain control of this symbolism in order to promote papal-centered ecclesiology. In chapter one, Hamilton develops the first theme by walking the reader through the rite step by step and offering helpful descriptions of its symbolism and its traditional interpretations. Against this background, he then examines local variations in the rite as evidenced in the manuscript traditions of the Carolingian Romano Germanic Pontifical and the Roman Pontifical, the two forms of the rite circulating in eleventh-century Italy (helpfully summarized in a detailed table at the end of the chapter). These variations demonstrate the fundamentally multivocal character of the rite's symbolism.

The rite's multivocality sets the background for the second major theme, which Hamilton introduces in chapter two. From an examination of fourteen dedications between 980 and 1116 (using mostly chronicle sources), he argues that dedication liturgies attracted a large and varied group of people. Moreover, Hamilton notes that while dedication ceremonies often served as occasions for conflict, the patterns of conflict defy the types of schematization for which historians like R. I. Moore have argued (i.e., elites/non-elites, lay/ecclesiastical, etc.). The liturgy was too symbolically rich and multivocal to lend itself to such functionalist categories.

Hamilton then turns to the book's central concern: the efforts of papal reformers to promote dedication liturgies as a means for asserting papal authority. In chapter three, Hamilton calls attention to an important development in these efforts as evidenced by a sermon preached by Peter Damian on the occasion of a dedication ceremony. Drawing upon I. S. Robinson's concept of "political allegory," Hamilton argues that Damian applied the liturgy's symbolism in novel ways—i.e., to the "political" struggle between reformers and lay magnates, who threatened the peace of the church. This stands in contrast to more traditional sermons that emphasized the liturgy's application to the moral life of the individual believer.

In chapter four, Hamilton examines the way in which Anselm of Lucca collected, edited, and organized materials concerning church dedications into his Collectio canonum, thereby codifying the very types of "political allegories" that Damian developed in his sermons. Here, Hamilton draws upon Eric Hobsbawm's concept of "inventing tradition." "By compiling selections from papal epistles, selections divorced from their original circumstances . . . Anselm attempted to create a tradition of papal authority over church dedications" (p. 122). Lest the concept of "inventing tradition" (an oxymoron?) lend itself to overly sinister connotations, Hamilton softens this characterization of Anselm later in the chapter. "In short, Anselm tapped into the powerful imagery and experience of the dedication in order to advance the reforming papacy" (p. 134). "Tapping into powerful imagery" sounds more like working within a tradition than inventing one.

In chapter five, Hamilton's narrative reaches its culmination with an examination of two commentaries by Bruno of Segni—De laudibus ecclesiae and De sacramentis ecclesiae—both of which address the dedication rite. Although Hamilton employs the political allegory motif here as well, he calls attention to the danger of anachronism inherent in the concept (i.e., imposing an overly sharp distinction between politics and morals). "In both cases, whether ruling a kingdom or bearing the Church, legitimate authority was rooted in the virtues . . . This chapter reveals how inextricable the critique of secular power is from Bruno's ecclesiology and from his ideals of personal morality. This observation exposes the weakness of the notion of a separate 'political' allegory in Bruno: there was no true boundary between political, biblical, moral or ecclesial within his thought" (pp. 182–183). It would seem that the same limitations would have to apply to Damian's use of political allegory as well.

Hamilton has given us a rich and detailed study of the role of dedication liturgies in medieval society. His compelling account of the ways in which this liturgy formed and inspired the thoughts and actions of church reformers offers a refreshing reminder of often neglected dimensions of human action.

DAVID FOOTE
University of St. Thomas

DAMIAN J. SMITH. Crusade, Heresy and Inquisition in the Lands of the Crown of Aragon (c. 1167–1276). (The Medieval and Early Modern Iberian World, number 39.) Boston: Brill. 2010. Pp. xii, 249. $138.00.

This welcome monograph goes a long way toward filling some serious gaps in the otherwise burgeoning historiographies of its subjects—both regional (the east-Iberian Crown of Aragon) and thematic (crusade, heresy, and inquisition). The fact that King Peter of Aragon died fighting French crusaders just months after his own crusading triumph against the Almohads at Las Navas de Tolosa (1212) is a well-known irony. Peter's son James, for his part, went on to enjoy a lengthy career as an anti-Islamic crusader and opponent of heresies who nevertheless had few scruples about fighting alongside Cathar sympathizers as the need arose, or cutting out his Dominican confessor's tongue when displeased. Damian J. Smith's careful, nuanced, and well-documented study sheds light on the intricacies of local religio-political conditions underlying such seemingly contradictory aspects of high medieval life in a complex and fragmented land.

Two initial chapters examine how episodes of the Albigensian crusade fit into wider patterns of long-term local and international conflict, with implications beyond the borders of Languedoc. The lead-up to Peter's defeat at Muret and his son's subsequent loss of control over much of the Midi (sealed by the 1258 Treaty of Corbeil) are thus explained within a context reaching back to Roman times. Smith's analysis does not extend much beyond the immediate Franco-Aragonese context whose intricacies he knows best, however, and his account is most comprehensive for the period around the turn of the thirteenth century. The earlier period remains somewhat obscure due to a comparative lack of sources, and by the later decades of the thirteenth century events in the expanded crown become too complex to permit the level of detail Smith achieves for Peter's reign, James's minority, and the 1198–1216 pontificate of Innocent III (on which he has previously published). Nevertheless this is a most helpful presentation of what can at times be a vexedly confusing political scene, shifting as it did from year to year, castle to castle, and from one valley to the next.

In two subsequent chapters Smith turns to the topic of spiritual heterodoxy. His main concern is to establish that there really were communities of heretics in parts of Aragon-Catalonia and not just in Languedoc; such an assertion hinges for the early period on acceptance of problematic sources such as the Charte de Niquinta. After laying out problems of interpretation surrounding this unique (and potentially late and/or forged) description of a 1167 heretics' council at Saint Félix de Caraman, Smith cautiously opts to follow Bernard Hamilton rather than skeptics like Mark Gregory Pegg in accepting it for the most part at face value. Along with later ecclesiastical documents, polemics by figures such as Lucas de Tuy or Durán de Huesca, and some scattered inquisitorial testimony, this allows him to conclude that there were indeed significant numbers of Cathars and above all Waldensians active in parts of the Crown. A final chapter on "Inquisitions in the Crown of Aragon" tracks the evolution of royal and ecclesiastical legislation drafted to confront this apparent problem, with short sections on the actual practitioners of inquisition (chiefly Ramon de Penyafort) and their victims.

Smith's greatest achievement is his skilled presentation of previous Spanish, French, and above all Catalan scholarship that has been too often ignored by anglophone researchers. The important personalities and events involved in years of inquisitorial persecution at Urgell, for example, are well explained here with frequent reference to the work of Cebrià Baraut and Carme Batlle—for the most part only available in the specialized local journal Urgellia. Focus and depth of knowledge also result in Smith's making few concessions to a non-specialist readership, however. Translations are eschewed in favour of original-language editions, to the extent that even the author's own version of King James's Book of Deeds is omitted. Smith is clearly aware of anglophone scholarship in his field, and it is cited when necessary, but situating his analysis within that historiographical milieu is not his chief concern.

The book is thus marked by a certain narrowness at times. Its grasp is surest when dealing with the heartlands of the crown's Provençal, Aragonese, and Catalan territories, with only passing attention given to local developments in newly conquered regions such as Mallorca or Valencia. And it is really most concerned with internal power struggles among Christian elites; the lives of more modest heretics hauled before the inquisitors briefly emerge when sources allow, but there is little to be found here about crusades or other persecutory approaches to Muslims and Jews. Still, within the limits he has set himself Smith has done a great service by bringing specialized research on the Crown of Aragon more fully into dialogue with the fields of crusade, heresy, and inquisition studies. His efforts will undoubtedly help others to better explore the many questions that remain.

ROBIN VOSE
St. Thomas University

JESÚS D. RODRÍGUEZ-VELASCO. Order and Chivalry: Knighthood and Citizenship in Late Medieval Castile. Translated by EUNICE RODRÍGUEZ FERGUSON. (The Middle Ages Series.) Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2010. Pp. 292. $65.00.

Though a stranger to Iberia, the great military historian of the fourteenth century, Jean Froissart, accepted the words of European knights who had crossed the Pyrenees to ply their martial trade and declared that the Christian kingdoms of Spain were thoroughly ignorant of chivalry. The work of modern Spanish and American scholars, such as Jesús D. Rodríguez-Velasco and Noel Fallows, has seriously challenged this argument and redefined the role of chivalry in late medieval Iberia. Fully accepting chivalry's existence in Castile-León, the Crown of Aragon, and Portugal during the last centuries of the Middle Ages, they have moved beyond traditionally defined intellectual limits to investigate chivalry's effect on the construction of modern state structures within premodern Iberia.

In this work, Rodríguez-Velasco traces the sociological influence of chivalry through an examination of one of Iberia's great warrior-kings, Alfonso XI (r.1312–1350). The author explores the relationship of the monarch to his subjects by analyzing the “indissoluble natural bond” between the king and an order (ordo) of knights who swore both allegiance and subordination through knighthood under the auspices of the monarch himself. In order to explain this “dialectic between dependence and independence,” Rodríguez-Velasco assesses a number of thirteenth-century works including those of Alfonso X of Castile (r.1252–1284), Ramon Llull, and Juan Manuel.

Rodríguez-Velasco extends his investigations of the effect chivalry had on medieval Spain's urban sector and investigates the Cuaderno de la Hermandad (1315), which was designed to establish a brotherhood of non-noble knights who lived in Castile's cities. This work, which describes Alfonso XI's attempt to fully establish control over urban centers, initiated the process of transforming urban residents into true citizens. Rodríguez-Velasco focuses on Burgos, the capital of León-Castile, and explains how this process took place and traces the unintended consequences that accompanied it. In this section, he directs his gaze on the principal confraternities of the second half of the fourteenth century, those of Santa María de Gamonal and Santiago. He paints a vivid picture of the operations of such knightly brotherhoods within Burgos and evaluates the institutional foundations of these two bodies by assessing how they changed over time. Though they carried out Alfonso XI's original intentions for them, they also exceeded them by propelling their members into the ranks of Castile's nobility.

Rodríguez-Velasco then analyzes the chivalric Orden de la Banda. Reviewing the Libro de la Banda and various regulatory ordinances of the new organization, he makes an interesting claim that Alfonso XI founded the Orden more to expand his own sovereignty than to improve chivalric behavior. The king's actions sought to advance the prestige of his middling court nobles, the mesnaderos, over the old baronial families who considered themselves his equals. Despite the king's specific aims in regard to the Orden, his successors, Pedro I (r.1350–1369) and Juan I (r.1379–1390), took the institution in quite a different direction and solidified the position of the Castilian barony while preventing middling nobles from gaining access to these upper rungs of society.

In his last chapter, Rodríguez-Velasco studies the insignia of Castile's bourgeois knights as well as those of the members of the Orden. Studying the heraldic markers of these groups, he concludes that these important coats-of-arms were fashioned through the merging of Castilian royal emblems with those of both baronial and middling noble families, all of whom served in the new chivalric orders. These insignia also portray the fascinating metamorphosis of Castile's nobility during the fourteenth century.

Rodríguez-Velasco's accomplished and massive study makes use of a variety of literary and organizational documents from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries and effectively establishes the social and institutional genealogy of the Castilian aristocracy on the verge of Spain's Golden Age. While setting the stage for the disastrous conflict of the early sixteenth century, the Comunero Revolt, this book also points unerringly to modern Spain's first literary masterpiece, Don Quijote de la Mancha, in which Miguel Cervantes held up to gentle ridicule the chivalric establishment of the later Middle Ages.

Despite its occasionally impenetrable style, this work is well worth the effort for medievalists and Hispanists alike, and is an essential addition to the literature of their fields.

DONALD J. KAGAY
Albany State University

KIRSTEN A. FUDEMAN. Vernacular Voices: Language and Identity in Medieval French Jewish Communities. (Jewish Culture and Contexts.) Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2010. Pp. xi, 254. $59.95.

Focusing on a small but suggestive group of Hebraico-French texts from the twelfth through fourteenth centuries, Kirsten A. Fudeman has produced a fascinating work that sheds new light on the culture of northern French Jewry. Her inquiry focuses on two questions: to what extent did French Jews, who spoke the vernacular of the communities in which they lived, develop a separate linguistic identity from their Christian neighbors, and how does their use of language inform us about their identity (p. 151)? Although learned Christians in medieval France were familiar with Latin, Latinity among Jews was quite limited (pp. 14–18). Indeed, this may be the leading reason why Jews were often aware of Christian intellectual values and methods that could be transmitted through everyday conversation but were virtually unaware of the contents of Christian legal and theological writings, even those that were central in the twelfth-century renaissance and beyond.

The written language of Jewish scholarship in northern France was Hebrew, along with an Aramaic component. Translations of liturgical or biblical texts for less learned Jews employed forms of the vernacular. As Fudeman demonstrates, French biblical commentators such as Joseph Kara wove French into their commentaries in a sophisticated way, a technique that can also be found in important liturgical and rabbinic works of this period such as Mahzor Vitry. Fudeman characterizes this kind of alternation between Hebrew and French as “code-switching,” which signals that these writers (and their readers) belonged simultaneously to two linguistic communities (pp. 45–47, 55–59). In chapter two, Fudeman treats several Hebrew texts related to the martyrdom at Blois in 1171. She deftly highlights differences in the ways that women and men expressed themselves, and offers an assessment of one of the records of this incident that suggests that even when Jews appeared to place their trust in Christian authorities, their suspicions were nonetheless aroused. This emerges from an understanding of the subtleties of the reformatting of the conversations between Jews and Christians (that took place in French) into a formalized Hebrew record.

Fudeman moves next to pin down the relationship between Hebrew and French in the written texts produced by French Jewry. Marshaling an impressive array of magical texts and recipes (such as those used to “open the heart,” petihat ha-lev, in order to understand and retain Torah studies), ritual phrases from a halisah ceremony, glosses to biblical texts, and medicinal cures, her conclusion is that a Jewish literary tradition in French never fully came into being (p. 123). With few exceptions, the (Old) French texts that were produced in Hebrew letters remained bound to their larger Hebrew contexts. In the final chapter, she discusses two Hebrew-French wedding songs that were performed in both languages. The Hebrew portions contain aspects of Jewish learning and literature, and are similar to other Jewish wedding poems. The French portions, however, reflect vernacular cultural influences. In the tradition of medieval French romance, the bridegroom is portrayed as a knight or warrior while the bride is portrayed as a maiden and as a castle or palace garden. These poems combine a strong presentation in Hebrew, which only the more learned fully understood, with a French dimension that all those present could understand. Fudeman notes that the French portions also served to underscore the legitimacy of the Jews’ place within the larger culture of France, in the eyes of the Jews themselves if not in the eyes of the Christians (p. 150).

Scholars of medieval European linguistics will undoubtedly admire this book; the author’s complete mastery is evident from beginning to end. Substantive possibilities also emerge for further study by intellectual and social historians. The most important literary product of the rabbinic elite in northern France, the Tosafot comments and glosses to the Talmud, were composed in a Hebrew-Aramaic mélange that is often disjointed. The regnant approach maintains that these texts reflect a series of accretions or layers. The editing or redaction process led to the pressing together of disparate formulations of rabbinic discourse and analysis that represent the work of multiple teachers over the course of several generations, resulting in structural and syntactical difficulties. Based on Fudeman’s pioneering work, it is possible to suggest that while the language of instruction in the study hall was some combination of French and Hebrew, the bringing together (and transposition) of these oral discussions into a more formal kind of Hebrew (and Aramaic) contributed to the linguistic and stylistic anomalies. Recent research has analyzed stories and tales written by or of interest to Jews that reflect the literary works and ideas being consumed on a more popular level. Fudeman’s work provides an entirely new avenue along which to look for additional resources.

Vernacular Voices presents a bevy of fresh perspectives and cutting-edge methodological tools. Anyone with an interest in medieval Jewish studies ought to read this book carefully. It tells a wonderful story that is beautifully narrated and illustrated.

EPHRAIM KANARFOGEL
Yeshiva University

JANE ALDEN. Songs, Scribes, and Society: The History and Reception of the Loire Valley Chansonniers. (The New Cultural History of Music.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2010. Pp. xxi, 283. $45.00.

This book, a study by Jane Alden of a handful of fifteenth-century songbooks known as the Loire Chansonniers, is a welcome addition to the existing literature on the topic. Despite some occasional pandering to fashionable terminology, Alden’s monograph moves ahead the considerable body of existing research on the fifteenth-century French chanson by making some interesting proposals about songbook production. Not surprisingly, these owe their greatest debt not to the “new philology” mentioned in the introduction (pp. 5–6), but to some of the oldest research in historical musicology—from the foundational histories of Edmond de Coussemaker (mentioned on pp. 21–23) to the biographic excavations of the twentieth century. In this latter area, Alden’s fifth and longest chapter provides a genuinely new twist, since her biographies relate not to musical pieces, as is traditionally the case, but to the books that transmit them.

Arguing for the importance of studying books as physical objects, Alden focuses on two in particular: the Laborde Chansonnier and the Dijon Chansonnier. Her analysis proper opens with a chapter entitled “the material objects,” mainly a retelling, gathering-by-gathering, of the Loire manuscripts’ creation and the work of their most prolific writer, the so-called Dijon Scribe; incidentally, references to Albert Derolez’s standard study, Codicologie des manuscrits en écriture humanistique sur parchemin (1984), are missing from the discussion of ruling patterns (pp. 73–77). A close comparison of these chansonniers’ contents makes clear that the Dijon Scribe’s manner of copying differed from book to book. The next chapter compares song concordances and questions some of the accepted chronology of the Loire Chansonniers (pp. 109–136). By positing a slightly earlier date for the Laborde Chansonnier, Alden places this book as the first in the sequence of five, rather than the Nivelles Chansonnier. In her next chapter, Alden reviews the compilation process of songbooks. Having raised the issue of how extant books were planned (p. 148), she engages in an important discussion of lost exemplars that were either bifolia or individual gatherings (quaternions), speculating innovatively on how individual voices were laid out in these (pp. 152–158). This excellent chapter on the Dijon Scribe as both notator and curator could have profited from a comparison with medieval precedents, as covered in Margot E. Fassler's essay, "The Office of the Cantor in Early Western Monastic Rules and Customaries: A Preliminary Investigation," in Early Music History 5 (1985): 29–51. A final chapter elaborates on the commissioning of the Loire Chansonniers, highlighting the role of Étienne Petit II and Adam Fumée I, and concludes with close readings of several songs (pp. 210–241). Here, as elsewhere in the book, the author overstates the uniqueness of the Loire Chansonniers (pp. 138, 168, 184). Indeed, the creation of handsome songbooks—"the earliest . . . deluxe musical collections" (p. 65), beautifully illuminated and laid out, intricately organized as whole codices, and intended as symbols of their particular commissioner's social standing—goes back over three centuries to the lost chansonniers of Anglo-Norman kings.

The third in Oxford University Press's "New Cultural History of Music" series, Songs, Scribes, and Society occasionally makes claims for newness that seem more dressing than substance. As Alden acknowledges, the presumed newness of the much-cited "new philology" she invokes in her introduction has been questioned (p. 6), and for good reason, since the study of the make-up of books was fundamental to the now vilified critical study of texts. Textual criticism was, and continues to be under its various new guises (codicology, "new philology," material culture, and so on), not just the quest for an original "Ur-text," as too often maintained (p. 138), but the study of sources, both extant and lost, in all their complexity. Much of Alden's book, as described in the previous paragraph, flows directly from source studies and musicological research of the last two centuries. Newer, perhaps, is her first chapter covering the life and activities of late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century bibliophiles working on the Loire Chansonniers. Yet despite its series of interesting biographical vignettes, the gist of the chapter—nationalistic researchers misconstruing medieval pieces as popular "songs of the people" (p. 46) and misjudging manuscripts' individual characteristics—is unfortunately not integrated into the rest of the book.

Such negligible reservations aside, Alden's fine monograph presents important conclusions that future research on the fifteenth-century chanson will not be able to sidestep. Beyond the substantial documentary evidence provided in the book, Oxford University Press offers additional material on a companion website devoted to Songs, Scribes, and Society: three appendices (codicological descriptions, a synoptic table of contents, and gathering diagrams for all five chansonniers) and some forty supplementary color images.

JOHN HAINES

University of Toronto

JUSTIN K. STEARNS. Infectious Ideas: Contagion in Pre-modern Islamic and Christian Thought in the Western Mediterranean. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2011. Pp. xx, 279. $60.00.

Justin K. Stearns has produced a work on plague in the Islamic world that is unique in its scope and a boon to students of the Second Plague Pandemic and medical history more generally. Before the pioneering publications of Lawrence I. Conrad and, more pointedly, Michael W. Dols in the 1970s and 1980s, the subject remained terra incognita to anglophone and other students of the Black Death. More recent studies, such as Stuart J. Borsch's 2005 comparative analysis of plague-era Ottoman Egypt and England, the 2008 University of Chicago unpublished dissertation on plague in the early modern Ottoman Empire by Nükhet Varlik, and Miri Shefer-Mossensohn's Ottoman Medicine: Healing and Medical Institutions, 1500–1700 (2009), have built upon and challenged much of the earlier work, which can only add texture and detail to our understanding of medieval and early modern reactions to plague outside of Christian Europe.

Stearns's contribution concentrates on the late medieval western Mediterranean, Andalusia in particular, but it draws on traditions rooted in Muhammad's life and teachings and developed over the intervening centuries. Muhammad lived in the age of the First Plague Pandemic, and the hadith record two seemingly dispositive statements: neither enter nor leave a plague-stricken area, and there is no contagion. At first glance, the former seems like sound advice for the sake of public health. The latter clearly reflects the Muslim theological position that God controls all that happens, including the contracting of disease, which precludes any seemingly random act such as "catching" it from another more or less randomly. It seemed clear to earlier scholars that accepting the pair of dicta at face value could—and did—lead to a fatalism and quiescence that characterized Ottoman and other Islamic reactions to the Black Death.

By carefully unpacking both the medical and theological literature from 1348 to the eighteenth century, Stearns discloses the active dialogue between the men of religion and those who treated the sick and dying. As he builds his picture, it becomes clear that what was at stake was the integrity of an interlocking set of core Islamic beliefs, including the will and power of God, causality in this world, and the existence or illusion of human free will. Both more and less than a text on medical history, Infectious Ideas is a study of intellectual foundations and currents coursed by physicians, philosophers, and religious teachers. Islam was far from monolithic, and differences, ranging from subtle nuances to incompatibilities, distinguished theological and juridical conclusions as they did strictly medical advice. Many of these Stearns articulates and compares with skill and clarity, concluding that the religious protection of God's omnipotence trumped the appearance of contagion, though some acceptance of Christian public health measures did appear before the nineteenth century.

Although predominantly occupied with Muslims "constructing the significance of the disease" (p. 2), Stearns adds a dimension by outlining some of the contemporary Iberian Christian discussions of the same questions. Rightly assuming that Islamic scholarship and medicine did not develop in a vacuum, in his second chapter he discusses the pre-Black Death figures Isidore of Seville, Beato of Liébana, Alphonso X, and the fiery Vincent Ferrer. Stearns concludes that Christians clearly believed in contagion, but that most discussion of it revolved around the “diseases” of sin and heresy. As in most other matters, Muslims had little to learn from those to whom Islam was the disease in need of cure. In his fourth chapter, Stearns comes closer to the mark in his discussion of biological contagion among late medieval Christian men of medicine. He correctly notes that they were content to hold multiple conceptions of disease origin and transmission, sometimes weaving them into semi-coherent systems that began with God and ended with poisoned organs. Christian Europe indeed had a multivalent understanding of plague and its transmissibility, which contrasted with the Muslim attempt to square the circle. One can see from his brief discussion why the Christian relative openness to “seedlets,” “animalcules,” “fomites,” and other invisible but natural means of transmission would lead to coping mechanisms such as isolation of the sick and quarantining of the suspected.

Infectious Ideas is thus a welcome addition to the growing literature on plague—and medical thought—in the premodern Islamic world. Stearns’s translations add new voices to those already known, and approach known figures with subtlety and nuance, challenging or at least refining the conclusions of the established scholarship. Though I am not in a position to judge the validity of his theological interpretations, they are complementary to rather than critical of current research. Stearns has provided future students commanding the requisite skills and depth of vision both a model and a solid target.

JOSEPH P. BYRNE
Belmont University

JONATHAN HARRIS. The End of Byzantium. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2010. Pp. xxii, 298. $40.00.

Consciously or unconsciously, Jonathan Harris’s book echoes one published more than thirty years ago: Donald M. Nicol’s The End of the Byzantine Empire (1979). Two books with almost the same title could hardly be more different, for whereas Nicol covers the last three hundred years of Byzantine history in just 112 pages, Harris covers the last half century in close to 300, including nineteen pages of notes. Yet Harris is writing in the same line of historiography as Nicol and, before him, Steven Runciman: a particularly British tradition of narrating late Byzantine history, especially its dramatic climax, as a stirring story of people and events. Runciman produced a popular history of the fall of Constantinople, and Nicol wrote a biography of the last Byzantine emperor, Constantine XI Palaiologos. The End of Byzantium is a worthy successor to both books and indeed supersedes them as an introduction to the empire in its final hour.

The story is a poignant and gripping one of how the tiny, fragmented Byzantine state, on the point of being strangled by the expanding Ottoman sultanate, made use of the breathing space it was given in 1402 when Timur defeated and executed Sultan Bayezid. For the next fifty years, three emperors of the Palaiologos dynasty—Manuel II and his sons John VIII and Constantine XI—performed an incredible and ultimately unsustainable balancing act. They had to placate the reigning sultan, on whose goodwill they ultimately depended for their political survival, while doing all they could to weaken his power by fomenting rivalries within his family. They had to build up their defenses and their territorial resources in the Peloponnese at the risk of provoking the aggression they were preparing to resist. Their communications, supply lines, finances, and naval defense depended on the Italian maritime republics of Venice and Genoa, which in addition to being commercial rivals were desperate not to offend the sultan in whose ports they traded. The empire’s only hope of breaking its dependency on the sultan lay in forming alliances in Western Europe that would deliver military assistance in the form of a crusade, but, in addition to antagonizing the sultan, this policy threatened dependence of another kind: submission to the Roman papacy, widely hated among the Byzantine church and people for its perceived past role in encouraging Latin violence against the Greeks. In all of this delicate maneuvering, the last Palaiologan emperors constantly risked being thrown off balance by the non-cooperation, or worse, of their closest relatives, who attracted the internal opposition to imperial policies. It did not always help that some of the leading members of the emperor’s court were in close contact with the sultan’s entourage and possessed bank accounts as well as citizenship rights in Venice and Genoa. The emperors faced a constant choice between high-risk and low-risk investment strategies. John VIII tended to go for the high-risk option. In 1422 his choice was almost fatal when Murad II laid siege to Constantinople. In the years after 1439 the gamble of church union, negotiated and proclaimed at the Council of Florence-Ferrara, seemed to pay off when the pope preached a new crusade. However, the crushing defeat of the large crusading army at Varna in 1444 left no alternative but to return to an accommodation with the sultan that Murad’s son and successor Mehmet II saw no point in maintaining.

The complex story of this last-ditch survival effort, its final dénouement in 1453, and the aftermath of lingering Byzantine resistance in the Peloponnese has been told often, but Harris retells it well, without sacrificing historical accuracy to cinematic effect. He explains the unfamiliar without dumbing-down and lets the players speak for themselves while maintaining a critical distance from his sources. Although he tells the tale from the Byzantine point of view, he avoids the nationalistic and religious value judgments that tend to go with it. In addition to providing a readable and judicious distillation of previous scholarship, he makes two original contributions. He places the political infighting of the Palaiologan dynasty in its fifteenth-century context, thereby correcting the censorious attitude of modern historians to what seems to be a selfish betrayal of the "national" cause. Harris also illustrates Byzantine relations with the West from his own research into Greeks in fifteenth-century England. What is missing from his colorful canvas of individuals and events is a sense of collective identities and interactions. What were the groups, institutions, and cultural codes that characterized Byzantium at its end? How did Byzantium in the fifteenth century differ from other contemporary states and societies, and from its own past? Readers who are interested in these questions may be referred to another recent publication, Tonia Kioussopoulou's Emperor or Manager: Power and Political Ideology in Byzantium before 1453 (2011).

PAUL MAGDALINO
Koç University,
Istanbul

EUROPE: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN

ROBERT GOULDING. Defending Hypatia: Ramus, Savile, and the Renaissance Rediscovery of Mathematical History. (Archimedes: New Studies in the History and Philosophy of Science and Technology, number 25.) New York: Springer. 2010. Pp. xx, 201. $99.95.

Perhaps the greatest accomplishment of Robert Goulding's book is that it rescues from oblivion an intellectual tradition that was of considerable importance in its own time, but has been largely forgotten since: Renaissance histories of mathematics. This in itself is a significant contribution to Renaissance studies, given that humanists of the period famously elevated grammar, rhetoric, and history far above the disciplines of mathematics and the natural sciences. Despite this, as Goulding demonstrates, numerous leading scholars of the period devoted a great deal of time and effort to mathematics, if not to expanding its boundaries then to establishing its past. Not only the oft-cited Federico Commandino and Bernardino Baldi but also Polydore Vergil, Girolamo Cardano, and Philipp Melanchthon contributed accounts of the history of mathematics, as well as the book's two protagonists—Peter Ramus and Henry Savile. Taken collectively they form an impressive tradition that left its mark on contemporary humanism, as well as on later scholarship.

Goulding begins with a survey of the main sources, both ancient and modern, used by Renaissance historians of mathematics. These include Proclus, the fifth-century Platonist who remains the most reliable source for the history of ancient mathematics, but also more surprising authors. Diodorus Siculus, for example, who attributed the origins of geometry to Egyptian priests, and Josephus, who in his Jewish Antiquities traced mathematics back to Adam, Abraham, and Moses, were widely accepted as equal and often superior authorities to Proclus. This is an uneven collection of sources and accounts for some of the glaring errors of Renaissance historiography of mathematics. But as Goulding points out, humanists did not study the history of mathematics for its own sake, but rather as a rhetorical tool in fierce debates over the proper organization of knowledge and its relation to practice, the role of the universities, and even the proper reading of Scripture.

For no one was this truer than for Ramus, who awarded mathematics pride of place in his efforts to reform the scholastic curriculum at the University of Paris. Mathematics, Ramus claimed, was pure unadulterated logic, natural to the human mind as well as embedded in the very structure of the physical world. Accordingly, mathematics was the foundation of all the arts, but whereas other fields of learning had been corrupted by human artifice, mathematics had not. True mathematics, Ramus believed, permeates the daily lives and discourse of common people, from simple vineyard workers to merchants and architects, and all that needs to be done is collect it and arrange it in proper logical order. Euclid, who in his Elements did precisely that, was therefore the greatest mathematician of all. To support this conception Ramus happily relied on the most ancient genealogies of mathematics, which traced it, little changed, from the Hebrews to the Egyptians and the Greeks.

Ramus, however, was no expert mathematician, and his view of mathematics as simple natural reason did not survive his first sustained efforts in the field. Much to his surprise, Goulding reports, Ramus discovered that mathematics was hard—not at all what one would expect of a discipline that was supposedly natural to the human mind. To defend his core beliefs, Ramus now recast the history of mathematics: natural and intuitive in its origins, mathematics was later corrupted by Greek scholars who made it into an abstract and insular discipline. Euclid, chief hero in the old narrative, was now the chief villain: his Elements, with its counter-intuitive structure and convoluted proofs, was largely responsible for the decline of mathematics. The way forward for mathematics and its dependent arts required clearing the corruptions of millennia and returning to the simple and practical mathematics of the days before Euclid.

Ramus's iconoclastic account came under attack from many quarters, but few of his critics were as systematic and thorough as the Englishman Savile. Like Ramus, Savile sought to reform mathematical teaching at the University of Oxford, which was in an even sadder state than it was in Paris. But unlike Ramus, the core of the curriculum in Savile's scheme remained Euclid, whose Elements, Savile wrote, was akin to a perfect and beautiful human body. Ramus's effort to discredit the text and assign it to numerous authors was reminiscent of the fate of the beautiful mathematician Hypatia, who was torn limb from limb by a bloodthirsty mob. As Goulding shows, Ramus and Savile stood for two opposing conceptions of mathematics and its educational role, each complete with its own historical narrative.

By far the most intriguing part of the book is contained in passing references to the religious significance of mathematics and its history. Ramus's conversion from a positive to a negative view of the Greek mathematical tradition, Goulding notes, closely paralleled his religious conversion from Roman Catholic to Protestant. Surely it is no coincidence that Catholic Ramus's praise for tradition, and acclaimed authorities like Euclid who handed down true knowledge through the generations, was replaced by Protestant Ramus's call for a return to an unadulterated original purity. The connection between mathematics and faith becomes even more suggestive if we consider that in the same years Christopher Clavius was laying the foundations for the great Jesuit mathematical school, famous for its close and fierce adherence to Euclid. This suggests that the stakes in the debates over mathematics and its history went well beyond questions of the reform of the universities and straight to the heart of the religious divisions that were tearing apart Western Christendom. One would have liked to hear much more about this, but even as it stands the book provides intriguing clues on the interrelationship of mathematics and faith at a time of religious struggle.

Defending Hypatia is a book of meticulous scholarship, based on a close reading of difficult and—in some cases—largely forgotten texts. Goulding does a commendable job of tracing the complex relationships among them. Indeed, he exhibits a natural affinity to the scholars he studies, engaging with relish in the humanist practices of textual recovery and criticism. The end result is a study of relatively narrow focus but impressive depth, which can serve as a starting point for a broader study of the place of mathematics in the religious and cultural life of the Renaissance.

AMIR ALEXANDER
University of California,
Los Angeles

BERNARD BOURDIN. The Theological-Political Origins of the Modern State: The Controversy between James I of England and Cardinal Bellarmine. Translated by SUSAN PICKFORD. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press. 2010. Pp. vii, 282. $59.95.

Originally published in French in 2004 under the title La Genèse théologico-politique de l'État moderne, Bernard Bourdin's study of early modern political theology takes as its point of departure the controversy that erupted in the aftermath of the Gunpowder Plot. During the period 1606–1610, King James I of England engaged Cardinal Robert Bellarmine in a wide-ranging, no-holds-barred controversy stemming from the issue of the loyalty owed by Roman Catholic subjects to their sovereign. A great deal of ink was spilled on both sides addressing questions concerning the source of princely power, the constitutional authority of natural law, the “two kingdoms” of spiritual and temporal rule, the distinction between a visible and an invisible church, the relative merits of royal versus papal ecclesiastical supremacy, as well as the definition of catholicity and possible grounds for religious toleration. Bourdin situates his inquiry with particular reference to two conflicting accounts of the secularization thesis by German scholars: Carl Schmitt's Politische Theologie (1922) and Hans Blumenberg's Die Legitimität der Neuzeit (1966). In order to buttress his strong affirmation of the theological sources of modernity Bourdin interacts extensively with scholarship of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries—indeed on this particular theme one is not in the least surprised to find oneself in the company of S. R. Gardiner, Henri-Xavier Arquillière, John Neville Figgis, Ernst H. Kantorowicz, and Francis Oakley. Bourdin's book is a vigorous foray into a theme of longstanding interest among scholars of early modernity, and unabashedly reasserts the derivation of modern concepts of sovereignty and liberty from profoundly theological presuppositions: clearly Schmitt rules here. Throughout the monograph there is a strain of implicit agreement with recent revisionist historiography of “re-enchantment” such as one finds, for example, among the historians of the so-called “Long Reformation” with their dismissal of the anachronism of the secularization thesis, or in Charles Taylor's argument in A Secular Age (2007).

Bourdin's monograph consists of six chapters. The first three set the stage with a survey of the theological implications of the Henrician and Elizabethan claims to royal headship of the Church of England, an account of James's encounter with Presbyterian resistance, and an exploration of the distinctively irenic streak of his ecclesiastical policy. The later chapters explore Bellarmine's political ecclesiology in light of papal claims to indirect temporal jurisdiction, James's hermeneutics of scripture in his Trew Law of Free Monarchies (1598), and their sharp controversy over the conflicting claims of royal and papal authority in the Apologie for the Oath of Allegiance (1608). Bourdin traces an interesting parallel and contrast between the responses of “Puritan Jesuits” and “Gallican royalists.” There are a few slips of diction and typography, some no doubt owing to the vagaries of translation. Reference is made to a “conciliatory” form of church government where the sense of the passage plainly demands “conciliar,” and to the “Episcopal Church” where “episcopacy,” in the Scottish context, would be considerably less anachronistic; the outmoded and imprecise term “Anglican” is employed throughout the discussion of Tudor church politics; the claim that both Adam Blackwood and William Barclay “became French” is slightly jarring when their shift of allegiance to another sovereign is clearly the event in question. At one point the author confuses William Cecil with his son Robert (p. 54). This reviewer is obliged to admit to being somewhat disconcerted by the discovery that half of a chapter devoted to describing the political theology of Richard Hooker consists largely of a summary of a portion of the argument of the his own monograph, Richard Hooker's Doctrine of the Royal Supremacy (1990), which links Hooker's defense of the royal headship of the English Church with his christological, trinitarian, soteriological, and ecclesiological presuppositions. Numerous selected quotations from the works of Hooker, Archbishop John Whitgift, and the Disciplinarian Puritan Thomas Cartwright—some twenty in number—are, without exception, quoted verbatim from this monograph without acknowledgement of their source in the notes.

This complaint aside, Bourdin's study is stimulating and interesting, and curiously timely for all its close attention to scholarly debates of generations past. Perhaps historiography, rather like Friedrich Nietzsche's account of history itself, is subject to some deep pattern of eternal recurrence. The current vigorous debate among historians of early modernity concerning the secularization thesis—"enchantment" versus "disenchantment"—certainly raises once again some of the foundational questions concerning the origins of modern political theory. According to participants in this early seventeenth-century debate about the loyalty oath, one man's secularization of ecclesiastical authority is another's sacralization of the civil power. When viewed through the lens either of recent challenges to the Weberian thesis among historians of the Reformation both in England (Alexandra Walsham) and on the continent (Jonathan Clark), or of an inversion of traditional readings of the Counter-Reformation in favor of a Catholic contribution toward a secularized modernity, any serious attempt to re-engage with the profoundly theological substance of two such eminent early modern political theorists as James and Bellarmine can only be greeted with gratitude.

TORRANCE KIRBY
McGill University

HARRY LIEBERSOHN. The Return of the Gift: European History of a Global Idea. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 210. $80.00.

This book advances an intriguing thesis regarding gift-exchange in modern European social thinking. According to Harry Liebersohn, notions of gift-giving that were abundant in the premodern era declined by the early nineteenth century, but subsequently revived and came to a full fruition in Marcel Mauss's wide-ranging study, The Gift: Forms and Functions of Exchange in Archaic Societies (1925; English translation, 1954).

The thesis is explored in five sections, each focusing on a major tradition of European thought. The first chapter sets the stage by looking at the nineteenth-century utilitarian critique of the traditional gift, which viewed it as an epitome of corruption rather than a primary social bond. Next Liebersohn turns to earlier periods and to the liberal tradition (Thomas Hobbes, Adam Smith), which in his reading emerges as a broad approach that not only advanced notions of possessive individualism and self-interest but also was cognizant of the value of gift offering and mutual exchange—an understanding that in the nineteenth century re-emerged among German historical economists. Chapter three delves into theories of primitive communism, focusing on the civic humanism of Adam Ferguson, the evolutionary theory of Lewis Henry Morgan, and its subsequent elaboration by Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels. While offering a powerful alternative to the liberal vision of self-interest, this tradition, with its formulation of altruistic archaic communities devoid of politics, power, or conflict, further diminished European thinking about gifts. Chapter four focuses on the innovativeness of the founders of modern anthropology who, based on their explorations of rituals that resonated with acts of gift exchange, articulated a far more nuanced account than the one entailed in either utilitarian models or communitarian schemes of societal evolution. In the Indian potlatch documented by Franz Boas, the sexual favors of the Banaros (New Guinea) described in the work of Richard Thurnwald, and the Kula in Bronislaw Malinowski's study of communities in the Trobriand Islands, these anthropologists found competition, power, status, and self-interest interwoven into and sustained by acts of gift exchange that created ties of commitment and obligation. The final chapter rounds up the treatment of a return of the gift with a discussion of Mauss, placing his ideas in the context of existing accounts of gifts as well as the politics of the postwar period, his personal life, and especially his close and intimate ties with intellectuals in France and abroad. A thinker rather than an explorer immersed in fieldwork, Mauss's innovation and originality ultimately resided in his synthesis of an enormous amount of research into a single whole, pinpointing the dynamics of gift exchange as a generalized and globalized principle rather than a distinctive, localized form of exchange.

Focusing as it does on major thinkers across large tracts of time, the book provides a concise if disparate exposition rather than a full-scale study of thinking about gifts since the seventeenth century. Questions linger about the wider diffusion of ideas and notions of gifts among lesser-known thinkers or even the populace at large, and about the dissemination of ideas about gift giving in looser and more intricate forms, and in a broader range of literary genres and texts. The argument about the retreat of thinking on gifts in the face of liberal and communitarian thinking appears overstated and overlooks subtle notions of gifts and gift-exchange that permeated the traditional but still pervasive understanding of "generosity" or even the novel concept of "altruism." Nor is it clear, given the inventiveness of anthropological thinking on gift-exchange, that these formulations amounted to a "return" to earlier articulations of the gift. Whether what we observe is the waning and subsequent return of notions of the gift, or more properly the shifts and mutations of a set of ideas involving gift-giving and reciprocal obligations, remains an open question.

For all this, the book provides a perceptive account that traces the genealogy of an idea commonly associated with a single modern thinker, Mauss, and places it in its broader intellectual context. It offers an important perspective on the gift as an idea and a construct, pointing to notions of obligation and regard for others that coexisted alongside an emerging conceptualization of possessive individualism, self-interest, and market competitiveness. It places the major founders of modern anthropology in their political and cultural milieu, offering compelling portraits and intellectual biographies that, while hardly insensible to the racial prejudices of these explorers of remote societies, still highlight the enormity of their endeavors, their "willingness to listen and learn from foreign cultures" (p. 96), and the originality and insight they brought into their reflections on acts and rituals of gift-exchange. Fully conscious of the value of gift theory as a conceptual tool that enhances our understanding of societal ties and interactions, the book uncovers the pivotal role of the discourse of reciprocal gifts in modern anthropology and social thinking more broadly, inviting further consideration of gift-offering and social bonds in modern contexts, in Europe and elsewhere. Scholars in a wide range of disciplines will find it an engaging and rewarding read.

ILANA KRAUSMAN BEN-AMOS
Ben-Gurion University of the Negev

JANET L. POLASKY. Reforming Urban Labor: Routes to the City, Roots in the Country. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2010. Pp. xii, 238. $55.00.

Comparative history is sometimes a hard sell. Presented as side-by-side contrasts of places or themes, it can come across as artificial and unconvincing. Comparative history is most persuasive when it identifies the right topics to juxtapose and when an author has the skill to weave an historical narrative from separate threads. Janet L. Polasky's book succeeds because it offers compelling topics to compare and because it is deftly written.

This book is mostly about nineteenth-century Europe's "social question," which in essence had to do with the unmet promises of the Enlightenment and industrialization: citizenship and an improved standard of living. Inventive in offering a finely tuned comparative approach to the social question, it covers the period of roughly 1880 to 1914, with a concluding chapter that briskly takes the analysis through the present. The settings compared are Brussels and London, as well as their respective hinterlands. The book is organized into seven concisely written chapters on carefully selected topics and includes images, maps, tables, graphs, and a thirty-page bibliography.

The reformers of the title are government officials, British philanthropists, Belgian Catholic paternalists, political leaders, engineers, social and municipal reformers, labor leaders, and others, on both sides of the English Channel, all of whom shared a nagging concern about the bitter fruits of industrialization in Brussels and London: densely crowded populations of workers and their families living in decrepit urban housing, and the attendant conditions of poverty, disease, moral decline, and threat of rebellion. These are familiar themes to scholars who have studied the social question for Europe's "long" nineteenth century. Polasky's unique approach is to compare Belgian and English efforts to address these circumstances by creating good housing and neighborhoods away from the cities, and providing reliable "locomotion"—railroads in particular—to move commuting workers from homes in rural and suburban green space to jobs in the city; this is the source of the book's subtitle. The strategies taken, the sometimes erratic modifications enacted over the decades, and the results achieved in the two capital cities make up the substance of the book.

Belgian and English reformers both acted on the assumption that good homes equal good citizens. Moreover, it was unconscionable that working-class families should be living in conditions that were unhealthy and that also appeared to threaten the larger society. The seeming solution was to place workers in extra-urban neighborhoods of "cottages" and build elaborate rail networks that would in the process graft another identity to workers: that of commuter. Over many years and on both sides of the English Channel, reformers and politicians grappled endlessly with policies that sought the right balance between government initiative and laissez-faire. National tendencies—if not precisely national traits—emerge in the telling: changes in England were more dependent upon philanthropy than in Belgium, where government took a stronger hand; British reformers focused more on skilled workers than did Belgian officials; British commuters were more likely than their Belgian counterparts to be segregated by class; the romanticized peasant was more a part of the formula in Belgium than in England.

The topics of housing and transportation for Brussels and London are large, and so the author has wisely chosen to limit her coverage and the themes she explores. The research rests upon archival collections and official reports from Belgium and England, as well as an extensive secondary literature. The author describes this book as long in the making, and the secondary literature relies heavily upon titles published before 1990. The primary sources mostly come from the reformers themselves. The words of commuting workers are difficult to locate and show up only here and there in this account. Although Belgian and British reformers feared strikes and other kinds of collective action, and used their threat as an explanation for reform, there are remarkably few worker actions cited in this history (the 1899 "Battle of Enfield" near London is an exception). Belgian and British workers may have evoked class interests on the job site, but they rarely acted together as commuters or consumers.

Reforming Urban Labor is elegantly written and revealing of its topic in ways that only the best comparative history achieves. A few years ago this book might have been considered an old-fashioned case of municipal labor history, a field that has given way in recent decades to cultural history. Polasky, however, reminds us that nineteenth-century reformers in Brussels and London were grappling with what we now label "sustainability." In that sense, this is a history with resonance, and representative of a scholarly field that is likely to make a return in the shadow cast by the most recent crises of capitalism.

CASEY HARISON

University of Southern Indiana

KEVIN J. CALLAHAN. Demonstration Culture: European Socialism and the Second International, 1889–1914. Leicester: Troubador Publishing Ltd. 2010. Pp. xxxii, 324. $33.95.

European socialism in the era of the Second International is a subject about which much has been written. Innumerable books, monographs, articles, and dissertations have analyzed the historical development, political dynamics, and ideological evolution of individual parties as well as the International itself. Many of these analyses are marked (some might say marred) by a sort of reverse Whig history: they start with the divisions and seeming inefficacy of the International at the outbreak of World War I and move back in time to try to find reasons for this ostensible failure. In Demonstration Culture: European Socialism and the Second International, 1889–1914, Kevin J. Callahan aims to add a new dimension to our understanding of European socialism as well as correct the existing literature's tendency to see the movement as a failure by examining the International as an "inter-national performative movement of symbolic demonstration" (p. xii).

Putting aside this off-putting (at least to a political scientist) jargon, what Callahan suggests is that rather than view the Second International primarily as a political movement or as the carrier of a powerful ideological tradition (as most of the existing literature does), we should instead understand it as a body whose aim was to create a "mass based political culture of demonstration." By "demonstration" Callahan means practices of "showing, manifesting, expressing, and displaying" (p. xiii): i.e., activities designed to create a common culture, identity, and sense of purpose within the International. This emphasis on "demonstration culture," Callahan argues, will direct our attention toward different aspects of the International's existence as well as enable us to gain a greater appreciation for its successes rather than failures. It will also, of course, help draw the historiography of the International away from its traditional focus on political and intellectual history and put it more in line with current trends toward cultural studies, "history from below," and discourse analysis.

So rather than focusing on critical political junctures and ideological divisions, Callahan shifts attention to cultural and symbolic activities, examining, for example, how much time was devoted to thinking about the location, venues, entertainment, and lodging for each of the International's congresses. (Want to know how much organizers spent on a "music and tambourine group" at the Basel congress? Or about how Karl Kautsky "dazzled the audience" at the Amsterdam congress with a ballet performance? Or about how, in addition to scintillating debate, congress delegates were treated to everything from boat excursions to fireworks? If so, then this is the book for you.) This focus is designed to show how seriously organizers took the experiential, communicative, and symbolic aspects of the congress. Callahan provides similar analyses of a range of other socialist activities including speaking tours, funerals, song lyrics, and manifestos in order to show how different forms of "demonstration" were used to spread socialism's message, convey its opposition to the existing order, and create a sense of unity among supporters.

By shifting attention away from political and ideological debates and junctures, Demonstration Culture does help students of the Second International appreciate the myriad ways in which socialists strove to counteract division and disunity. We are reminded that socialists during this era saw themselves as engaged in more than political battles. Socialists believed they were preparing for a new world, one where different ideals and organizing principles would reign. For this to occur, more than political organization, electoral campaigns, and ideological appeals would be necessary.

Yet we are left at the end of the book with the sobering reality that socialism did, on some level, fail in 1914 (and again later on during the interwar years). Divisions and disunity did prevent the movement from being able to exert influence over political development commensurate with membership numbers or electoral support. Despite his emphasis on the efforts made by socialists to create unity, Callahan bumps up against this reality time and time again. For example, Callahan notes that the "examples of the Boer War and the Macedonian conflict illustrate the difficulty the ISB had in responding to international injustices. The injustices themselves were readily condemned, but when the perpetrator of the acts had to be identified, national loyalties, priorities, and prejudices of the various sections came to the fore" (p. 214). In this case as in many others, vague and general statements (i.e., forms of "paper demonstration") could be agreed upon, but often little more could be done to actually influence the course of history.

And so we are left wondering: how important ultimately are cultural and communicative efforts if not matched with corresponding political ones? Can cultural or communicative activities alone significantly shape the course of political development? These are questions that Callahan's book raises but does not fully answer.

SHERI BERMAN
Barnard College

PETER E. GORDON. Continental Divide: Heidegger, Cassirer, Davos. Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 2010. Pp. xiv, 426. $39.95.

The 1929 Davos disputation between Martin Heidegger and Ernst Cassirer has become the stuff of philosophical legend. By the same token, as Peter E. Gordon shows in his fine study of the encounter, its legendary status has at times proved something of an obstacle to subsequent interpretation. Both philosophers were at the height of their respective powers. Heidegger's masterpiece, Being and Time, had appeared two years earlier. Cassirer was the reigning heir of the esteemed tradition of German neo-Kantianism, which, since the Great War—a veritable watershed in German political culture—had endured a considerable loss of prestige. German youth associated neo-Kantianism, rightly or wrongly, with the old regime that had been responsible for the cataclysmic defeat of November 1918.

Yet, an even greater barrier to interpreting this landmark philosophical disputation lies with Heidegger's impassioned commitment to National Socialism in 1933, an allegiance that the philosopher never fully renounced, even after the war. As late as 1953, in An Introduction to Metaphysics, Heidegger still praised the movement's "inner truth and greatness." And the 1966 Der Spiegel interview, Heidegger insisted that National Socialism had proceeded in the right direction; however, ultimately, "those people [i.e., the Nazis] were far too limited in their thinking" to rise to the epochal challenges of technology qua fate.

Gordon sets aside Heidegger's later political compromises in order to retrieve the lost philosophical substance of this historic debate. He claims that, time and again, the Cassirer-Heidegger dispute has been misapprehended (and, hence, degraded) as a melodramatic political allegory concerning the collapse of Weimar liberalism—a political standpoint that Cassirer had vehemently championed—at the hands of the sinister forces of German irrationalism. Here we are confronted with two apparent paradoxes: first, a historian arguing explicitly for the systematic extrusion of historical and political resonances in favor of a strictly text-immanent, conceptual reading of the exchange in question; and, second, a historian who in his introduction claims to be methodologically interested in the way that ideas "ramify" ("The chief task of this book . . . is to follow philosophical concepts themselves as their meanings branch out into the wider world to which they already implicitly belong. It is to understand how concepts ramify" [p. 4]), but who nevertheless wishes to place far-reaching strictures on the extent and nature of such ramifications.

Thus, from the book's opening pages, political ramifications are deemed reprehensible and illicit. In his conclusion, the author goes so far as to label attempts to read the Cassirer-Heidegger dispute politically as a "tragedy" (p. 364). But Gordon protests too much. The tragedy lies with the German catastrophe itself, Nazism's victims (an estimated twenty-five million), and German intellectuals' eager participation in the so-called German Revolution (see Nazi Germany and the Humanities, ed. Wolfgang Iser and Anson Rabinbach [2007]).

Gordon's impulses are noble. And upon reviewing the actual terms of the debate, one cannot help but be struck by its non-polemical, "objective" (sachlich) character. Much of the colloquy turns on some fine points of Kant interpretation: above all, Kant's treatment of the faculty of the imagination in the Critique of Pure Reason (1781). Whereas Cassirer sought to accord primacy to the faculty of synthesis as realized by the pure concepts of the understanding, Heidegger, conversely, stressed the foundational import of "temporality" in the Critique. Thereby, Heidegger sought to invert the priority that had been established by Cassirer and other Kant scholars of the transcendental analytic (whence our capacity for synthesis arises) over the transcendental aesthetic (the repository of our pure intuitions of space and time.) In this way, Heidegger sought to claim that the first Critique was really a work of metaphysics rather than a treatise on epistemology.

Cassirer feared that, by downplaying the first Critique's status as a theory of knowledge, and by making truth dependent on the contingent modalities of Dasein (e.g., the doctrine of temporality), Heidegger flirted with a full-blown philosophical relativism. As Cassirer observes at one point in the colloquy: "Heidegger . . . says: there can be no truths in themselves, nor can there be any external truths at all. Rather, insofar as they occur in general, truths are relative to Dasein" (Kant and the Problem of Metaphysics, 195.) Heidegger, whose reputation as a convinced anti-neo-Kantian had preceded him, believed that the neo-Kantian stress on "theory of knowledge" amounted to a thinly veiled scientism; as such, it embodied an inferior approach to knowledge and truth that was incapable of fathoming the more profound, existential aspects of Being-in-the-world and fundamental ontology. In Heidegger's view, such questions—and they were for him the crucial ones—simply dropped off of the neo-Kantian radar screen. Only a standpoint that took human finitude as its point of departure, claimed Heidegger, was capable of disclosing and addressing such matters of pivotal ontological import. As Heidegger argues in the course of the Davos Disputation: "To hold oneself . . . in the openness of beings is what I describe as Being-in-truth, . . . On the grounds of the finitude of the Being-in-truth of human beings, there exists at the same time a Being-in-untruth. Untruth belongs to the innermost core of the structure of Dasein" (Kant and the Problem of Metaphysics, p. 197). One can only begin to imagine how disconcerting Heidegger's provocative conflation of "Being-in-truth" with "Being in-untruth" must have been for the sober and austere author the four-volume Philosophy of Symbolic Forms.

The intellectual substance of the dispute may be captured via the philosophical opposition between "finitude" and "spontaneity." The revolutionary demarche of Heidegger's fundamental ontology consisted in arguing for the primordially (Ursprünglichkeit) of non-cognitive or "existential" modalities of Being-in-the-world: "moods," "anxiety," "ambiguity," "falling," and so forth. In Heidegger's view, any attempt to theorize or define the basic constituents of Dasein or human being must begin with such formal prerequisites or "existentials." Conversely, Cassirer, the unbowed champion of Kant and the Enlightenment spirit, argued repeatedly for the primacy of autonomy or “spontaneity”: the sovereign human capacity to shape or impose form on the phenomenal world as it is given or as it appears to us.

It does not take a master hermeneutician to discern that the basic opposition between “finitude” and “spontaneity” that structures the exchange is already amply freighted with ideological resonances, although I wish to emphatically agree with Gordon that, in Heidegger’s case, these resonances should not be construed as “Nazi.” This would be a gross falsification. There can be no doubting the fact that Cassirer’s stress on the virtues of Kantian autonomy or Mündigkeit represents an unequivocal defense of the values of Western humanism. Heidegger’s embrace of “finitude,” conversely, is of a piece with the “anti-humanism” that culminated in his 1947 “Letter on Humanism.” Heidegger’s later philosophy revolved around the notion of Seinsgeschick, the “destining of Being.” Although I cannot do justice to its nuances or ramifications in this review, one thing should be transparently clear: Heidegger’s standpoint is not merely a critique of the humanist perspective embraced by Cassirer and others; it represents a rejection of that perspective tout court. It embodies an explicit disavowal of the project of human autonomy in favor of the mysterious and fateful “sendings of Being” (Schickungen des Seins). As mortals, all we can do is passively await Being’s arbitrary and inscrutable dispensations. For this reason, observers have aptly characterized Heidegger’s later philosophy as Seinsmystik, a “mysticism of Being.”

One of the most troubling aspects of Heidegger’s political engagement is that his pro-Nazi declarations, which suffuse his seminars and lecture courses from the 1930s, seem to flow from the discourse of fundamental ontology he had contrived in Being and Time and other works of the 1920s. Gordon is convinced that Heidegger’s theoretical vindications of Nazism—which we now know to be much more extensive than we first suspected—“debased” Heidegger’s own peculiar brand of Existenzphilosophie. Here, the problem is that the lexical continuity between the two discourses, philosophical and political, is striking and compelling. Attempts to build a firewall between the strictly philosophical and broader cultural resonances of Heidegger’s thought have repeatedly come up short.

In retrospect the Davos debate has been read, not incorrectly, as the swan song of Cassirer’s staid variety of neo-Kantianism (as well as neo-Kantianism’s accompanying humanist shibboleths) and the triumph of Heidegger’s bold and innovative Existenzphilosophie. Today, Heidegger is read, taught, translated, and commented upon throughout the world, whereas Cassirer’s thought, noble though it may be, lives on as something of a period piece or a historical curiosity. Thus, anyone who is concerned with the Davos disputation’s legacy must confront a curious and troubling paradox. The version of philosophy that “triumphed” at Davos—Heidegger’s “fundamental ontology”—despite its admitted brilliance, contains elements that are both groundbreaking and genuinely disturbing. The peculiar stress Heidegger placed on “finitude” during the Davos encounter is certainly one of these.

When all is said and done, there remain too many obscurities in Heidegger’s thought that, among the faithful, pass for self-evident truths. Heidegger’s supporters do him no service by treating his more questionable and portentous insights and claims with reverence rather than subjecting them to the open-minded critical scrutiny that all thought deserves.

RICHARD WOLIN
The Graduate Center,
City University of New York

VALERIO PERNA. Relazioni tra Santa Sede e Repubbliche baltiche (1918–1940): Monsignor Zecchini diplomatico. (Istituto di storia sociale e religiosa di Gorizia; Depurazione di storia patria per il Friuli.) Udine: Forum. 2010. Pp. 238. €14.50.

The collapse of the German, Russian, Austro-Hungarian, and Ottoman empires at the end of World War I led to the emergence of new national states. The appearance of a host of smaller states created economic, political, and diplomatic difficulties for the established European powers, which initially questioned their viability and hesitated granting them recognition. Their appearance also posed problems for the Vatican, which tended to follow the cautious lead and diplomacy of the major powers. Both deemed other issues more pressing, including the prospect of a defeated Germany seeking revenge while the Soviets preached universal revolution in their quest for European, if not world, domination.

In postwar Europe the Baltic states of Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania were not given the same military protection and diplomatic attention showered on the larger ones such as Poland. The Poles, in turn, challenged not only their border with the Soviet Union, which received considerable attention, but also that with the Baltic state of Lithuania, which aroused less interest. The Vatican, however, was motivated by the desire to protect the church and the faith in both small and large states and sought to craft a policy to keep them not only safe but friendly to the Vatican and the church. The course it pursued toward three Baltic republics in the interwar period is carefully traced in this book by Valerio Perna.

Perna provides a focus for the complex Vatican policy toward the Baltics by focusing on Monsignor Antonino Zecchini’s diplomatic career and major contributions in the development and implementation of the papacy’s Baltic policy. Born in Visco in 1864, this Jesuit studied in various parts of Europe and was ordained a priest in Krakow, where he served as a professor of canon law and spiritual director of the Central Seminary of Gorizia. After World War I he was summoned by the Holy See to visit Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, which had recently received independence. Ordained archbishop in 1922, he served as apostolic delegate to these republics, then apostolic nuncio in Latvia, where he died in 1935. During his fifteen-year tenure he initiated the policy the Vatican would pursue toward the three Baltic states that was followed by his successor, Antonino Arata. His contribution and career is succinctly described in the preface to the volume, written by Ferruccio Tassin—a grand-nephew of Zecchini and a scholar of the Italian region from which the family hails. It serves as an introduction to Perna's six chapters and the conclusion that follow.

Perna notes that prior to Zecchini's involvement the Vatican sought additional information on the independent Baltic states and with that aim in mind in 1920 commissioned the nuncio to Warsaw, Achille Ratti—who in 1922 succeeded Benedict XV as Pope Pius XI—to make an apostolic visit to the region. In his report of January 4, 1921, Ratti perceived the need for a more protracted visit (p. 52), which led secretary of state Pietro Gasparri to appoint Zecchini apostolic visitor to the Baltic states. Gasparri, who had defined the difference between papal "impartiality" and "neutrality" during the Great War, clung to it in the aftermath. It differentiated conflicts in principles, in which the Holy See could have a say, from specific political or military disputes, in which the Holy See would not intervene.

Adhering to this differentiation, Zecchini's formal instructions stressed that his mission was purely religious with the aim of assessing and reporting on the religious life and ecclesiastical organization in the three Baltic republics (pp. 58–59). In practice, however, Gasparri called upon Zecchini to facilitate a resolution of the conflict over Vilna and to assist returning Italian prisoners of war. He was warned not to be seen to undertake any action that might be judged political. Zecchini fulfilled his delicate assignments by facilitating the conclusion of a treaty with Latvia in 1922 and securing the Holy See's recognition of Lithuania that same year. He was rewarded by being named apostolic delegate. Perna then traces Zecchini's subsequent achievements.

Perna has had recourse to the recently opened papers of the pontificate of Pius XI (1922–1939) in the Secret Vatican Archive, as well as the documents in a number of state archives, following the collapse of the Soviet Union. Consequently, the six fact-filled chapters of the book are based on solid research and are quite informative—if less than interesting. Although the volume has a useful chronology of events and an index of names, it does not include a bibliography—very likely because there has been little written on the topic of this volume. There is a page, however, which refers to the archives the author consulted and abbreviations used. The resulting volume, replete with little-known facts, will not attract the general reader but will prove invaluable to the specialist.

FRANK J. COPPA
St. John's University

IVAN ERMAKOFF. Ruling Oneself Out: A Theory of Collective Abdications. (Politics, History, and Culture.)

Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2008. Pp. xxxiii, 402. Cloth $99.95, paper $27.95.

On March 23, 1933, the unanimous support of the Catholic Center Party gave Adolf Hitler the necessary two-thirds majority in the Reichstag for the Enabling Act and thus the legal authority to impose a dictatorship over Germany. On July 10, 1940, the overwhelming vote by senators and deputies granted Marshal Philippe Pétain power to promulgate the constitution for a "French State" based on his personal rule. For Ivan Ermakoff, these decisions are examples of "constitutional abdication" (p. 54). To investigate why elected representatives would cede their authority so absolutely, he has combined sociology's logistic regression and game theory methods with history's archival, documentary, and memoir sources.

Ermakoff considers the roles played by coercion, miscalculation, and collusion and claims that they were important but not determining factors of the collective abdications in Germany and France. Fear debilitated. In Germany, Nazi violence and intimidation were proof of what awaited Hitler's enemies. In France, military collapse encouraged conjecture that the French might face the atrocities visited upon the Poles. Yet the Social Democratic Party voted against the Enabling Act, and eighty senators and deputies, nearly 12 percent, opposed Pétain. Judgment misled. Few acknowledged that Hitler and Pétain were pursuing truly radical agendas. Yet neither had troubled to conceal his intentions. Latent sympathy enticed. Hitler and Pétain were each regarded as the antidote to chaos and perhaps the only alternative to communism. Yet the Catholic Center and the great majority of French legislators were firmly democratic.

Ermakoff's explanation for why German and French legislators engaged in political suicide is the theory of collective alignment. At a time of uncertainty and danger, they sought the comfort of solidarity when confronting a decision of such extraordinary consequence—thus the term "collective." The exact "alignment" derived from the process of arriving at this solidarity, talking among themselves, passing on bits of information, and seeking some dominant figure to provide leadership. Such actions might be called "politicking"; Ermakoff designates them, respectively, "sequential alignment," "local knowledge," and "tacit coordination."

In March 1933, the dominant leader was Monsignor Ludwig Kaas, chairman of the Catholic Center Party, who argued that Hitler would do what he wanted despite the vote on the Enabling Act and that the party should therefore curry favor by supporting him. In July 1940, the dominant figure was Pierre-Étienne Flandin, a principal supporter of appeasement in the late 1930s who appealed for a new regime under Pétain to engender a revived France able to treat with Germany. Ermakoff presents the preliminary sequences of collective alignments through various gaming diagrams and statistical tests, but the final and decisive aspect in both cases is personal agency: the role of the individual.

Traditional historians may reject as procrustean the application of social science methods to history, and may reject as well the assertion that these two moments in history are truly comparable. The telling objection to Ermakoff's approach is, however, that aside from Kaas and Flandin, he treats only superficially the motivations of the Catholic Center or the French senators and deputies.

The only possible counter to Kaas was Heinrich Brüning, German chancellor from March 1930 to May 1932, who governed largely through the use of emergency decrees and was acutely aware of both their temptation and their danger. Brüning opposed the Enabling Act but kept silent and voted for it to maintain, he asserted, party solidarity. Some prominent French legislators like Jean Mistler, Joseph Caillaux, Camille Chautemps, and Anatole de Monzie aligned themselves with Flandin, but others, above all Yvon Delbos, Marx Dormoy, Auguste Champetier de Ribes, and Emmanuel d'Astier de la Vigerie, stridently did not—with d'Astier exclaiming after the vote, "Long live the Republic anyway!" Ermakoff and social science have yet to devise a method for measuring courage, or indeed its absence.

BENJAMIN F. MARTIN
Louisiana State University

JOHN BOHSTEDT. The Politics of Provisions: Food Riots, Moral Economy, and Market Transition in England, c. 1550–1850. (The History of Retailing and Consumption.) Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2010. Pp. 312. $99.95.

John Bohstedt has been studying food riots in England for over three decades, and his accounts of this quintessential early modern phenomenon have appeared in an important monograph and dozens of articles, book chapters, and conference papers since the 1980s. The book under review is the culmination of that work, and it seeks to synthesize not only Bohstedt's many discrete studies but also the immense amount of historical research of the past half century that relates to this topic. One can pick holes in Bohstedt's arguments, but this does not detract from the sheer volume of work that he has done and the monumental task he has set himself in repositioning the discussion of food riots away from the conceptual framework of the "moral economy of the crowd" and toward a more empirically based "politics of provisions."

Studies of early modern food riots proliferated after the publication of E. P. Thompson's "The Moral Economy of the English Crowd in the Eighteenth Century" (Past and Present 50 [1971]: 76–136). In an article that kindled the historical imagination of a generation of social historians and helped reset the terms of debate for eighteenth-century social relations, Thompson argued that English crowds rioted not from some gut reaction to hunger but rather in defense of and through the mechanisms of a shared "moral economy," which was pitted against the rising mentality of political economy. While Thompson's analysis fundamentally shaped the field, it rested less on empirical research than on an empathetic leap into the mentalité of eighteenth-century communities. Bohstedt's work takes full advantage of numerous and sophisticated studies by historians such as John Walter and Nicholas Rogers to build his conceptual framework on firmer empirical ground. He argues that, while Thompson correctly identified the "intense moral dimensions" (p. 169) of crowd action, his article misrepresented the chronology of the phenomenon, failed to capture adequately the political dimensions of food rioting, and underplayed the importance of the market transition as a cause of food riots.

Using a comprehensive database of information on food riots (which he has generously made available on the internet), Bohstedt discusses three major periods of food rioting in early modern England. During "Tawney's Century" (ca. 1550–1650), food riots emerged alongside increased market dependency and growing numbers of "masterless men." The classic matrix of provision politics from this point forward would include cycles of riot, rhetoric, regulation, relief, and repression negotiated between parish elites and rioters, who were led by the middle third of non-agrarian society, the group Paul Slack has called the "shallow poor." The second period (1650–1739) witnessed fewer riots; these "regressed toward simple seizures" (p. 102), while landowners turned a "harder face to the poor" (p. 91). Bohstedt deals with this era rather cursorily.

In contrast, the monograph presents 1740–1812 as the golden age of food riots, and gives an especially sophisticated and comprehensive analysis of 1740–1779 as the formative age of provision politics. In rural industrializing districts, mining communities, and corporate provincial towns, specific economic problems caused direct action by food rioters whose demands were "lubricated" (p. 105) but not caused by a notion of moral economy. With the new presence of the militia and Yeomanry and increased local surveillance, this period was followed by a fraught quarter century of intense food riots and repression. Still, by the 1810s, thanks to greater state capacity for control as well as the rise of new forms of working-class politics and action, Bohstedt sees the demise of the classic food riot.

Bohstedt's overarching analysis of the phenomenon is compelling. He argues convincingly that while economic and demographic trends set the parameters for food rioting, the local political context essentially defined the events. His contention that the historical memory of successful popular action formed "veteran communities" of rioters would have benefited from more thorough and theoretically rich discussion. Nonetheless, it is clear that these communities (whether motivated by memory or more immediate concerns) successfully used food riots to force the provision of emergency funds and food for the hungry. Indeed, Bohstedt's ability to link the history of food rioting to the history of social welfare is one of the most important contributions of the book. While historians such as Joanna Innes have effectively demonstrated England's use of a "mixed economy of welfare" comprised of poor relief and charity, Bohstedt shows that the provision of large-scale emergency food supply represented a new and fundamentally different third strand in that mixed economy. While the "politics of provisions" may not replace the moral economy in the lexicon of early modern social historians, Bohstedt's book is an important work of synthesis in this exceptionally rich field.

SUSANNAH OTTAWAY
Carleton College

STEPHEN BANKS. A Polite Exchange of Bullets: The Duel and the English Gentleman, 1750–1850. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell Press. 2010. Pp. 317. $115.00.

This is a well-researched book on dueling in Britain in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. It examines the cultural and theoretical underpinnings of dueling, its prevalence, social composition, and changing character, as well as its final demise. The book is based on a large body of primary material, which the author skillfully uses to establish a number of novel and important points. One of its merits is that it combines theoretical sophistication with a thorough analysis of primary sources. Stephen Banks makes numerous interesting points and draws many important conclusions but never overstates his case.

The book consists of ten chapters, which could be thematically divided into four groups. The first three place dueling in cultural and intellectual contexts. Banks opens with a brief discussion of earlier centuries, emphasizing that, although the duel was never legal, it "appeared to have successfully subverted the actual operation of the criminal justice system" (p. 23). This was so because it had a significant role to play in the social and cultural world of the gentleman. Banks demonstrates that dueling was an integral part of the broader culture of competitiveness, self-assertion, and violence. Fair and manly violence became, in the course of the eighteenth century, an integral part of the British national identity. At the same time, however, Banks also emphasizes that dueling was closely linked with civility and politeness; the duel was, as the title of the book puts it, a polite exchange of bullets. Gentlemen were trained in the arts of courtesy at the same time they were educated to endure and inflict violence.

Chapters four and five offer a social historical analysis of the duel. While acknowledging the difficulty of determining the absolute number of duels, Banks points out that there were certain periods when they seemed to have been more prevalent. During the Napoleonic wars the number of duels increased, and after a subsequent decline, there seems to have been another minor upsurge in the latter part of the 1820s and 1830s before a final decline in the following decade. Geographically, duels were unevenly dispersed. More than half of those reported were fought in London and its environs, and most of the rest took place in port and garrison towns. Smaller inland towns and expanding centers of manufacture witnessed very few duels, which leads Banks to conclude that the middle classes did not embrace dueling. The most common professional group involved in duels was, as could be expected, military officers. But the duelists also included "the aspiring lawyers and surgeons whose order were intent on ascending the social ladder" (p. 93). The honor culture of dueling also prevailed among those gentlemen who served abroad in military, political, or administrative roles. Banks attributes this to the more intimate and limited nature of colonial societies.

Chapters six and seven return to cultural aspects of dueling. Although the figure of the second has an important place in romantic fictional depictions of the duel, his role has been mostly ignored by historians. Banks offers a fascinating analysis of the second, emphasizing how, during the eighteenth century, his role changed from that of a retainer, who often joined the fight, to that of an intermediary. Rather than determining who was at fault, seconds often sought to find a resolution acceptable to both parties and therefore safeguarded their principals' honor. The shift from swords to pistols also changed the seconds' role, as they were crucial for determining the distance of the parties and the number of shots to be fired. In chapter seven, Banks discusses the relationship between dueling and the criminal justice system. He establishes that juries were reluctant to convict duelists if the duel had been fair. Prosecutors therefore needed to show, if they wanted to secure a conviction, that the honor code had been breached.

The final three chapters focus on the demise of dueling in Britain. Banks does not see this simply as the result of a rise of novel commercial, middle-class values but rather as the culmination of a long civilizing process that included thorough changes in the experience of life. At the same time, he points to important changes in the duel itself. Increasingly during the earlier part of the nineteenth century, the duel was seen not as a way for the offended party to remove a stain on his honor, but as a mode of apology.

The discussion of the end of dueling, as everything else in the book, is convincing, and the author is to be commended for having written such a comprehensive, persuasive, and engaging account of the duel in modern Britain.

MARKKU PELTONEN
University of Helsinki

ROGER MORRIS. The Foundations of British Maritime Ascendancy: Resources, Logistics and the State, 1755–1815. (Cambridge Military Histories.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xvii, 440. $99.00.

It is the contention of this book that "the bureaucratic culture of the British state" was an essential—perhaps the principal—element that gave "Britain the ability to become the dominant power at sea" in the eighteenth century (p. 5). By "bureaucratic culture" the author means government administrative attitudes and practices (and also their interaction with private-sector suppliers and contractors). Many historians who know the field will be surprised by Roger Morriss's diminishment of the importance of the British government's remarkable financial capability; he suggests that John Brewer's The Sinews of Power: War, Money and the English State, 1688–1783 (1988) has caused too much emphasis to be placed on it. That French naval administration was repeatedly and in multiple ways rendered incapable during the Seven Years' War by lack of funds is a fact he recognizes (p. 61) but seems not to have given great weight.

Morriss claims that "the structure, culture and capabilities of the British state developed during the second half of the eighteenth century" (p. 7), and his supporting argument for this periodization is based mainly on developments in naval administration. Years ago this reviewer reached the opposite conclusion, maintaining that by 1750 "the Royal Navy as an institution had acquired almost all of the attributes that would carry it through the Napoleonic era" (in J. R. Hill, ed., The Oxford Illustrated History of the Royal Navy [1995], p. 156). Specifically, the forms and practices of British naval administration were nearly all established during the first half of the century. The Victualling Office, for instance, was a remarkably efficient organization by 1750. (Morriss would have gained insight by reading the work of Christian Buchet, Marine, économie et société-un exemple d'interaction: L'avitaillement de la Royal Navy durant la guerre de sept ans [1999], which explores questions similar to his own.) Although many government agencies impressively enlarged their geographical reach after 1750, as Morriss points out, it is not clear that this had a significant impact on the size of the administrative system. According to Morriss's figures, the number of employees of the state at the beginning of the century (about 12,000) increased to 16,267 in 1797 (pp. 8–9)—not much growth considering that the tonnage of the British fleet increased from 200,000 in 1705 to 512,000 in 1795.

The book's primary focus is on the administrative improvements, or "reforms," advocated during the second half of the century, such as substituting individual for collective responsibility, salaries for fees, administrative staff for contractors, and appointments based on merit for ones dependent on patronage connection. A good deal of the information is drawn from the commissions of inquiry appointed from the 1780s onward. It is not clear, however, whether and when the recommendations of these commissions were implemented. What is known (as Morriss plainly sets forth) is the disastrous consequence of Earl of St. Vincent John Jervis's rashly aggressive approach to "reform" during his tenure as First Lord of the Admiralty (1801–1804). In any case, these sorts of reforms notwithstanding their long-term advantages, cannot have had much effect on the military capabilities of the navy before 1815.

One fundamental circumstance not mentioned in the book is that the British navy's bureaucrats had the public eye on them and knew it. The officers at sea were even more aware of this, and their probity and sense of responsibility were absolutely essential to the navy's administrative system. Members of organizations if not carefully watched tend, sooner or later, to serve themselves rather than the purpose for which they were ostensibly created. Sea officers as well as administrators were frequently exposed to temptation, but very few broke the unwritten rules of responsible conduct. They were restrained professional and aware that the navy tended to be under continual public scrutiny. On the subject of personal conduct and patronage in eighteenth-century British government there is great wisdom to be found in Brewer's Sinews of Power (esp. pp. 71–87), but Morriss has ignored these pages, perhaps because they potentially refute his general argument. Nor has Morriss, when exploring the interaction of the Treasury and the naval boards, made the best use of Clive Wilkinson's The British Navy and the State in the Eighteenth Century (2004), many chapters of which deal precisely with some of his major concerns.

In a chapter on supplying land forces overseas Morriss seems to imply that naval administrative improvement was more or less matched by developments in army administration. The demands of providing logistic support for troops overseas did indeed increase markedly in the second half of the century. During the Seven Years' War the Treasury assumed the burden of supplying an army of almost 100,000 in Germany, a very difficult undertaking because the men were largely Hanoverians and Hessians, and reliable contractors who spoke German were scarce. The American Revolutionary War involved, of course, a large force of British regulars in North America, and the war of the 1790s against revolutionary France witnessed major expeditions to the West Indies. But did the management of army logistics overseas really acquire a sound and efficient foundation? Regarding the army in Germany during the Seven Years' War, Morriss has missed Reed Browning's article in the Journal of the Society for Army Historical Research 49 (1971), which reveals that no effective commissariat was in place until the struggle was almost over, allowing a long track of very expensive and politically damaging failure. Did the Treasury learn much from the experience? Two officials who had served in Germany proved quite useful in the American Revolutionary War, but R. Arthur Bowler has shown that the Treasury lacked any sense that America presented a special situation requiring unusual technical competence (Logistics and the Failure of the British Army in America, 1775–1783 [1975], a book not cited by Morriss). Although Morriss writes very little about feeding the army overseas in the war of the 1790s, it is interesting that in October 1793, soon after Britain went to war, "the Treasury formally delegated responsibility for provisioning troops overseas to the naval Victualling Board" (p. 372). It appears, therefore, that to this point the Treasury had not developed a reliable system for army provisioning overseas.

The book is ill-written and frustrating to read. Too often it is not clear what time period is being discussed. Too many sentences involve mindless assertions, such as that "Ships were central to any operation beyond Britain's shores" (p. 397). These should not have survived a copyeditor's pen.

Yet there are also passages and features of great interest. Because it spans sixty years, the book, when it discusses shipping and provisioning, reveals (but does not emphasize) how utterly unprepared the British government was to employ a large army against the colonists in North America. The best parts, however, concern the period from 1790 to 1815, where Morriss's long-developed expertise and deeper research pay dividends. Especially valuable are the statistical tables that he provides. There is a very interesting chapter on "Ordnance and Technology"; undoubtedly Britain's power at sea toward the end of the century was greatly enhanced by guns and powder of a kind and quantity that opponents could not match. Also, Morriss is right to bring in private merchants and their informed co-operation, the improvement of equity law, and, above all, shipping. On these subjects, he has very usefully brought together his own fruitful research and that of others.

DANIEL BAUGH
Cornell University

C. I. HAMILTON. The Making of the Modern Admiralty: British Naval Policy-Making, 1805–1927. (Cambridge Military Histories.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 345. $99.00.

On first glance, this is a massive topic to cover in one book: just over 120 years of war and peace, technological advances, and material change. However, it would be wrong to assume that this is the task C. I. Hamilton sets himself. Indeed, he is at pains to differentiate between how policy was made—the personnel, structure, and development of an organization that was both an administrative and operational headquarters—and the policy itself. This may seem like a rather semantic distinction, but it is a highly important one. After all, a long line of naval historians have attacked policy in its various forms from one direction or another over various parts of this period; these include John Beeler, John Brooks, D. K. Brown, Andrew Lambert, Nicholas A. Lambert, Arthur J. Marder, N. A. M. Rodger, and Jon Tetsuro Sumida, to name but a few. What has escaped serious scrutiny has been the Admiralty organization itself. Hamilton's book addresses this lacuna.

In many ways, Hamilton's work builds on themes developed by Roger Morriss in Naval Power and British Culture, 1760–1850: Public Trust and Government Ideology (2004) to illustrate cultural changes in the general attitude toward management during the early nineteenth century, with a shift from collective to individual responsibility. Of course, changing attitudes were only part of the story, as Hamilton makes clear; the evolving role of a permanent secretary and the civil service, as well as the much later development of a naval staff, are key features in the Admiralty's story. However, I feel the most significant aspect of this book is its analysis of the tensions and problems arising from two causes—a failure to delegate and the dual role of the Admiralty as an operational and administrative headquarters. As Hamilton shows, even the development of a naval staff to deal with operational issues did not solve all of the problems; poor staff training in the early days of the naval staff hindered its effectiveness, while the stubborn refusal of some senior naval officers to delegate authority also subverted the best efforts of the civil service members of the Admiralty as well as the uniformed sections.

That many of the problems within the Admiralty structure can be traced back to individual personalities unfortunately falls outside of Hamilton's terms of reference. The process through which the Navy selected its senior officers (and the skills and abilities the selection process venerated) is ripe for wider exploration, as is the professional education of officers, especially that which occurred outside of the basic training framework. It would be a valuable addition to naval history, military studies, and the history of the government to blend and elaborate some of the ideas about the personalities of senior officers highlighted in Andrew Gordon's The Rules of the Game: Jutland and British Naval Command (2000) with Hamilton's detailed structural analysis of the Admiralty headquarters and its personnel. The fact that Hamilton's work does not address this issue will not detract from the value of his conclusions. As Hamilton himself argues, there is only so much that can be done in one book, if it is to be done well and rigorously; the book under review is done well and is most rigorous in its approach. Indeed, my only complaint is that Hamilton, for completely understandable reasons of space and readability, has to draw his analysis to a close in 1927. I hope that he is working on a companion monograph that will take the story through World War II and to the end of the Admiralty as a separate body in the late 1960s, and then there will be a need for someone to chart the development of Britain's Ministry of Defence with the same eye for detail and analysis that Hamilton has cast over the Admiralty.

Hamilton's book joins a growing body of high quality research into neglected, misunderstood, or incompletely explored areas of naval history that is successfully broadening the subject to include a variety of approaches and methodologies rather than just focusing on battles or "how big is my dreadnought?" Hamilton has thrown a welcome light on an understudied area and, now that he has done so, may leave many readers wondering why it has taken so long for naval historians to look at how the Royal Navy's operational and administrative headquarters developed.

DUNCAN REDFORD
University of Exeter

CHRISTINE KINEALY. Daniel O'Connell and the Anti-Slavery Movement: "The Saddest People the Sun Sees." London: Pickering and Chatto Publishers. 2011. Pp. viii, 218. $99.00.

Christine Kinealy's book is just what the title suggests: a narrative history that traces the involvement of Daniel O'Connell in the movement against slavery. In it, Kinealy recounts the antislavery work of the prominent nineteenth-century Irish leader, who is best known for his agitation for Catholic Emancipation in Great Britain and for his commitment to promoting Irish autonomy within the British Empire. Kinealy traces O'Connell's activities during the struggle for British West Indian emancipation, discusses his outspoken critiques of American slavery, and presents evidence of how O'Connell's words and actions influenced reformers well after his death. It is the most detailed accounting of O'Connell's antislavery activities to date, and the work will serve as a useful resource for anyone interested in that subject.

That said, Kinealy's book lacks a strong point of view. Her thesis is simply that O'Connell played an important role in the antislavery movement, a fact that has been well documented by scholars. Although she mentions some of the other literature on the topic in her notes, she engages only selectively with that scholarship. Instead, she focuses on narrating the details of O'Connell's crusade against slavery. Indeed, she relates a great amount of information on the subject, documenting O'Connell's antislavery arguments with long quotations and providing detailed accounts of the meetings he attended and his exchanges with others on the topic of slavery.

Kinealy does try to contextualize all of this data by discussing the political environment in Great Britain and in the United States between the 1820s and the 1860s. As a scholar of Irish history, she is understandably more adept at presenting the British context than the American. Her narrative of O'Connell's involvement in the fight against both slavery and apprenticeship in the British Parliament is well informed. Her discussion of the politics of slavery in the United States is less so.

Kinealy's treatment of the American antislavery movement, for example, lacks nuance. She describes American abolitionists at large as being optimistic about their impact on the American political system in the 1840s, a portrayal that overstates their confidence and glosses over the divisions within the movement on the subject of political action. Furthermore, she refers to the antislavery third party that arose during that decade, the Liberty Party, as the "Liberal Party" (pp. 81, 92). She also refers to the nativist parties of the 1840s as the "Know Nothings," yet the Know Nothings did not emerge until the next decade (p. 105). In addition, her discussion of the annexation of Texas and the beginning of the Mexican War is overly simplistic. She explains the delay in the American annexation of Texas between 1836 and 1845 as an attempt to avoid war with Mexico, and she characterizes the outbreak of the Mexican War in 1846 as a result of annexation. In reality, both the delay in annexation and the outbreak of war with Mexico were tied to the politics of American sectionalism, expansionism, and slavery in a much more complicated way.

Most problematic, however, is Kinealy's suggestion that Irish Americans became more sympathetic to antislavery in the decade before the Civil War. She notes that while they largely rejected O'Connell's antislavery appeals in the 1840s, "after 1861, thousands of Irish men had signed up for the Union army to join in the military crusade against slavery" (p. 165). Kinealy thus characterizes service in the Union Army as an expression of commitment to antislavery in order to document a change in sentiment. In fact, for most, service in the Union Army was a defense of the Union and not an attack on slavery, especially in the years before the Emancipation Proclamation. While some Irish American soldiers may have fought out of an antislavery sensibility, far more fought to prove their loyalty to the United States, for financial gain, or because they were conscripted into the army. Most evidence, in fact, points to continued widespread (though certainly not universal) animosity toward emancipation among Irish Americans throughout the entirety of the war.

Kinealy's main interest, however, is not American history but Daniel O'Connell, and her discussion of his position on slavery is thorough. Her documentation of his activities demonstrates O'Connell's importance in the transatlantic antislavery movement. Her last chapter, on the way O'Connell's antislavery activities were remembered for years after his death, contains much evidence of the great importance of his legacy. The value of this work lies in its accounting of O'Connell's antislavery activities throughout his life and the ways in which those activities were remembered after his death.

ANGELA F. MURPHY
Texas State University,
San Marcos

MARJORIE WHEELER-BARCLAY. The Science of Religion in Britain, 1860–1915. (Victorian Literature and Culture Series.) Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press. 2010. Pp. x, 311. $45.00.

In this book, Marjorie Wheeler-Barclay starts from the assumption that some early British classics within the academic discipline now commonly known as the comparative study of religions have frequently been analyzed to ascertain their contribution to the present state of knowledge in the field, but without a sufficient view to elucidating their role in Victorian discourse on religion. To remedy this, she discusses in detail six writers who justifiably can be taken to exemplify the full scope of non-theological Victorian writing on religion and the religions. In her introduction, the author argues "that their work is best regarded not as a cause of, but as a response to, the sense of cultural disorientation that was engendered by religious turmoil" (p. 2), claiming that the "widespread interest in the 'utility' and human 'meaning' of all forms of religious belief and practice offered a favourable atmosphere for the creation of a comparative study of religions" (p. 7). Chapter one consequently details some major influences that had shaped the perception of religion and religions by the early decades of the Victorian period, most notably the evolutionary ideas propagated by Auguste Comte and Herbert Spencer. Following this setting of the stage, the author discusses in the following six chapters the lives and works of Friedrich Max Müller, Edward Burnett Tylor, Andrew Lang, William Robertson Smith, James George Frazer, and Jane Ellen Harrison; each of the chapters moves from vital biographical information via key themes and concepts to an outline of the contemporary reception. In her conclusion, Wheeler-Barclay reaffirms her conviction that the "Victorian 'science of religion' was a reaction to and a reflection of the sense of crisis that had troubled the educated classes of British society as the traditional Anglican cultural elite came under increasingly successful attack, a process that had reached its most intense phase in the years between 1850 and 1890" (p. 247). Summarizing the individual positions taken by the authors discussed in her book, she notes that "while the science of religion was not able to create a new cultural consensus, it had contributed in ways not always easy to trace to a new and more wide-ranging conception of religion" (p. 252).

The book is well written, clearly structured, and carefully produced. As it does not presuppose a great deal of familiarity with the lives and ideas of the authors discussed in it, there is inevitably much that is not new and may in fact be found in earlier introductions to and histories of comparative religious studies. However, the carefully arranged chapters, focusing on Britain in the crucial period between 1860 and 1915, present a coherent and tightly knit argument, well suited to the author's aim of highlighting the contemporary background of Victorian comparative religious studies. In this context, it was a wise decision to discuss in detail the work of Lang, which has tended to be dismissed as amateurish in recent years but is an illuminating and by no means idiosyncratic reflection of the spirit of the times. Moreover, readers will find not only well-structured basic information and orientation but also shrewd remarks on details, as, for instance, when the author notes that Robertson Smith's biographer John Sutherland Black had arrived at a view of religion much more radical than Smith's and therefore should not be assumed to represent the views of his friend without bias (p. 273, n. 1). In fact, it might be argued that the source problem is even more complex, as the 1912 biography was a collaborative effort of Black, his friend George Chrystal, and the latter's son George William Chrystal, whose relative share in the enterprise must remain largely a matter of speculation. As another source-critical caveat, the author should perhaps have used Max Müller's various accounts of his own career with a little more discretion, questioning their romantic self-stylization and balancing it with the views of Müller's contemporary critics. These remarks, however, in no way detract from the book's value; it offers basic information well suited to the needs of the undergraduate student, as well as fresh insights to the advanced scholar.

BERNHARD MAIER

Eberhard Karls Universität Tübingen

INA ZWEINIGER-BARGIELOWSKA. Managing the Body: Beauty, Health, and Fitness in Britain, 1880–1939. New York: Oxford University Press. 2010. Pp. xi, 394. $115.00.

Ina Zweiniger-Bargielowska's research into the history of the body began when she became interested in women's body image and weight issues since the 1960s. It then expanded to cover attitudes affecting the size and shape of both men's and women's bodies from the 1880s onward. This book presents the fruits of her research on the period between 1880 and 1939. It provides a fascinating and richly illustrated history of discourses surrounding the making of British bodies during that time.

The monograph is divided into two parts, topped and tailed by an introduction and conclusion. The first part deals with the period 1880–1914 in three chapters. The first two concern male bodies. Chapter one places the growth of interest in the male body in the context of increasing anxieties about the effects of modern urban lifestyles on health and physical fitness. Chapter two shows how concerns about physical deterioration were woven into arguments about patriotic and imperial necessity. The third chapter illustrates the impact of these ideas on women, focusing on themes of physical culture, "race motherhood," and the importance of proper feeding.

Part two covers the period between 1918 and 1939. Chapter four shows how wartime revelations about the health of British men generated a campaign to build an "A1" nation. Chapter five examines issues associated with the popularity of physical culture, its relationship to fascism, anxieties about male obesity, and male dress reform. Chapter six discusses the parallel movement to encourage women's fitness, the relationship between sex and race, and the yoking together of food, health, and beauty. The seventh chapter suggests—a little contentiously, perhaps—that "the historical literature and popular perceptions of the 1930s" are still dominated by a "left-wing perspective" that emphasizes the long years of unemployment and deprivation; Zweiniger-Bargielowska contrasts this with an alternative image of fit and healthy bodies nourished by rising living standards.

The book is animated by two underlying and inter-related ideas. The first is that the failure to achieve high standards of physical health and fitness was interpreted in primarily individualistic terms or, in other words, as a symbol of personal failure. The second is that individuals were told that they had a patriotic duty to overcome this failure in order to discharge the responsibilities of citizenship. As a result, individual men and women were placed under increasing pressure to make themselves fit for the world in which they lived. These ideas were expressed directly by the Scottish medical officer William Leslie Mackenzie, who wrote that “it has taken a century to persuade the ordinary citizen that his environment of home and street and atmosphere is . . . in some measure his own creation. Perhaps, with the greater pace of today, it will take less than a century to persuade him that it is . . . his duty to fit himself to live in it” (The Health of the Schoolchild [1906], p. 50).

This book will undoubtedly become a major reference point for students of the history of the body and the history of medicine more generally, but there are a number of ways in which it might have been developed further. Although the author has gone to some lengths to place the history of the body in the wider context of improvements in health standards, she makes comparatively few references to the work of anthropometric historians, who have used data on the size and shape of people’s bodies to illustrate those changes. This is particularly apparent in chapter seven, which discusses the impact of unemployment on the height of children but makes no reference to changes in the physical measurements of children more generally. Secondly, although the book emphasizes the individualistic nature of the discourse about health and fitness, it would be interesting to know how far these concerns were also reflected in other aspects of social and public policy, such as campaigns to improve housing conditions and promote town planning.

On the back cover of my copy, Peter Mandler suggests that this book “makes our own most deeply-held beliefs and practices look strange and circumstantial” while, in other ways, it also illustrates some striking similarities between the period it discusses and the present day. Mandler argues that “yesterday’s answers . . . once focused on men rather than women, on elites rather than ordinary people,” and yet the book demonstrates how the pursuit of “health, beauty and fitness” was enjoined on people of both sexes and all classes. Zweiniger-Bargielowska also highlights the importance of concerns about anorexia, obesity, and the struggle for physical fitness. The lives of our parents and grandparents may not have been so different from our own.

BERNARD HARRIS
University of Southampton

TONY MASON and ELIZA RIEDI. Sport and the Military: The British Armed Forces, 1880–1960. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2010. Pp. ix, 288. Cloth $90.00, paper $32.99.

This deeply researched book provides the first close look at the role of sport in the British military. Tony Mason and Eliza Riedi offer a fascinating account that highlights the importance of military sport, not just at home but on battleships, behind the trenches in World War I, and in the midst of the Desert War. Sport was played by servicemen and women, both officers and those in the ranks. Sport remained strictly sex segregated, but it increasingly brought together people from all ranks. It functioned both as a marker reinforcing military and social hierarchies and as a means to blur these distinctions, at least on the playing field. This book charts the rise of military sport from informal beginnings in the late Victorian period to the foundation of the Army Sport Control Board in 1918 and the creation of corresponding bodies in the Royal Navy and Royal Air Force, concluding with the era of national service. While equestrian sport and particularly hunting and polo dominated officer sport until the 1930s, football was most popular among the ranks, followed by rugby, boxing, cricket, and track and field. Mason and Riedi also explore the relationship between military and civilian sport; for example, they point to the pioneering role of the Royal Engineers in promoting the new game of football in the 1870s and 1880s.

The sheer amount of time spent playing sport is striking. In peacetime the lives of officers stationed in Britain and India appear to have been dominated by a variety of sporting activities. Under the leadership of enthusiasts such as Captain Reginald Kentish, a prime mover in extending the provision of sports grounds for troops, opportunities for sport were increasingly made available to the ranks from the turn of the century. Playing sports did not end following the outbreak of war. Soldiers short of equipment early in World War I improvised cricket sets, using old jam tins as balls, hop poles for bats, and bully beef tins for wickets. As the military situation stabilized, competitions and tournaments behind the lines became an established routine in northern France. This practice was replicated in World War II. Accomplished sportsmen were frequently excused from ordinary duties, and professional footballers were used to entertain troops.

Why was sport such a prominent aspect of military life? Sport served a variety of functions. One longstanding argument posits sport as training for war, and indeed, the value of sport in cultivating fitness and a fighting spirit has long been recognized. From the later nineteenth century, this perspective was increasingly extended to include the ranks, and military reformers advocated sports as a means of social control. Troops kept busy playing and watching sports were less likely to frequent pubs or brothels. However, there were limits to the morally uplifting impact of sport, because competitions also provided opportunities for drinking and gambling. Secondly, sport helped to foster an esprit de corps within the unit and, more generally, to maintain morale, distracting the troops from the horrors of war. The maintenance of morale was equally important during demobilization after the two world wars, when the military authorities used sport to counter potential discontent and to maintain discipline. In January 1919, a British Expeditionary Force Sport Board was established to coordinate sporting activities to keep the men from “grousing,” and after VE Day, sport was promoted to “occupy the waking hours of the troops” (pp. 107, 206). Perhaps the most important function of sport was to provide relief from the “boredom unspeakable” (p. 91) endured by most servicemen, whether garrisoned or stationed far from home. This was even more important for prisoners of war in Germany during World War II, who developed a sporting culture as a source of solace.

This book would have benefitted from a more fully developed gender analysis, both with regard to situating military sport within wider debates about masculinity and in giving more space to women. The implication of sport as a site of male bonding within and between ranks and the diverse masculine codes represented by the promotion of amateurism in the face of a working-class culture of professionalism could have been discussed further. Although the book promises to address both sexes in the introduction (p. 13), a mere six pages toward the end are devoted to women. Women's military role was of course auxiliary and they accounted for only a fraction of personnel, but this topic deserves greater attention. There is virtually nothing about the relationship between female military sport and constructions of femininity in wartime or following the establishment of permanent women's services in the late 1940s. Regardless, Mason and Riedi provide new insight into an important and neglected topic. Their book should be essential reading not only for scholars and students working on military history and the history of sport, but also for those interested in modern British social and cultural history more generally.

INA ZWEINIGER-BARGIELOWSKA
University of Illinois,
Chicago

RUPERT RICHARD ARROWSMITH. Modernism and the Museum: Asian, African, and Pacific Art and the London Avant-Garde. (Oxford English Monographs.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 228. $110.00.

This book recalls Moncure Daniel Conway's character Professor Omnium, who, proposing "an excursion round the world," explains that "we can never go round the world, except in a small, limited way, if we leave London . . . Ten thousand people and a dozen governments have been at infinite pains and expense to bring the cream of the East and of the West to your own doors" (Travels in South Kensington [1882], pp. 21–23). In Rupert Richard Arrowsmith's study, the geography of the British Museum becomes a microcosm of world culture. We encounter Ezra Pound haunting the reading room and confronting the massive Assyrian Shedu. Under the museum's influence, Henri Gaudier-Brzeska turns against "the fair Greek [who] saw himself only" in favor of a gallery of hieratic Egyptian and Assyrian stone carvings; from there, we catch a fleeting glimpse of him "heading for the Asiatic section" and Japanese netsuke (p. 97). Arrowsmith argues persuasively that these powerful stimuli, buried deep behind the museum's classical facade, decisively affected the work of the London avant-garde.

There is now a sizeable literature on the relationship between the practices of collecting and display by museums and the wider history of imperialism. Arrow-smith, however, is interested in the impact of the imperial collections of non-Western art, and the institutions that preserved and disseminated them, on the development of English Modernism. Frustrated with the lack of expertise in the areas his subtitle denotes—the arts of Asia, Africa, and the Pacific—on the part of historians of Modernism, he intends to reorient the avant-garde narrative, insisting that objects in London collections of work from outside the Western tradition left a profound imprint on major Modernist practice, especially in the fields that most interest him: sculpture and poetry.

The question of influence—or, even more vaguely, of inspiration—still generates anxiety in art historians. A generation ago, controversy greeted the Museum of Modern Art's (MoMA) celebration of Modernist responses to African objects in the exhibition "Primitivism" in Twentieth-Century Art: Affinity of the Tribal and the Modern (1984). James Clifford's lethal critique of the exhibition revealed its replication of colonial ethnological categories and its lack of expertise concerning—or interest in—the origins, meaning, and function of the African objects displayed. But what should replace "primitivism"? In his treatment of Benin bronzes and their influence on Jacob Epstein, Arrowsmith could have usefully referenced Annie E. Coombes's fundamental work Reinventing Africa: Museums, Material Culture and Popular Imagination (1994). He provides a compelling account both of the British Museum's acquisition of the bronzes and their direct impact on Epstein's work but fails to connect the two.

Epstein looms large, moving back from Paris to London in 1905 to be near the British Museum and creating a scandal, well documented in the existing literature, with his relief sculptures for the new headquarters of the British Medical Association. Arrowsmith, however, argues that Epstein worked in dialogue with the architect Charles Holden and the historian of Indian art Ananda Kentish Coomaraswamy to create what was understood as "an Indian temple on the Strand," a "building based on Indian rather than European aesthetic principles" (p. 34). This might be pushing it too far, but Arrowsmith has no truck with theories of ambivalence and hybridity of the Homi Bhabha school. He demonstrates the direct influence of Buddhist and early Hindu sculpture at the heart of imperial London. Further, Arrowsmith argues persuasively that Epstein's masterpiece, the unmistakably phallic Rock Drill of 1913, ostensibly a dystopian product of the machine age, actually issues forth from Epstein's study of African art, revealing colonial parentage for a troubled icon of British Modernism.

Arrowsmith is well versed in most, if not all, the many aspects of global artistic production referenced in this book and writes knowledgeably about Asian, African, and Pacific objects as well as about London Modernism (itself other to the self-elected metropolises of Paris and New York). It is a rare scholar who can move with such expertise across these fields, each with its own historiography; rarer still is the art historian who troubles to piece together evidence from fragmentary institutional archives. Some of the most important details in this book are revealed by the Register of the British Museum's print room; the dates of Pound's visits, for example, are painstakingly correlated with new acquisitions made by Laurence Binyon, which are in turn linked to the poet's literary productions.

Also significant is Arrowsmith's refashioning of the role of the museum not as merely a crude agent of imperialism, but rather as a source of expertise and a treasure trove of objects of extraordinary beauty. Many of the best effects in this text concern interactions between curators and artists, such as that between Binyon and Pound poring over Japanese prints. Nobody would mistake Binyon's own poetry, however, for Modernism, and Arrowsmith could have moved his revisionist project further had he undermined the avant-garde/academic binary which is an unquestioned premise of his project. The creative exploration of museum collections was not restricted to the small avant-garde discussed here.

The text is not without slips. Arrowsmith is unlucky in having miscited the present reviewer's work (p. 2). Henry Hardy Cole (p. 43, but given in the index as p. 40) was not the "president of the South Kensington Museum" but an employee of the Archaeological Survey of India and the son of the first director of the museum. Arrowsmith describes as Chola (a period ending in the thirteenth century) a bronze Parvati that he dates to the mid-sixteenth century (fig. 3). The captioning is imprecise and the photographs sometimes poorly reproduced, especially for a book far too expensive for any student, and most professors, to purchase.

Arrowsmith's project is an important one, and it is to be hoped that a new generation of scholars will consult this work: it offers a genuinely important revision of Modernism's interactions with the museum and with art from beyond the Western tradition. He refuses, however, to make the next obvious move and suggest that, whatever its ostensible political affiliations, Modernism was made possible by, and was indeed perhaps an aspect of, European imperialism, two historical formations that peaked and collapsed together.

TIM BARRINGER
Yale University

H. L. MALCHOW. Special Relations: The Americanization of Britain? Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press. 2011. Pp. xvii, 368. $65.00.

H. L. Malchow's important new book refreshingly treats the "special relationship" between Britain and the United States not in terms of high politics, diplomacy, or economics—as scholars have usually done—but rather in terms of popular culture, concentrating on the two decades separating the Suez Crisis and the U.S. Bicentennial.

Malchow divides the book into four parts, treating urban architectural modernism and student protest (part one), the counterculture (part two), the liberation movements of blacks, women, and gays (part three), and, finally, the subsequent reaction against modernism and counterculture (part four).

The British, according to Malchow, associated modernism with America, and this provoked in the "swinging London" of the early 1960s both optimism about new possibilities and anxiety that London was being "Manhattanized." The Hilton Hotel (1963) overlooking Hyde Park became the focus of criticism given its culturally significant location, while Eero Saarinen's Grosvenor Square U.S. embassy became a symbol of American arrogance and the site of student protest against the Vietnam War.

Student protest, and the counterculture with which it was associated, attacked U.S. Cold War leadership and mainstream American culture, but for Malchow protest and counterculture were just as much American exports as the Hilton. The counterculture then, defined here as a "system of aesthetics the central purpose of which was the destruction of boundaries and conventions," represented not a break with "American modernity but its continuation" (p. 97). In Britain it relied on American rhetoric, American example, and even American expatriate leadership.

In his discussion of the counterculture, Malchow responds to revisionists who have emphasized that the radicals were a minority and never achieved their ambitious political goals. He argues that Britons far beyond the committed militants were touched by the "powerful sense of liberation," including the many young people listening to American-influenced pirate radio and attending the massive music festivals of the era. Indeed, he maintains that the counterculture was "uniquely unsettling" in a "class-bound country with a postwar identity crisis," providing British youth with "an alternative deeply informed by American populism, anarchic libertarianism, and antiestablishment youth style to focus their own cultural and political assault on the British Establishment" (pp. 106, 112).

While Malchow acknowledges that the countercultural moment was short-lived, confined to a few years in the late 1960s, it influenced the subsequent liberation movements, which drew on counterculture's militant subjectivity and theatricality. Each of these movements broke with a peaceful, integrationist, and reformist past, embracing radicalism and focusing not on what white (or male or straight) liberal sympathizers could provide but on constructing identities apart from historical stereotypes: assertive, unashamed, and self-empowered. Here too Malchow responds to revisionists who would deny the lasting impact of the liberationist movements. What endured was the transformed mentality, the new confidence, and self-awareness.

Throughout Malchow challenges those scholars who have sought an "authentic" British counterculture or who have maintained that "local reception" of American culture resulted in a "negotiated" cultural "hybridity." Here are the buzzwords of the recent history of cross-cultural contacts. The easy approach would have been to accept this template. Malchow does not.

Though he does acknowledge at times a circularity of influence and admits differences of context between the United States and Britain, he forcefully argues from the start for the “hegemonic reality of the postwar American cultural presence” (p. 2). For him, “to privilege and exaggerate local difference” is to lose sight of this overwhelming truth.

Indeed, even the subsequent reaction against American modernity, the 1970s retreat to “Heritage Britain,” provides further evidence of cultural hegemony for Malchow. Many of the elements of this nostalgic turn were related to the “growing American market, real and potential” (p. 263). Here Malchow expands on the cultural theorist Dominic Strinati’s suggestion that “Americanization may also take the form of Britain selling to Americans ‘Americanized’ representations of itself, and bringing back American produced and validated versions of constructions of ‘Britishness’” (quoted p. 264). While there was certainly a domestic demand for nostalgia, “Heritage Britain” owed much not only to the demand of American consumers for nostalgic British television, sport (Wimbledon tennis), and antiques but also to the expectations of American tourists.

There is little here to criticize. The narrative does falter when treating the liberation movements, if only because the chapters on feminism and gay liberation seem repetitive following the chapter on black power, perhaps necessarily given the reliance of the former movements on the rhetoric and example of the last. Likewise, his insistence on the lasting legacy of the counterculture, though certainly plausible, is difficult to demonstrate fully. One might also note a tendency to refer too straightforwardly to “the Establishment.” In the end, however, Malchow has produced a very readable and exceptionally stimulating book. Historians and other scholars of postwar Britain ought to consult it, and to include it on their graduate students’ reading lists. Many Americanists will also find it of interest.

JAMES LOTHIAN
Binghamton University,
State University of New York

GRACE E. COOLIDGE. Guardianship, Gender, and the Nobility in Early Modern Spain. (Women and Gender in the Early Modern World.) Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2011. Pp. viii, 176. $104.95.

When scholars have addressed the subject of aristocratic women as guardians of minor children, they have done so either indirectly, as part of a study of widowhood (Stanley Chojnacki, Ann Crabb, Christiane Klapisch-Zuber), or by focusing on England (Barbara Harris, Joel T. Rosenthal, Sue Sheridan Walker), Italy (Guilia Calvi), or the Low Countries (Martha C. Howell). Spain has been notably absent from the historiography. Grace E. Coolidge’s excellent, tightly focused study of women from families at the pinnacle of the early modern Spanish nobility, the grandezas (grandees)—dukes, marquises, and counts—now fills this gap. Working with an impressive set of legal sources, Coolidge makes an important distinction between Spain and the rest of Europe. Spanish women guardians “enjoyed more economic and political power than many of their contemporaries” (p. 5) because they could own property, and because inheritance laws mandated dividing familial property equally among all legitimate children. Female guardians, “legally knowledgeable . . . resourceful, clever, and tenacious in defense of their wards and property” (p. 127), renounced laws in favor of women when they temporarily assumed the legally male status of head of household, and were solely responsible for their decisions. In a cultural milieu of aspiration, social competition, and acquisition, Spanish women guardians were vital to family, politics, and economics. Coolidge’s book is an important addition to the study of women and gender in the context of legal, social, and family history.

Spanish noblewomen guardians were well-educated, experienced, and self-confident widows who had the full approval of their husbands and the willing support of male family members (eighty percent of noblemen chose their wives to serve as guardian in the event of their death). Coolidge describes these women as “double-edged swords” (p. 152) who violated traditional norms of deferential modesty while acting openly in political, military, economic, and legal realms. They could do so because their steadfast loyalty to family and lineage made their families eager to violate gender norms. Moreover, because women’s authority was temporary, men who would not ordinarily be inclined to share power with women found female guardianship more palatable. This contingent status in a pragmatic “flexible patriarchy” (p. 8) allowed female guardians between 1349 and 1751 to protect the integrity of their lineage and to “cheat death of its triumph” (p. 13).

Coolidge’s meticulously documented study is more than an accounting of the mundane legal, economic, social, cultural, and political details of estate management. Her sources yield fascinating insights into the emotional worlds and the affectionate character, happy or otherwise, of marriage and family life. This book also reconfigures the lineaments of political power, showing women as far more central to royal politics than most studies to date have described. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, women guardians strategically asserted rights to property, consolidated power, and used military force to defend borders. When the economy worsened in the sixteenth century, as heads of land-rich but cash-poor aristocratic families, they managed debt and used their influence at court rather than armies to defend their wards. Moreover, guardianship provides important evidence concerning women’s education. The noblewomen Coolidge describes were educated at home, in the convent or colegio, and in the company of other active, vocal, shrewd, intelligent, tough-minded politically savvy women.

Coolidge taps the wealth of proscriptive and descriptive sources produced by a litigious society: law codes, guardianship documents, wills, dowry and marriage contracts, lawsuits, family archives, and letters. The book outlines the life-cycle of a guardian, whether as a tutor (for girls age twelve or younger, boys age fourteen or younger), curator (girls and boys between twelve or fourteen and twenty-five), or curator ad litem (guardian of property, not people). Similarly, Coolidge details premortem provisions to establish guardianship, education, estate management, and legal representation, and describes the arranging of marriages and dowries, and the relinquishing the guardianship when wards came of age.

Coolidge never claims more than evidence can support. The book, however, would have been richer and no less credible had she been willing to reach farther in her analysis of gender and power. She suggests that scholars think comparatively about a “flexible patriarchy,” but her thesis would be deeper and more nuanced if she had included a discussion of what Judith M. Bennett terms “patriarchal equilibrium” and Sarah Hanley’s analysis of how the practices of noblewomen in early modern France influenced laws concerning women of all ranks. Coolidge also missed an opportunity to link guardianship to other, related forms of temporary authority granted to women such as queens-regent and queens-lieutenant. Nevertheless, her meticulous research should prompt comparisons across a wide swath of time and space to enable us to better understand a fuller range of a noblewoman’s access to and use of power in premodern Europe.

THERESA EARENIGHT
Seattle University

BRYAN GIVENS. Judging Maria de Macedo: A Female Visionary and the Inquisition in Early Modern Portugal. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 255. $48.00.

In November 1635, Maria de Macedo, a ten-year-old girl in Lisbon whose mother had died and who had a difficult relationship with her stepmother, began to claim she was being touched at night. Maria then suggested she was being visited by creatures, including a giant lizard. Encouraged by her aunt, who was hopeful of good fortune, Maria began to see the creatures as enchanted Moors who could shift shape and bring treasure. During fourteen years, in her imagination, Maria became their servant, working daily in the mines of their lands and bringing them water. As Maria grew older, and more aware of her own Christian faith, the creatures whom she served were gradually transformed. In May 1650, when Maria became associated with sebastianistas, the Moors of her original visions became the Christian people of King Sebastian (1557–1578) and their land his Hidden Isle, from whence he would return with his fleet to Portugal. In May 1658, Maria was denounced to the Holy Office, but her case was not acted upon until 1665, when her visions had become more widely known. After a process lasting about a year, Maria was found guilty of falsely claiming revelations, transportations, and visions and was sentenced to five years of exile. Refusing to confess, she was tortured and then admitted to inventing her story so her stepmother would treat her better. Maria repeated this confession without torture, appeared in an auto-da-fé, but was spared a public whipping because it was decided that her husband, Feliciano Machado, was of noble stock. Maria was ultimately spared exile as well, because Feliciano had died during the trial and she was thus a widow with four children.

This strange story is not unknown to historians and is discussed by Jacqueline Hermann in her study of Sebastianism, No reino do desejado (1998). Bryan Givens’s work is the first monograph on the case and is of special interest to historians of the Inquisition. He utilizes testimony from Maria prior to her trial, dictated to her husband in 1650, as well as Feliciano’s record of his wife’s experiences written down in 1658. Thus we can hear Maria in large measure as she wished to be heard (and, most interestingly, her testimony to the Inquisition was not dramatically different from that offered previously).

Givens does a good job in sketching the background to the complicated development of Sebastianism in Portugal after the king’s defeat at Alcazarquivir in 1578—its popularity during the Iberian Union (1580–1640), the competition with supporters of João IV (1640–1656), and the association of Sebastian with the Hidden Isle. Very usefully, Givens then offers us a translation of Maria’s testimony concerning her visions, which is followed by a careful description of her trial. Givens establishes the timeline for the evolution of Maria’s fantasies before analyzing the diverse cultural strands that were interwoven into her descriptions. Finally, Givens looks at the culture of the inquisitors who tried Maria. Although Maria’s story tells us a significant amount about early modern Portuguese non-elite culture, it may well be that this final section proves of most historical interest. The inquisitors were far from uniform in their interpretation of the answers they received from Maria and other witnesses. Fernão Correa de la Cerda appears to have remained convinced throughout that Maria had made a pact with the Devil, while his companion Francisco Barreto thought quite differently. The qualificador João Gomes countenanced the possibility that Sebastian might still return, which reminds us that divisions between the “elite” and “non-elite” are far less clear-cut than sometimes supposed.

Inevitably there are points where the reader might disagree with Givens’s conclusions. Is it likely that de Sousa de Macedo’s initial denunciation of Maria was largely disinterested? If Maria did have visions and they were brought on by over-vigorous fasting (which was not uncommon), why did neither her defense counsel, Domingos Vieira de Santo, nor any of the witnesses mention something that could have been used in her favor? Were the Cockaigne legends influential on Maria’s imaginings about the Hidden Isle? Could Maria’s island not be influenced by Euhemerus’s Panchaea, transmitted indirectly through Lactantius, whose work her friend Father Manoel da Costa was reading? And could the James of Aragon on the island not be James II the Just, the sometime protector of the Joachite Arnau de Vilanova?

Of course, if we may veer away from Givens on occasion it is only because he has allowed us to travel the same route by presenting his evidence and his arguments clearly. This is a valuable book for the history of Sebastianism, the operations of the Inquisition, and the religious culture of early modern Portugal.

DAMIAN J. SMITH
Saint Louis University

GILLIAN WEISS, Captives and Corsairs: France and Slavery in the Early Modern Mediterranean. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 389. $65.00.

The last decade has witnessed a rise in academic literature focused on global or transnational studies. In regard to early modern history, this trend has reanimated discussions famously initiated by Fernand Braudel on the Mediterranean as a unit for historical study. Scholars of medieval, Renaissance, and early modern Italy have led historical discussions in this vein, sharing insight on questions of identity, commerce, colonialism, and cultural hybridity. For American scholars of French early modern history, however, the Mediterranean has remained largely terra incognita. Accepting that the Ottoman Empire declined by the eighteenth century, and that the Mediterranean became relevant to France only under Napoleon Bonaparte or with the conquest of Algeria, early modernists have traditionally left research on the Mediterranean to modernists, whose research on imperialism has dominated scholarship on French encounters with the “other.”

In this new book, Gillian Weiss challenges the assumption that the Mediterranean world was irrelevant to early modern France. Canvassing an interdisciplinary array of archival and printed sources, including newspaper accounts, novels, plays, paintings, correspondence among diplomats in Marseille, Versailles, and North Africa, and religious accounts pertaining to slave redemptions, Weiss enriches our understanding of Barbary slavery and its impact on French identity and state-building. While filling a major historiographical gap, she revises the dominant story of French nation-building by demonstrating that notions of Frenchness, French subjecthood, and French citizenship were negotiated through interactions among royal administrators, diplomats, municipal leaders, religious personnel, and private individuals in Muslim territories and France’s Mediterranean seaports. The French state, in other words, was not directed solely from “the center” nor developed in a domestic bubble.

By placing the story of early modern state-building in global context, Captives and Corsairs enhances scholarship on slavery and Christian-Islamic relations. Steering away from measuring Old World servitude against New World slavery, Weiss charts how, over three centuries, human bondage transformed from an institution understood in terms of “religion and mischance” to one defined by “race and destiny” (p. 3). While Atlantic slavery replaced Mediterranean, Weiss demonstrates how the imperative toward saving French slaves in Barbary and making free Frenchmen informed the later projects of “destroying slavery and making colonies” (p. 5). This argument is strengthened, moreover, as Weiss complicates the historical narrative of Christian-Islamic interactions in the Mediterranean. Questioning the traditional story of crescent and cross warring against one another, she shows how sultans, beys, deys, kings, municipal leaders, and diplomats responded to slavery and fostered relationships between France and the Ottoman satellites that ranged between amicable and antagonistic.

Framed between the establishment of the Barbary regencies (1580s) and the conquest of Algeria (1830), the book begins by establishing how Franco-Ottoman relations were relatively relaxed due to the diplomatic alliance between Suleiman and Francis I. Foreign policies pursued by Morocco, Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli independently of Constantinople, combined with tit-for-tat violence between Christians and Muslims along the sea-coasts, however, rendered peace between Turkey and France tenuous. Piracy and slave-taking followed. Between the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, municipal authorities, religious personnel, most notably the Trinitarians and Mercedarians, and communities along France’s Mediterranean coast took it upon themselves to liberate French slaves in Barbary while the French crown remained preoccupied with anti-Habsburg warfare. While working independently of the monarchy, they produced publications and organized processions of freed slaves that projected an image of an idealized France and a depraved Barbary that would form the foundation for future, royally led projects for state-building.

Weiss describes how the monarchy became more invested in manumission under Louis XIV, who “charted a more aggressive course” (p. 53) against Barbary to validate French absolute power in the Mediterranean. Traditional rituals and practices of slave liberation fell under centralized guidance and glorified the French king, French freedom, and the French religion. Philippe d’Orléans, Louis XV, and Louis XVI similarly used slave manumission as a strategy to bind subjects to the state. The combination of domestic troubles, financial crises, Enlightened secularism, and decline in Mediterranean slavery, however, put traditional methods of slave liberation in crisis by the end of the eighteenth century. Christian servitude and “scenes of religio-political salvation” (p. 117) became less relevant as Atlantic racially determined slavery predominated. The French Revolution completed this shift as the suppression of religious orders brought manumission under the aegis of the state. Nonetheless, religious vocabulary saw continued usage as revolutionary and Napoleonic ideologies of regeneration and the civilizing mission appropriated traditional notions of redemption and deliverance. Such rhetoric helped racialize slavery and "connect the advent of French liberty to the colonization of North Africa" (p. 130).

Captives and Corsairs makes major contributions to the literature on early modern religion, slavery, diplomacy, and culture. Its municipal, provincial, and overseas perspectives enrich traditional narratives of absolutism and state-building, create a much-needed dialogue between early modern and modern histories of France, and demonstrate that new, global methodologies can enliven traditional historical questions.

JUNKO THÉRÈSE TAKEDA
Syracuse University

MEREDITH MARTIN. Dairy Queens: The Politics of Pastoral Architecture from Catherine De' Medici to Marie-Antoinette. (Harvard Historical Studies, number 176.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. 328. $45.00.

Making the case for the significance of the pleasure dairy, most famous in relation to Marie-Antoinette's penchant for playing the milkmaid, seems a tall order. But Meredith Martin reveals that the history of this early modern building type tells an important story about the dynamics of class, gender, and power in Old Regime France.

Introduced from Italy by Catherine de' Medici, the pleasure dairies she constructed at Fontainebleau and Saint-Maur asserted images of responsible female political authority that rested on maternal care and agricultural management. Catherine's retreats and the entertainments she sponsored at them highlighted her combining work and leisure (negotium and otium) in service of the monarchy. Pastoral poetry and astrological decoration associated with the dairies evoked female rule, as when Pierre de Ronsard called Catherine "the French Cybele" (p. 53) and celebrated her support of her royal sons. Despite some dissent, Catherine's message emphasized her work on behalf of the prosperity and peace of the kingdom.

The gender politics of Catherine's dairies were not acceptable to Louis XIV. He sought to assert "royal renewal, domesticated femininity, and agricultural reform" with his menagerie at Versailles (p. 71). The didactic decoration and spatial organization there projected his claims for control over nature and fertility. Reflecting the scholarship on the cultural politics of Louis XIV's monarchy, Martin traces the contestation over the meanings of the pleasure dairy. Elite women such as the Duchesse de Montpensier retired from court and established pleasure dairies as a mode of protest against Louis XIV's controlling proclivities. The princes of Condé undercut the king's claims by establishing a pleasure dairy at Chantilly in order to declare the strength, fecundity, and skilled husbandry of their family. Louis then reconfigured the dairy at Versailles for Marie-Adélaïde, Duchesse de Bourgogne (the wife of his grandson), allowing her to situate herself in the Versailles social hierarchy. That Marie-Adélaïde was associated with the *dévo*t reform movement headed by Louis XIV's morganatic wife, Madame de Maintenon, only complicated the dynamics of containment and protest, feminine industry and masculine control.

If disaffected aristocrats could stake political claims by means of the pleasure dairy, so could the king's mistress—when the king was Louis XV and the mistress was Madame de Pompadour. Building her position at court in part through patronage associated with her pleasure dairy, Pompadour supported industry (Sèvres brought out drinking vessels specifically for milk) and neo-Hippocratic health claims based on the healing power of nature. Pompadour's pleasure dairy activities fit comfortably within notions of agricultural productivity and the value of domesticity for health and fertility espoused by the Physiocrats. The artificiality of Pompadour's country retreats and assertions of simplicity, however, encouraged skepticism about aristocratic devotion to health and reform.

While Pompadour's assertions of health and clean living were countered by claims that her body was diseased and her influence pernicious, she had it easy compared to Marie-Antoinette. Louis XVI's wife had her pleasure dairy at the Hameau de Versailles. The queen did not actually milk the cows herself—she preferred to watch—and her retreat into (faux) country living contributed to complaints about her extravagance. Attempts to associate the queen with fertility and French agricultural traditions failed in part because she insisted on control over her dairy, excluding the king and allowing scandalous informality among her intimates. Marie-Antoinette's performances of the pastoral highlighted her distance from the realities of rural life. Sexually ambiguous pastoral imagery opened the door for criticism based on georgic understandings of agricultural life as a matter of labor rather than leisure. Reformers increasingly demanded that women remove to the countryside and into domesticity. Idealized images of feminine, maternal care enjoyed tremendous popularity and underscored the artifice of Marie-Antoinette's pastoral playgrounds.

Reform impulses came from within the monarchy as well, but efforts to reassert royal, masculine control over the pastoral semiotics of the pleasure dairy failed. Louis XVI's building director, the Comte d'Angiviller, attempted to impose a vision of political regeneration and domesticated femininity at the king's estate at Rambouillet. The pleasure dairy there, constructed as a present for Marie-Antoinette without her input, developed a French neoclassical aesthetic that stressed masculine public service. Celebrations of breastfeeding and domesticity aimed to relegate elite women to the sidelines and allow the monarchy to renew the polity on its own terms. The fantasy of dutiful femininity combined with the reform of taste in the direction of utility to render Marie-Antoinette as an exemplar of degeneration.

While Martin speculates on occasion (usually when documents are no longer extant) and at times offers somewhat jarring readings, as when Rambouillet is described as creating a feeling "reminiscent of the womb or the polymorphous pleasures of infancy" (p. 236), her overall achievement far outweighs these passing moments. Martin conveys the complexity of these strange remnants of and monuments to feminine power, monarchical fecundity, aristocratic protest, and reformist impulses.

KATHERINE CRAWFORD
Vanderbilt University

THOMAS E. KAISER and DALE K. VAN KLEY, editors. From Deficit to Deluge: The Origins of the French Revolution. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 345. Cloth $65.00, paper $25.95.

Forget "revisionism" and "Marxism"! This stimulating and valuable collection edited by Thomas E. Kaiser and Dale K. Van Kley reminds us just how far debates on the origins of the French Revolution have come since the heady days when two supposedly diametrically opposed interpretations confronted each other. Here we find, instead, the more valuable and subtle kind of historical debates, where the disagreements are about approaches and about the emphasis to be placed on particular causal factors. The seven essays are written by some of the leading English-language specialists on eighteenth-century France and offer well-written examples of some of the most significant recent approaches to the origins of the revolution.

Not that the editors present the volume that way. Rather, they offer us a "central thesis . . . that the French Revolution arose from an unprecedented politicization of the Old Regime's many problems" (p. 249). And the introduction by Kaiser and Van Kley, which includes a wide-ranging and incisive survey of the historiography, indeed makes the case that the fiscal problems of the monarchy, taken alone, need not have resulted in its collapse. It was the government's attempts at reform that opened the way for revolution, and those decisions only made sense within the new political circumstances of the late eighteenth century: the widening of political participation and the relocation of sovereignty in the "nation." Yet neither the fiscal crisis nor the new politics makes sense, the editors point out, if we do not understand the longer-term changes in the world view of French people and the equally long-term shifts in the economy and in the social and political organization of the kingdom. While such factors constrained and structured events in particular ways, they did not lead inevitably to revolution. The political events of 1789 were equally a product of unforeseeable behavior by individuals and groups, of mutual misunderstandings, and sometimes of unpredictable reactions to unprecedented situations.

The three essays that admirably fit this intended re-interpretation are those by Gail Bossenga, Van Kley, and Kaiser. Bossenga's piece on the "financial origins" of the French Revolution is a brilliant synthesis. She explains with remarkable clarity the development of the byzantine fiscal system of the Old Regime, and shows that the finances of the monarchy were integrated with some of its key political and social institutions, office-holding in particular. The tax system was "inefficient, arbitrary, and unresponsive to economic growth" (p. 45). The contradictory measures taken to deal with these problems, aggravated by conflicting assumptions about credit and economic management as much as by the opposition of vested interests, destroyed the French government's credit in the money markets. The reforms of successive ministers undermined the domestic "court capitalism" that was one of the pillars of royal authority, at the same time giving international financiers ever greater power: an explanation for political instability that today's readers will find particularly persuasive. The Estates General was a fiscal necessity as much as a political one.

Van Kley's chapter on the religious origins of the French Revolution, a reworked version of a previously published essay, is also a remarkable synthesis. It explains the way that the French monarchy became Catholic and sacred, essentially in the seventeenth century, and the way that key decisions by Louis XIV destroyed what might have been a crucial alliance between monarchy and Gallicanism. Instead, they set in train the eighteenth-century conflicts over Jansenism that in the long term undermined sacral absolutism, both conceptually and by creating—in alliance with the Enlightenment—a new "public opinion." Van Kley links all this, very convincingly, to the Civil Constitution of the Clergy rather than to the collapse of the Old Regime. He does not reiterate his past arguments about the influence of Jansenism on the "patriot party" of the 1770s and 1780s, and while he defends the idea that the monarchy was desacralized in the late eighteenth century, he does not make the case in any detail. As a result, the connections between the immediate crisis of the 1780s and the "religious origins" remain unclear.

Kaiser's essay on court politics and foreign policy makes a very convincing case for the importance of both in the crisis of the Old Regime. Again, much of this material is familiar, but it is very clearly laid out and like the other essays skillfully links short- and long-term factors. France's long-term decline as a European power, largely because of financial difficulties, as well as successive foreign policy failures and the unpopular Austrian alliance embodied by Marie-Antoinette, discredited the monarchy in "the contemporary public mind" (although quite who this "public" was remains unclear). The detail of foreign policy is fascinating and enlightening, yet in the end "public" misunderstanding of what was happening seems to have been more important than the reality.

The other essays in the volume are all valuable and stimulating, but vary in their contribution to the "central thesis" offered. Keith Michael Baker provides a characteristically brilliant survey of the "symbolic complex" of ideas, assumptions, and discourses that were a crucial part of struggles over representation, sovereignty, and national identity. The resulting revolution, however, looks perilously like a purely discursive construction, with little room for sordid economics or for personalities. Jack A. Goldstone's piece on "social origins," an updated summary of his 1991 book, Revolution and Rebellion in the Early Modern World, deals with long-term demographic and economic factors, the "social" being restricted to some useful analysis of the impact of taxes and prices on various economically defined interest groups. Jeffrey Merrick's perceptive essay argues that shifts in thinking about gender helped to "make the new regime thinkable," but did not directly undermine either the authority of husbands or of the king. Jeremy D. Popkin makes a strong case for the contribution of colonial issues to the revolution, although his discussion shades into an explanation of revolutionary policy toward the colonies. All this leaves the volume as a whole with next to nothing on literacy and communications, on social conflicts independent of economic ones, on consumerism, or on changing social ideologies and hierarchies, the kinds of themes explored, for example, by Daniel Roche and his students, and in recent work on the nobility (for instance, the collection The French Nobility in the Eighteenth Century: Reassessments and New Approaches (2006), edited by Jay M. Smith). Nor does state building receive much attention, despite the occasional reference to Alexis de Tocqueville.

As will be evident from this summary, it is not always clear which revolution is being explained. Some of the essays are primarily concerned with the collapse of the Old Regime, while others better explain the subsequent directions that the revolution took. These are closely related questions, but they are not identical. Another difficulty is the varying points at which "origins"—defined in a footnote as "long-term preconditions that, whether necessary or not, made a French revolution increasingly probable" (p. 272)—become causes. A true synthesis would need to grapple with that question.

This is not, therefore, an integrated interpretation of the origins of the French Revolution. Although the "politicization" theory does provide a certain coherence, and the editors are to be commended for trying, some of the essays go in quite different directions. That is not necessarily a bad thing. Teachers and established scholars will all find something new here, and it will give advanced students the opportunity to debate the various approaches and methodologies and the insights each offers.

DAVID GARRIOCH
Monash University

GISÈLE SAPIRO. La Responsabilité de l'écrivain: Littérature, droit et morale en France (XIX^e-XXI^e siècle). Paris: Éditions du Seuil. 2011. Pp. 746. €35.00.

France may not have marked the origin of the modern intellectual, the archetypal voice in opposition to institutional repression, social injustice, and moral conformity. Contrary to Jürgen Habermas's assertions about the rational French bourgeois public sphere in the eighteenth century, for example, Jonathan Israel has argued that a more radical Enlightenment, especially in opposition to religious oppression, originated much earlier in the Netherlands. But Gisèle Sapiro's magisterial history of the author's responsibility over the past two hundred years makes a powerful case for its development in postrevolutionary France. Since the fall of Napoleon Bonaparte, she contends, literature, the law, and morality interacted in mutually reinforcing ways to elevate the author very nearly to an acknowledged legislator of the world. Such a "déontologie" (p. 40) did not have to wait, as Christophe Charle suggests, until the Dreyfus Affair in the 1890s. Rather, it began with the impassioned commentary on the Interior Ministry's efforts to censor Paul-Louis Courier and Pierre-Jean de Beranger during the Bourbon Restoration, and its conclusion outlasted the fin de siècle, requiring no less than the engaged existentialist assertions of Simone de Beauvoir and Jean-Paul Sartre. Words, like those of the collaborationist Robert Brasillach, were powerful weapons during the German occupation of France.

It is impossible to summarize in short compass the richness of Sapiro's 730-page argument, documented by extensive use of both primary sources, especially from the liberation period, and the scholarly literature on the social history of ideas, more generally concerning the long nineteenth century. Suffice it to state that her approach borrows heavily from Pierre Bourdieu's theories of autonomous cultural fields and Michel Foucault's analyses of the discursive author-function to define the French writer's responsibility over a genealogy of exemplary court cases. Sapiro, a historical sociologist, traces the changing guises of the author in defiant dissent: during the Restoration, this figure was held accountable to the political implications of his or her recently acquired property rights in print (part one); during the Second Empire, the author evolved into a moral arbiter, notwithstanding the efforts of writers like Gustave Flaubert and Charles Baudelaire to recast their authority in a strictly literary domain, that of art for art's sake (part two); during the Third Republic, the increasingly professional writer, a journalist as much as a littérateur, assumed much greater political and nationalist responsibility, just as Emile Zola and Lucien Descaves proclaimed during their trials (part three); and with the occupation, the author, either as a collaborator like Pierre Drieu La Rochelle or as a resistor like Albert Camus, was expected to take sides, to be engaged in matters of immediate public import, far afield from a strictly literary craft, however divided the response to Brasillach's execution and the nature of literary engagement (part four). Over the course of 130 years, the writer became an authority, one empowered to guide the political, social, and moral fortunes of a country that in turn has honored its men (and some women) of letters in institutions like the Académie française and the Panthéon. Sapiro's method is thus to seize upon four significant moments in this trajectory toward authorial autonomy, setting each moment in its proper historical context, whose changing laws constrained free speech in the name of a contested public interest. Ultimately, the intellectual prevailed.

Sapiro's thoughtful epilogue describes the waning influence of literary engagement in France since World War II. The underlying sources of this weakness include the diffusion of the author's professional activities in media other than print; cinema, radio, television, and the Internet compete with traditional vehicles for expressing opinion, such as newspapers and books. New figures now rival literati with comparable public responsibilities: television and radio talk-show hosts, academics, scientists in research centers, and bloggers online, many of them international experts and artists. Moral engagement has given way to commercial promotion, thereby undermining the credibility of intellectual authorities in the eyes of an increasingly distracted and skeptical public. But it may well be the paucity of widely publicized court cases against authors on matters of immediate moment that has had the most telling effect. Censorship is more subtle, more self-imposed, less visible to the reading public; literary causes célèbres are far fewer and much less significant to an "éthique de la forme" (p. 715).

Sapiro's sweeping history is of interest to more than specialists in modern French literature and history. Intellectual historians fascinated by the role of ideas well beyond the boundaries set by growing professionalization of writers in their narrow specializations will want to learn how literature developed more than a life of its own in a culture that has long been the conscience of the West. While authorial responsibility may have indeed changed over the past two hundred years, as Sapiro documents and analyzes with such care, the French intellectual is far from dead to the world.

JAMES SMITH ALLEN

Southern Illinois University Carbondale

CYNTHIA A. BOUTON. Interpreting Social Violence in French Culture: Buzançais, 1847–2008. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 256. Cloth $39.95, e-book $39.95.

In this book Cynthia A. Bouton undertakes an original and very engaging exercise of historiography. She studies the way in which violent riots in the small village of Buzançais, situated in the heart of provincial France, have been the focus and site, since January 1847, of extremely different interpretations that have varied according to historical context. Bouton also highlights the impact of the choice of the media used to narrate, comprehend, and think about the riots. This is therefore a study of the cultural reception of a distinctive event, wherein different memorializing and political interpretations are offered as competing claims over a period of some one hundred sixty years.

Bouton demonstrates that, from the beginning, four main elements have constituted the discursive economy of accounts of violence at Buzançais: the initial spark that led to the obstruction of the grain convoy, the lynching of a local notable who had murdered one of the insurgents, the role played by women in several key episodes of rioting, and finally the behavior and the responsibility of local and departmental authorities and elites. Naturally there is an evolution in the interpretation of these four elements and the weight assigned to them, as well as in the play of their encounter or evasion in the structure of each account. These vary in relation to the timing of the account as well as to the economic and commercial context, to the political and social debates of the time, and to the support of the various media.

In chapter one Bouton reviews the facts of the unfolding of the riots and the violent repression by the government of the July Monarchy that followed. This was not merely another instance of a peasant uprising, but a "mixed conflict" facing in two directions, one toward the past of grain riots and the other toward the future of modern social revolts. Chapter two shows how, after a speedy and demonstrative trial, the event captured the attention of the press, a medium fast on the rise, whose practitioners used it to indict the regime of the bourgeois King Louis Philippe or, conversely, to stigmatize the pyromaniac intellectuals, both republican and socialist, who exploited the ignorance of the people and turned them away from a sane understanding of liberal modernity. Chapter three evokes the perennial quality of the memory of the events of January 1847 throughout the nineteenth century on the part of politicians and journalists as well as song writers and even novelists. In 1880, Jules Vallès offered such an account in his serial novel, Les Blouses. Vallès presented Buzançais as an ancestor of the Commune of 1871. Ten years after the Wall of the Federals, he informed his readers that the issue at stake in the young Third Republic was first and foremost social.

In the wake of 1918 two publications evoking the riots of 1847 introduced an innovation of format, the presence of illustrations. Chapter four discusses Pierre Bouchardon, a conservative magistrate and later admirer of the Vichy regime who published an illustrated fictional account in 1925. In his hands, the old episode of Buzançais became the original expression of violent revolution and class conflict fomented by a population longing for pillage and violence. In chapter five Bouton takes us between the France before May 1968 and the France after that date. In 1956, in the prominent daily newspaper France-Soir, Paul Gordeaux and the illustrator Jean-Albert Carlotti published a comic strip on Buzançais. In a nation thrown off course following World War II, this kind of serial served to recall certain moral values upon which "eternal France" had relied. In this context the rioters of 1847 appeared essentially as ignorant brutes and criminals. By way of contrast, "Bread or Wine," presented on French public television in 1978, invited viewers to judge the riots collectively. The film's "visual grammar" seemed to endorse the validity of certain social demands as well as the right to rise up and precipitate change. This account of the revolt of Buzançais thus assumed a meaning that was at once a prolongation of May 1968 and an anticipation of May 1981.

While the final chapter demonstrates how historians of the past thirty years have attempted to address the ambiguity of the Buzançais riots, the book's conclusion emphasizes the fact that this history bears witness to the indisputable place of the right of insurrection in French political culture when the question of bread and subsistence is at stake. The results of Bouton's efforts are far from negligible, even if more definitive conclusions might have been reached had the author taken a more comparative approach, examining riots, insurrections, and rebellions engendered in the aftermath of July 1830 with respect to their cultural reception over a century and a half. This book offers a very promising route to a broader investigation that remains to be undertaken.

LUDOVIC FROBERT

École Normale Supérieure de Lyon

SOFIE LACHAPELLE. Investigating the Supernatural: From Spiritism and Occultism to Psychical Research and Metapsychics in France, 1853–1931. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2011. Pp. 198. $50.00.

Sophie Lachapelle offers a Wunderkammer of the late nineteenth-century séance and psychical research. The fourth book in as many years to deal with heterodox phenomena in France, Lachapelle's study approaches the subject from the angle of science. Spiritualists and occultists, as others have noted, claimed to be scientific. Lachapelle asks what that meant for them, and what it meant to orthodox science. Her book surveys the various movements, beginning with spiritism in the mid-nineteenth century, with chapters devoted to the occult, to medical and psychological science, to psychical research in general, and finally the Institut métapsychique internationale (IMI) in the early twentieth century. Lachapelle's original contribution lies in her mining of the early archives of the IMI, which was founded in 1919.

Like her subjects, Lachapelle accepts a broad definition of science. She explores the ways that each group tried "scientifically" to explain mediumistic phenomena, including talking tables, mediums' ability to talk to the dead, the production of ectoplasm, and the movement of objects. Each chapter offers a fascinating cabinet of curiosities and insight into how malleable the idea of science was, especially for those outside the professionalizing realm of the university scientist. Lachapelle also keeps an eye on religion, occasionally noting the ways that religion used science, as in the increasing turn by the Roman Catholic Church to use scientific methods to verify miracles. However, the meat of the book is a reportage of the varieties of "science" that flourished around the supernatural and the subliminal in the later nineteenth century. We learn that occultism tried to revise science to include ancient teachings, while psychical research combined professional scientists and philosophers such as Charles Richet and Henri Bergson with a mass audience of amateur "ghost hunters" looking for evidence of appearance of the dead and hauntings. The combination, not surprisingly, was incompatible. Although Lachapelle's main argument seems to be that science was a more open and possible realm for these fifty to sixty years than might be assumed, her book concludes again and again that science and the supernatural do not mix. Each attempt to use the methods of science to investigate these phenomena ran into roadblocks from the mediums who produced them and the people who believed in them. Science offered explanations that were unacceptable to the people who cared about these phenomena. For orthodox science, and even some psychical researchers, involuntary muscle movements or subliminal influence were at work, rather than the spirits or occult knowledge. The investigations themselves proved unsatisfactory to scientists who strove to fit these phenomena into the system of natural laws and could not do so. Mediums refused to submit to controls and were discovered in fraud, yet they were the only means of investigation; scientific objectivity was called again and again into question and psychical science remained uncomfortably on the margins of acceptability.

This is a brief book, only 148 pages of text. It has a tendency to the succinct, recording the ideas of one group of investigators and moving on to the next without comparing them or offering an argument that links them into a whole. One wishes at times for a longer book, and that Lachapelle had asked deeper questions about whether science was more influenced than it thought. Did psychical research push science beyond the empirical? What linked occultism's exteriorization of the soul to psychical research's study of hauntings? Lachapelle's book seems to have been finished too soon to interact with M. Brady Brower's fine work, Unruly Spirits: The Science of Psychic Phenomena in Modern France (2010), which asks similar questions but concentrates on the link between psychology and psychical research. Partly because of its attempt to survey such a broad range of movements, this book is uneven, at times falling into a catalog of views and events. This is the case in her chapter on psychical research, which bogs down in summaries of what the Annales des sciences psychiques published, rather than exploring the fascinating tension posed by the power men of the professional scientific and literary world and their values held over those would-be scientists who shared the pages of the same journal. Why France? is also a question never fully answered, although the struggle of metapsychism to become international is explored in the final chapter.

Investigating the Supernatural straddles the line between cultural history and history of science; its main interest lies in showing how science and the marvelous came together as the supernatural struggled for scientific status. The book's greatest strengths lie in its evocation of the popularity of these new "sciences" as it at the same time explains their ephemeral nature, at least as far as orthodox science was concerned.

LYNN L. SHARP

Whitman College

LAURENCE BADEL. Diplomatie et grands contrats: L'état français et les marchés extérieurs au XX^e siècle. (Internationale, number 80.) Paris: Publications de la Sorbonne. 2010. Pp. 512. €40.00.

A central argument of Laurence Badel's latest book is that the active role played by the French state in promoting French exports within the international economy, particularly since the end of World War II, has long been overlooked by French historians. If diplomatic historians have failed to recognize the ways in which domestic economic concerns have influenced both foreign policy and the machinery of policy making within France, political and economic historians have focused mainly on the role played by the state in the domestic economy. In what Badel terms a regime of "organized liberalism" after 1945 the French state developed a new set of institutions, staffed by personnel trained in the new École nationale d'administration, which was designed to enable the French economy to compete more effectively in international trade than it had done during the first wave of globalization after 1870, without endangering French security in the process.

Tracing the origins of the new approach to foreign policy making back to World War I, when the demands of running a war economy temporarily ended the diplomats' monopoly over questions of foreign trade, Badel shows that it was not until after World War II that the most significant administrative breakthroughs occurred. Each step along the way, from the cautious transfer in 1918 of the commercial attachés from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (Quai d'Orsay) to the Ministry of Commerce, to the decision in March 1920 by the Ministry of Commerce to set up, with the help of an annual state subsidy, a private bank responsible for foreign trade, through to the creation of a raft of new institutions and policy instruments after the liberation of France in 1944, is clearly documented. A new emphasis on helping French firms find export markets outside the protected markets of the colonies while exposing them to increasing competition on the domestic market from the countries in the European Economic Community (EEC) came to be seen as essential to reversing France's decline as a great power. Key foreign policy decisions in the 1950s, the author stresses, were taken for pragmatic rather than ideological reasons.

But as her impressive research into a wide range of public and private archives in France reveals, it was not the creation of institutions that explained the foreign policies adopted. If the Ministry of Finance managed for several years to dominate the Secrétariat général du Comité interministériel pour la coopération économique européenne, set up in 1948 within the prime minister's office, initially to coordinate the French government's action within the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, the Quai d'Orsay reasserted its power over foreign economic policy in the 1960s. Badel's thorough discussion of the series of cooperation agreements that France concluded with the Soviet Union and countries in Eastern Europe in the 1960s and 1970s and in the Middle East in the 1970s reveals multiple objectives, some of which excluded financial logic. In some cases private organizations and interests played a key role in defining French commercial policy. The rationale behind the Gaullist policy of securing large export contracts was that the establishment of a French presence in foreign markets would strengthen French power in the world while the diffusion of French technological expertise would reinforce French influence.

By the end of the 1970s, however, as Badel documents, recognition that the structure of French trade had scarcely changed since the early 1960s, with the main suppliers and markets still concentrated in Western Europe and the United States, and that almost all of the public subsidies for foreign trade had gone to large firms that accounted for no more than fifteen percent of all exports, reopened the debate about the structure and effectiveness of foreign economic policy making in France.

Badel's research sheds much new light on the historical origins of that debate. By revealing the extent of the efforts made by the French state to promote the exports of French firms, alongside its more highly visible role in securing large defense contracts for them, she makes an important contribution to the abundant literature on French state intervention in the economy. Because her focus is on institutions rather than on trade itself, however, her book ends up detailing the trade that was of marginal importance to the French economy. Western Europe is curiously absent from her field of study, yet the decisions to form the EEC and, thirty years later, the Single Market were of critical importance for French exports. A full investigation into how those decisions were taken within the French administrative structure and in whose interests they were taken would open up an area of study that is still largely the preserve of diplomatic historians and political scientists.

FRANCES M. B. LYNCH
University of Westminster

REBECCA J. PULJU. Women and Mass Consumer Society in Postwar France. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 260. $85.00.

Bringing a fresh perspective to the history of gender and consumer culture, Rebecca J. Pulju explores in this volume the development of an economy and culture of modern mass consumerism in France from 1944 to 1968. Pulju argues that in the immediate post-World War II decades the French state, women's organizations, consumer groups, and Frenchwomen themselves participated in the construction of a female "citizen consumer" who not only managed her household economy effectively but also contributed to national economic prosperity.

This notion of a citizen consumer emerged at a historical moment in which France experienced liberation at multiple levels: for the nation as a whole, liberation from Nazi occupation; for women, the additional liberation of suffrage rights. In this environment, Pulju contends, the idea of a citizen consumer offered women a form of citizenship that was consonant with traditional gender precepts, as it kept definitions of femininity—and female citizenship—centered on home and family. Liberation for women could be manifested in their power as consumers with access to modern consumer goods for the household (among them, washing machines, refrigerators, and vacuum cleaners) that would allegedly empower them by transforming the home into a place of familial comfort, and wherein the previously labor-intensive nature of household management would be alleviated by rational methods and tools. The maintenance of traditional prejudices toward women was evident in the belief shared by planners and consumer organizations that women would have to be educated and disciplined regarding appropriate modes of fulfilling their roles in the creation of this rational, modern mass consumer economy (such as conscientiousness about monitoring the prices of goods for purchase). The implication was that women, if left to their own devices, would consume indiscriminately, unwisely, and irrationally to the detriment of the national economy, not to mention their own household finances.

Pulju emphasizes the confluence of goals among the French state and its modernization drive, women's organizations looking to improve women's living and working conditions, and entities that promoted heightened economic productivity and consumption. Each sought to create what one productivity advocate termed a "market community" in which consumers, planners, and business worked together to establish a rational and profitable mass consumer economy that served the interests of producers, consumers, and the state. Because the costs of many technological consumer goods for the home were still prohibitive in the aftermath of the war, an emphasis on the use of credit gained currency; as Pulju shows, more consumers relied on credit to make purchases once the cultural stigma surrounding credit was mitigated by a discourse portraying credit as a way to boost the national economy and to benefit the home. The result was a redefinition of "necessity" as opposed to "luxury," since credit placed modern consumables within financial reach of most French families. In turn, the acquisition of "necessary" goods came to be viewed as a veritable right of families to enjoy an acceptable standard of living and comfort. The emergence of this cultural ideal, Pulju demonstrates, caused tensions over the possible collapsing of class distinctions, as in the postwar decades lifestyles heretofore reserved for the bourgeoisie could be enjoyed by those of lower socioeconomic strata. This did not lead to a classless society, as some feared it would, but rather to the reassertion of class and status differences on grounds other than household consumption.

Pulju's work draws together several disparate threads of consumption-based discourses and realities in order to illustrate the nature of France's postwar development toward a society of modern mass consumerism. It is a testament to the quality and clarity of Pulju's writing that these varied motifs are elucidated in a manner that is consistently clear, both on their own merits and in their relation to the wider arguments being made in the text. A fascinating epilogue traces the breakdown, starting in the late 1960s, of cooperation among the individuals, interest groups, and the state that had produced the "market community." In this section, Pulju documents increasing French disillusion over the perceived shortcomings and unfulfilled promises of mass consumer society, from a continued lack of social equality, to a sense of alienation and limitation within the confines of such a society, to women's rejection of the notion of consumption as the locus of feminine emancipation and citizenship. In so doing, Pulju illuminates extremely promising avenues for future research. On the whole, this book is an impressive work of scholarship and will undoubtedly have a significant impact on the historiography of gender and consumer culture in postwar France.

ADAM C. STANLEY
University of Wisconsin,
Platteville

R. J. B. BOSWORTH. Whispering City: Modern Rome and Its Histories. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2011. Pp. xvii, 358. $35.00.

History and its representations are the focus of R. J. B. Bosworth's fine analysis of the way the past has been used over the centuries to impose meaning on the eternal city. Wishing to reaffirm that the reading of history is never neutral but conflictual, Bosworth examines critical moments in the life of Rome that display the fight of different protagonists over the ability to interpret the past and formulate master narratives for public consumption.

Bosworth's main argument is that different pasts interpenetrate, coexist, and clash. When claims over the past impose a dominant tale that eschews the complexity of historical processes, however, we see politics and power at work. The past is tapped to present a version of the truth and to give significance to present-day concerns and interests, Rome being a case in point.

Although aware of the difficulties one faces when deciphering the layers of history that are superimposed over one another, Bosworth embarks on a reading of Rome's architecture, urban planning, and celebrations as signs of how history is deployed. He takes the reader on a fascinating journey that, covering the period from the Enlightenment to the present and through more or less well-known Roman landmarks, reveals the politics of history and its undemocratic workings at crucial moments in the life of the city and of Italy more generally. Bosworth's gaze moves through the topography of Rome, its street corners, squares, and alleys. It pauses on different sections of the urban landscape, including the center and the periphery, popular neighborhoods and more privileged ones, and looks at monuments and buildings, ruins and reconstructions. Among the several cases scrutinized, we find St. Peter's Church, the statue of Giordano Bruno, and the Eur neighborhood. Each is taken to represent a particular reading of Rome and to reflect larger political and cultural struggles.

One of the book's main accomplishments is its emphasis on the central role played by the Roman Catholic Church in these power struggles. Bosworth is at his best when detailing the church's relentless efforts to impose a Catholic past on the history of Rome. Beginning in the eighteenth century, for instance, the church promoted a reading of Rome as the holy city and fought against the classical view of Rome epitomized by archeology and ruins, and privileged by visitors to the city. The church did not wish to see the Christian narrative superseded by the classical view of Rome and, in a counter move, tried to use archeological evidence to affirm the entrenched religious origins of the city. Along the same lines, the church clashed with the national movement of the Risorgimento for undermining the church's dominance and challenged its legitimacy and legacy well into the twentieth century.

Opposed to the Roman Catholic Church, liberal Italy sought to impose a reading of history that was fundamentally anticlerical and that aimed at overcoming the popes' long political and symbolic rule over Rome. Bosworth shows that in this case we also see an attempt to affirm one single "true" history, as well as a strategic interpretation of that history. This is evident in the Liberals' choice of commemorative figures for conveying the meaning of the Risorgimento. The "romantic" Giuseppe Garibaldi won over the more strictly political Giuseppe Mazzini. Garibaldi indeed remained and still is the Risorgimento's representative figure of choice. His myth was later adopted and adapted by Benito Mussolini, while it is rejected today by the Northern League.

Bosworth's discussion of the contested nature of Risorgimento history exemplifies the battle over meaning between powerful protagonists. Crucial to his argument, however, is evidence that the battle over the meaning of the Risorgimento was also fought against the people of Rome, whose old ways of living were challenged by the Liberals' imposition of a more active and modern worldview that was supposed to overcome prejudice and ignorance. This same top-down pattern had emerged in the late 1700s during the revolution, when rationality was intended to replace the superstitions and illusions of ordinary people fostered by religious authorities. Once again, Bosworth faults a unilinear imposition of history and exposes its undemocratic nature.

In a book thick with historical cases and examples, Bosworth spends several pages discussing fascism and its active reading (or one could say transformative re-writing) of Rome. He particularly emphasizes the use of fascist monuments and constructions for contemporary purposes and raises another important issue one confronts when studying the uses of the past: forgetting. Rome and its fascist legacy testify to Italy's amnesia about its fascist history, he argues; the lack of self-reflection that characterizes Rome's relationship to the Resistance, as well as the church's oblivion of its role under fascism, confirm this trend.

In the end, this book's great lesson is that the selection of one history always constitutes a simplification and mystification, and historians should also steer away from such temptation. Claims to one single truth obliterate the different pasts, lead to the imposition of meaning from above, and seriously threaten and undermine the democratic process.

SIMONETTA FALASCA-ZAMPONI
University of California,
Santa Barbara

JOEL F. HARRINGTON. The Unwanted Child: The Fate of Foundlings, Orphans, and Juvenile Criminals in Early Modern Germany. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 2009. Pp. xvii, 437. $45.00.

Readers interested in "the unwanted child" or "early modern Germany" should set this book aside. It treats in far greater detail their unwilling keepers in one small corner of the Holy Roman Empire. Joel F. Harrington embraces the anthropological notion of "child circulation" (p. 7), the variety of ways—formal and informal, public and private—children may pass from one caregiver or family to another to be adopted, fostered, educated, or exploited. He claims thus to avoid the "statist trap" (p. 7) and "statist distortions" (p. 9) of "a post hoc legally-defined category of actions . . . and self-referential terms" (p. 7) that he contends are the unavoidable result of relying on government records and their categories. To achieve the goal and avoid the catch, he employs a methodology that is strangely familiar and sadly fumbled: combing through early modern state documents, the decrees of the city council of Nuremberg, and the records of its foundling home. The result is an extraordinary database that reveals the background and passage of 4,018 children without recognizing its own internal contradiction and irony.

Harrington apparently does not realize that the informal circulation of children in the past remains conjectural. Early modernists may not doubt that it happened, but they cannot measure its scope. Because it was informal, few people wrote about it, and most officials did not record it. They certainly did not use the word "unwanted." Harrington must rely, therefore, on the state—in this case, the city—and contend with its regulations and categories. To prefer the anachronistic "unwanted" to the more usual "orphaned," "abandoned," "abused," or "neglected" is to traduce history and meaning. Caregivers and officials, participants and observers used these terms because they captured important distinctions. Orphans were not the same as foundlings; among other things they had better prospects of survival. Nor were all abandoned children alike; it mattered if a child was "abandoned" to the care of others or "abandoned" in a ditch. Finally, whether orphaned, abandoned, abused, or neglected, no child was necessarily "unwanted." Such a determination requires more evidence—qualitative as well as quantitative—than Harrington commands.

That lack of evidence dogs this study like the child-beggars of its fourth chapter. To finesse it, to get at the “unwanted,” Harrington advocates the methods of l’histoire croisée, which he describes as “an attempt to construct ‘a specific connection between observer positions, perspective, and objective’ without reliance on artificial . . . categories of comparison” (pp. 15–16). Each chapter takes up some person related to or involved in the “fate of foundlings, orphans and juvenile criminals”: the “unwed mother” and infanticide, Apollonia Vogt; the “absconding father” and mercenary, Stoffel Baur; the “beleaguered magistrate” and patrician, Albrecht Pömer; the “street orphan” and burglar, Jörg Mayr; and the “state wards” and orphans, Eberhardt and Susanna Schier. Juxtaposing their perspectives and examining their interactions is supposed to result in a “de-centering of the historian-observer” that yields new insights.

That does not happen. In Harrington’s hands, these real people are no more than “a variation on a familiar literary topos” (p. 22) or “a universally familiar figure” (p. 74). The interpretation of their actions requires a grasp of their circumstances, which, in turn, “suggest a reality that is far more nuanced than might be expected” (p. 123), but Harrington can offer little direct testimony or evidence about anyone’s “reality.” Instead, in every chapter, he relies on modern scholarship—too often from far afield—or comparable cases to create synthetic contexts and composite options. His street orphans, finally, are allowed to speak for themselves, but they are not cross-examined. Qualitative sources are read transparently, without reflection on their purpose, context, or audience and how these affect what appears on the page. Quantitative sources are uncritically adduced without pause to consider their statistical liabilities. Harrington likens his conclusion to St. John of the Cross’s “dark night of the soul, the moment of utter desolation and confusion before the emergence of clarity” (p. 281). But no clarity comes. We learn nothing new, rather the opposite: these microhistories serve as little more than epigrams of macrohistory. They present caricatures of a group or class of real people, mindless pawns of social forces or historical models, alleged to describe the experience of all. Their subjects become stereotypes.

Historians as disparate as Carlo Ginzburg and Richard White have challenged us to respect the past as real and discrete. Historians must provide context so that the subject’s place and motion in society become clear. They must respect the individual in all his or her idiosyncrasy and contingency, not reduce him or her to a subjective projection of themselves. The Unwanted Child not only disregards these simple guidelines, it casts them down and treads upon them.

THOMAS MAX SAFLEY
University of Pennsylvania

MARK TILSE. Transnationalism in the Prussian East: From National Conflict to Synthesis, 1871–1914. (The Palgrave Macmillan Transnational History Series.)

New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xiii, 276. $85.00.

In the decades between German unification in 1871 and the beginning of World War I, Reich German nationalists and significant factions within the Prussian and Reich governments came to see the “Polish Question” in the Prussian East as one of the most pressing problems of the age. The Polish question served as a motivation for Otto von Bismarck’s Kulturkampf, the strict regulation of foreign labor, and the redefinition of German citizenship in 1913, all policies with implications beyond Prussia’s Eastern Marches. Still, the widest-reaching efforts to assert clear German political and cultural predominance over Poles were carried out in the Prussian East, where Polish-speakers were most concentrated. Mark Tilse’s book contributes to a growing literature exploring the German-Polish nationality conflict by examining the dynamics of German-Polish relations in Posen and West Prussia. Tilse argues that from the 1870s on, the German-Polish nationality conflict produced transnational interactions and milieus as well as national divisions.

The book is at its strongest in its discussion of efforts by the Prussian government and nationalist organizations to control national populations and national narratives by means of statistics, school regulation, the creation of cultural institutions, and party politics. Tilse shows that statistics on linguistic distribution led Prussian administrators and German nationalists to see the Eastern Marches as a region in which the German nation, and thus the German state, was losing ground to Poles. They responded with a variety of efforts to shift demographics. They bought Polish-held land and tried to settle it with German peasants, promoted German-language schools, libraries, and theaters, and discouraged nationally mixed marriages, Catholicism, and bilingualism, all phenomena they perceived as damaging to German national interests. As the author shows, these efforts were never fully successful. Polish speakers used German-language schools to make their children bilingual rather than to make them German. German-speaking Catholics frustrated nationalists by siding politically with Polish-speaking Catholics rather than German-speaking Protestants in the wake of the Kulturkampf. And Social Democrats had some limited success in recruiting political support for an “internationalist” class-based politics across the national divide.

Tilse argues that his use of the paradigm of synthesis distinguishes his work from previous studies of the German-Polish conflict and allows him to explore these nationalist failures in new ways. By synthesis, he means a process whereby two contradictory phenomena combine to create something fundamentally new. In this case, he proposes that German and Polish nationalisms jointly produced transnational contexts such as mixed marriages, confessional politics (especially connected to the Catholic Church), and social democracy. Those transnational contexts served, he suggests, to harmonize relations between the two national communities.

The synthesis argument is the least successful aspect of the book. Tilse shows that that nineteenth-century nationalists' vision of populations divided unambiguously into distinct national groups, each structuring their social, political, and cultural lives around national commitments, was often at odds with lived experience. This is an important observation that Tilse shares with a number of scholars. Most recently, historians including Pieter M. Judson, Tara Zahra, and (specifically for the German-Polish case) James E. Bjork have proposed that we should understand such disjunctures between nationalists' programs and popular behavior in terms of "national indifference." The national indifference model suggests that even at the height of Central European nationalism in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, significant numbers of people did not accept nationalism as the primary frame for their lives and that national populations were a lot harder to define than contemporary nationalists and subsequent scholars have often assumed. Although Tilse suggests that his synthesis model is akin to that of national indifference, there are important differences. In particular, he proves to have a more traditional view of nationality insofar as he treats Germans and Poles as distinct, recognizable categories even when particular members of those categories did not always behave in strictly "national" ways. Thus German-speaking Catholics who chose to support Polish (Catholic) political parties did so because, Tilse suggests, they "conflated" national and confessional categories. Yet, what if they simply understood those categories differently than did nationalists? Further, it is not clear that people who engaged in transnational behavior through mixed marriage or confessional allegiance necessarily did so in direct response to nationalist movements, as the synthesis models suggests. Indeed, Tilse shows that the rate of mixed linguistic marriages remained remarkably constant throughout the nineteenth century. The argument that nationalist policies often undermined themselves, perhaps to the point of acting as catalysts for the creation of transnational communities, is an interesting one, but the kind of detailed attention to popular behavior and opinion that would be needed to prove this assertion falls outside the scope of the book. Nevertheless, his work adds to the discussion both of the dynamics of German-Polish conflict in the Prussian East and of the ways in which historians interpret the scope and implications of such national conflicts.

CAITLIN E. MURDOCK
California State University,
Long Beach

ERIC N. JENSEN. Body by Weimar: Athletes, Gender, and German Modernity. New York: Oxford University Press. 2010. Pp. ix, 184. $50.00.

KATIE SUTTON. The Masculine Woman in Weimar Germany. (Monographs in German History, number 32.) New York: Berghahn Books. 2011. Pp. vii, 204. $70.00.

Considerable recent scholarship has tackled the history of either the body or the emotions. These two books treat the physicality and emotionality of historical actors together. In doing so, they provide analyses that combine some of the most interesting insights of the linguistic turn with the important goal of applying discourse back onto actual historical agents. Their subjects thus appear as rounded human beings, filled with the multiple—and sometimes conflicting—desires, identities, and appearances that we find easy to accept in the contemporary world but that often seem to evade us in the past, particularly when historians take "ordinary" people as their subjects.

Both books explore the physical and emotional history of German men and women during the Weimar Republic, focusing particularly on the experience and construction of their gender roles. Copious academic texts have discussed, either in detail or in passing, the Weimar phenomena of the "new," more masculine woman and her complement, the supposedly more effeminate man, in order to examine the extent to which traditional gender and sexual norms were destabilized during the Weimar era. But by exploring these issues from the perspectives of the history of the body and of the emotions, and in uniting discursive analyses with social histories that take as their focus often ignored case studies, these two books offer valuable new insights.

Katie Sutton explores discourses about the masculinization of women and the ways in which the idea of masculinization reflected social change. She also examines the process of social change itself, investigating the emergence of more masculine women, from those who cut their long braids short and changed their clothing style to those who openly identified as a garçonne, or boy. While the latter sometimes self-consciously identified themselves as part of a lesbian subculture, Sutton's book argues that the desire to appear masculine affected both straight and gay women. In other words, the author does not conflate fears of the ramifications of masculinization—i.e., homosexuality—with the study of homosexuality itself. Instead, she suggests that the idea of masculinization was pervasive, endorsed, and accepted by many German women and men as normal or even advisable. Conversely, others feared that it heralded the downfall of Germany, in part because it necessarily implied the feminization of men.

Eric N. Jensen takes up a complementary argument, exploring Germany's attempt to remold the body and psyche (both individual and collective) through popular sports and exercise regimes. In the wake of defeat in World War I, Germans feared they had become soft; a Berlin newspaper went so far as to photograph President Friedrich Ebert with defense minister Gustav Noske shirtless in a lake, their flabby, weak flesh on display for all the world to see. Increased physicality would rescue the nation. More importantly, it presented a legitimate means for women to develop strength and aggression, masculine traits hitherto seen as unacceptable. Jensen uses the culture of sport to shine new light on the motivations for, and ramifications of, shifting gender roles for both men and women. The modern sporting man and the new, aggressive woman concomitantly promised to reinvigorate Germany and to threaten its future reproductive chances. Jensen's focus on both men and women is compelling. Although Sutton argues that the "new woman" is still neglected in academic literature, despite the frequent discussions of moral panic surrounding them, her focus only on women does not allow us totally to recast our understanding of how they were perceived. Sutton's implicit references to the corollary feminization of men and its wider social ramifications—on both men and women—would have been better if made explicit.

By focusing on both genders, Jensen is able to demonstrate the surprising extent to which changes in gender roles were supported, if not openly encouraged. Running coaches openly stated that they wanted to take German girls and give them hard, manly bodies. Men were held to be great athletes, not women; to make a woman a great athlete was important, but it necessitated her becoming more masculine. As long as it did not prevent the "right sort" of German woman from reproducing, this masculinization was acceptable to many Germans. Despite what Jensen shows to be the clear preference for manliness among some sectors of the population, Sutton contends that the masculinization of women was seen by some Germans as much more frightening than feminization of men, which was often perceived as being comical. It would be interesting to explore further how to reconcile these conflicting interpretations, particularly given the equation of male weakness with German degeneration. Doing so would help uncover what these two authors show to be a distinct, subtle, but persistent sexism at work in Weimar.

This sexism manifested itself in multiple ways. Male-identifying lesbians acted chauvinistically toward feminine lesbians, even going so far as to claim to have higher intelligence. More drastically, Jensen reveals that breast reduction surgery was extremely popular in Weimar, and not just among openly male-identifying, or lesbian, women. Breast reduction is a step further than the masculine styles of hair and dress that Sutton shows were so prevalent. Weimar women actually tried to remove one of the most distinctive markers of femininity. Attempts to create a male psyche to complement the male body extended to masculine women's publications: the magazine Frauenliebe (Womanly Love) changed its name to Garçonne (Boy) in 1930. Clearly, regardless of one's sex, it was often better to be of the male gender.

But that was not always the case. In Jensen's discussion of tennis, he shows that the game provided a space where both the masculinization of women and feminization of men were equally permitted if not explicitly encouraged. Female tennis players were the much-admired champions of a masculine game, while male tennis players were dandies, preferring grace and style to competitive drive in their matches. The former were aggressive flirts, while the latter were effeminate if not openly homosexual. Sutton's exploration of lesbian clubs and lesbian-oriented literature contributes another interesting aspect to the discussion of the acceptable subversion of gender and sexual norms. Her analysis would have been all the more provocative if she had made a similar comparison across gender lines. How, for instance, did male and female homosexual clubs simultaneously shift and threaten norms of behavior? While we know that many homosexuals visited the other gender's clubs, did expressions of solidarity and subversion extend beyond this?

Both books do well in escaping from the city limits of Berlin, demonstrating that these issues were prevalent across Germany, in both urban and rural areas. Berlin, the "city of sin," was not an exception in an otherwise conservative and traditional land. Sutton demonstrates the subtle differences in urban and rural thinking on issues of gender norms by revealing the ways in which provincial longing for the city was complemented by an urban desire to escape to the purity of the countryside. Through his exploration of Germans' reception of sports, Jensen demonstrates that cosmopolitan attitudes were common across Germany, with rural Germans indulging in exotic tastes much in the same way as their urban peers.

What both volumes also make clear is that wherever one lived, it was much easier to live or play unconventionally if one was protected by a high-class status. Tennis dandies could get away with their effeminate displays because they were generally wealthy; working-class male boxers, by contrast, were far more tied to traditional ideas of male comportment. Conversely, women who chose a masculine life had a far easier time, whether in Berlin or the countryside, if they were upper class. It is a shame that neither book takes the ramifications of this crucial class divide further. The idea that women were becoming more masculine and aggressive and men were losing their edge definitely frightened some Germans. But so too did the fact that the working classes were also becoming aggressive and emancipated: in short, masculine. Although German elites were happy to accept gender transgressions among their ilk, they were less tolerant of the same transgressions among the lower classes. Jensen's cartoon of a dandy tennis star with a banner campaigning to keep the plebs out of the sport makes this particularly clear. Gender is a useful category, but its meanings become more useful still when connected with class, as well as race and ethnicity, another issue only hinted at in these books.

Despite such omissions, these two books are an important addition to the history of Germany and the history of human actors. They complement an emerging body of literature that seeks to explore the complicated and often contradictory nature of Weimar's social values, demonstrating that while the progressive democracy did much to modernize German society, it did not uniformly enable or support more liberal policies and outlooks. While histories of Weimar should not fall into the trap of trying to find pre-Nazi ideas in the republic—as Sutton’s book unfortunately does—they should enable us to understand how some of Weimar’s policies led quite naturally, as Jensen suggests, into the Third Reich.

VICTORIA HARRIS
University of Cambridge

SHELLEY BARANOWSKI. Nazi Empire: German Colonialism and Imperialism from Bismarck to Hitler. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 368. Cloth $90.00, paper $24.99.

Shelley Baranowski strives to contextualize National Socialism and its mass violence within the broader history of the rise and disintegration of empires. Her perspective includes long-term German imperial ambitions and the competition with other empires. She has based her arguments on an impressive amount of recent secondary literature in English and German.

Baranowski argues that the Nazis grounded their empire in the principle of racial homogeneity and not in ethnic and religious diversity. German nationalism, she claims, was already distinctive in 1914 with its “explosive cocktail of will to power and the fear of dissolution” (p. 65), and under the Nazis the “prospect of annihilation coexisted with the euphoria of triumph” (p. 280). The twin goals of racial purification and the expansion of German Lebensraum lay at the core of the drive to build an empire between 1933 and 1945, which was intended to avoid the failures of the Second Empire (1871–1918) and the Weimar Republic (1918–1933).

Following up on Dirk Moses’s insight that a society that had been colonized might turn into a colonizing empire, Baranowski suggests that Germans experienced the Weimar Republic as a form of colonization, and that they then turned aggressively against their alleged colonizers, first and foremost “the Jews.” The Nazi variant of empire came to be “the most extreme manifestation” of the longstanding European problem of combining diversity and homogeneity. Total war and Adolf Hitler’s charismatic authority were, to Baranowski, decisive for the outcome, transforming the homogenizing capacities of the European nation state into what Hannah Arendt called the “attack on human diversity as such.” The annihilation of enemies would solve the problem of dominion.

Baranowski argues that the dilemma between nation (uniformity) and empire (diversity) was allegedly “more intense in Germany” and “encouraged a nationalism that fused pride and aggression with insecurity and pessimism” (p. 13). That claim allows her to address two important debates on the context of Nazi violence and the Shoah. First, did Germany follow a special path in modern history that can explain the exceptional violence of the 1940s? Second, to what extent did Germany’s colonial experience inform Nazi mass violence and the Shoah?

With regard to the question of continuity and discontinuity in German history, Baranowski remains vague. To give a few examples (with my emphasis added): German exploitation, the apartheid system, the “gravitation of prominent veterans of African campaigns to the Nazi Party after World War I, and the persistent, nagging fears of racial mixing might have constituted a bed of experiences that would shape the Third Reich” (p. 49). She claims that “German suppression of colonial revolts” and the “German military’s conduct in Africa . . . adhered to a common pattern,” only to counter this a few pages further on when she contends that the “system of racial privilege and segregation that the German colonial administration honed after the Herero War . . . was distinctive in its severity” (pp. 50, 51). The reader is left with the impression that continuities, discontinuities, similarities, and transformations somehow coexisted, but no clear, substantiated argument is presented. Baranowski distances herself from the “special path” argument but emphasizes the existence of a “common thread” in Germany between 1871 and 1945, despite many discontinuities. Comparisons with other states might have strengthened her argument, but she does not attempt them. Moreover, the historiographical debates she addresses are mostly hidden in footnotes rather than analyzed in the text.

This leads me to another problem with the book. Baranowski explains in the preface that her initial impetus was to write an accessible textbook for undergraduates on the Third Reich. She then extended the scope of the topic to explore German history from 1870 to 1945 as a problem of empire. So what is this monograph, an undergraduate textbook or an analytical study of the development of German imperialism? It tries to be both, surveying imperial German history from 1871 to 1945 while also touching briefly on many topics concerning German society and politics during this period. The result is most likely too complicated and ambitious for students, and at the same time too sketchy, vague, and in parts too simplistic for academics. Since Baranowski continues to work in this field, her promising approach of examining the Nazi regime and its violence from the perspective of empire may produce a more enlightening monograph in the future.

CHRISTOPH DIEKMANN
Keele University

MONICA BLACK. Death in Berlin: From Weimar to Divided Germany. (Publications of the German Historical Institute.) New York: Cambridge University Press. Washington, D.C.: German Historical Institute. 2010. Pp. xvi, 308. $80.00.

If there is one universal human experience that challenges our contemporary predilection for culturalist readings of history, it is surely death. All people, into whatever circumstances they are born, have their time—and then they die. But as Monica Black convincingly demonstrates in this outstanding monograph, which deservedly won the Fraenkel Prize for Contemporary History, the ways in which people thought and talked about death, the practices they developed, and the rituals they enacted changed over time in line with evolving political, ideological, and material conditions. At the same time, as she rightly argues throughout, bereaved citizens were not simply tabulae rasae onto which new mourning habits were inscribed; neither were their enactments of grief simply a performance of whatever the discourse of officialdom prescribed at any given moment. Rather, the bereaved drew upon a complex, varied, and often contradictory repertoire of beliefs, habits, and practices inherited from pasts both recent and distant, and their acts of mourning evolved in a process of constant negotiation with the changing precepts of authority, even under conditions of totalitarian domination where a more homogenizing dynamic might be assumed. The history that Black outlines is thus one in which much changed, but in which all sorts of surprising continuities also operated, continuities that demonstrate anew that the history of cultural practices cannot be reduced to expressions of politics but rather have a life and rhythm of their own.

The book is organized into a series of broadly chronological chapters, starting with the 1920s and working through the successive attempted reframing of death pursued first by the Nazi regime and then by the competing postwar regimes in East and West Berlin. Mindful of the fact that people's attitudes toward death are not always verbalized, but are inscribed in the rituals they perform, Black blends historical analysis with anthropology. In pursuit of the simultaneous presence of modern discourses of hygiene and efficiency and older habits of magical thinking and superstition, she draws on material as diverse as bureaucratic records and folkloric tales or poetry with equal dexterity. She tells a fascinating set of histories, whose actors range from pallbearers and undertakers to priests, cemetery officials, and holders of high political office. At the center, however, are the bereaved themselves.

Looming large over these histories is the experience of mass death in the two world wars. For the authorities, the challenge lay simultaneously in the need to attribute positive meaning to mass military death—be it through the mobilization of the dead as a call to national renewal, or the portrayal of the deceased as workers who lived positively for the cause of socialism—while domesticating the overwhelming experiences of violence that had given rise to the deaths in the first place. For the bereaved, meanwhile, the challenge lay in retaining a sense of dignity and decency (themselves of course contingent and contested terms) in the face of experiences of death that, at points, rendered all attempts to bury the dead in accordance with traditional standards of propriety almost impossible. The most obvious of these moments was the last months of the war, when coffins—themselves profound symbols of moral order—were so scarce that they were repeatedly reused. The war bequeathed a landscape of random improvised graves and temporary cemeteries, the gradual rationalization of which took place against the wider background of reconstruction. At the same time, the emotional landscapes of grief to which the war also gave rise were such that many Berliners resisted attempts to exhume the bodies of loved ones whose resting place had become a profoundly meaningful site of mourning, inconvenient to the authorities as that may have been. Black describes, for instance, how East German authorities' attempts to generate a socialist culture of cremation and burial collided with popular sentiments concerning death and burial—political, religious, ethical, magical, and habitual—so ingrained that it took until the late 1950s before much progress could be made.

Yet Black is careful not to reduce all stories about death in Berlin to war. Equally persuasive is a set of histories that trace, for example, the persistence of class-based patterns of mourning and the ascription of gendered roles (for example in the figure of the Leichenfrau who dressed the body), or the unfolding of attitudes toward cremation. If these stories beg a question, it is the obvious one of comparison. Did timeworn practices such as the laying-out of bodies persist longer in rural areas? Given Black's argument about the negative associations of cremation for Germans after Auschwitz, did evolving attitudes toward cremation differ greatly from those in other countries? This exceptional book stimulates many fascinating thoughts and questions and deserves a wide readership.

NEIL GREGOR

University of Southampton

THOMAS KÜHNE. Belonging and Genocide: Hitler's Community, 1918–1945. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2010. Pp. vii, 216. $40.00.

Against the backdrop of the burgeoning field of Holocaust studies, with its growing emphasis on the complexity of events leading up to the mass murder of European Jews, historians have produced a string of insightful studies designed to explain how Nazi Germany really worked. This book, succinctly written and well structured, will intrigue many with its compelling thesis of a “national brotherhood of mass murder” that resulted from a “completely new kind of nation-building” rooted in perpetrating genocide (p. 171). Thomas Kühne develops his argument in five chapters covering the forging of male bonds during World War I and their subsequent commitment to the concept of racial homogeneity, Heinrich Himmler's attempts at creating a genocidal esprit de corps in his SS and police apparatus, and the effect of complicity in mass murder within German society at large as represented by men in the ranks of the army and women involved in the regime's “strategy of community-building through crime” (p. 7). The strongest part of the book is chapter three, “Performing Genocidal Ethics: Togetherness in Himmler's Elite,” as it points to the subtle effects of indoctrination and applied violence creating what Kühne calls the “mafia principle” that “united the hard-core group of fanatic, eliminationist anti-Semites and included murderers, occasional doubters, more serious dissenters, and unwilling yet submissive collaborators” (p. 92).

Despite its importance, Himmler's elite resembled but a small slice of German society. Frequent repetitions of his thesis and its partial incompatibility with the more nuanced, often fascinating, yet largely anecdotal evidence presented in the chapters evokes the impression that the author is aware of the flaws in his approach. Indeed, Kühne's focus on the camaraderie of male core groups and their societal impact can be easily criticized as neither very original (in view of his own book on Kameradschaft and earlier works by scholars like George Mosse, Klaus Theweleit, or Michael Wildt) nor innovative as it largely ignores the role of gender, coercion, spatial factors, systemic specifics, and social practices—all essential factors for the working of the Third Reich and for the emergence of the Final Solution, not to mention the persecution of other outgroups. In view of the rich mosaic of multicausal interpretations produced by scholars since the 1990s to better understand the destructive dynamics of Nazi Germany, one might question the explanatory value of an approach that insists on the prevalence of "state guided community-building by criminal means" (p. 8) and accepts the Nazis' propaganda projection of the Volkgemeinschaft as social reality without providing sufficient empirical evidence for the claimed transfer of bonding mechanisms from core groups of convinced racists to the wider public. Despite the graphic nature of some of the sources used, the picture of "Hitler's community" painted by Kühne appears remarkably amorphous and static, with little happening once the mental building blocks of collective identification were in place and the outcome remaining uncertain as "the project of building the new society was still in its infancy" even in late 1943 (p. 92). Similarly, the book implies that the crossing of the threshold from the persecution of Jews to their annihilation was more driven by the inherent determinism of the Nazi project than by concrete causes emerging from the course of events. As a result, the author seems to argue for a kind of collective intentionalism that extends Daniel Jonah Goldhagen's thesis and claims Adolf Hitler and "the Nazis" successfully co-opted "the Germans" for a genocidal utopia of classless harmony.

Despite its shortcomings, the book makes for a fascinating read and has the potential to trigger readers' interest in further exploring crucial questions as to what prompted Germans' involvement in a genocidal campaign. If Holocaust perpetrators "created a new 'society' – with new boundaries, new inner hierarchies, and new values" (p. 59), what happened to it after the war's end? If there was a "joy of togetherness" (p. 73) among perpetrators, is it possible that there was also a joy of murder derived from the smooth workings of a cooperative process fed by the decisions of those involved? If belonging in the Third Reich consisted of more than participation in genocide, are we overlooking significant aspects of German society if we restrict our analysis of the Nazi system to its most destructive aspects?

JÜRGEN MATTHÄUS
Washington, D.C.

DAN MICHMAN. The Emergence of Jewish Ghettos during the Holocaust. Translated by LENN J. SCHRAMM. New York: Cambridge University Press. Jerusalem: Yad Vashem. 2011. Pp. viii, 191. $85.00.

In this book Dan Michman offers what he calls a semantic, linguistic, and cultural approach to answer the question "where and when did the idea for the ghettos originate?" (p. 145). One of the most important contributions of the book is his analysis of the different meanings of the term "ghetto" and the need, therefore, to be more conscious and precise when using it. As a generic term, the word originated from the name of the specific geographical location for the residence of Jews in sixteenth-century Venice. By the twentieth century the term could be used to denote the dense urban concentration of any particular group, but in the European context it usually referred to poor and crowded Jewish neighborhoods in Eastern Europe. For German Jews in the 1930s it was invoked as a metaphor (an invisible ghetto or ghetto without walls) for the social isolation imposed by Nazi regulations. Michman makes an especially important point when he stresses the importance of Peter-Heinz Seraphim's Das Judentum im osteuropäischen Raum (1938) in providing the Nazis with their dominant image of the ghetto as a repulsive urban neighborhood of Jewish overpopulation and misery but also the central location and source of strength for sustaining the Jewish community, enabling them to threaten and contaminate others. He then identifies the "classic" or "new Nazi concept of the ghetto" created in Poland between 1939 and 1941, in which Lodz represented the "quantum leap" from a "vague concept" to the "tangible form" of an officially demarcated area (either closed or open) within which Jews were forced to reside separate from others (p. 86). Once the Final Solution was underway, various labor, transit, and collection camps were also occasionally referred to as ghettos, most notably in Transnistria, Thessaloniki, and Hungary.

Despite the dominance of Lodz and Warsaw as the paradigmatic ghettos in both historiography and memoirs, Michman correctly emphasizes the need to refer to Nazi ghettos in the plural, since they were not a uniform phenomenon. He also rightly notes that the ghetto and the Judenrat were two distinct instruments of Nazi policy that existed independent of one another and not as "conjoined twins" (p. 151). He argues, again correctly in my opinion, that ghettos were not a premeditated, integral, or even necessary step on the road to the Final Solution.

Despite its undoubted contribution to the historiography of the Holocaust, two aspects of Michman's book irritate me. To be open with readers of this review, let me be clear that both aspects involve points of friction between my own work on Nazi ghettos and Michman's assertions. Noting a serious omission in the current state of research concerning the first ghetto at Piotrków-Trybunalski, Michman proceeds to the sweeping indictment that "the study of Holocaust-era ghettos has been based on erroneous generalizations rather than on an empirical approach to history" (p. 79). He laments the "implicit assumption that all ghettos were entirely alike" and attacks what he considers the dominant paradigm that the ghettos were the product of a premeditated, centralized, preparatory policy integral to the Final Solution (p. 104). This is, however, a long-obsolete paradigm fatally wounded in the 1980s by Israel Gutman's work on the Warsaw ghetto and my initial article on Nazi ghetto policy in Poland, and then buried under an avalanche of subsequent scholarship. Michman is attacking a straw man that requires no further demolition.

Second, Michman elevates his semantic-linguistic-cultural interpretation above what he dubs the "administrative and planning perspective" utilized by Raul Hilberg and me that "looks for organizational and bureaucratic rationales." He insists that the motivation for creating ghettos was "psychological rather than bureaucratic." They were created as a response to the "fear of the cultural stereotype of the Ostjuden as the source of Jewish power, and fear of the crowded Jewish neighborhoods of Eastern Europe" (p. 146). Michman claims he has thereby refuted the functionalist explanation that ghettos emerged from real problems stemming from the German encounter with the Jewish population in Poland, problems that he dismisses as rationalizations; rather, ghettos "resulted from the history of anti-Semitism" (p. 154). In my opinion this is an unhelpful regression to the false dichotomy of the intentionalist-functionalist controversy. The problems German occupiers cited (hunger, epidemic, black market, etc.) were real. Germans too often perceived the cause of these problems through ideological lenses, attributed them to inherent Jewish inferiority and malice, and thus created a self-fulfilling prophecy by adopting policies that made these real problems even worse. Nazi ideology and bureaucratic problem-solving are not mutually exclusive explanations; rather, they mutually reinforced one another in the grim history of Nazi ghettoization.

CHRISTOPHER R. BROWNING

University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

NILS ROEMER. German City, Jewish Memory: The Story of Worms. (The Tauber Institute Series for the Study of European Jewry.) Waltham, Mass.: Brandeis University Press. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England. 2010. Pp. x, 316. Cloth $85.00, paper $35.00.

In this book Nils Roemer focuses on the city of Worms as a contested site of Jewish memory. By tracing Jewish life in Worms over a thousand years, Roemer examines the impact of political and social developments on Jewish culture, memory, and identity. The book is organized chronologically into three sections, each containing three chapters. Part one describes Jewish settlement and memory in Worms from its medieval origins to the Enlightenment, part two explores the Jewish heritage in Worms from the modern era until its destruction in the Holocaust, and part three focuses on the post-Holocaust period.

Jews had settled in Worms by the end of the tenth century, and by 1034 Christian masons built a synagogue, and a few decades later, a Jewish burial ground. The community consisted of a few hundred Jews, with families averaging two or three children. During the Investiture Controversy in 1073, Henry IV rewarded Jews and other burghers with tax freedom for allowing him to take refuge there, and he granted Jews comprehensive protection and jurisdiction over internal disputes. Despite these extensive rights, crusaders and burghers attacked Jews during the 1096 campaign and devastated the community. A rumor that Jews had boiled a Christian corpse and then poured the concoction into the city's water supply to poison the population was the pretext for the attacks. With the exception of a few who were forcibly baptized, most of the city's Jewish population was killed. Henry IV allowed those forcibly baptized Jews to return to Judaism, and the community re-established itself.

In response to the devastation, Roemer shows how a new paradigm emerged that viewed persecution as a divine test of Jewish faith. A local communal day of fasting, liturgical prayers memorializing the crusade's destruction, and the commemoration of the martyrs contributed to a culture of remembrance. During the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries there was another series of violent anti-Jewish attacks. The outbreak of the plague, in particular, fueled accusations that Jews promoted disease by poisoning water supplies, which resulted in the expulsion of Jews from almost all urban centers.

This pattern of expulsion and re-establishment of the Jewish community of Worms continued in the early modern period. Roemer details how Jewish martyrs and rabbis made the cemetery a holy ground where God would more willingly receive prayers, and thus it acquired an important role for the local community and visitors.

During the modern period, religious reform, social advancement, and civic equality altered religious traditions. Reform Judaism emerged as a response to Jewish emancipation, and the Revolution of 1848–1849 threw Jews into the turmoil of political conflict. The city's local heritage became important for Jewish travelers, and its historical sites contributed to Jews' local identity.

The most interesting section is the final one, "After the Holocaust." During this era, Worms was reinvested with multiple meanings, and memory operated as a means of representing and integrating the past into different contexts. For example, in the 1930s Friedrich Illert, the local archivist and travelogue author, who a few years earlier had promoted Worm's rich Jewish legacy, now described the city as the source of the Nibelungen, and in 1937 submitted a proposal to Joseph Goebbels for a national celebration of the Third Reich. Goebbels attended the staging of Friedrich Hebbel's Nibelungen, and Worms recast its historical heritage as the birthplace of Nazism. In the postwar years, Illert reinvented himself as the postwar trustee of Jewish interests. Still the local archivist, he was responsible for collecting, preserving, and even restoring Jewish historical landmarks. These actions were ensnared in worldwide debates over whether Jews should remain in Germany, if Jewish sites should even be rebuilt, and who owned the property of those murdered Jews whose legal heirs could not be identified.

The rebuilding of the Jewish synagogue in 1961 was heavily politicized. Illert and the mayor of Worms, Heinrich Völker, promoted its reconstruction as an act of German-Jewish reconciliation, despite there being no Jews still living in Worms. Isaac Holzer, Worms's former rabbi, questioned whether the synagogue should be rebuilt at all. Elke Spies, a former member of the Worms community who, like Holzer, now in the United States, argued that almost all of the surviving Worms Jews rejected the reconstruction of the synagogue. The rebuilding project continued, and eventually included the restoration of the cemetery, a new museum, and an archive. Nonetheless, its meaning was and is still contested. Are the Jewish sites in Worms a place of commemoration for victims of persecution, or are they a visible sign of German-Jewish reconciliation? Do these sites and artifacts reflect the centrality of Judaism in German culture, or are they a reminder of Nazi crimes? All told, Roemer's meticulous study illustrates how Jewish memory was created and contested in Worms through religious commemorations, historical writings, travelogues, and the creation of museums and monuments.

LYNN RAPAPORT
Pomona College

BERND SCHAEFER. The East German State and the Catholic Church, 1945–1989. Translated by JONATHAN SKOLNIK and PATRICIA C. SUTCLIFFE. (Studies in German History, number 11.) New York: Berghahn Books. 2010. Pp. xiii, 303. $90.00.

The cover of Bernd Schaefer's book depicts an atypical occurrence: only once during his entire tenure as bishop of Berlin from 1979 to 1989 did Cardinal Joachim Meisner meet Erich Honecker, the head of the East German state and its communist party. It was an arranged tête-à-tête on the occasion of East Germany's celebration of Berlin's 750th birthday in 1987. The picture does not symbolize harmony between the East German state and the Catholic Church any more than the photo that was taken when Pope John Paul II encountered Honecker in 1985. Schaefer places both episodes in their historical context (pp. 186, 232–234). Meisner, who had close ties to the Polish pope, had, by 1987, long since dissolved the so-called "business fundamentals" (Geschäftsgrundlage) between church and state. The "political abstinence" (politische Abstinenz) that his predecessor Cardinal Alfred Bengsch had practiced yielded in the 1980s to a stronger push by the church into the public sphere.

Schaefer traces the tortuous path of the Catholic Church in the East German state (GDR) from the beginning (1949) to the end of the Socialist Unity Party's (SED) rule in 1989/1990. He asks, first, how successful were the party's attempts to neutralize, if not marginalize, the church, which it saw as an ideological rival, through a combination of repression ("security policy" or Sicherheitspolitik) and support for elements that were loyal to the state ("alliance policy" or Bündnispolitik) (pp. 43–46). Second, he investigates the Catholic Church's conduct in response to the state's religious policies. At the heart of the study is the political interaction between the party-state and the Catholic Church leadership (including the Vatican); theological and cultural aspects play only a marginal role.

Schaefer's investigation is based on a broad fundamen-tation of party and government files, as well as the archival holdings of the Berlin Bishops' Conference. The files of the Ministry of State Security (the "Stasi"), in particular, provide insights into the scope, and also the partial successes, of four decades of security policy by the SED regime. The SED regime succeeded in neutralizing the Catholic Church, but only after the leading powers in the party and state had put aside their image of the church as an ideological "bogeyman" in favor of a pragmatic policy and accepted the church's "political abstinence" as approving silence rather than denied affirmation. This transformation, which was accomplished under Honecker, shifted balance between church and state to the advantage of the latter. The intentionally small circle of episcopal representatives who negotiated with state agencies no longer served as a protective shield, as the church intended. Instead, they were increasingly instrumentalized by the state in accordance with its church policy. Under pressure from the East German state, church interlocutors (Gesprächsbeauftragte) and Cardinal Bengsch also enforced political abstinence against Catholic dissidents. The hypertrophically expanding security apparatus, which stabilized the GDR both externally and internally, was the necessary precondition for this policy. The SED regime succeeded not least because the church itself limited its latitude for action by suppressing any reform-oriented pluralism within its ranks. The effects of such questionable closeness to the state continued to manifest themselves during the revolutionary year 1989.

Even more inauspicious than the Catholic Church's political abstinence in the 1970s and 1980s, in Schaefer's estimation, was its unconditional anticommunism prior to the building of the Berlin Wall. Especially under the leadership of Bishop Julius Döpfner of Berlin (1957–1961), the church appeared to be the virtual handmaiden of Konrad Adenauer's policies. Döpfner's "Western"-oriented course obstructed any possibility of a modus vivendi with the GDR and overtaxed the powers of the small diaspora church, which was already strained by flight and expulsion (pp. 77–84).

Schaefer's book is still the only comprehensive treatment of this subject. It is a very literal and not always easy to read translation of his dissertation, which was published in Germany in 1998. From the publisher's perspective, it is understandable that the author would shorten only footnote references and individual text passages—though not always in a plausible manner (p. 34, notes 105, 106; pp. 85–88)—for the “slightly abridged English version” (p. x), the only other change being the reduction of the text to a smaller typeface. But the study suffers from its lack of any engagement with present scholarship. A thorough revision would likely have given a different complexion to the chapters on the Catholic Church in the Soviet occupation zone and in the early GDR of the 1950s, in particular. Twenty years after the unification of Germany, a balanced scholarly account of the Catholic Church in the Soviet occupation zone and the GDR remains a desideratum in Germany as well as the United States.

CHRISTOPH KÖSTERS
Kommission für Zeitgeschichte,
Bonn

KAY SCHILLER and CHRISTOPHER YOUNG. The 1972 Munich Olympics and the Making of Modern Germany. (Weimar and Now: German Cultural Criticism.) Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2010. Pp. xiii, 348. Cloth $65.00, paper $24.95.

In public memory, the 1972 Munich Olympics have become associated with the nadir of modern Olympic history: the hostage-taking and murder of eleven members of the Israeli Olympic team by the radical Palestinian group Black September. This association was further cemented by Kevin MacDonald's high-profile documentary One Day in September (1999) and, more recently, Steven Spielberg's film Munich (2005). Kay Schiller and Christopher Young discuss the terrorist attack in the final chapter of their book as part of an account of West Germany's shifting international relations and tensions with the Arab world and the state of Israel. The book refuses, however, to reduce the history of the 1972 Olympics to one tragedy and asks larger questions about the significance of the planning, preparation, and, to a lesser extent, aftermath of the games. It succeeds in developing an interlocking narrative that explores the interdependence of domestic and international developments even though the authors' main arguments are sometimes obscured by too detailed descriptions of international negotiations and domestic organizational matters.

The study examines the relationship between different levels of the German government and the organizers during the bidding and planning stages for the Olympics. This forms the basis for a wider analysis of international relations and their political and cultural implications. Memories of the 1936 Berlin games—through which the Nazi regime tried to project a positive image abroad—formed an important subtext for the Munich event. While this is not surprising, the authors convincingly analyze the complex and contradictory ways in which the organizers negotiated the legacy of 1936. The Berlin games were as much cultural capital as they were a burden for the Munich bidders. While West Germans liked to play down the legacy of the 1936 games, some of the leading international functionaries of the International Olympic Committee (IOC) had fond memories of the Berlin games that made them sympathetic to the Munich bid. The American president of the IOC, Avery Brundage, was an uncritical Germanophile who had been on friendly terms with Carl Diem, the chief organizer of the 1936 games, and the German IOC member, Karl Ritter von Halt, who had served as the last Reichssportführer. Willi Daume, the president of the German National Olympic Committee (NOK), was able to harness the positive reputation of the Berlin games for the Munich bid. In public, however, associations with 1936 were avoided. The East Germans did their best to discredit the Munich games, and by extension the Federal Republic's attempt to promote a positive self-image, by associating them with the Nazi past.

While the ghosts of 1936 were never far below the surface, the organizers of the 1972 games promoted a different image for the Munich event. Informed by contemporary ideas about social planning and technological feasibility (Machbarkeit), they tried to present West Germany as a modern, forward-looking place that was not much disturbed by its past. The architecture of the stadium, with its innovative tent-like roof designed by the architectural firm Behnisch and Partner, can be read as a rejection of the gigantism of the Berlin Reichssportfeld and its monumental Olympic stadium. In the cultural program of the 1972 Olympics, elements of classical culture such as opera, theater, and classical music were relegated to venues in the city center. As the authors demonstrate, the organizers favored less elitist forms of art that were located close to the stadium. The area around the stadium was designed to encourage the active involvement of the public and break down barriers among performers, athletes, and visitors. An “Avenue of Games” provided a forum for less conventional forms of culture and entertainment. There were thirty stages for theater, music, dance, pantomime, and circus acts that mixed elements of popular and avant-garde culture. In Schiller and Young's view, the open and hedonistic aspects of the program were part of a cautious attempt to engage with the youth culture emerging from the 1960s.

This is an important book that uses the 1972 Olympics to raise larger questions about international relations and West German society in the 1960s and 1970s. Still, in some ways it is too ambitious and does not deliver on all its promises. The claim of the subtitle that the history of the 1972 games can shed light on the making of modern Germany seems an overstatement. Which German modernity are the authors talking about? The particular modernist and technocratic visions of the 1960s that they have analyzed so convincingly? Or do they intend to make larger claims about German history in the twentieth century?

MICHAEL HAU
Monash University

CAITLIN E. MURDOCK. Changing Places: Society, Culture, and Territory in the Saxon-Bohemian Borderlands, 1870–1946. (Social History, Popular Culture, and Politics in Germany.) Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press. 2010. Pp. x, 275. $70.00.

Caitlin E. Murdock's book is a significant contribution to the growing literature on frontiers in European history. Her impressive research in both German and Czech archives allows her to write a book that is simultaneously transnational and regional, using the history of the Saxon-Bohemian borderlands to challenge the centrality of the nation-state in the history of Central Europe.

Murdock begins by describing a Saxon-Bohemian border that has been remarkably stable and peaceful throughout the majority of its history. This was a region whose frontier status was unremarkable up until the later years of the nineteenth century, when it first became simultaneously a transit point for migrant workers and shoppers and the site of increased nationalist concern for both Czech and German nationalists. These economic and political developments were largely overlooked by both the Austro-Hungarian and German empires, both of which mostly pursued a policy of benign neglect. This changed with World War I, when even this peaceful frontier was subject to ramped up border patrols intent on ferreting out spies and smugglers. Meanwhile, states at war sought to clarify formerly fuzzy citizenship statuses for the purpose of the draft.

After the war, two new states confronted each other across the Saxon-Bohemian border: the democratic Weimar Republic and Czechoslovakia. As a result of their identification as nation-states and economic and financial turmoil, the border assumed a new role. Politicians highlighted the border as a zone of conflict, and people living in the region fought to keep border networks intact against protectionist states. By the end of the Weimar period, the border zone had become a site of crisis. The region was particularly hard hit by the depression, and both states saw managing border traffic as a means to combat political radicalism. When the Nazis came to power in 1933, they largely continued the border policies of the previous regime, much to the disappointment of German Bohemian nationalists who had hoped for a greater level of support from a state explicitly devoted to the rights of all Germans, regardless of citizenship. They got their wish later in the 1930s, as the Nazi state, concerned by the supposedly threatened status of ethnic Germans in the Sudetenland, adopted an increasingly aggressive posture vis-à-vis Czechoslovakia.

Murdock fluidly weaves a narrative that combines the economic and political history of the Czech-German borderlands. She convincingly explains how border dwellers sought to assert their unique relationships and interests in the face of shifting political regimes and growing efforts on the part of states to delimit and patrol the border and sort out their populations. Murdock stresses how irrelevant nationalism and state power often were to residents' lives. She claims that this reflected a kind of "borderland thinking" that characterizes this and similar regions with transnational economic and personal connections and movements. In order to make this argument, it is crucial to explain what makes borderlands distinct from non-borderland regions. Perhaps the most important distinction is that the Saxon-Bohemian region contains a border between two states. And it is here that Murdock could have gone further with a more extended analysis of the role and understanding of the various states active in this region. Were there shifting relationships between the local and national states over this period? How and to what degree did states themselves borrow policing tactics or citizenship policies from across the frontier? Was there any pattern to why and how border residents chose to identify with the state vis-à-vis the nation? Murdock's evidence hints at some interesting developments, but she could have done more to tie them together analytically to articulate the shifting relationships between the local and national state as well as between the German/Habsburg and German/Czechoslovak states.

Furthermore, while Murdock does an excellent job explaining the uniqueness of the Saxon-Bohemian border, her study might have benefitted from some comparisons with other German or Czech borderlands. In particular, as time goes on, this borderland appears to be increasingly inflected with language imported from the German-Polish border region, which was generally more confrontational. Some attention to this and other border regions might have supported her argument about the nationalization of a discourse of threatened borders and helped to explain when, how, and to what degree this occurred.

These caveats aside, this is an important and carefully researched book that should be read by specialists on Central Europe as well as historians of borderland regions more generally.

ANNEMARIE SAMMARTINO
Oberlin College

MARIA CRĂCIUN and ELAINE FULTON, editors. Communities of Devotion: Religious Orders and Society in East Central Europe, 1450–1800. (Catholic Christendom, 1300–1700.) Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2011. Pp. xvi, 284. $124.95.

Although the Berlin Wall collapsed over twenty years ago, current scholarship on Christianity in early modern Europe still focuses mainly on the western side of the continent. While language barriers and lack of familiarity with library and archive holdings often serve as a rationale for the lesser attention paid to the lands east of Wittenberg, the bigger hurdle may be the mindset of Western European and North American scholars that everything of genuine importance happened in Western Europe, with East-central and Eastern Europe relegated to a derivative backwater.

Therefore, works that challenge these assumptions not only help to rectify the imbalance between scholarship on Western and Eastern Europe in the Reformation era but also introduce readers to the diversity and rich complexity of confessional interactions in East-central and Eastern Europe in the early modern period. One such work is the volume of essays edited by Maria Crăciun and Elaine Fulton on Catholic religious orders in East-central Europe from the fifteenth to the late seventeenth centuries. As the editors point out in the introduction, these religious orders faced many challenges, including the near-collapse of Catholic institutions in the sixteenth century, strong competition from other confessional groups, internal rivalries between secular and regular clergy, and rivalries among the different religious orders.

The first four contributions focus on the pre-Reformation context. Crăciun's chapter on friars in Transylvania from 1450 to 1550 shows that parish clergy resented the friars' influence over the laity, particularly their popularity as confessors and their success in attracting donations because of the perceived power of their intercessory prayers. Marie-Madeleine de Cevins's essay on the Franciscans' impact in Hungary in the later 1400s focuses on their role in shaping Hungarian piety. Her analysis of surviving Franciscan sermons highlights the friars' commitment to Marian devotion and an emphasis on the inner life of faith. Carmen Florea analyzes friars' impact on charity and devotional practices in Transylvanian towns, including confraternities overseen by the Dominicans and Franciscans. These confraternities (including some for women) served as focal points for charity, and for the growing cult of the rosary. In her essay, Gabriella Erdélyi examines the Augustinian convent in Körmend, Hungary. In this instance, the laity criticized the Augustinians' lax morals, including sexual misconduct and drunkenness. The friars' drinking even affected their ability to celebrate the sacraments. The laity showed their commitment to the church and their clout in refusing to countenance the friars' misbehavior.

The next five chapters deal with the period after 1550, when the religious orders' situation became even more precarious due to external pressure from various Protestant groups and to the competition between older and more recent orders, including the Jesuits. Rona Johnston Gordon analyzes jurisdictional conflicts and the complex cooperation between church and state authorities in the Austrian lands who were charged with overseeing the process of reforming decayed monasteries. In her essay, Fulton examines the activities of the Jesuits in Vienna and the key support they received from the Habsburg courtier Georg Eder. He ensured that competent Catholic clergy were selected to fill vacancies and dealt with cases of clerical immorality. Christine Peters continues the focus on the Jesuits with her analysis of their work in Transylvania between their arrival in 1579 and their expulsion in 1588. The Jesuits took over as landlords from other religious orders but their mistreatment of the peasants on their lands antagonized the laity. Martin Elbel focuses on the practice of pilgrimage promoted by the Franciscans in Bohemia, which could include the veneration of relics but also the Stations of the Cross, which became a Franciscan hallmark. Finally, Greta-Monica Miron analyses the work of the Basilian monks in the Uniate or Greek-Catholic church of Transylvania in the eighteenth century. The challenges for the order included recruiting and training sufficient numbers of monks and ensuring their effectiveness in missionary work directed toward Transylvanian Orthodox communities.

In his epilogue, R. Po-chia Hsia describes the work of these religious orders as a triptych: the first panel shows the early work of the orders prior to the Reformation; the second shows the decline in the Reformation era, but also the greater involvement of the laity and the new orders; and the third shows the gradual renewal of the clergy after 1600.

The first chapter includes illustrations of church interiors and altarpieces, and several of the contributors provide maps of the areas under discussion. This work helpfully expands geographic and cultural horizons and contributes to a greater understanding of the ways in which East-central Europe was an active and important player in the complex confessional history of the early modern era.

KARIN MAAG
Calvin College

MAGDA TETER. Sinners on Trial: Jews and Sacrilege after the Reformation. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 331. $39.95.

In this beautifully written and richly documented study, Magda Teter examines the accusation that Jews desecrated communion wafers, which became a commonplace of Christian-Jewish relations in Poland-Lithuania in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. These accusations led to many Jews being accused of sacrilege, brought to trial, tortured, and even executed. Drawing on a wide array of sources from Polish and Vatican archives, as well as the literature of the period, Teter vividly brings to life a number of these cases, including the famous 1556 Sochaczew case and a range of other less well-known instances. Her goal is to examine them in the context of religious and social life in Poland, presenting them as part not only of the tensions aroused by the Reformation, but also of changes in the contemporary criminal justice system. In this way, she aims to examine the interplay of sacred and sacrilege in the development of early modern religious tolerance in the region.

The discussion revolves around two major arguments. The first of these is that the accusation of Jews desecrating the host had its roots in intra-Christian polemic over the nature of transubstantiation. Since Jews did not believe in that miracle they had no reason to desecrate the wafer, so the use of the accusation by Christians must be explained as part of the theological struggle over the Eucharist. Claiming that Jews pierced the host with miraculous results (i.e., its bleeding) was clearly meant to serve those Catholics who believed that it had become physical flesh. This is not a new thesis. Gavin I. Langmuir made it in the context of medieval theological polemics, and Hanna Węgrzynek discussed it in the context of post-Reformation Poland. Teter's strategy is not to analyze this literature but to illustrate the argument with case studies. In her fourth chapter, for example, she shows how the legend that the Jews had desecrated the host in Poznań during the Middle Ages was manipulated by the local Carmelite order in the sixteenth century as part of its war against Protestants. It ended up enabling them not only to defeat the Protestants and persecute the Jews, but also to establish their own chapel for eucharistic worship in the town. Thus, as much as she is using the history of the reformations to elucidate the history of Polish Jewry, she is also using the history of Polish Jewry to elucidate the history of the reformations, giving her study broader significance for historians of religion in Europe.

The book's second major thesis also has implications that extend well beyond the borders of Poland-Lithuania. Teter argues that it was the transfer of jurisdiction over crimes of sacrilege from the ecclesiastical to the secular courts following the Reformation that opened the way to judicial murder for the crime of host desecration; church courts in Poland had traditionally shied away from that form of punishment. As a result, the trials she describes, such as that in Przemyśl in 1630, show how the jostling for jurisdiction, power, and authority within Poland-Lithuania affected the fate of the Jewish victims. She is clear that the outcome of this process was the reinforcement of "the Catholic religion as the only true religion, the only one considered sacred" (p. 6). This is an interesting twist on the thesis of her previous book, which argued against a triumphalist view of Catholic supremacy in early modern Poland. From the perspective of the sacrilege trials, however, the close cooperation of state institutions with the church was crucial for the Counter-Reformation's success. This is an argument of great significance for the discussion of whether (or how) the process of confessionalization, well studied for Central and Western Europe, took place in Poland-Lithuania.

The author concludes with a broadside against Polish historiography, claiming that her work overturns the concept that Reformation Poland was a "state without stakes," as Janusz Tazbir, the doyen of Polish cultural-religious historians, contended in 1967. Teter is undoubtedly correct in asserting that religious tolerance in early modern Poland-Lithuania had its limits and that judicial violence and murder formed part of the picture. In fairness, however, Tazbir has argued much the same thing in a series of studies published after the fall of communism, including essays on the anti-Jewish accusations themselves. In fact, a whole generation of Polish scholars has been at work for the last two decades to deconstruct the rose-tinted descriptions of Tazbir's early study. Any assessment of the impact of Teter's book needs to take that body of research into account.

To say this, however, does not detract from Teter's achievements. On the basis of a large body of primary sources, some of them unknown in previous research, her book sheds new light not only on the history of Poland and Polish Jews but also on the history of the reformations in East Central Europe. In doing so, it opens the way to the fuller integration of these histories into larger narratives of European history in the age of the reformations, helping further break down the east-west borders that still plague research in this area. Though its materials are highly technical, the book's writing and argumentation are clear and easy to follow, making it a very enjoyable read.

ADAM TELLER
Brown University

NATHANIEL D. WOOD. Becoming Metropolitan: Urban Selfhood and the Making of Modern Cracow. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press. 2010. Pp. xiv, 272. $40.00.

A newcomer to Cracow in 1900 would have found the city a dirty, provincial place dominated by its past. Thanks to new technologies of communication, transportation, energy, and especially the modern newspaper, by 1915 Cracow had joined other contemporary cities in an "interurban matrix of words and images describing the modern world" (p. 51). In his excellent monograph, Nathaniel D. Wood defines this process as "becoming metropolitan," and indeed in the first fifteen years of the twentieth century "little Cracow" was transformed physically and culturally. Moreover, its infrastructural innovations proved attractive to surrounding communities incorporated into "Greater Cracow" between 1910 and 1915, even if "big city" building codes and crime did not. Consequently, the city's territory increased eightfold and its population doubled, making Cracow the fifth largest city in the Habsburg Empire.

If this sounds like a familiar story to those who have studied urban development in other European cities in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, that is exactly Wood's point. Cracow may have lagged behind Paris, Vienna, and Berlin in its urban planning, infrastructural improvements, and expansion, but in many ways it was "becoming metropolitan" sooner than Warsaw to the north. Moreover, Cracow's popular illustrated daily newspapers, a boulevard press that promoted, described, and defined the city's metropolitan development, also preceded those of Warsaw. Their flavor—featuring sensational headlines and advertisements, and cultivating immediacy and novelty—and their distribution on the street would have made Cracow's popular dailies siblings of those in other great cities.

For Wood, Cracow's boulevard press serves as both subject and source, and therefore receives extensive treatment. Although Cracow had daily newspapers before 1900, they had connections with the era's political parties. Beginning with the short-lived Kuryerek Krakowski, followed by the more popular Nowiny dla wszystkich, which in turn was superseded by Ilustrowany Kurier Codzienny (IKC), Wood documents the rise and significance of an essentially new medium with considerable skill. Ludwik Szczepański, the editor of Nowiny who Wood refers to as the “Cracovian press pioneer” (p. 57) is one of the book’s two central figures, more so than his protégé, Maryan Dąbrowski, “the Polish William Randolph Hearst” who founded IKC (p. 64). The other central character is Juliusz Leo, Cracow’s vice-mayor and then mayor and the prime mover behind the city’s greater metropolitan expansion. Yet it is through the lens of the popular press rather than of the city administration that we experience Cracow’s modernization, whether the first day of electric streetcar operations or the pros and cons of incorporation as debated by the communities on Cracow’s periphery. The boosterism prominent in dailies like Nowiny and IKC contained missions that, according to Wood, were both “civilizing” and “colonizing,” although the vision of rational modernization promoted by them and politicians like Leo was not so much contested but negotiated by their targeted lower-class and suburban subjects.

A main point of Wood’s thesis is that urban identification is an “imagined community” that has a place in the modern self, one that has been seriously overlooked in the scholarship on Central Europe, which has focused to a great extent on the process of “becoming national.” He argues convincingly that in the mundane everyday lives of Cracovians, the imagined community “was not national, but metropolitan” (p. 202). The popular press, moreover, was instrumental in shaping how Cracovians imagined their city and its place in modern European civilization. Although one can readily agree with the author that national identity is less situated in the quotidian, it is not necessarily in competition with urban identity; rather, “becoming metropolitan” and “becoming national” are better viewed as mutually reinforcing forms of selfhood in the modern era. As Wood himself notes, Leo consciously pitched his arguments for metropolitan incorporation to suburban leaders in national patriotic colors.

Wood’s chapters on Cracow’s expansion raise another issue. His discussion of the making of Greater Cracow is based almost entirely on a reading of the popular daily press, which works better when the press is the subject rather than the source. The reader is not offered a more direct perspective from inside the city administration and council or from the self-governing institutions of the surrounding communities. Instead, the views of all participants in the process and the interactions between them are relayed and filtered through the press. Finally, with so much of his argument based on the importance of the mass-circulation boulevard press in the metropolitan project, more extended discussion of the literacy and education of its readership would have been helpful.

That being said, this book has a great deal to recommend it. The first serious study of the making of modern Cracow, Becoming Metropolitan contributes valuable new perspectives to a dynamically growing literature on the city in Central and Eastern Europe. Methodologically sophisticated and superbly written, Wood’s book clearly demonstrates that Cracow’s story is not exceptional but part and parcel of modern European urban history.

ROBERT BLOBAUM
West Virginia University

VLADIMIR SOLONARI. Purifying the Nation: Population Exchange and Ethnic Cleansing in Nazi-Allied Romania. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. Washington, D.C.: Woodrow Wilson Center. 2010. Pp. xxviii, 451. $65.00.

In the past decade and a half numerous works have appeared on the Holocaust in Romania, along with studies of race, eugenics, and the rise of right-wing extremism in interwar Romania. The Final Report of the International Commission on the Holocaust in Romania (edited by Tuvia Friling, Radu Ioanid, and Mihail E. Ionescu [2005]), the late Jean Ancel’s The History of the Holocaust in Romania (2011) and other important publications have moved these topics from the margins into the mainstream of Romanian and Holocaust historiography.

With this book Vladimir Solonari did not intend to present yet another major work on the history of the Holocaust in Romania, although parts of the book are devoted to the subject. He sets the fate of Romanian Jewry in the wider context of Romania’s attempts to “purify the nation,” which included persecution of the Roma, a subject that Viorel Achim has brought attention to. Yet, until recently there were very few English-language studies on racist stereotypes of the Roma in Romania and their place in eugenic theories of the interwar period. Solonari also dwells on less well-known cases of population exchange, including Hungarians and Germans, whose fate was so different from that of the hundreds of thousands of Jews killed and left to die. The Romanian regime did not attempt to exterminate Hungarians and Germans; rather it subjected them to Romanization. Romanian attitudes toward Germans is an interesting subject that calls for deeper study. Romania was allied with Germany during the war, but the German minority in Romania experienced a racial awakening during the Nazi era.

Solonari does not use the word “Holocaust” in the title of this book, preferring the terms “population exchange” and “ethnic cleansing.” While he does describe the theory and praxis of removing “disturbing elements” from the body of the nation, these terms are perhaps too mild for some of the book’s contents. Jews, for instance, were not ethnically cleansed; they were exterminated.

Solonari correctly emphasizes that Ion Antonescu’s policies were not carried out as a result of Nazi pressure, a claim made by the communist-era historiography and Holocaust deniers since 1989. The outbreak of extreme violence in Bessarabia, Bukovina, and Transnistria was not a result of extreme forms of violent behavior in a wartime situation, but rather the implementation of a radical and fanatical idea in the northern parts of Romania and territories occupied by the Soviet Union. This violence served as a model to be applied in other parts of Romania, but when it became clear that Nazi Germany would lose the war, the Antonescu regime, for pragmatic reasons, did not extend it to the entire country.

While Solonari does an excellent job (especially in chapters four and five) presenting racial and eugenic thought in interwar Romania, he is less focused on some of the major intellectual pillars of Romanian nationalism and antisemitism in the 1930s. Mircea Eliade (whose approach to Jews and Hungarians was racist), Emil Cioran, and Nae Ionescu all made important contributions to the development of Romanian antisemitism during this era, but they receive only scant attention.

This is a valuable and well-documented book on a topic that, until recently, has been neglected by historians of both Romania and the Holocaust.

RAPHAEL VAGO
Tel-Aviv University

MARIANNE HIRSCH and LEO SPITZER. Ghosts of Home: The Afterlife of Czernowitz in Jewish Memory. (The S. Mark Taper Foundation Imprint in Jewish Studies.) Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2010. Pp. xxiv, 362. $39.95.

The city of Czernowitz has long captured the imagination of people with Eastern European roots. Presently situated in western Ukraine, the city's peak of prosperity was during the nineteenth century when it was the capital of the Austro-Hungarian Empire's eastern province of Bukovina. By 1900, the multinational and multilingual city possessed a modern, largely Germanized Jewish community. Czernowitz was also a center of modern Yiddish culture, hosting the first international Yiddish language conference in 1908. After World War I, Czernowitz was severed from Austria and ruled successively by Romania, the Soviet Union, and Ukraine. It had an estimated Jewish population of 43,000 (47 percent of the city's inhabitants) in 1919, reaching more than 50,000 by 1940; the Holocaust halved that number. Waves of postwar Jewish emigration further reduced the Jewish population of Czernowitz to the present-day estimate of 6,000.

Marianne Hirsch and Leo Spitzer's book recaptures Czernowitz's legacy. Hirsch, who developed the concept of "postmemory" to describe the memory of children of Holocaust survivors in her Family Frames: Photography, Narrative, and Postmemory (1997), is the daughter of Carl and Lotte Hirsch, Holocaust survivors from Czernowitz who are the book's subject. In 1998, Hirsch and coauthor Spitzer (her husband) traveled to Czernowitz with her parents, who were returning there for the first time since 1945. Hirsch had never been to Czernowitz, yet her "postmemory," derived from a childhood infused with stories of the city before and during the war, was so powerful that she felt she was returning to a place she had already known.

This is a nuanced book of many layers and themes. It is in part a "second-generation journey" (p. 167) back to the old country: a family history of Carl and Lotte Hirsch that covers their ancestry, childhood in interwar Romania, dramatic survival during the Holocaust, and postwar exile, told through the eyes of the couple's daughter and son-in-law. By situating the story of the Hirsches within the larger history of wartime Czernowitz's Jewish population, Ghosts of Home is also about the Holocaust in Romania. The result is a book that puts a profoundly human face on the experience of wartime Romanian Jewry. The authors draw on artifacts, documents, and photos, including a tile stove from the apartment the Hirsches abandoned in 1945, a 1942 photograph of the Hirsches in Czernowitz, a little book of illustrations by an inmate of the concentration camp in Transnistria (where Jews from Czernowitz were deported), a 1941 photograph of the historic Czernowitz synagogue after it was set on fire, two 1942 Czernowitz Jewish identity cards with a yellow star imprinted in the background, and a wartime document naming Carl Hirsch on a list of Jews exempted from deportation. The search for and discovery of the latter documents, some of which required considerable persistence in Soviet-era Ukrainian archives, is a pronounced part of the book. Such records, among others, are skillfully and carefully used to fill the gaps in oral testimony.

Considerable attention is focused on a single photograph of Hirsch's parents taken in Czernowitz in 1942. The wallet-size image, which shows well-dressed, confident newlyweds on an afternoon stroll, offers a stark contrast to the wartime stories of deportations, brutality, and deprivation that formed Hirsch's "postmemory" of her parents' experience. A spot on the lapel of Carl's jacket in the 1942 photo, barely visible, is the subject of an entire chapter in which the authors speculate about whether or not it was a Jewish star. Carl maintained that Jewish stars were larger and more distinct (p. 166). But if Hirsch's parents were openly defying the ordinance requiring Jews to wear such badges of identification in public (it was rescinded in July 1943), then Carl and Lotte must have felt relatively secure in Czernowitz, even in 1942.

The authors situate the 1942 photo in its historical context. Romanian and German troops retook Czernowitz in June 1941, Jews were ordered to wear the yellow star in August, and they were moved into a ghetto on October 11, 1941, after which Hirsch's parents married to avoid being separated. In October-November 1941, some 30,000 Jews were deported from Czernowitz to a Romanian-run concentration camp in Transnistria that Robert D. Kaplan has called "the only non-German run extermination camp in Europe" (Balkan Ghosts: A Journey Through History [1993], p. 128). But Carl and Lotte Hirsch were spared almost certain death, along with 19,000 other Czernowitz Jews, due to the efforts of local officials who placed them on a list of people exempt from deportation. The second and last deportation action, in January 1942, led to the round up and deportation of 4,000 more Czernowitz Jews.

Hirsch's parents lived out the rest of the war in Czernowitz. As a result of their research, the authors came to understand the photograph in an entirely new light. "Looking at the picture now," Hirsch and Spitzer write, "we realize that in it Carl and Lotte are already survivors, alive within a fortunate minority that had been spared a terrible fate" (p. 193). They contend that "the fact that local officials had such significant impact on government policy is one of the peculiarities of the Romanian Holocaust" (p. 192).

The authors conclude that children of Holocaust survivors born after the war belong to "the generation of postmemory" (p. 269). Ghosts of Home is a highly personal work about the attempt by two members of that generation to reconstruct the experience of their parents' wartime past by combining memories and the historical record. Hirsch and Spitzer have deepened their self-understanding while providing readers with a valuable study of memory and the Holocaust.

JOSHUA D. ZIMMERMAN
Yeshiva University

STEVEN B. BOWMAN. The Agony of Greek Jews, 1940–1945. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press. 2009. Pp. xiv, 325. $55.00.

Long neglected in the English-language historiography on the Holocaust, the plight of Greek Jewry has found partial redress in recent years through the work of eminent historians such as Mark Mazower, K. E. Fleming, and Steven B. Bowman. Whereas Mazower and Fleming have concerned themselves with the broader history of Salonican Jewry, Bowman is recognized as an authority on the Greek Holocaust. In this book Bowman expands on his previous chronicle of Jewish participation in the National Liberation Front–National Popular Liberation Army (EAM/ELAS) resistance movement by mapping out the prewar and wartime structural, political, social, and psychological factors that facilitated the expulsion and ultimate destruction of Greece's Jewish community.

Bowman's discussion of the fateful effects of the general belief in German good will, in conjunction with the "entrapment" of Jews as a consequence of the tripartite partitioning of the country, although greatly indebted to the work of Michael Matsas, makes for compelling reading. Bowman's depiction of the sheer scale of population movement through mass deportation restores to the term "displacement" its true meaning. The description of an ever-expanding constellation of labor and concentration camps across Europe, and of the method and precision deployed in the development of a highly sophisticated infrastructure designed for the purpose of annihilation, horrifies and baffles the reader anew. Equally engaging is Bowman's discussion of the politics of relief, where he lays out the delicate and intricate negotiations undertaken by international and local relief organizations with the conqueror, to facilitate their work and also to advance their respective interests. The combined impact of institutional rivalry, the complexities of intracommunal Jewish politics, and the role of respective governments, both occupied and free, whose Jewish citizens had fallen within the grasp of the Axis powers contributed considerably to the fate of Greek Jewry. These are among the strongest sections in the book.

Overall Bowman's book does little to advance the existing scholarship on this still-obscure chapter of the Holocaust and does not do justice to the author's own considerable labors over the last two decades. But it does reflect them, at times seeming to act as a repository for data that perhaps did not find a home in Bowman's previous publications. The book presents a catalogue of minutiae, details of events, incidents, and the fates of individuals that, invaluable as they may be, are rendered meaningless by not being used selectively and integrated into a binding narrative. The reader is left to do the messy work of assimilating the data and evaluating its myriad significances. A better negotiation of the balance between detail and narrative would have produced a more cohesive, engaging book. In addition, there are problems of structure, awkward and often confusing prose, and numerous typographical errors.

The history of Greek-Jewish coexistence and solidarity—and sometimes the lack thereof—presents itself as Bowman's potential narrative hook, the missing scaffolding. The story of successful multiculturalism, the equilibrium struck between difference and assimilation, is ever-present but only half-told in this account. It finds expression in Greek law and policy, in the return of confiscated properties by the Greek state after the war, in community loyalty and solidarity evident in the willingness to hide, protect, smuggle, and generally assist Jewish citizens during the occupation, often at great personal risk. This seems to be the strongest, yet still unexplored, potential of Bowman's research, an aspect that also distinguishes the Greek case from the experience of many, though not all, Jewish communities elsewhere in Europe during World War II. Today, the memory and legacy of Greek-Jewish coexistence is, or remains, absent from public discourse, from Greek self-understanding, and from narratives of national identity. In its place is a widespread but arguably epidemic antisemitism within Greek society and the diaspora communities, coupled with an entrenched assumption of its historic nature—a cultural condition that Bowman's account of the plight of Greek Jewry calls into question.

MARGARITE POULOS
University of Sydney

CHRISTINE RUANE. The Empire's New Clothes: A History of the Russian Fashion Industry, 1700–1917. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2009. Pp. xii, 276. $65.00.

On first picking up Christine Ruane's history of the Russian fashion industry, a reader might easily be deceived into assuming, because of the book's coffee-table size and beautiful photographs, that it was written to entertain rather than educate. That would be a mistake. The author does not limit her history to fashion as an aesthetic and cultural phenomenon but accomplishes something larger: the book is at once a broad analysis of changes in Russian fashion from Peter the Great to the revolution and a history of the development of imperial Russia's clothing industry. Ruane weaves the two subjects together to produce a colorful tapestry of topics and stories, some of them familiar and unsurprising, others new and intriguing.

If one were to isolate a single thread running through and connecting the various themes of this wide-ranging book, it would be the familiar subject of Russia grappling with economic and social changes emanating from Western Europe. In studies of imperial Russia, Western influence can be a virtually inescapable theme. Here the theme becomes particularly engrossing for the simple reason that developments in the fashion industry often took place among little-known figures and unfamiliar groups. As Ruane points out, the state had a difficult time controlling Russian fashion and its effects since "even an autocratic government could not hope to eliminate the idiosyncratic choices that individual Russians made when they decided what to wear each day" (p. 151). Thus ordinary women, both as clothing makers and wearers, take center stage here, as do textile workers, the publishers of fashion magazines, and writers who condemned what they saw as fashion's excesses.

Approaching fashion from a variety of angles, the book dips into less familiar aspects of Russian history. For instance, press censorship is a common theme in the history of imperial Russia, but censorship of the fashion press reveals the extremes to which it could go. Likewise, historians are familiar with the origins of Russian publishing and know about many of imperial Russia's remarkable women, but few are likely to be aware that the fashion press was partly inaugurated by two female publishers in the mid-nineteenth century. Ruane also details the history of artisanal tailoring, the role of sewing in women's education, Russian mail order catalogues, the surprisingly widespread dissemination of Singer sewing machines, the Russianization of court attire and uniforms, the place of the garment trade in Russian labor history, and the riots that destroyed German clothing stores in Moscow during World War I.

As for the book's more familiar topics, the fashion industry proves particularly illuminating when it comes to the ever-troubling problem of Russian identity vis-à-vis Europe, as well as the expanding role of women in the public sphere. With respect to the former, it seems to this reviewer that Ruane uses fashion to contribute to the case for what might be termed the "undecidability" of Russian identity. She shows how, in the world of fashion, national identity continually wavered between the expression of a full-fledged Europeaness and the desire to embrace something more native. Indeed, my only disagreement with the book involves Ruane's argument in the epilogue that a fashion show in May 1916 marked a "resolution of Russia's cultural conundrum" in fashion by establishing a blend of Western and Russian styles (p. 238). The rest of the book seems to suggest that had the revolution not intervened in 1917, the struggle for an acceptable Russian identity would have continued unabated. With respect to gender, developments in the fashion industry reflect the slow but steady advance of women into the public sphere. Accompanying this progress, not surprisingly, there arose a conservative backlash. The backlash culminated in a book by Iulii Elets that (absurdly) demonized women for the rise of fashion and consumerism, a viewpoint Ruane deftly ties to the similar stigmatization of modern women in Leo Tolstoy's Kreutzer Sonata (1889).

Finally, the photographs in this book should not be overlooked. Among the most interesting and enjoyable aspects of this study are the long captions analyzing these photographs. Ruane demonstrates a keen eye for visual analysis of clothing and brings out subtle and revealing features of the photographs that most observers would likely never notice. The photographs themselves, moreover, can be haunting. The often well-dressed figures, presumably chosen for the fashionable clothing they flaunt, seem particularly concerned to demonstrate their up-to-the-moment modernity, and yet, from today's perspective, their very fashionability makes them appear poignantly frozen in time. Rather than dressing up an otherwise traditional social history in excessive finery, the photographs and captions enhance the overall fascination of this study, rendering it all the more revealing and absorbing.

CHRISTOPHER ELY
Florida Atlantic University

JOHN DOYLE KLIER. Russians, Jews, and the Pogroms of 1881–1882. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xxiv, 492. $110.00.

This splendid book, nearly completed at the time of John Doyle Klier's untimely death at the age of sixty-two in 2007, was edited and seen through production by a devoted team including his wife and historian François Guesnet. It is undoubtedly the best of Klier's many publications: a work that challenges but, oddly enough, also substantiates something of the thrust of Jewish collective memory with regard to the pogroms of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

The intermittent, violent attacks on the streets of Russia's cities, towns, and also villages—starting in earnest in the spring of 1881 and becoming more violent in 1905–1906, and particularly with the disintegration of the Romanov regime in 1918–1920—still constitute for many the epicenter of Jewish recollections of the past. Klier's careful, thoughtful study, focusing on the first of these explosions, is as good an account of their etiology as we are likely ever to have. He argues that the pogroms cannot be traced to tsarist machinations; rather, they were inspired by a mesh of hatreds and suspictions fanned by the authorities and shared equally by elites and the masses in late imperial Russia.

In waves of attacks erupting first in Elizavetgrad in April 1881, in Warsaw later that year, in Balta a few months later, and then, finally, in Ekaterinoslav in the summer of 1883, hundreds of locales suffered violence almost entirely aimed at Jewish property. Millions of rubles of damage resulted while few were killed (probably no more than twenty-five Jews in all), very few were raped (numbers remain uncertain, but such attacks, far more common in later anti-Jewish outrages, were rare in the early 1880s), and thousands of attackers were arrested. Klier argues that Cossacks were primarily present to protect Jews from marauders and that authorities mostly sought, as vigorously as they could, and with the use of sparse, poorly prepared police or troops, to maintain order. Not only was the new tsar, Alexander III, not responsible for either their planning or execution, but he, and many close to him, feared that revolutionaries had ignited them.

Klier's interpretation of the pogroms contradicts many of the still-regnant Jewish assumptions about the Russian Jewish past. His analysis of Russia's fin-de-siècle anti-Jewish violence is coherent and persuasive, arguably the fullest and best available. Still, this is not what most distinguishes the book. Its single most significant achievement is Klier's demonstration that while the government was not literally culpable it was nonetheless responsible for the violence, if only because of how it both sustained and vigorously articulated so many of the assumptions at the core of pogromist animus.

For this reason, Klier begins his account not in 1881 but a year earlier when, following a failed attempt on the life of Alexander II, Russia's chief of gendarmes ordered authorities to investigate the "universal Jewish Kahal's" support for the anti-imperial revolutionary movement. By the summer of 1881, once the first pogroms had erupted, Vilna's Okhrana (Department for Protecting the Public Security and Order) dispatched an agent to Königsberg to shadow an old rabbi it suspected of working with revolutionaries to transport contraband in an effort to topple the Romanov regime. "Any honest voice of the Russian land is drowned out by Polish-Yid cries" (p. 2), declared in 1880 the soon to be appointed Minister of Interior N. P. Ignatiev, who would be largely responsible for the formulation of Russian policy toward Jews in the period immediately following the pogroms.

"It will suffice to note that every non-Jewish assessment of the pogroms without exception, relied on the concept of Jewish exploitation . . . All asserted, with one voice, that the Jews themselves were to blame for the disorders," writes Klier (p. 122). This meant that those responsible for Russian policy toward the Jews sought, in the short term, to restore calm to Russia's streets while seeking to check, in the long-term, Jewish economic chicanery. This, in essence, was the impulse at the heart of the May Laws instituted by the regime soon after the pogroms, regulations that, as Klier puts it, were "Born in haste, muddled in intent, [and] designed to be temporary" (p. 224).

Regarding pogromists themselves, Klier makes a good case for them having been drawn mostly not from vagrants or hoodlums but from the peasantry or semi-urban dwellers with a small number of furloughed soldiers and the occasional nobleman or cleric. Polite society showed little horror at the sight of the riots, often watching from the sidelines and causing police or troops to complain that they blocked access. Leaning on the comparative work of Donald L. Horowitz, Klier describes the critical role played by rumors, outsized tales that often stressed how Jews were swallowing Russia whole; he even ferrets out of the archives at least one pogrom-era Dracula rumor involving Jews.

Where the book stumbles, badly at times, is in its last section when it seeks to make sense of the post-pogrom reactions of the Jews themselves. Here, the range of primary sources Klier utilizes is more constrained, his insights less sharp. Most unfortunate is the book's conclusion, which culminates in observations so reductive, so unintelligible that one can only presume they were written by Klier in haste with the expectation of recasting: "Conspiracy theories have had the power of charming Jewish audiences as they have gripped groups of antisemites. Just as the latter find a strange comfort in the myths propagated by the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, so too do many descendants of the East European Jewish diaspora retain an unshakable belief in the malevolent pogrom-mongering of the Russian state" (pp. 413–414). It seems bizarre to establish a parallel between a hideous forgery still used to promote hatred and Jewish perceptions of pogroms that led to a reductionist image of the Russian-Jewish past. And the assertion is also out of kilter with the book's key discovery: namely that collective Jewish memory retained a more accurate understanding of the pogroms—centered on the culpability of the Russian regime and the explosive nexus between official xenophobia and popular violence—than did most recent historians of the region.

The bulk of the work, however, is a superbly wrought, multilayered treatment of pogrom-era Jews as seen through the eyes of the Russian public, government, press, radicals, and others. It is the achievement of a consummate archival historian, a true expert on Russian attitudes toward Jews who died in his prime.

STEVEN J. ZIPPERSTEIN
Stanford University

OLGA KUCHERENKO. Little Soldiers: How Soviet Children Went to War, 1941–1945. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 266. $99.00.

In Little Soldiers Olga Kucherenko explores the factors that led young people, predominately boys, under the enlistment age of eighteen to join the Soviet armed forces during World War II, and their experiences in the army, the navy, and among partisan groups. Poor record keeping, especially among partisan units, makes specifying the total number of underage soldiers impossible; estimates range widely from 60,000 to 300,000. The age range of such soldiers is also difficult to determine. As Kucherenko notes, sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds were sometimes allowed to enlist. She uses the terms “child,” “underage,” “adolescent,” “teenager,” and “youngster” interchangeably to refer to those aged ten to sixteen, although it is not clear—and indeed may be impossible to determine—how frequently the “little soldiers” were much younger than sixteen. For Kucherenko, what seems to distinguish these youngsters from their adult comrades in arms was their greater susceptibility to the exhortations to defend the motherland (rodina) that permeated Soviet schools and Soviet culture more generally in the 1930s.

The first three chapters examine the ways in which prewar programs for children and the broader Soviet culture prepared young people mentally and physically to participate in warfare. Kucherenko provides a general overview of a large number of topics ranging from Soviet school policy to Soviet cinema. Much of this information will be familiar to specialists, particularly as Kucherenko reaffirms relatively uncontroversial conclusions—for example, that Soviet education stressed collectivist values, hard work, and, beginning in the 1930s, patriotism—rather than analyzing the ways in which paying attention to child soldiers might reinforce, challenge, or reshape these conclusions. At the same time, the brief treatment of so many topics may be confusing for those without some specialized knowledge, as numerous individuals, books, and movies are mentioned without any accompanying explanation. Moreover, many topics—for example, the re-education of homeless and abandoned children—while part of a general picture of Soviet childhood lack a clear connection to the question of why during the war a minority of children set out for the front.

Emphasizing “adolescents’ propensity for collective activities, heightened susceptibility to everything that accentuates their maturity, and their desire for positive evaluation by others,” Kucherenko concludes “it is hardly surprising that some should have sought to enhance their self-esteem by asserting their capability and participating in the war” (p. 46). She appears to have conducted in-depth interviews with an unspecified number of child veterans. However, in the first section little of this material is quoted or analyzed. Rather, it is cited in the footnotes to support generalizations such as “ideological convictions stimulated emotions” (p. 45).

The child soldiers themselves begin to emerge from the general context in the book’s second section. An initial chapter provides overviews of wartime propaganda directed at adults and children as well as of the war’s effects on children’s lives. Three chapters then describe children’s experiences in three distinct wartime situations: the army (“Babes in Grey”), partisan units (“Imps and Eaglets”), and the navy (“Sea Whelps”). As the chapter titles suggest, Kucherenko is keen to emphasize the immaturity, if not innocence, of the child soldiers. However, she does not specifically engage with the question of why or whether someone like sixteen-year-old Katia Mikhailova, who arrived at a military base in Smolensk as a trained and certified medic, is best understood as a “child soldier” or a “babe in grey,” terms that emphasize age and obscure gender. Kucherenko raises but does not develop the question of how Soviet child soldiers in World War II compared to those at earlier times in Russian history or to those in more recent conflicts worldwide.

The most engaging sections of the book reproduce and analyze the words of the child veterans themselves. Kucherenko effectively draws on memoirs and interviews to demonstrate that for many children military service constituted less the end of childhood than a means of coping with the overwhelming disruptions caused by the war: hunger, abandonment, the death of family members, the destruction of their homes. Children who left home to join relatives at the front, who were “adopted” as vospitanniki (wards) by Red Army units passing through their villages, or who joined partisans in the forest were often already adrift and endangered. While teenagers’ service in the army and partisan units was often unplanned and (in the case of the army) officially discouraged by the state, the navy attempted to channel youthful enthusiasm into approved channels by establishing schools to train approximately five thousand boys aged twelve to seventeen to become jungi (ship’s boys), the lowest naval rank established by Peter the Great and reintroduced during World War II.

Focusing on the impact of ideology on Soviet children’s decisions during World War II, Little Soldiers highlights the importance of understanding children as historical actors.

LISA A. KIRSCHENBAUM
West Chester University

KRISTIN ROTH-EY. Moscow Prime Time: How the Soviet Union Built the Media Empire That Lost the Cultural Cold War. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 315. $39.95.

Kristin Roth-Ey has written a remarkably intelligent book about the exponential post-Stalin expansion of the mass media, particularly film, radio, and television. Based in equal parts on the memoirs of culture producers and on archival records, it is a major contribution to our understanding of post-Stalin culture and society. Roth-Ey focuses not on the cultural analysis of individual films or programs, although she does that very well, but on media production and consumption. One of her central arguments is that in terms of production, programming, and reach, the mass media were immensely successful—by the late 1960s Soviet society was thoroughly plugged in—yet Soviet culture producers failed to meet their own stated goal of offering an attractive, distinctively Soviet alternative to competing Western media. That was because the regime’s goal of cultural uplift and its antipathy to mass culture hobbled the media. A second argument is that the growth of the media was accompanied by increasing complexity, including the emergence of multiple points of control that gave media producers room to maneuver. A third argument is that, in the context of increasing leisure time (by my own calculation, there was at least a thirty-five percent increase between the mid-1950s and the late 1960s), rising income, increasing years in school, and massive housing construction, cultural consumption was transformed from a predominantly public to a predominantly private experience, from relative uniformity (at least in the cities) to a multiplicity of options and consequent audience segmentation. These points fit nicely with what we know about other developments in post-Stalin society. Roth-Ey's detailed case histories, however, often cut against received wisdom, and against what leading figures in the Soviet media have told us in their memoirs.

How can we explain, for instance, the economics of the Soviet film industry, which was hugely profitable even though most Soviet films barely broke even or lost money? One answer is that foreign films (although ideologically suspect) and Soviet domestic blockbusters (although scorned for aping Western mass culture) filled the big theaters. Highbrow films could play to small audiences and uphold the honor of Soviet film at international festivals, while boring politicized films had their own niche. The film establishment, including the directorial intelligentsia, claimed to be elevating the Soviet public's cultural tastes, but the industry depended upon providing films that the audience wanted. Why then was Grigori Chukhrai's Experimental Creative Studio (ETK, 1966–1976), which aimed for its every movie to make a profit, shut down? Not, suggests Roth-Ey, because of political or cultural transgressions, as is usually maintained, but because the profit principle threatened the rest of the Soviet film establishment. In general, Roth-Ey convincingly plays down the role of politics and ideology in hampering media creativity. As she points out, directors whose films were banned were never forced to produce popular or politically acceptable films but went on producing for small or restricted audiences because they had cultural capital; they were artists, and thus valuable. Meanwhile, a fan culture grew up spontaneously around popular actors and actresses, and was then fed by the movie magazine Sovetskii ekran. Cultural authorities disapproved of but profited from fandom.

Why, as Nikita Khrushchev asked at a 1963 meeting of the Presidium, did the Soviet Union produce more radios with short wave capacity than the rest of the world taken together, while it was at the same time trying to prevent foreign short wave signals from reaching the Soviet public? Roth-Ey's answer is in part that this was a successful growth industry that satisfied both the strong public demand for short wave radios and the regime's goal of connecting with as many people as possible. But short wave radio was also part of the leadership's effort to export Soviet culture to the rest of the world via Radio Moscow: it was too easy to tout Radio Moscow's achievements, to believe claims that the station had a strong appeal to foreign audiences, and to assume that on this cultural front the Soviet Union would eventually predominate. Meanwhile, Radio Maiak was set up in 1964 as a twenty-four-hour news and music station specifically to compete with foreign broadcasts. The Central Committee for a time resisted this initiative because the proposed programming seemed to be borrowed directly from the enemy. That was indeed what made the station hugely successful (except in news programming: political controls did stifle news), but it turned out that the Soviet radio audience could listen both to Maiak and to foreign stations.

One reason why the Soviet government invested billions of rubles developing television was the belief that the television audience would be walled off from foreign competition, but in Roth-Ey's telling most of the television programming in the 1950s was the work of amateurs. Only in the 1960s did the regime begin to impose central controls over programming. The 1960s are, in post-Soviet recollection, the golden age of experimentation and authenticity in programming, but the author tells the story differently: the KVN program (a popular game show) and others held up as exemplars of cultural liberalism were in fact committed to cultural uplift and to providing exemplary heroes (even if in the form of clever male students who excelled in improvisational sketches); that is, their producers shared the regime's cultural predilections. Roth-Ey argues further that programming during the allegedly regimented 1970s was not much different from what it had been in the 1960s. While audience surveys were abandoned in the 1970s because cultural authorities already knew what audiences should be watching, there was nevertheless progressively less opera and more sports and movies. The television audience was huge, but it always wanted more of the mass culture programming that both ideological watchdogs and the intelligentsia despised. Television, radio, and film responded to audience demand, but always cautiously and always with the conviction, or pretense, that their mission remained cultural uplift.

JOHN BUSHNELL
Northwestern University

MIDDLE EAST AND NORTHERN AFRICA

FARIBA ZARINEBAF. Crime and Punishment in Istanbul, 1700–1800. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2010. Pp. xiii, 287. Cloth $55.00, paper $22.95.

It is common wisdom that crime does not pay. But this is not true for historians, since crime is a rich and exhaustible source for social history. Unfortunately, very few historians of the Middle East have ventured into this field. Therefore, Farina Zarinebaf's book on crime in Ottoman Istanbul is a welcome addition to the literature. The study is divided into three parts. In the first section, the author discusses social developments, focusing especially on migration, marginalization, and the impact of the 1703 and 1730 rebellions. This is followed by a section on the categories of crime, in which she addresses crimes against property, prostitution, violence, and homicide. The book's final section deals with policing and the administration of justice. Zarinebaf makes use of a wide range of archival sources, such as Islamic court records, police records, prison records, and imperial orders. The result is a lively book, full of illustrative examples of crime.

Despite its strengths, the book is in some respects problematic. The first is methodological. Although she acknowledges that archival sources do not allow her to ascertain statistical trends, Zarinebaf aims to examine the impact of socioeconomic transformations on crime. Unfortunately, she limits herself to a description of the types of crime against property, their perpetrators, and their objects. In a chapter on "Prostitution and the Vice Trades," she claims that moral standards declined during the first part of the century, that commercial sex spread, and that the state tried to get control of the vice trade (pp. 87, 104, 110–111, 176). As proof of this moral decline, Zarinebaf notes that moralists composed poems criticizing the relaxation of the moral codes and that other poets wrote to promote "love and romance in an open and direct manner" (p. 88). I am not convinced by her evidence and do not believe that the simultaneous circulation of both moralist and amorous poetry is per se an indication of the easing of moral boundaries. Similarly, she shows that the state began to suppress the vice trade, yet does not prove that efforts at suppression were more intensive than before. Finally, court records are not very helpful since very few cases of adultery and prostitution were tried (pp. 107, 116).

The author's limited knowledge of shari'a at times leads her to misinterpret her sources. I will cite a few examples out of many. First, the slave's blood money is the value of his/her market price, and not half the amount of a free Muslim as the author claims (p. 162). Secondly, Zarinebaf offers no evidence to support her assertion that the rate of polygamy in the Ottoman Empire was lower than elsewhere in the Muslim world because of Hanafi law (the official code of the Ottoman Empire), which favors monogamy, an equally unsubstantiated claim (p. 94). Finally, to support her claim that slave traders were involved in prostitution, Zarinebaf presents two cases (p. 97). One is about a slave trader who sued three men for damages for deflowering his female slave, because her market price decreased as a result. This apparently was a case of rape, and the men were sentenced to penal servitude in the galleys. The register deals only with criminal sentences, and we do not know how the civil suit ended. The second case is about the purchaser of a female slave, who slept with her after the sale but before paying her price. Evidently dissatisfied, he attempted to rescind the sale. The slave trader refused and sued the purchaser's guarantor, and the judge found for the slave trader. Neither case suggests that prostitution was involved.

In the last chapter, Zarinebaf makes some sweeping statements about trends in the Ottoman penal system. She argues that capital punishment was slowly dying out during the eighteenth century and that punishment moved from the private to the public domain (p. 173). She does not, however, provide any statistical data about capital punishment. Therefore, I doubt that it was gradually being abolished. Private prosecution of homicide and violence certainly did not disappear in the eighteenth century. Actually, capital punishment according to shari'a law continued into the early twentieth century because the revised Ottoman penal code of 1858 retained it.

Although this book offers interesting glimpses of daily life and criminality in eighteenth-century Istanbul, its inadequate methodology makes it disappointing.

RUDOLPH PETERS
University of Amsterdam

MAX WEISS. In the Shadow of Sectarianism: Law, Shi'ism, and the Making of Modern Lebanon. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2010. Pp. x, 341. $39.95.

In the Shadow of Sectarianism is a welcome, topical addition to the study of the social history of Shi'ism, the Lebanese political system, and French Mandatory rule in the Middle East. Remarking that sectarianism in Lebanon is neither a preternatural mode of being nor a colonialist scheme imposed by the West, the author opts for a middle path and traces the institutionalization of a specifically Shi'i sectarian identity, under the French Mandate (1920–1943), through such diverse processes as a public debate in the Shi'i press over the proper observance of the 'Ashura mourning ritual, the management by the Shi'i community of its own separate cemeteries, and especially the formal recognition of the Shi'i Ja'fari legal school and creation of a separate system of Shi'i courts of law. Sectarianism, or a community's political reference to its sole confessional identity, he convincingly argues, was thus a distinctly modern phenomenon and differed as a process from one community to another. In the case of the Shi'as, sectarianism constituted the interface by which they first participated in the modern state, and it began much earlier than the political mobilization campaign of Musa al-Sadr in the 1960s.

The author concentrates on three main sets of sources to demonstrate how sectarianism was produced both "from below" by the Shi'i community and "from above" by the French authorities: al-'Irfan, the well-known Shi'i literary journal in whose pages contemporary intellectuals argued for and over their community's modernity; French Foreign Ministry archives that showcase the Shi'as' "politics of demand" and attempts to oblige the central state to pay more attention to their development; and the records of the Ja'fari tribunal in Beirut and other towns. This last source deserves particular note as Weiss appears to be the first to have exploited it in any systematic manner. Court proceedings have of course long been a mainstay of Middle Eastern social history, and only a handful of the cases treated here relate to Shi'a-specific concerns such as mut'a marriage. Still, these constitute some of the most recent and potentially sensitive of such records to be have been used (the author judiciously changes several of the names involved) and thus open the way to further legal studies on the Mandate and post-Mandate period.

Weiss is well read on Lebanon's political system and the problem of sectarianism, and he offers several generally pertinent comparisons with other societies under European domination. Given the overall nuance of his approach, it is only a bit striking that he so summarily dismisses many previous scholars' contributions as "crude," "failing to appreciate," "unsubstantiated," "reductionist," and "cynical" (or waves aside as a "bizarre historical narrative" the less-known but well-attested fact of Shi'i support for the French campaign against Acre in 1799 [p. 116]). Weiss's own statements are often a bit grandiose themselves, for example where he announces that the Ja'fari court was capable of re-fashioning power relationships within the Shi'i milieu "in a way that would have been downright impossible before its foundation" (p. 141) or that the recognition of Ja'fari law in 1926 was no less than the "birth moment" of a visible Shi'i community in Lebanon (p. 159).

The bluster and occasional jargon, however, should not distract from the author's very substantive contribution. Correctly pointing out that what was new was not the recognition of Ja'fari jurisprudence per se (one might add that Ottoman-era practice generally did not distinguish between Hanafi and other sources of law anyway, so that locally Shi'i practice could indeed enjoy de facto recognition) but its formalization and "unprecedented bureaucratization" under the French mandate (pp. 160–162), Weiss's research suggests that the real story of the Lebanese Shi'as' modern transformation is the emergence of a new sectarian elite. In redefining the confessional court as the new locus of traditional Shi'i legal authority (marja'iyya), pro-French and essentially secular lawyers such as Munir 'Usayran not only engendered a revolution in Shi'i legal and political thought but also irrevocably tied the Lebanese community's fate to the system of national sectarian politics as a whole.

Far from struggling in the shadow of sectarianism, Weiss shows how the Shi'a rather emerged from under the shadow to seize on the peculiar benefits of French mandatory rule and, perhaps more than any other community, turn the politics of sectarian differentiation to its advantage. Well researched and passionately argued, this study offers some fresh insights into the development of Shi'i identity in modern Lebanon and provides several new starting points for the discussion of law, colonial rule, and sectarian politics in the Middle East overall.

STEFAN WINTER
Université du Québec à Montréal

SUB-SAHARAN AFRICA

WILLIAM CUNNINGHAM BISSELL. Urban Design, Chaos, and Colonial Power in Zanzibar. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 378. Cloth $70.00, paper 24.95, e-book $21.95.

William Cunningham Bissell has written what he describes as an ethnography of colonial rule in British Zanzibar. He examines the "chaos" of urban planning under the colonial government and suggests that its failure demonstrates "that the rationality, regularity, and reach of colonial states have been vastly overrated. Colonial governance was far more inconsistent, incomplete, and incoherent than is commonly assumed" (p. 71). While one might quibble with the degree to which colonial omnipotence has been commonly assumed in Africa or anywhere else, Bissell certainly does prove that the British in Zanzibar spectacularly failed to fulfill their own plans for Zanzibar town.

Bissell takes as his case one of the more unique colonies created out of the scramble for Africa, the protectorate of Zanzibar. In the nineteenth century the Busaidi sultans of Oman had moved their capital to the East African island of Zanzibar in order to exert more control over the trade of the East African coast and to take advantage of the growth of plantation production on the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba. Zanzibar town became their capital, and what had been a relatively small Swahili town before the nineteenth century, most notable because it had also hosted a Portuguese post earlier, became the center of international commerce in East Africa. Zanzibar developed on a triangular promontory jutting into the Zanzibar Channel with a tidal creek almost totally cutting off the triangle from the rest of the island. The triangle developed as Mji Mkwewe, Stone Town in English, with the palaces and building of the sultanate, a number of large buildings housing merchant firms, and residential areas clustered around the port. "Arabs," "Shirazi," and Indians made up much of its population. Across the creek in Ng'ambo, a residential area developed populated primarily by Africans. Stone Town became an urban area with many narrow streets and crowded bazaars surrounding the large buildings along the waterfront.

When the British took control of the protectorate in the 1880s, one of their early focuses was on "improving" the urban environment by rationalizing residential patterns, separating residences from work places, and imposing segregation. Bissell shows how colonial fantasies about order conflicted with the complex social relations that existed within Zanzibar society and the legal restrictions on a colonial state bound both by existing codes of law, and by the need to guarantee the rights of particularly Indian colonial subjects. Most importantly, he argues that Zanzibar's decline from the main international port of East Africa to one that handled only the export of spices from Zanzibar and Pemba severely limited the resources available to the colonial state. As a result, planning for urban development suffered delays, and implementation of the plans developed never matched the scope of their design.

The colonial state did make two attempts to develop full-fledged town plans for Zanzibar and Stone Town in particular. Both sought expertise in town planning from within the empire. These plans, one developed in the 1920s and one in the 1950s, were never formally adopted by the colonial government. Bissell shows that the plans lacked grounding in local social relations. Both called for extensive clearance in Stone Town to enhance sanitary conditions, and the 1920s one called for more extensive residential segregation. Bissell shows how a lack of resources meant that neither plan's most grandiose designs ever came close to implementation. The colonial government did complete a couple of the plans' most economically important aspects: they built a new port with new access roads that skirted Stone Town and filled the tidal creek. But their failure to master either the social complexity of Zanzibar or to raise enough resources meant that the physical structure of Stone Town remained at its core a nineteenth-century town even as it filled in during the colonial era.

Bissell has provided an interesting and informative book that links urban policy in Zanzibar to broader currents in urban planning. He provides a detailed analysis of colonial bureaucracy at work, highlighting the indeterminacy caused in part by the shuffling of personnel. Bissell's work is limited by his reliance on colonial archives. His claim to reveal the chaotic nature of colonial rule is not new, and his focus on colonial chaos excludes other important aspects of the history of urban space on Zanzibar. He does not examine in great detail the nature of urban development in Omani or pre-Omani Zanzibar. He alludes to rather than describes actual land use practices in the town. He does not use local written or oral sources extensively. Similarly, he does not make much use of court cases that might potentially have yielded important information on Zanzibari conceptions of space. Nonetheless, Bissell has written an interesting book on a fascinating topic.

GREGORY H. MADDIX
Texas Southern University

PAUL S. LANDAU. Popular Politics in the History of South Africa, 1400–1948. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2010. Pp. xvi, 300. $90.00.

On the dust jacket of Paul S. Landau's path-breaking book we are greeted by armed men. An age-regiment is conducting a ceremonial dance. Bechuanaland in 1934 provides this vestigial image of precolonial hinterland southern Africa, the area of Landau's study. Wearing leopard skins, the dancers mimic the loping movements of the predator. Holding outmoded rifles, they confront the lens directly. For an instant the photographer is the hunted.

The photographer in question was Isaac Schapera, author of The Ethnic Composition of Tswana Tribes (1952), an anthropological work consulted by Landau. Although Schapera's oeuvre signals otherwise, it is possible for readers to ask whether his image catches "perennial tribesmen" in an act signifying that Africans were threatened by change. Landau eventually answers this question by showing how Schapera's research refutes such a claim (pp. 232–238, 240–241). It is possible to return to the dustjacket and interpret images of this rite of passage differently. The performers in their leopard skins, a revered symbol of lineage power, were not hostile. As inheritors of an inclusive politics that Landau calls "self-rule," they welcomed others into their fold, in this case the visiting Resident Commissioner of Bechuanaland. Landau attributes self-rule and its hybrid signs (guns and skins) to an enduring logic shaping Highveld societies. It was this flexible tradition of political inclusion, rather than defensive tribal machinations, that was "very hard to smash" (p. xii).

Landau's bold interpretation is developed over six chapters, the first of which explores the challenge to self-rule posed by upheavals in the Highveld during the early nineteenth century, a period of spreading violence conventionally known as the Difaqane. Here Landau considers the new militarized polities feeding off the spoils of war: a Griqua state comprised of "mixed race" people who kidnapped laborers; Mzilikazi's "Ndebele invaders"; and—underscored in this account—the fearsome regiments of Shaka Zulu. Evocatively titled "History before Tribes," chapter two extends deep in time to discuss the influence of more ancient patterns of mobilization on the Highveld, from the development of states like Great Zimbabwe, with its Indian Ocean orientation, to the expansive ancestral alliances aligned with twin courts and animal totems. In this and subsequent chapters, the author's mastery of linguistics greatly enriches his analysis. The third chapter, heralding the "invention of Christianity," shifts to the 1800s to consider the historical impact of evangelists like Robert Moffat who, arriving in southern Africa to save heathens, encountered chiefdoms buffeted by Difaqane turbulence. Moffat and his fellow missionaries barely converted a soul, but their proselytizing produced lasting misconceptions about indigenous definitions of the ancestors and God. They also reinforced a European belief that tribes were naturally naïve and insular. Landau demonstrates how this dogma became gospel for "native experts" and even contemporary scholars. They assumed that tribal otherness drove colonists, fearful of "inter-racial" contact, to institute segregation, and that missionaries preaching personal salvation awakened Africans from a pre-political torpor and propelled them to seek individual freedom through independent churches and nationalist movements.

This Eurocentric explanation, Landau writes, fails to capture how Highveld societies functioned. Since the opening of the nineteenth century, these societies had indeed interacted with Christianity, incorporating its elements to advance ancestral traditions of social inclusion and collective autonomy. These constitutive traditions were increasingly attacked by intruding white rulers (Boer and British), who by the twentieth century had eroded chieftaincy, appropriated land, and attempted to regulate emergent strains of African religiosity that provided “a potent field for insurgent movements” (pp. 82, 88–95, 248).

One fascinating “Christian” movement, the Samuelites, is the subject of chapters four and five. Landau eloquently brings the Samuelites to life. Emerging in Thaba Nchu during the 1880s, this forty-year movement claimed métis adherents that colonial authority viewed as distinctly native yet partly European. For their part, Samuelites “refused to emphasize ethnicity or race”; they also drew on transnational “Ethiopian” and Garveyite millenarianism, which stirred their rebellion against the oppressive powers of white supremacy (pp. 177–183). Above all, the Samuelites rose and fell fighting for what they could claim to embody—the tradition of self-rule practiced by their Highveld ancestors.

In the concluding chapter, Landau summarizes lines of inquiry that are at once impressively broad and sharply focused. In honing one point about continuity and change in the Highveld, however, he makes an argument that may spark a new (and old) controversy. If his story has concentrated on the exploits of men, this is because they could “strategize beyond their domestic arrangements,” while women could not. Why? His answer is that women remained homebound, supplying “mashed sorghum (bogobe) to their children and in-laws” (p. 41). This contrast between maneuvering men and, in Landau’s terminology, “idle” women could well reignite debate over the perceived neglect of female agency in histories such as that of the Xhosa cattle-killing (p. 86). This provocation aside, Landau’s superb scholarship offers a compelling new understanding of how indigenous people conceived their politics in a world before the colonists arrived bearing faith in Christianity, tribe, and ethnicity.

BENEDICT CARTON

George Mason University

Collected Essays

These volumes, recently received in the AHR office, do not lend themselves readily to unified reviews; the contents are therefore listed.

COMPARATIVE/WORLD

MARGUERITE RAGNOW and WILLIAM D. PHILLIPS, JR., editors. Religious Conflict and Accommodation in the Early Modern World. (Minnesota Studies in Early Modern History, number 3.) Minneapolis: Center for Early American History. 2011. Pp. xi, 257. $55.00.

JAMES D. TRACY, The Background War of the Early Modern Era: Christian and Muslim States in Contest for Dominion, Trade, and Cultural Preeminence. ANNE MARIE WOLF, Pleas for Peace, Problems for Historians: A 1455 Letter from Juan de Segovia to Jean Germain on Countering the Threat of Islam. STEPHEN P. BLAKE, Religious Conflict in Early Modern India: Akbar and the House of Religious Assembly. DENIS CROUZET, Violence and the State in Sixteenth-Century France. GRAEME MURDOCK, Transylvanian Tolerance? Religious Accommodation on the Frontier of Christian Europe. TIMOTHY BROOK, The Battle of Christ and Lord Guan: A Sino-European Religious Conflict in the Philippines, 1640. LUCA CODIGNOLA, Roman Catholic Conservatism in a New North Atlantic World, 1760–1829. FREDERICK M. ASHER, Temple and Mosque, Conflict and Balance.

MARTIN BRÜCKNER, editor. Early American Cartographies. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, for the Omohundro Institute of Early American History and Culture, Williamsburg, Virginia. 2011. Pp. xiii, 485. $60.00.

RICARDO PADRÓN, From Abstraction to Allegory: The Imperial Cartography of Vicente de Memije. KEN MACMILLAN, Centers and Peripheries in English Maps of America, 1590–1685. JESS EDWARDS, A Compass to Steer by: John Locke, Carolina, and the Politics of Restoration Geography. JÚNIA FERREIRA FURTADO, Rebellious Maps: José Joaquim da Rocha and the Proto-Independence Movement in Colonial Brazil. GAVIN HOLLIS, The Wrong Side of the Map? The Cartographic Encounters of John Lederer. WILLIAM GUSTAV GARTNER, An Image to Carry the World within It: Performance Cartography and the Skidi Star Chart. ANDREW NEWMAN, Closing the Circle: Mapping a Native Account of Colonial Land Fraud. MATTHEW H. EDNEY, Competition over Land, Competition over Empire: Public Discourse and the Printed Maps of the Kennebec River, 1753– 1755. JUDITH RIDNER, Building Urban Spaces for the Interior: Thomas Penn and the Colonization of Eighteenth-Century Pennsylvania. SCOTT LEHMAN, Mapping Havana in the Gentleman's Magazine, 1740–1762. BARBARA MUNDY, National Cartography and Indigenous Space in Mexico. MARTIN BRÜCKNER, The Spectacle of Maps in British America, 1750–1800. MICHAEL J. DREXLER, Hurricanes and Revolutions.

CHRISTINA FOLKE AX et al., editors. Cultivating the Colonies: Colonial States and Their Environmental Legacies. (Ohio University Research in International Studies; Global and Comparative Studies series, number 12.) Athens: Ohio University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 337. $29.95.

ANDREW WEAR, The Prospective Colonist and Strange Environments: Advice on Health and Prosperity. DANIEL ROUVEN STEINBACH, Carved Out of Nature: Identity and Environment in German Colonial Africa. GREG VANKOFF, The Science of Nature and the Nature of Science in the Spanish and American Philippines. DAVID BIGGS, Aerial Photography and Colonial Discourse on the Agricultural Crisis in Late-Colonial Indochina, 1930–1945. CHRISTOPHER MORRIS, Wetland Colonies: Louisiana, Guangzhou, Pondicherry, and Senegal. JULIE LAJUS, Colonization of the Russian North: A Frozen Frontier. KAVITA SIVARAMAKRISHNAN, Recasting Disease and Its Environment: Indigenous Medical Practitioners, the Plague, and Politics in Colonial India, 1898–1910. PHIA STEYN, Changing Times, Changing Palates: The Dietary Impacts of Basuto Adaptation to New Rulers, Crops, and Markets, 1830s–1966. ELIZABETH LUNSTRUM, State Rationality, Development, and the Making of State Territory: From Colonial Extraction to Post-colonial Conservation in Southern Mozambique. PEDER ANKER, Ecological Communication in the Oxford Imperial Forestry Institute. JOSEPH M. HODGE, Colonial Experts, Developmental and Environmental Doctrines, and the Legacies of Late British Colonialism.

DIRK HOERDER and NORA FAIRES, editors. Migrants and Migration in Modern North America: Cross-Border Lives, Labor Markets, and Politics. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2011. Pp. xxi, 432. Cloth $89.95, paper $24.95.

JAIME R. AGUILA and BRIAN GRATTON, Mirando atrás: Mexican Immigration from 1876 to 2000. BRUNO RAMIREZ, Through the Northern Borderlands: Canada-U.S. Migrations in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. LARA PUTNAM,

The Making and Unmaking of the Circum-Caribbean Migratory Sphere: Mobility, Sex across Boundaries, and Collective Destinies, 1840–1940. NORA FAIRES, Population Movements and the Making of Canada-U.S. Not-So-Foreign Relations. CARLOS G. VÉLEZ-IBÁÑEZ with DIRK HOERDER, Greater Southwest North America: A Region of Historical Integration, Disjunction, and Imposition. MELANIE SHELL-WEISS, Independence and Interdependence: Caribbean-North American Migration in the Modern Era. DELIA GONZÁLEZ DE REUFELS and DIRK HOERDER, Migration to Mexico, Migration in Mexico: A Special Case on the North American Continent. ANGELIKA E. SAUER, The Construction of Borders: Building North American Nations, Building a Continental Perimeter, 1890s–1920s. OMAR S. VALERIO-JIMÉNEZ, The United States-Mexican Border as Material and Cultural Barrier. SUSAN E. GRAY, Migration and the Seasonal Round: An Odawa Family's Story. DAN KILLORAN, Market Interactions in a Borderland Setting: A Case Study of the Gila River Pima of Arizona, 1846–1862. JAMES N. GREGORY, Paying Attention to Moving Americans: Migration Knowledge in the Age of Internal Migration, 1930s–1970s. SARAH-JANE (SAJE) MATHIEU, The Black Experience in Canada Revisited. YUKARI TAKAI, Circumnavigating Controls: Transborder Migration of Asian-Origin Migrants during the Period of Exclusion. JOHN MASON HART, Migration and Capitalism: The Rise of the U.S.-Mexican Border. MARÍA CRISTINA GARCÍA, Central American Migration and the Shaping of Refugee Policy. RODOLFO CASILLAS-R., Central American Transmigrants: Migratory Movement of Special Interest of Special Interest to Different Sectors within and outside Mexico. KERRY PREIBISCH, Interrogating Managed Migration's Model: A Counternarrative of Canada's Seasonal Agricultural Workers Program. ANGELIKA SAUER and Catherine O'Donnell, 1876 and All That: Teaching the American Survey as Continental North American History.

ASIA

LI FENG and DAVID PRAGER BRANNER, editors. Writing and Literacy in Early China: Studies from the Columbia Early China Seminar. Seattle: University of Washington Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 494. $50.00.

DAVID W. PANKENIER, Getting "Right" with Heaven and the Origins of Writing in China. WILLIAM G. BOLTZ, Literacy and the Emergence of Writing in China. DAVID PRAGER BRANNER, Phonology in the Chinese Script and Its Relationship to Early Chinese Literacy. KEN-ICHI TAKASHIMA, Literacy to the South and the East of Anyang in Shang China: Zhengzhou and Daxinzhuang. ADAM SMITH, The Evidence for Scribal Training at Anyang. MATTHIAS L. RICHTER, Textual Identity and the Role of Literacy in the Transmission of Early Chinese Literature. LOTHAR VON FALKENHAUSEN, The Royal Audience and Its Reflections in Western Zhou Bronze Inscriptions. LI FENG, Literacy and the Social Contexts of Writing in the Western Zhou. CONSTANCE A. COOK, Education and the Way of the Former Kings. ROBIN D. S. YATES, Soldiers, Scribes, and Women: Literacy among the Lower Orders in Early China. ANTHONY J. BARBIERI-LOW, Craftsman's Literacy: Uses of Writing by Male and Female Artisans in Qin and Han China.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

BRUCE E. STEWART, editor. Blood in the Hills: A History of Violence in Appalachia. (New Directions in Southern History.) Lexington: University of Kentucky Press. 2012. Pp. x, 412. $55.00.

KEVIN T. BARKSDALE, Violence, Statecraft, and Statehood in the Early Republic: The State of Franklin, 1784–1788. KATHRYN SHIVELY MEIER, "Devoted to Hardships, Danger, and Devastation": The Landscape of Indian and White Violence in Wyoming Valley, Pennsylvania, 1753–1800. TYLER BOULWARE, "Our Mad Young Men": Authority and Violence in Cherokee Country. JOHN C. INSCOE, The "Ferocious Character" of Antebellum Georgia's Gold Country: Frontier Lawlessness and Violence in Fact and Fiction. KATHERINE E. LEDFORD, "A Possession, or an Absence of Ears": The Shape of Violence in Travel Narratives about the Mountain South, 1779–1835. DURWOOD DUNN, Violence against Slaves as a Catalyst in Changing Attitudes toward Slavery: An 1857 Case Study in East Tennessee. BRUCE E. STEWART, "These Big-Boned, Semi-Barbarian People": Moonshining and the Myth of Violent Appalachia, 1870–1900. MARY ELLA ENGEL, "Deep in the Shades of Ill-Starred Georgia's Wood": The Murder of Elder Joseph Standing in Late-Nineteenth-Century Appalachian Georgia. RAND DOTSON, Race and Violence in Urbanizing Appalachia: The Roanoke Riot of 1893. T. R. C. HUTTON, Assassins and Feudists: Politics and Death in the Bluegrass and Mountains of Kentucky. PAUL H. RAKES and KENNETH R. BAILEY, "A Hard-Bitten Lot": Nonstrike Violence in the Early Southern West Virginia Smokeless Coalfields, 1880–1910. KEVIN W. YOUNG, "The Largest Manhunt in Western North Carolina's History": The Story of Broadus Miller. RICHARD D. STARNES, The Murder of Thomas Price: Image, Identity, and Violence in Western North Carolina.

MICHAEL ZAKIM and GARY J. KORNBLITH, editors. Capitalism Takes Command: The Social Transformation of Nineteenth-Century America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 358. Cloth $90.00, paper $30.00.

CHRISTOPHER CLARK, The Agrarian Context of American Capitalist Development. JONATHAN LEVY, The Mortgage Worked the Hardest: The Fate of Landed Independence in Nineteenth-Century America. EDWARD E. BAPTIST, Toxic Debt, Liar Loans, Collateralized and Securitized Human Beings, and the Panic of 1837. ELIZABETH BLACKMAR, Inheriting Property and Debt: From Family Security to Corporate Accumulation. AMY DRU STANLEY, Slave Breeding and Free Love: An Antebellum Argument over Slavery, Capitalism, and Personhood. ROBERT E. WRIGHT, Capitalism and the Rise of the Corporation Nation. TAMARA PLAKINS THORNTON, Capitalist Aesthetics: Americans Look at the London and Liverpool Docks. JEFFREY SKLANSKY, William Leggett and the Melodrama of the Market. MICHAEL ZAKIM, Producing Capitalism: The Clerk at Work. SEAN PATRICK ADAMS, Soulless Monsters and Iron Horses: The Civil War, Institutional Change, and American Capitalism.

KEVIN M. KRUSE and STEPHEN TUCK, editors. The Fog of War: The Second World War and the Civil Rights Movement. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. vi, 240. $21.95.

JAMES T. SPARROW, Freedom to Want: The Federal Government and Politicized Consumption in World War II. JULIAN E. ZELIZER, Confronting the Roadblock: Congress, Civil Rights, and World War II. J. MILLS THORNTON III, Segregation and the City: White Supremacy in Alabama in the Mid-Twentieth Century. PATRICIA SULLIVAN, Movement Building during the World War II Era: The NAACP's Legal Insurgency in the South. THOMAS SUGRUE, Hillburn, Hattiesburg, and Hitler: Wartime Activists Think Globally and Act Locally. STEPHEN TUCK, "You Can Sing and Punch . . . but You Can't Be a Soldier or a Man": African American Struggles for a New Place in Popular Culture. JASON MORGAN WARD, "A War for States' Rights": The White Supremacist Vision of Double Victory. JANE DAILEY, The Sexual Politics of Race in World War II America. PENNY VON ESCHEN, Civil Rights and World War II in a Global Frame: Shape-Shifting Racial Formations and the U.S. Encounter with European and Japanese Colonialism. ELIZABETH BORGWARDT, Race, Rights, and Nongovernmental Organizations at the UN San Francisco Conference: A Contested History of "Human Rights . . . without Discrimination." KIMBERLEY L. PHILLIPS, "Did the Battlefield Kill Jim Crow?" The Cold War Military, Civil Rights, and Black Freedom Struggles.

EUROPE: ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL

CONRAD LEYSER and LESLEY SMITH, editors. Motherhood, Religion, and Society in Medieval Europe, 400–1400: Essays Presented to Henrietta Leyser. (Church, Faith, and Culture in the Medieval West. Burlington, Vermont: Ashgate. 2011. Pp. xv, 369. $134.95.

KATE COOPER, Augustine and Monnica. CONRAD LEYSER, From Maternal Kin to Jesus as Mother: Royal Genealogy and Marian Devotion in the Ninth-century West. JANET L. NELSON, Dhuoda on Dreams. MARK WHITTO, Motherhood and Power in Early Medieval Europe, West and East: The Strange Case of the Empress Eirene. BRIAN PATRICK MCGUIRE, In Search of the Good Mother: Twelfth-century Celibacy and Affectivity. HENRY MAYR-HARTING, Twelfth-century English Mothers. MICHAEL CLANCHY, Did Mothers Teach Their Children to Read? LESLEY SMITH, Who Is My Mother? Honouring Parents in Medieval Exegesis of the Ten Commandments. MONICA H. GREEN, Making Motherhood in Medieval England: The Evidence from Medicine. TONY HUNT, Obstacles to Motherhood. SETHINA WATSON, A Mother's Past and Her Children's Futures: Female Inheritance, Family and Dynastic Hospitals in the Thirteenth Century. SAMUEL FANOUS, Becoming the Theotokos: Birgitta of Sweden and Fulfilment of Salvation History. CAROLINE M. BARRON and CLAIRE A. MARTIN, Mothers and Orphans in Fourteenth-century London. JOCELYN WOGAN-BROWNE, Mother or Stepmother to History? Joan de Mohun and Her Chronicle.

EUROPE: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN

SUSAN BROOMHALL and JACQUELINE VAN GENT, editors. Governing Masculinities in the Early Modern Period: Regulating Selves and Others. (Women and Gender in the Early Modern World.) Burlington, Vermont: Ashgate. 2011. Pp. xi, 328. $124.95.

STEPHANIE TARBIN, Civic Manliness in London, c. 1380–1550. ROSA SALZBERG, Masculine Republics: Establishing Authority in the Early Modern Venetian Printshop. LISA KEANE ELLIOTT, Jean Martin, Governor of the Grand Bureau des Pauvres, on Charity and the Civic Duty of Governing Men in Paris, c. 1580.

JENNIFER SPINKS, Codpieces and Potbellies in the Songes dro-latiques: Satirizing Masculine Self-Control in Early Modern France and Germany. JARED VAN DUINEN, The Obligations of Governing Masculinity in the Early Stuart Gentry Family: The Barringtons of Hatfield Broad Oak. PETER SHERLOCK, Militant Masculinity and the Monuments of Westminster Abbey. SUSIE PROTSCHKY, Between Corporate and Familial Responsibility: Johan Maurits van Nassau-Siegen and Masculine Governance in Europe and the Dutch Colonial World. E. J. KENT, Raiding the Patriarch's Toolbox: Reading Masculine Governance in Cases of Male Witchcraft, 1592–1692. JACQUELINE VAN GENT, Side-wounds, Sex, and Savages: Moravian Masculinities and Early Modern Protestant Missions. GIOVANNI TARANTINO, Alternative Hierarchies: Manhood and Unbelief in Early Modern Europe, 1660–1750. ROBERT WESTON, Men Controlling Bodies: Medical Consultation by Letter in France, 1680–1780. JOANNE MCEWAN, Attitudes towards Male Authority and Domestic Violence in Eighteenth-Century London Courts. DAVID G. BARRIE and SUSAN BROOMHALL, Policing Bodies in Urban Scotland, 1780–1850.

DAVID ONNEKINK and GIJS ROMMELSE, editors. Ideology and Foreign Policy in Early Modern Europe (1650–1750). (Politics and Culture in Europe, 1650–1750.) Burlington, Vermont: Ashgate. 2011. Pp. xi, 320. $134.95.

STEVE PINCUS, Absolutism, Ideology and English Foreign Policy: The Ideological Context of Robert Molesworth's Account of Denmark. GARY EVANS, Partisan Politics, History, and the National Interest (1700–1748). DOOHWAN AHN, From "Jealous Emulation" to "Cautious Politics": British Foreign Policy and Public Discourse in the Mirror of Ancient Athens (ca. 1730–ca. 1750). DAVID ONNEKINK, The Ideological Context of the Dutch War (1672). STÉPHANE JETTOT, Ideologies of Interests in English Foreign Policy during the Reign of Charles II. BENEDICT WAGNER-RUNDELL, Holy War and Republican Pacifism in the Early-Eighteenth-Century Commonwealth of Poland-Lithuania. SOLANGE RAMEIX, Justifying War: Churchmen and War in France and England during the Nine Years War (1688–1697). HENK VAN NIEROP, Romeyn de Hooghe and the Imagination of Dutch Foreign Policy. ANA CRESPO SOLANA, A Change of Ideology in Imperial Spain? Spanish Commercial Policy with America and the Change of Dynasty (1648–1740). GIJS ROMMELSE, Mountains of Iron and Gold: Mercantilist Ideology in Anglo-Dutch Relations (1650–1674). ANDREW C. THOMPSON, Balancing Europe: Ideas and Interests in British Foreign Policy (c. 1700–c. 1720). WOUT TROOST, "To Restore and Preserve the Liberty of Europe": William III's Ideas on Foreign Policy.

TOM CROOK, REBECCA GILL, and BERTRAND TAITHE, editors. Evil, Barbarism and Empire: Britain and Abroad, c. 1830–2000. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. x, 290. $85.00.

TOM CROOK, REBECCA GILL, and BERTRAND TAITHE, Liberal Civilisation and Its Discontents: Evil, Barbarism and Empire. TOM CROOK, Evil in Question: The Victorian Social and the Politics of Prostitution, 1830–1900. DAVID SPEICHER, Terror, Spectacle and the Press: Anarchist Outrage in Edwardian England. ANTONY TAYLOR, "And I Am the God of Destruction!": Fu Manchu and the Construction of Asiatic Evil in the Novels of Arthur Sarsfield Ward, 1912–1939. EUGENIO F. BIAGINI, The Politics of Italianism: Reynolds's Newspaper, the Indian Mutiny, and the Radical Critique of Liberal Imperialism in Mid-

Victorian Britain. H. S. JONES, The Victorian Lexicon of Evil: Frederic Harrison, the Positivists and the Language of International Politics. BERTRAND TAITHE, Evil, Liberalism and the Imperial Designs of the Catholic Church, 1867–1905. REBECCA GILL, “Now I Have Seen Evil, and I Cannot Be Silent about It”: Arnold J. Toynbee and His Encounters with Atrocity, 1915–1923. CHRISTINA TWOMEY, Atrocity Narratives and Inter-Imperial Rivalry: Britain, Germany and the Treatment of “Native Races,” 1904–1939. THOMAS OSBORNE, Conrad’s Horror: Heart of Darkness and the Imaginary of Power. SCOTT MCCrackEN, The Lives of Others: The Defeat of Evil or the Evil of Defeat? TIM JACOBY, Islam, Violence and the New Barbarism.

SABRINA P. RAMET and OLA LISTHAUG, editors. Serbia and the Serbs in World War Two. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xvii, 324. $105.00.

SABRINA P. RAMET and SLADJANA LAZIĆ, The Collaborationist Regime of Milan Nedić. SABINE RUTAR, Employment of Labour in Wartime Serbia: Social History and the Politics of Amnesia. KRIZTIÁN UNGVÁRY, Vojvodina under Hungarian Rule. OLGA MANOJLOVIĆ PINTAR, Delusion and Amnesia: Ideology and Culture in Nedić’s Serbia. JOVAN BYFORD, The Collaborationist Administration and the Treatment of the Jews in Nazi-Occupied Serbia. JOVAN BYFORD, Bishop Nikolaj Velimirović: “Lackey of the Germans” or a “Victim of Fascism?” MARIO JAREB, Allies or Foes? Mihailović’s Chetniks during the Second World War. NIKICA BARIĆ, Relations between the Chetniks and the Authorities of the Independent State of Croatia, 1942–1945. MARKO ATTILA HOARE, The Partisans and the Serbs. PÁL KOSTØ, The Serbian-Croatian Controversy over Jasenovac. DUBRAVKA STOJANOVIĆ, Revisions of Second World War History in Contemporary Serbia. SLADJANA LAZIĆ, The Re-evaluation of Milan Nedić and Draža Mihailović in Serbia.

Documents and Bibliographies

Books listed were recently received in the AHR office. Works of these types cannot normally be reviewed by the AHR.

ASIA

- LIU, XIAOBO. No Enemies, No Hatred: Selected Essays and Poems. Edited by PERRY LINK, TIENCHI MARTIN-LIAO, and LIU XIA. Foreword by VÁCLAV HAVEL. Cambridge: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. xxii, 366. $29.95.
- NGYUEN, CONG LUAN. Nationalist in the Viet Nam Wars: Memoirs of a Victim Turned Soldier. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2012. Pp. xv, 598. Cloth $39.95, e-book $33.95.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

- ADAIR, LYLE. They Have Left Us Here to Die: The Civil War Prison Diary of Sgt. Lyle Adair, 111th U.S. Colored Infantry. Edited by GLENN ROBINS. (Civil War in the North.) Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 123. $29.95.
- ADAMS, MARIAN HOOPER. The First of Hearts: Selected Letters of Mrs. Henry Adams, 1865–1883. Edited by WARD THORON. Introduction by COKIE ROBERTS. San Francisco: Willowbank Books. 2011. Pp. vii, 211. Cloth $24.59, paper $14.00.
- BICKFORD, CHARLENE BANGS, et al. Documentary History of the First Federal Congress of the United States of America, 4 March 1789–3 March 1791. Volume 18, Correspondence; Second Session: October 1789–14 March 1790. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2012. Pp. lxxiv, 876. $125.00.
- BICKFORD, CHARLENE BANGS, et al. Documentary History of the First Federal Congress of the United States of America, 4 March 1789–3 March 1791. Volume 19, Correspondence; Second Session: 15 March–June 1790. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2012. Pp. ix, 877–1993. $125.00.
- DOOLEY, JOHN. John Dooley's Civil War: An Irish American's Journey in the First Virginia Infantry Regiment. Edited by ROBERT EMMETT CURRAN. (Voices of the Civil War.) Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press. 2012. Pp. xxxi, 516. $59.00.
- GEYER, DAVID C., and EDWARD C. KEEFER, editors. Foreign Relations of the United States, 1969–1976. Volume XIII: Soviet Union, October 1970–October 1971. Washington, D.C.: United States Government Printing Office. 2011. Pp. xxxi, 1129. $76.00.
- HAAS, LISBETH. Pablo Tac, Indigenous Scholar: Writing on Luiseño Language and Colonial History, c. 1840. With art by JAMES LUNA. Complete manuscript of Pablo Tac, transcribed by MARTA EGUFÁ et al. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2011. Pp. xx, 267. $49.95.
- MAKELY, WESLEY. I Fear I Shall Never Leave This Island: Life

- in a Civil War Prison*. Edited by DAVID R. BUSH. Gainesville: University Press of Florida. 2011. Pp. xiii, 269. $34.95.
- OSTROOT, CONRAD LYMAN. Letters from a Sailor: America at War, 1917–1918. Edited by DANIEL E. LEE. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books. 2011. Pp. viii, 117. $55.00.
- SMITH, MARROW STUART. Life After J. E. B. Stuart: The Memoirs of His Granddaughter, Marrow Stuart Smith. Edited by SEAN M. HEUVEL. Foreword by SHARON STUART MCREE. Lanham, Maryland: Hamilton Books. 2012. Pp. xv, 189. $27.50.
- SPRINGS, ELLIOTT WHITE. Letters from a War Bird: The World War I Correspondence of Elliott White Springs. Edited by DAVID K. VAUGHAN. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press. 2012. Pp. xxxii, 358. $39.95.
- THURMAN, HOWARD WASHINGTON. The Papers of Howard Washington Thurman. Volume 2, Christian, Who Calls Me Christian? April 1936–August 1943. Edited by WALTER EARL FLUKER et al. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press. 2012. Pp. lix, 370. $59.95.
- VIDA, ISTVÁN KORNÉL. Hungarian émigrés in the American Civil War: A History and Biographical Dictionary. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland & Company. 2012. Pp. xi, 256. $35.00.

CARIBBEAN AND LATIN AMERICA

- CABEZA DE VACA, ÁLVAR NÚÑEZ. The South American Expeditions, 1540–1545. Translated by BAKER H. MORROW. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press. 2011. Pp. xxi, 240. $39.95.

EUROPE: ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL

- BENNETT, NICHOLAS. The Registers of Bishop Henry Burghersh 1320–1342: Volume III. (Publications of the Lincoln Record Society, number 101.) Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell Press. Lincoln Record Society. 2011. Pp. xxviii, 486. $50.00.
- HIEATT, CONSTANCE B. Cocatrice and Lampray Hay: Late Fifteenth-Century Recipes from Corpus Christi College Oxford. Blackawton, United Kingdom: Prospect Books. 2012. Pp. 176. £30.00.
- MCCORMICK, MICHAEL, editor. Charlemagne's Survey of the Holy Land: Wealth, Personnel, and Buildings of a Mediterranean Church between Antiquity and the Middle Ages. (Dumbarton Oaks Medieval Humanities.) Washington, D.C.: Dumbarton Oaks Research Library and Collection. 2011. Pp. xxii, 287. $39.95.
- PLUTARCH. Caesar. Translated and foreword by Christopher Pelling. (Clarendon Ancient History Series.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xix, 519. Cloth $150.00, paper $55.00.
- RICHARD RUFUS OF CORNWALL. In Aristotelis De generatione et corruptione. Edited by NEIL LEWIS and REGA WOOD. Assisted by JENNIFER OTTMAN. (Auctores Britannici Medii

- Aevi, number 21.) London: The British Academy. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xxiii, 326. $135.00.
- SYMMACHUS. The Letters of Symmachus: Book 1. Translated and foreword by MICHELE RENEE SALZMAN. Translated by MICHAEL ROBERTS. (Writings from the Greco-Roman World, number 30.) Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature. 2011. Pp. lxxii, 215. $34.95.
- ULSET, TOR, editor. Diplomatarium Norvegicum: Bind XXIII. (Diplomatarium Norvegicum.) Oslo: Riksarkivet. 2011. Pp. 1041. kr.300.

EUROPE: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN

- BARIÉTY, JACQUES, editor. À la recherche de la paix France-Allemagne: Les carnets d'Oswald Hesnard 1919–1931. Assisted by THIERRY ROBIN and JEAN PODEROS. (Les Mondes germaniques, number 16.) Strasbourg: Presses Universitaires de Strasbourg. 2011. Pp. 697. €40.00.
- CASTELVETRO, GIACOMO. The Fruits, Herbs and Vegetables of Italy: An Offering to Lucy, Countess of Bedford. Translated by GILLIAN RILEY. Foreword by JANE GRIGSON. Blackawton, U.K.: Prospect Books. 2012. Pp. vii, 151. £12.00.
- CHERTOK, BORIS. Rockets and People: Volume 4, The Moon Race. Edited by ASIF SIDDIQUI. (NASA History Series.) Washington, D.C.: National Aeronautics and Space Administration. 2011. Pp. xlv, 663.
- COOK, C. J., editor. The Palfrey Notebook: Records of Study in Seventeenth-Century Cambridge. (The History of the University of Cambridge: Texts and Studies, number 7.) Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell Press, with Cambridge University Library. 2011. Pp. xiii, 802. $99.00.
- CORTADA, JAMES W. Modern Warfare in Spain: American Military Observations on the Spanish Civil War, 1936–1939. Dulles, Va.: Potomac Books, Inc. 2012. Pp. xxx, 335. $35.00.
- FRANZEN, CHRISTOPH JOHANNES, KARL-HEINZ KOHL, and MARIE-LUISE RECKER, editors. Der Kaiser und sein Forscher: Der Briefwechsel zwischen Wilhelm II. und Leo Frobenius (1924–1938). Stuttgart: Kohlhammer. 2012. Pp. 664. €49.90.
- HALPERN, PAUL, editor. The Mediterranean Fleet, 1919–1929. (Publications of the Navy Records Society, number 158.) Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company, for the Navy Records Society. 2011. Pp. xxv, 620. $134.95.
- KEIRN, TIM, and NORBERT SCHÜRER, editors. British Encounters with India, 1750–1830: A Sourcebook. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xv, 229. Cloth $95.00, paper $32.00.
- KOLBERG, LENA. Letters from Lena: An Account of the Great Prussian Exodus of 1945. Edited by Donna R. Liberman. Translated by ELMER RUHNKE. Lanham, Maryland: Hamilton Books. 2012. Pp. xvi, 148. $28.99.
- LANDAU, ABRAHAM W. Branded on My Arm and in My Soul: A Holocaust Memoir. Edited by JOSEPH D. THOMAS, MARSHA L. MCCABE, and JAY AVILA. New Bedford, MA: Spinner Publications. 2011. Pp. 143. $25.00.
- MCVAY, ATHANASIOS D., and LUBOMYR Y. LUCIUK, editors. The Holy See and the Holodomor: Documents from the Vatican Secret Archives on the Great Famine of 1932–1933 in Soviet Ukraine. Afterword by LAURA PETTINAROLI. Ontario, Canada: Kashtan Press. 2011. Pp. xli, 98.

MIDDLE EAST AND NORTHERN AFRICA

- KAPLAN, ERAN, and DEREK J. PENSLAR, editors. The Origins of Israel, 1882–1948 : A Documentary History. (Sources in Modern Jewish History.) Madison: University of Wisconsin Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 380. Paper $29.95, e-book $21.95.

Other Books Received

The following books were recently received in the AHR office. Books listed here do not include works scheduled for review.

METHODS/THEORY

- AHMED, SIRAJ. The Stillbirth of Capital: Enlightenment Writing and Colonial India. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 291. Cloth $80.00, paper $24.95, e-book $24.95.
- BURTON, ANTOINETTE. A Primer for Teaching World History: Ten Design Principles. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 154. Cloth $74.95, paper $21.95.
- CORTADA, JAMES W. History Hunting: A Guide for Fellow Adventurers. Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe. 2012. Pp. xii, 281. $29.95.
- EDKINS, JENNY. Missing: Persons and Politics. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2011. Pp. xvii, 277. $29.95.
- FLOYD, JONATHAN, and MARC STEARS, editors. Political Philosophy versus History? Contextualism and Real Politics in Contemporary Political Thought. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 228. Cloth $95.00, paper $29.99.
- FREVERT, UTE. Emotions in History: Lost and Found. (The Natalie Zemon Davis Annual Lecture Series at Central European University.) Budapest and New York: Central European University Press. 2011. Pp. 255. $24.95.
- GENET, JEAN-PHILIPPE, and ANDREA ZORZI, editors. Les historiens et l'informatique: Un métier à réinventer. (Collection de l'école française de Rome, number 444.) Rome: École française de Rome. 2011. Pp. ix, 350. €60.00.
- HIRSCH, MARIANNE, and NANCY K. MILLER, editors. Rites of Return: Diaspora Poetics and the Politics of Memory. (Gender and Culture.) New York: Columbia University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 310. Cloth $84.50, paper $27.50, e-book $21.99.
- KARATANI, KOJIN. History and Repetition. Edited by SEIJI M. LIPPIT. (Weatherhead Books on Asia.) New York: Columbia University Press. 2012. Pp. xxx, 239. Cloth $34.50, paper $27.50, e-book $21.99.
- MACINTYRE, STUART, et al. The Oxford History of Historical Writing. Volume 4: 1800–1945. (The Oxford History of Historical Writing.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xx, 650. $180.00.
- MIGNOLO, WALTER D. The Darker Side of Western Modernity: Global Futures, Decolonial Options. (Latin America Otherwise: Languages, Empires, Nations.) Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2011. Pp. xxxvii, 408. Cloth $94.95, paper $25.95.
- MIRZOEFF, NICHOLAS. The Right to Look: A Counterhistory of Visuality. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2011. Pp. xix, 385. Cloth $89.95, paper $26.95.
- PILON, JULIAN GERAN. Soulmates: Resurrecting Eve. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Publishers. 2012. Pp. xx, 273. $34.95.

- RICCI, GABRIEL R. The Tempo of Modernity. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Publishers. 2012. Pp. xxx, 213. $39.95.
- STRAUB, JÜRGEN, and JÖRN RÜSEN, editors. Dark Traces of the Past: Psychoanalysis and Historical Thinking. (Making Sense of History.) New York: Berghahn Books. 2010. Pp. vi, 226. $85.00.
- WILLIAMS, ROBERT C. The Historian's Toolbox: A Student's Guide to the Theory and Craft of History. 3d ed. Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe. 2012. Pp. xvi, 230. Cloth $73.95, paper $26.95.

COMPARATIVE/WORLD

- ADAM, THOMAS. Intercultural Transfers and the Making of the Modern World, 1800–2000: Sources and Context. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. x, 158. Cloth $75.00, paper $23.95.
- ALDRICH, ROBERT. Gay Lives. New York: Thames and Hudson. 2012. Pp. 304. $29.95.
- ANAGNOSTOU, SABINE. Missionspharmazie: Konzepte, Praxis, Organisation und wissenschaftliche Ausstrahlung. (Sudhoffs Archiv, number 60.) Stuttgart: Franz Steiner Verlag. 2011. Pp. 465. €68.00.
- BARHAIM, GABRIEL A. Public-Private Relations in Totalitarian States. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Publishers. 2012. Pp. xi, 181. $44.95.
- BAUGEISS, JAMES S., and ABBE ALLEN DEBOLT, editors. Encyclopedia of the Sixties: A Decade of Culture and Counter-culture. In two volumes. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press. 2012. Pp. xlv, 448; xlv, 871. $189.00 the set.
- BEATTY, JACK. The Lost History of 1914: Reconsidering the Year the Great War Began. New York: Walker & Company. 2012. Pp. 392. $30.00.
- BLACK, JEREMY. War in the World: A Comparative History 1450–1600. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. x, 254. Cloth $85.00, paper $29.00.
- CLAYTON, ANTHONY. Warfare in Woods and Forests. Foreword by CHARLES GUTHRIE. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2012. Pp. xviii, 145. Cloth $29.95, e-book $24.95.
- COURLAND, ROBERT. Concrete Planet: The Strange and Fascinating Story of the World's Most Common Man-Made Material. Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus. 2011. Pp. 396. $26.00.
- DUFFY, EVE M., and ALIDA C. METCALF. The Return of Hans Staden: A Go-between in the Atlantic World. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 192. $25.00.
- ENGERMAN, STANLEY L., and KENNETH L. SOKOLOFF, editors. Economic Development in the Americas since 1500: Endowments and Institutions. (National Bureau of Economic Research [NBER] Series on Long-term Factors in Economic Development.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xxv, 417. Cloth $99.00, paper $34.99.
- FLYNN, MATTHEW J., and STEPHEN E. GRIFFIN. Washington and Napoleon: Leadership in the Age of Revolution. Dulles, Va.: Potomac Books, Inc. 2012. Pp. xvii, 251. $29.95.

- GLAESER, EDWARD. Triumph of the City: How Our Greatest Invention Makes Us Richer, Smarter, Greener, Healthier, and Happier. New York: Penguin. 2011. Pp. 338. $16.00.
- HENRY, JOHN. A Short History of Scientific Thought. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. xvii, 306. Cloth $90.00, paper $28.00.
- HOLMES, KEITH C. Black Inventors: Crafting over 200 Years of Success. New York: Global Black Inventor Research Projects. 2008. Pp. 179. $15.00.
- HORN, TAMMY. Beeconomy: What Women and Bees Can Teach Us about Local Trade and the Global Market. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky. 2012. Pp. xvi, 376. $29.95.
- HUANG, MICHELLE YING LING, editor. Beyond Boundaries: East and West Cross-Cultural Encounters. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 2011. Pp. xiv, 261. $59.99.
- JACKSON, MARK, editor. The Oxford Handbook of the History of Medicine. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xviii, 672. $150.00.
- JOHNSON, KENDALL, editor. Narratives of Free Trade: The Commercial Cultures of Early US-China Relations. (Global Connections.) Hong Kong: Hong Kong University Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 234. Cloth $50.00, paper $25.00.
- MAWDSLEY, EVAN. December 1941: Twelve Days That Began a World War. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 347. $30.00.
- McILWAINE, CATHY, editor. Cross-Border Migration among Latin Americans: European Perspectives and Beyond. (Studies of the Americas.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xvi, 262. $90.00.
- MURRAY, WILLIAMSON. Military Adaptation in War: With Fear of Change. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 342. $35.00.
- MURRAY, WILLIAMSON. War, Strategy, and Military Effectiveness. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. vii, 332. $90.00.
- PETERSON, BARBARA BENNETT. Peopling of the Americas: Currents, Canoes, and DNA. (Focus on Civilizations and Cultures.) Hauppauge, N.Y.: Nova Science. 2011. Pp. x, 309. $145.00.
- POWERS, ELIZABETH, editor. Freedom of Speech: The History of an Idea. (Aperçus: Histories Texts Cultures.) Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press. 2011. Pp. xxv, 227. $65.00.
- RABB, THEODORE K. The Artist and the Warrior: Military History through the Eyes of the Masters. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2011. Pp. xviii, 228. $45.00.
- RADKAU, JOACHIM. Wood. Translated by PATRICK CAMILLER. Cambridge: Polity Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 399. $29.95.
- REINHARD, WOLFGANG. A Short History of Colonialism. Translated by KATE STURGE. New York: Manchester University Press. 2011. Pp. vi, 308. Cloth $100.00, paper $38.95.
- SIMONS, ANNA, JOE MCGRAW, and DUANE LAUCHENGCO. The Sovereignty Solution: A Commonsense Approach to Global Security. Annapolis, Md.: Naval Institute Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 226. Paper $32.95, e-book $32.95.
- SZPIRO, GEORGE G. Pricing the Future: Finance, Physics, and the 300-year Journey to the Black-Scholes Equation; A Story of Genius and Discovery. New York: Basic Books. 2011. Pp. xiv, 298. $28.00.
- WENDT, SIMON, and MANFRED BERG, editors. Globalizing Lynching History: Vigilantism and Extralegal Punishment from an International Perspective. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. vi, 251. $85.00.
- WITTE, JOHN, JR., and M. CHRISTIAN GREEN, editors. Religion and Human Rights: An Introduction. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xviii, 392. $29.95.
- WOLFE, ROBERT. From Habiru to Hebrews and Other Essays. Minneapolis: Mill City Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 209. $14.95.

ASIA

- HENG, DEREK, and SYED MUHD KHAIRUDIN ALJUNIED, editors. Singapore in Global History. (ICAS Publications Series, number 14.) Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press. 2011. Pp. 317. $55.00.
- MINES, DIANE P., and SARAH LAMB, editors. Everyday Life in South Asia. 2d ed. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2010. Pp. viii, 566. Cloth $70.00, paper $24.95, e-book $20.95.
- PICKOWICZ, PAUL G. China on Film: A Century of Exploration, Confrontation, and Controversy. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield. 2012. Pp. x, 365. Cloth $85.00, e-book $84.99.
- STARRS, ROY. Modernism and Japanese Culture. (Modernism and . . .) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xix, 323. Cloth $80.00, paper $25.00.

OCEANIA AND THE PACIFIC ISLANDS

- PEEL, MARK, and CHRISTINA TWOMEY. A History of Australia. (Palgrave Essential Histories.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xv, 305. $49.95.
- WOOLLACOTT, ANGELA. Race and the Modern Exotic: Three "Australian" Women on Global Display. Victoria: Monash University Publishing. 2011. Pp. xxv, 153. $24.95.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

- ALVIS, JOHN E. Nathaniel Hawthorne as Political Philosopher: Revolutionary Principles Domesticated and Personalized. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Publishers. 2012. Pp. ix, 282. $49.95.
- ARMFIELD, FELIX L. Eugene Kinckle Jones: The National Urban League and Black Social Work, 1910–1940. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 116. $55.00.
- ARMSTEAD, MYRA B. YOUNG. Freedom's Gardener: James F. Brown, Horticulture, and the Hudson Valley in Antebellum America. New York: New York University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 209. $35.00.
- ATER, RENÉE. Remaking Race and History: The Sculpture of Meta Warrick Fuller. (A George Gund Foundation Book in African American Studies.) Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2011. Pp. 200. $49.95.
- BALLON, HILARY, editor. The Greatest Grid: The Master Plan of Manhattan, 1811–2011. New York: Columbia University Press, with the Museum of the City of New York. 2012. Pp. 226. $40.00.
- BARROS-GRELA, EDUARDO, and JOSÉ LISTE-NOYA, editors. American Secrets: The Politics and Poetics of Secrecy in the Literature and Culture of the United States. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press. 2011. Pp. vii, 265. $75.00.
- BARTLE, HARVEY III. Mortals with Tremendous Responsibilities: A History of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia: Saint Joseph's University Press. 2011. Pp. xvii, 285. $35.00.
- BAUMAN, JOHN F., ROGER BILES, and KRISTIN M. SZYLVIAN. The Ever-Changing American City: 1945–Present. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield. 2012. Pp. x, 199. Cloth $90.00, paper $49.95.
- BELLETO, STEVEN. No Accident, Comrade: Chance and Design in Cold War American Narratives. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 206. $65.00.
- BESSLER, JOHN D. Cruel and Unusual: The American Death Penalty and the Founders' Eighth Amendment. Boston: Northeastern University Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 456. $39.95.
- BLAKELY, EDWARD J. My Storm: Managing the Recovery of New Orleans in the Wake of Katrina. Foreword by HENRY CISNEROS. (The City in the Twenty-First Century.) Philadel- phia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2012. Pp. x, 182. $34.95.

- BLOCK, JAMES E. The Crucible of Consent: American Child Rearing and the Forging of Liberal Society. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 447. $45.00.
- BORICK, CARL P. Relieve Us of This Burthen: American Prisoners of War in the Revolutionary South, 1780–1782. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 170. $29.95.
- BRADDOCK, JEREMY. Collecting as Modernist Practice. (Hopkins Studies in Modernism.) Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 319. $39.95.
- BULLOCK, CHARLES S. III, and MARK J. ROZELL, editors. The Oxford Handbook of Southern Politics. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 564. $150.00.
- CAROCCI, MAX, and STEPHANIE PRATT, editors. Native American Adoption, Captivity, and Slavery in Changing Contexts. (Studies of the Americas.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. x, 267. $90.00.
- CASTEL, ALBERT. Victors in Blue: How Union Generals Fought the Confederates, Battled Each Other, and Won the Civil War. With BROOKS D. SIMPSON. Maps by GEORGE SKOCH. (Modern War Studies.) Lawrence: University Press of Kansas. 2011. Pp. xii, 362. $34.95.
- CHARTRAND, RENÉ. Forts of the War of 1812. Illustrated by DONATO SPEDALIERE. (Fortress, number 106.) Oxford: Osprey. 2012. Pp. 64. $18.95.
- CHARTRAND, RENÉ. Tomahawk and Musket: French and Indian Raids in the Ohio Valley 1758. (Raid, number 27.) Oxford: Osprey. 2012. Pp. 80. $18.95.
- CHONG, SYLVIA SHIN HUEY. The Oriental Obscene: Violence and Racial Fantasies in the Vietnam Era. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 364. Cloth $94.95, paper $26.95.
- CHUSID, JEFFREY M. Saving Wright: The Freeman House and the Preservation of Meaning, Materials, and Modernity. New York: W. W. Norton. 2011. Pp. 256. $55.00.
- CLOUD, DANA L. We Are the Union: Democratic Unionism and Dissent at Boeing. With R. KEITH THOMAS. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2011. Pp. xvi, 236. $55.00.
- COLLINS, PERRY McDONOUGH. Siberian Journey: Down the Amur to the Pacific, 1856–1857. Edited by CHARLES VEVIER. Reprint. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 370. $29.95.
- CONTOSTA, DAVID, and CAROL FRANKLIN. Philadelphia's Wisahickon Valley, 1620–2020: Metropolitan Paradise, The Struggle for Nature in the City. In four volumes. Philadelphia: Saint Joseph's University Press. 2010. Pp. xxii, 184; 187, 428; 431, 694; 697, 902. $85.00.
- COOPER, WILLIAM J., JR., and JOHN M. MCCARDELL, JR., editors. In the Cause of Liberty: How the Civil War Redefined American Ideals. Paperback edition. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, with the American Civil War Center at Historic Tredegar. 2011. Pp. viii, 195. $18.95.
- COZEAN, JESSE. My Grandfather's War: A Young Man's Lessons from the Greatest Generation. Guilford, Conn.: Lyons Press. 2012. Pp. 220. $19.95.
- DANISI, THOMAS C. Uncovering the Truth about Meriwether Lewis. Foreword by ROBERT J. MOORE, JR. Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus. 2012. Pp. 466. $26.00.
- DAVIES, ROBERT B. Baldwin of the Times: Hanson W. Baldwin, A Military Journalist's Life, 1903–1991. Annapolis, Md.: Naval Institute Press. 2011. Pp. x, 399. $32.95.
- DAVIS, WILLIAM C., and JAMES I. ROBERTSON, JR., editors. Virginia at War, 1865. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, for the Virginia Center for Civil War Studies. 2012. Pp. x, 237. $40.00.
- DE LEÓN, ARNOLDO, editor. War along the Border: The Mexican Revolution and Tejano Communities. (University of Houston Series in Mexican American Studies, number 6.) College Station: Texas A&M University Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 345. $50.00.
- DEE, CHRISTINE. "Feel the Bonds That Draw": Images of the Civil War at the Western Reserve Historical Society. (Cleveland Illustrated History Series.) Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, with the Western Reserve Historical Society. 2011. Pp. ix, 118. $34.95.
- DUCK, BERKLEY W. III. Twilight at Conner Prairie: The Creation, Betrayal, and Rescue of a Museum. (American Association for State and Local History Book Series.) Lanham, Md.: AltaMira Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 220. $39.95.
- EDMONSON, NATHAN. Technology Cycles and U.S. Economic Policy in the Early 21st Century. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Publishers. 2012. Pp. 184. $49.95.
- ELDRIDGE, LAWRENCE ALLEN. Chronicles of a Two-Front War: Civil Rights and Vietnam in the African American Press. Columbia: University of Missouri Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 285. $45.00.
- FADERMAN, LILLIAN. Odd Girls and Twilight Lovers: A History of Lesbian Life in Twentieth-Century America. (Between Men—Between Women.) Paperback edition. New York: Columbia University Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 373. $24.50.
- FASS, PAULA S., and MICHAEL GROSSBERG, editors. Reinventing Childhood after World War II. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 182. $42.50.
- FELLMAN, MICHAEL. Views from the Dark Side of American History. (Conflicting Worlds: New Dimensions of the American Civil War.) Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 2011. Pp. 155. $22.50.
- FERGUSON, GILLUM. Illinois in the War of 1812. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 349. $34.95.
- FICHERA, SEBASTIAN. Italy on the Pacific: San Francisco's Italian Americans. (Italian and Italian American Studies.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. viii, 239. $85.00.
- FLEMING, JAMES RODGER. Fixing the Sky: The Checkered History of Weather and Climate Control. (Columbia Studies in International and Global History.) Paperback edition. New York: Columbia University Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 325. $19.95.
- FLUCK, WINFRIED, DONALD E. PEASE, and JOHN CARLOS ROWE, editors. Re-Framing the Transnational Turn in American Studies. (Re-Mapping the Transnational: A Dartmouth Series in American Studies.) Hanover, NH: Dartmouth College Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 460. Cloth $85.00, paper $35.00.
- FORMAN, SAMUEL A. Dr. Joseph Warren: The Boston Tea Party, Bunker Hill, and the Birth of American Liberty. Gretna, La.: Pelican. 2012. Pp. 455. $29.95.
- FRANK, LISA TENDRICH, and DANIEL KILBRIDE, editors. Southern Character: Essays in Honor of Bertram Wyatt-Brown. Foreword by STANLEY HARROLD and RANDALL M. MILLER. (Southern Dissent.) Gainesville: University Press of Florida. 2011. Pp. xvi, 301. $74.95.
- GALAMBOS, LOUIS. The Creative Society—And the Price Americans Paid for It. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 322. Cloth $90.00, paper $27.99.
- GENOVESE, EUGENE D., and ELIZABETH FOX-GENOVESE. Fatal Self-Deception: Slaveholding Paternalism in the Old South. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xvii, 232. Cloth $90.00, paper $26.99.
- GIDLOW, LIETTE, editor. Obama, Clinton, Palin: Making History in Election 2008. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2011. Pp. x, 175. Cloth $65.00, paper $25.00.
- GILLESPIE, ANGUS KRESS. Crossing under the Hudson: The Story of the Holland and Lincoln Tunnels. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rivergate Books. 2011. Pp. xii, 214. $24.95.
- GOLDBERG, RONALD ALLEN. America in the Forties. Foreword by JOHN ROBERT GREENE. (America in the Twentieth Century.) Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 213. Cloth $45.00, paper $19.95.
- GOMES, BERNARDINO, and TIAGO MOREIRA DE SÁ. Carlucci ver-

- sus Kissinger: The US and the Portuguese Revolution*. Translated by SUSANA SERRAS PEREIRA. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books. 2011. Pp. xiii, 263. Cloth $80.00, paper $32.95.
- GOULD, LEWIS L. Theodore Roosevelt. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 88. $12.95.
- GRANATSTEIN, J. L., and DEAN F. OLIVER. The Oxford Companion to Canadian Military History. New York: Oxford University Press, with the Canadian War Museum. 2011. Pp. xiii, 514. $74.00.
- GRAU, LESTER W., and DODGE BILLINGSLEY. Operation Anaconda: America's First Major Battle in Afghanistan. (Modern War Studies.) with DVD. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas. 2011. Pp. xviii, 459. $39.95.
- GREVE, MICHAEL S. The Upside-Down Constitution. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 518. $39.95.
- HAMERA, JUDITH. Parlor Ponds: The Cultural Work of the American Home Aquarium, 1850–1970. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press. 2012. Pp. ix, 268. Cloth $90.00, paper $35.00.
- HARWOOD, JOHN. The Interface: IBM and the Transformation of Corporate Design, 1945–1976. (A Quadrant Book.) Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 2011. Pp. 278. $34.95.
- HAYES, ALLAN, and CAROL HAYES. Pottery of the Southwest: Ancient Art and Modern Traditions. Botley, United Kingdom: Shire Publications. 2012. Pp. 64. $9.95.
- HAYES, DEREK. Historical Atlas of Washington and Oregon. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2011. Pp. 240. $39.95.
- HOWARD, HUGH. Mr. and Mrs. Madison's War: America's First Couple and the Second War of Independence. New York: Bloomsbury Press. 2012. Pp. xviii, 365. $30.00.
- HUNTLEY, JEN A. The Making of Yosemite: James Mason Hutchings and the Origin of America's Most Popular National Park. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas. 2011. Pp. xi, 232. $34.95.
- JACOBSON, ROBIN DALE, and NANCY D. WADSWORTH, editors. Faith and Race in American Political Life. (Race, Ethnicity, and Politics.) Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press. 2012. Pp. vi, 320. $49.50.
- JAKLE, JOHN A., and KEITH A. SCULLE. Remembering Roadside America: Preserving the Recent Past as Landscape and Place. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press. 2011. Pp. xxi, 284. $29.95.
- JENKINS, TRICIA. The CIA in Hollywood: How the Agency Shapes Film and Television. Austin: University of Texas Press. 2012. Pp. 167. $55.00.
- JENKINSON, CLAY S. The Character of Meriwether Lewis: Explorer in the Wilderness; Essays on One of the Most Remarkable Men in American History. Foreword by DAVID NICANDRI. Washburn, N.D.: The Dakota Institute Press of the Lewis and Clark Fort Mandan Foundation. 2011. Pp. xxxiv, 456. Cloth $29.95, paper $19.95.
- JOHNSON, DAVID ALAN. Decided on the Battlefield: Grant, Sherman, Lincoln and the Election of 1864. Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus. 2012. Pp. 319. $27.00.
- JONES, BRIAN MADISON. Abolishing the Taboo: Dwight D. Eisenhower and American Nuclear Doctrine, 1945–1961. (Helion Studies in Military History, number 7.) Solihull, England: Helion & Company. 2011. Pp. iv, 172. $49.95.
- KENNY, PETER M., et al. Duncan Phyfe: Master Cabinetmaker in New York. New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art. 2011. Pp. x, 302. $65.00.
- KING, ANTHONY. The Founding Fathers v. the People: Paradoxes of American Democracy. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 242. $35.00.
- KONINGS, MARTIJN. The Development of American Finance. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 199. $90.00.
- LAUSE, MARK A. A Secret Society History of the Civil War. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 209. $35.00.
- LEWIS, RICHARD ANTHONY. Robert W. Tebbs, Photographer to Architects: Louisiana Plantations in 1926. Foreword by ROBERT J. CANGELOSI, JR. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 151. $39.95.
- LINK, WILLIAM A. Links: My Family in American History. Gainesville: University Press of Florida. 2012. Pp. xv, 214. $32.00.
- LOUNSBURY, CARL R. Essays in Early American Architectural History: A View from the Chesapeake. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 268. $35.00.
- LURIE, JONATHAN. William Howard Taft: The Travails of a Progressive Conservative. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xv, 214. $90.00.
- MAJID, ANOUAR. Islam and America: Building a Future without Prejudice. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield. 2012. Pp. xvi, 173. $35.00.
- MARLEY, ANNA O., editor. Henry Ossawa Tanner: Modern Spirit. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, for the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts. 2012. Pp. 308. Cloth $75.00, paper $39.95.
- MARTEN, JAMES, editor. Children and Youth during the Civil War Era. (Children and Youth in America.) New York: New York University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 270. Cloth $75.00, paper $25.00.
- MARTIN, ZACHARY J. Martyr to Freedom: The Life and Death of Captain Daniel Drayton. 2d ed. Lanham, Maryland: Hamilton Books. 2011. Pp. xviii, 129. $21.99.
- MATOVINA, TIMOTHY. Latino Catholicism: Transformation in America's Largest Church. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 312. $29.95.
- MCDONALD, ROBERT M. S., editor. Light and Liberty: Thomas Jefferson and the Power of Knowledge. (Jeffersonian America.) Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press. 2012. Pp. xvii, 232. $40.00.
- MCGUIRE, ROBERT A., and PHILIP R. P. COELHO. Parasites, Pathogens and Progress: Diseases and Economic Development. Cambridge: MIT Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 343. $30.00.
- MCKNIGHT, BRIAN D., and JAMES S. HUMPHREYS, editors. The Age of Andrew Jackson. (Interpreting American History Series.) Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 140. $29.95.
- MCLEOD, JACQUELINE A. Daughter of the Empire State: The Life of Judge Jane Bolin. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2011. Pp. xvi, 146. $30.00.
- MCLEOD, STEPHEN A., editor. Dining with the Washingtons: Historic Recipes, Entertainment, and Hospitality from Mount Vernon. Foreword by WALTER SCHEIB. Recipes by NANCY CARTER CRUMP. Mount Vernon, Va.: Mount Vernon Ladies' Association, with the University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill, N.C. 2011. Pp. 234. $35.00.
- MCNEIL, BRYAN T. Combating Mountaintop Removal: New Directions in the Fight against Big Coal. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2011. Pp. 204. $45.00.
- MELAMED, JODI. Represent and Destroy: Rationalizing Violence in the New Racial Capitalism. (Difference Incorporated.) Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 2011. Pp. xxiv, 274. $25.00.
- MEYERS, AMY R. W., editor. Knowing Nature: Art and Science in Philadelphia, 1740–1840. With the assistance of LISA L. FORD. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 417. $65.00.
- MILLER, KEITH D. Martin Luther King's Biblical Epic: His Final, Great Speech. (Race, Rhetoric, and Media Series.) Jackson: University Press of Mississippi. 2012. Pp. xiii, 245. $55.00.
- MILLER, RUTH A. Seven Stories of Threatening Speech: Women's Suffrage Meets Machine Code. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press. 2012. Pp. vi, 289. $60.00.

- MINDELL, DAVID A. Iron Coffin: War, Technology, and Experience aboard the USS Monitor. (Johns Hopkins Introductory Studies in the History of Technology.) Updated edition. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 191. $23.00.
- MOHL, RAYMOND A., and ROGER BILES, editors. The Making of Urban America. 3d ed. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield. 2012. Pp. viii, 456. Cloth $90.00, paper $49.95.
- MOODY, WESLEY. Demon of the Lost Cause: Sherman and Civil War History. (Shades of Blue and Gray Series.) Columbia: University of Missouri Press. 2011. Pp. 190. $30.00.
- MURPHY, DAVID ROYCE. Scenery, Curiosities, and Stupendous Rocks: William Quesenbury's Overland Sketches, 1850–1851. With contributions by MICHAEL L. TATE and MICHAEL FARRELL. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 275. $45.00.
- MURPHY, PAUL V. The New Era: American Thought and Culture in the 1920s. (American Thought and Culture.) Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield. 2012. Pp. xiii, 267. $74.99.
- MYERS, BARTON A. Executing Daniel Bright: Race, Loyalty, and Guerrilla Violence in a Coastal Carolina Community, 1861–1865. (Conflicting Worlds: New Dimensions of the American Civil War.) Paperback edition. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 193. $18.95.
- NATHANS, SYDNEY. To Free a Family: The Journey of Mary Walker. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. 330. $29.95.
- NOMELAND, MELVIA M., and RONALD E. NOMELAND. The Deaf Community in America: History in the Making. Foreword by TRUDY SUGGS. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland & Company. 2012. Pp. vii, 232. $45.00.
- NOTO, PAUL J. At the Crossroads of Justice: My Lai and Son Thang—American Atrocities in Vietnam. Bloomington, Ind.: iUniverse, Inc. 2011. Pp. xiv, 131. $13.95.
- PARKS, GREGORY S., and STEFAN M. BRADLEY, editors. Alpha Phi Alpha: A Legacy of Greatness, the Demands of Transcendence. Foreword by MICHAEL ALEXANDER BLAKE. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky. 2012. Pp. xv, 394. $39.95.
- PARSI, TRITA. A Single Roll of the Dice: Obama's Diplomacy with Iran. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2012. Pp. xvi, 284. $27.50.
- PAYNE, ELIZABETH ANNE, editor. Writing Women's History: A Tribute to Anne Firor Scott. Contributions from LAURA F. EDWARDS et al. (Chancellor Porter L. Fortune Symposium in Southern History Series.) Jackson: University Press of Mississippi. 2011. Pp. xviii, 231. $55.00.
- PEDLEY, JOHN GRIFFITHS. The Life and Work of Francis Willey Kelsey: Archaeology, Antiquity, and the Arts. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 468. $75.00.
- PESKIN, LAWRENCE A., and EDMUND F. WEHRLE. America and the World: Culture, Commerce, Conflict. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 302. Cloth $60.00, paper $30.00.
- PETERSON DEL MAR, DAVID. The American Family: From Obligation to Freedom. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. 211. Cloth $85.00, paper $27.00.
- PHELPS, M. WILLIAM. The Devil's Right Hand: The Tragic Story of the Colt Family Curse. Guilford, Conn.: Lyons Press. 2012. Pp. xix, 315. $24.95.
- PICKERING, ROBERT B., editor. Peace Medals: Negotiating Power in Early America. Tulsa, Okla.: Gilcrease Museum. 2011. Pp. ix, 118. $19.95.
- RAMIREZ-VALLES, JESUS. Compañeros: Latino Activists in the Face of AIDS. (Latinos in Chicago and the Midwest.) Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2011. Pp. x, 179. Cloth $75.00, paper $25.00.
- REMLEY, DAVID. Kit Carson: The Life of an American Border Man. (The Oklahoma Western Biographies, number 27.) Paperback edition. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press. 2012. Pp. xxx, 289. $19.95.
- RICHARDSON, JOHN T. E. Howard Andrew Knox: Pioneer of Intelligence Testing at Ellis Island. New York: Columbia University Press. 2011. Pp. xxxii, 309. $55.00.
- RISKA-CAMPBELL, LEENA. Bridging East and West: The Establishment of the International Institute for Applied Systems Analysis (IIASA) in the United States Foreign Policy of Bridge Building, 1964–1972. (Commentationes Scientiarum Socialium, number 75.) Helsinki: Finnish Society of Science and Letters. 2011. Pp. xii, 608. €30.00.
- ROGERS, D. LAURENCE. Apostles of Equality: The Birneys, the Republicans, and the Civil War. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 315. $39.95.
- RYAN, TERRE. This Ecstatic Nation: The American Landscape and the Aesthetics of Patriotism. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 171. $22.95.
- SAMSON, JACK. The Flying Tiger: The True Story of General Claire Chennault and the U.S. 14th Air Force in China. Paperback edition. Guilford, Conn.: Lyons Press. 2012. Pp. xvii, 470. $18.95.
- SATTERFIELD, JOHN R. Saving Big Ben: The USS Franklin and Father Joseph T. O'Callahan. Annapolis, Md.: Naval Institute Press. 2011. Pp. x, 175. $34.95.
- SAUGERA, ERIC. Reborn in America: French Exiles and Refugees in the United States and the Vine and Olive Adventure, 1815–1865. Translated by MADELEINE VELGUTH. (Atlantic Crossings.) Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press. 2011. Pp. x, 572. $30.00.
- SAVELSBERG, JOACHIM J., and RYAN D. KING. American Memories: Atrocities and the Law. (Rose Series in Sociology.) New York: Russell Sage Foundation. 2011. Pp. xxvi, 238. $37.50.
- SCOTT, WILLIAM. Troublemakers: Power, Representation, and the Fiction of the Mass Worker. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 284. Cloth $72.00, paper $24.95.
- SEWELL, BEVAN, and SCOTT LUCAS, editors. Challenging US Foreign Policy: America and the World in the Long Twentieth Century. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xii, 302. $85.00.
- SHULER, JACK. Blood and Bone: Truth and Reconciliation in a Southern Town. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press. 2012. Pp. xv, 240. $29.95.
- SILVERMAN, VICTOR, and LAURIE GLOVER. California. (On-the-Road Histories.) Northampton, Mass.: Interlink Books. 2012. Pp. 389. $22.00.
- SORNBERGER, JOE. Dreams and Due Diligence: Till and McCulloch's Stem Cell Discovery and Legacy. Buffalo, N.Y.: University of Toronto Press. 2011. Pp. xviii, 148. $29.95.
- SPIVAK, JOHN L. Hard Times on a Southern Chain Gang. Introduction by DAVID A. DAVIS. (Southern Classics Series.) Reprint. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, in cooperation with the Institute for Southern Studies of the University of South Carolina. 2012. Pp. xxv, 283. $14.95.
- STAKER, MARK LYMAN. Hearken, O Ye People: The Historical Setting for Joseph Smith's Ohio Revelations. Salt Lake City, Utah: Greg Kofford Books. 2009. Pp. xlii, 694. $34.95.
- STANTON, LUCIA. "Those Who Labor for My Happiness": Slavery at Thomas Jefferson's Monticello. (Jeffersonian America.) Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, in association with the Thomas Jefferson Foundation at Monticello. 2012. Pp. xiv, 369. $24.95.
- STEARMAN, WILLIAM LLOYD. An American Adventure: From Early Aviation through Three Wars to the White House. Annapolis, Md.: Naval Institute Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 264. $37.95.
- TARNOFF, BEN. A Counterfeiter's Paradise: The Wicked Lives and Surprising Adventures of Three Early American Money-makers. Paperback edition. New York: Penguin. 2012. Pp. 368. $19.50.
- TAVES, BRIAN. Thomas Ince: Hollywood's Independent Pioneer.

- (Screen Classics.) Lexington: University Press of Kentucky. 2012. Pp. xi, 367. $39.95.
- TILLMAN, BARRETT. Enterprise: America's Fightingest Ship and the Men Who Helped Win World War II. New York: Simon and Schuster. 2012. Pp. xv, 300. $27.00.
- TOURGÉE, ALBION W. The Story of a Thousand, Being a History of the Service of the 105th Ohio Volunteer Infantry in the War for the Union, from August 21, 1862, to June 6, 1865. Edited by PETER C. LUEBKE. (Civil War in the North.) Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press. 2011. Pp. xxxix, 409. $59.00.
- TRACY, STEVEN C., editor. Writers of the Black Chicago Renaissance. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 523. $50.00.
- VANDEMARK, BRIAN. American Sheikhs: Two Families, Four Generations, and the Story of America's Influence in the Middle East. Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus. 2012. Pp. 252. $25.00.
- VICKERS, RAYMOND B. Panic in the Loop: Chicago's Banking Crisis of 1932. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books. 2011. Pp. xxiv, 347. $80.00.
- WATERS, DEBORAH DEPENDAHL, JOSEPH CUNNINGHAM, and BRUCE BARNES. The Jewelry and Metalwork of Marie Zimmermann. Principal photography by DAVID COLE. New Haven: Yale University Press, in association with the American Decorative Art 1900 Foundation, New York. 2011. Pp. xv, 384. $65.00.
- WATT, ROBERT N. Apache Tactics 1830–1886. Illustrated by ADAM HOOK. (Elite, number 119.) Oxford: Osprey. 2012. Pp. 64. $18.95.
- WEAVER, FREDERICK S. The United States and the Global Economy: From Bretton Woods to the Current Crisis. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield. 2011. Pp. xi, 175. $29.95.
- WEED, CLYDE P. The Transformation of the Republican Party, 1912–1936: From Reform to Resistance. Boulder and London: FirstForumPress. 2012. Pp. x, 250. $58.00.
- WEIDENSAUL, SCOTT. The First Frontier: The Forgotten History of Struggle, Savagery, and Endurance in Early America. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Harcourt. 2012. Pp. xxi, 474. $30.00.
- WENN, STEPHEN, ROBERT BARNEY, and SCOTT MARTYN. Tarnished Rings: The International Olympic Committee and the Salt Lake City Bid Scandal. (Sports and Entertainment.) Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press. 2011. Pp. xxix, 273. $39.95.
- WHEATLEY, CHRISTOPHER J. Thornton Wilder and Amos Wilder: Writing Religion in Twentieth-Century America. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 226. $29.00.
- WHEELER, KENNETH H. Cultivating Regionalism: Higher Education and the Making of the American Midwest. (Early American Places.) DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 156. $38.00.
- WHITE, BARBARA A. Visits with Lincoln: Abolitionists Meet the President at the White House. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books. 2011. Pp. xxi, 157. $65.00.
- WHITE, PHILIP. Our Supreme Task: How Winston Churchill's Iron Curtain Speech Defined the Cold War Alliance. New York: PublicAffairs. 2012. Pp. xiii, 288. $26.99.
- WHITES, LEEANN, and ALECIA P. LONG, editors. Occupied Women: Gender, Military Occupation, and the American Civil War. Paperback edition. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 2012. Pp. vi, 256. $21.50.
- YOSHITANI, GAIL E. S. Reagan on War: A Reappraisal of the Weinberger Doctrine, 1980–1984. (Foreign Relations and the Presidency, number 10.) College Station: Texas A&M University Press. 2012. Pp. xvii, 250. $35.00.
- BROWN, KENDALL W. A History of Mining in Latin America from the Colonial Era to the Present. (Diálogos.) Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press. 2012. Pp. xix, 257. $34.95.
- GONZÁLEZ CRUZ, DAVID, editor. Pueblos indígenas y extranjeros en la Monarquía Hispánica: La imagen del otro en tiempos de guerra (siglos XVI–XIX). Madrid: Sílex. 2011. Pp. 330. €22.00.
- GOTKOWITZ, LAURA, editor. Histories of Race and Racism: The Andes and Mesoamerica from Colonial Times to the Present. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2011. Pp. vii, 400. Cloth $94.95, paper $25.95.
- GRACIA, JORGE J. E., editor. Forging People: Race, Ethnicity, and Nationality in Hispanic American and Latino/a Thought. (Latino Perspectives.) Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press. 2011. Pp. xix, 349. $30.00.
- HEGGARTY, PAUL, and ADRIAN J. PEARCE, editors. History and Language in the Andes. (Studies of the Americas.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xxi, 266. $85.00.
- HORNA, HERNÁN. A History of Latin America. (Studia multi-ethnica Upsaliensia, number 19.) Uppsala: Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis. 2011. Pp. 260.
- HULME, PETER. Cuba's Wild East: A Literary Geography of Oriente. (American Tropics: Towards a Literary Geography.) Liverpool: Liverpool University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 455. £70.00.
- MARTIN, TONY. Caribbean History: From Pre-colonial Origins to the Present. New York: Pearson Education. 2012. Pp. xvii, 366. $44.00.
- RESTALL, MATTHEW, and KRIS LANE, editors. Latin America in Colonial Times. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 304. Cloth $90.00, paper $29.99.
- RINKE, STEFAN. Las revoluciones en América Latina: Las vías a la independencia, 1760–1830. Mexico City: Colegio Internacional de Graduados Entre Espacios. México, D.F.: El Colegio de México. 2011. Pp. 407. $29.00.
- SADER, EMIR. The New Mole: Paths of the Latin American Left. Translated by IAIN BRUCE. New York: Verso. 2011. Pp. xvi, 169. $26.95.
- VILLAFÁÑA, FRANK R. Expansionism: Its Effects on Cuba's Independence. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Publishers. 2012. Pp. x, 224. $39.95.
- WITSCHY, WALTER R. T., and CLIFFORD T. BROWN, editors. Historical Dictionary of Mesoamerica. (Historical Dictionaries of Ancient Civilizations and Historical Eras.) Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press. 2012. Pp. xxii, 416. Cloth $105.00, paper $99.99.

EUROPE: ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL

- ANDREAU, JEAN, and RAYMOND DESCAT. The Slave in Greece and Rome. Translated by MARION LEOPOLD. (Wisconsin Studies in Classics.) Madison: University of Wisconsin Press. 2011. Pp. v, 198. Paper $26.95, e-Book $19.95.
- BALARD, MICHEL, editor. La Papauté et les croisades/The Papacy and the Crusades: Actes du VIIe Congrès de la Society for the Study of the Crusades and the Latin East/Proceedings of the VIIth Conference of the Society for the Study of the Crusades and the Latin East. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2011. Pp. xii, 301. $124.95.
- CAMPBELL, BRIAN. The Romans and Their World. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 285. $35.00.
- CLINE, ERIC H., editor. The Oxford Handbook of the Bronze Age Aegean (ca. 3000–1000 BC). Paperback edition. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xxxiii, 930. $55.00.
- DARASSE, COLINE RUIZ, and EUGENIO R. LUIÁN, editors. Contacts linguistiques dans l'Occident méditerranéen antique. (Collection de la Casa de Velázquez, number 126.) Madrid: Casa de Velázquez. 2011. Pp. xii, 312. €37.00.
- FLORI, JEAN. Chroniqueurs et propagandistes: Introduction critique aux sources de la Première croisade. (Hautes études

CARIBBEAN AND LATIN AMERICA

- BEEZLEY, WILLIAM H. Mexico in World History. (New Oxford World History.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xvi, 179. $19.95.

- médiévales et modernes, number 98.) Geneva: Librairie Droz. 2010. Pp. 353. $58.00.
- GERTSMAN, ELINA, editor. Crying in the Middle Ages: Tears of History. (Routledge Studies in Medieval Religion and Culture, number 10.) New York: Routledge. 2012. Pp. xxx, 320. $125.00.
- HARE, JOHN. A Prospering Society: Wiltshire in the Later Middle Ages. (Studies in Regional and Local History, number 10.) Hertfordshire: University of Hertfordshire Press. 2011. Pp. xvi, 240. £35.00.
- ICKS, MARTIJN. The Crimes of Elagabalus: The Life and Legacy of Rome's Decadent Boy Emperor. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 276. $29.95.
- LENSKI, NOEL, editor. The Cambridge Companion to the Age of Constantine. Rev. ed. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xx, 471. Cloth $99.00, paper $39.99.
- MAC SWEENEY, NAOÍSE. Community Identity and Archaeology: Dynamic Communities at Aphrodisias and Beycesultan. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 266. $75.00.
- MOSTERT, MARCO, and P. S. BARNWELL, editors. Medieval Legal Process: Physical, Spoken and Written Performance in the Middle Ages. (Utrecht Studies in Medieval Literacy, number 22.) Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols. 2011. Pp. viii, 299. $85.00.
- NICOLAIDIS, EFTHYMIOS. Science and Eastern Orthodoxy: From the Greek Fathers to the Age of Globalization. Translated by SUSAN EMANUEL. (Medicine, Science, and Religion in Historical Context.) Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2011. Pp. xviii, 252. $55.00.
- ORMROD, W. MARK. Edward III. (Yale English Monarchs Series.) New Haven: Yale University Press. 2011. Pp. xx, 721. $45.00.
- PRICE, SIMON, and PETER THONEMANN. The Birth of Classical Europe: A History from Troy to Augustine. (The Penguin History of Europe, number 1.) New York: Penguin. 2010. Pp. xvii, 397. $20.00.
- SARRIS, PETER. Empires of Faith: The Fall of Rome to the Rise of Islam, 500–700. (The Oxford History of Medieval Europe.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 428. $65.00.
- SOMERVILLE, ROBERT. Pope Urban II's Council of Piacenza: March 1–7, 1095. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. vi, 151. $110.00.
- THOMAS, ANABEL. Garrisoning the Borderlands of Medieval Siena: Sant' Angelo in Colle; Frontier Castle under the Government of the Nine (1287–1355). Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2011. Pp. xix, 422. $124.95.
- EUROPE: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN
- ÅGREN, HENRIK. Kejsarens nya kläder: Historiebruk och kulturarv under tidigmodern reformation och modern revolution [The Emperor's New Clothes: History Writing and Cultural Heritage during the Early Modern Reformations and Modern Revolutions]. (Opuscula Historica Upsaliensia, number 46.) Uppsala: Swedish Science Press. 2011. Pp. 135. SEK110.
- ÅGREN, HENRIK, editor. Goda exempel: Värderingar och världsbild i tidigmodern svensk sakprosa och tillfällesdikt [Good Examples: Values and View of the World in Early Modern Prose and Poems for Ceremonial Occasions]. (Opuscula Historica Upsaliensia, number 43.) Uppsala: Swedish Science Press. 2010. Pp. 237. SEK110.
- ÅKERLUND, ANDREAS, editor. Kulturtransfer och kulturpolitik: Sverige och Tyskland under det tjugonde århundradet [Cultural Transfer and Cultural Policy: Sweden and Germany during the Twentieth Century]. (Opuscula Historica Upsaliensia, number 45.) Uppsala: Swedish Science Press. 2011. Pp. 150.
- ARNASON, JOHANN PALL, and BJÖRN WITTROCK, editors. Nordic Paths to Modernity. New York: Berghahn Books. 2012. Pp. vi, 288. $90.00.
- BALOGH, BÉNI L. The Second Vienna Award and the Hungarian-Romanian Relations, 1940–1944. Translated by ANDREW GANE. Assisted by MATTHEW SUFF and ANDREA T. KULCSÁR. (Atlantic Studies on Society in Change, number 139; East European Monographs, number 779.) Highland Lakes, NJ: Atlantic Research and Publications, Inc. Boulder, Colo.: Social Science Monographs, distributed by Columbia University Press. 2011. Pp. vii, 589. $65.00.
- BERGER, RONALD J. The Holocaust, Religion, and the Politics of Collective Memory: Beyond Sociology. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Publishers. 2012. Pp. xi, 281. $39.95.
- BLACKMORE, JOHN T., RYOICHI ITAGAKI, and SETSUKO TANAKA. Ernst Mach's Prague 1867–1895 as a Human Adventure. Bethesda, Maryland: Sentinel Open Press, distributed by Enfield Publishing and Distribution Co. 2010. Pp. xiv, 476. $40.00.
- BLANCHARD, JOËL, editor. 1511–2011 Philippe de Commines: Droit, écriture; deux piliers de la souveraineté. (Cahiers d'Humanisme et Renaissance, number 100.) Geneva: Librairie Droz. 2012. Pp. 377. $51.60.
- BLANCO, LUIGI, editor. Dottrine e istituzioni in Occidente. (Annali dell'Istituto storico italo-germanico in Trento; Quaderni, number 83.) Bologna: Il Mulino. 2011. Pp. 254. €20.00.
- BOURQUIN, LAURENT, et al. S'exprimer en temps de troubles: Conflits, opinion(s) et politisation de la fin du Moyen âge au début du XX^e siècle. (Histoire.) Rennes: Presses Universitaires de Rennes. 2011. Pp. 377. €21.00.
- BRAUN, BERND. Die Weimarer Reichskanzler: Zwölf Lebensläufe in Bildern. (Photodokumente zur Geschichte des Parlamentarismus und der politischen Parteien, number 7.) Düsseldorf: Droste Verlag. 2011. Pp. 502. €59.80.
- BROOD, PAUL, and RAYMOND KUBBEN, editors. The Act of Abjuration: Inspired and Inspirational. Nijmegen, Netherlands: Wolf Legal Publishers. 2011. Pp. 207. €19.95.
- BUSHKOVITCH, PAUL. A Concise History of Russia. (Cambridge Concise Histories.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xxiv, 491. Cloth $99.00, paper $27.99.
- CABADA, LADISLAV, and ŠÁRKA WAIŠOVÁ. Czechoslovakia and the Czech Republic in World Politics. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books. 2011. Pp. xx, 221. $65.00.
- CALDWELL, DORIGEN, and LESLEY CALDWELL, editors. Rome: Continuing Encounters between Past and Present. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2011. Pp. xx, 262. $119.95.
- CHACÓN, FRANCISCO, and JOAN BESTARD, editors. Familias: Historia de la sociedad Española (Del final de la edad media a nuestros días). (Historia. Serie Mayor.) Madrid: Cátedra. 2011. Pp. 1247. €38.46.
- CHAUVAUD, FRÉDÉRIC, editor. L'Ennemie intime: La peur; Perceptions, expressions, effets. (Histoire.) Rennes: Presses Universitaires de Rennes. 2011. Pp. 285. €18.00.
- CLARKE, DAVID, and UTE WÖLFEL, editors. Remembering the German Democratic Republic: Divided Memory in a United Germany. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xiv, 294. $85.00.
- COLLINSON, PATRICK. This England: Essays on the English Nation and Commonwealth in the Sixteenth Century. (Politics, Culture and Society in Early Modern Britain.) New York: Manchester University Press, distributed by Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. ix, 316. $105.00.
- COOHILL, JOSEPH. Ideas of the Liberal Party: Perceptions, Agendas, and Liberal Politics in the House of Commons, 1832–52. (Parliamentary History: Texts and Studies, number 5.) Malden, Mass.: Wiley-Blackwell, for The Parliamentary History Yearbook Trust. 2011. Pp. xii, 232. $34.95.
- COOK, ALEXANDRA PARMA, and NOBLE DAVID COOK. The Plague Files: Crisis Management in Sixteenth-Century Seville.

- Paperback edition. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 296. $21.50.
- DAKERS, CAROLINE. A Genius for Money: Business, Art, and the Morrisons. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 326. $40.00.
- DALE, GARETH, editor. First the Transition, Then the Crash: Eastern Europe in the 2000s. London: Pluto. 2011. Pp. vi, 271. $40.00.
- DEBAENST, BRUNO. Een proces van bloed, zweet en tranen! Juridiseren van arbeidsongevallen in de negentiende eeuw in België. (Iuris Scripta Historica, number 25.) Brussels: Koninklijke Vlaamse Academie van België voor Wetenschappen en Kunsten. 2011. Pp. 503. €35.85.
- EDLEN, STUART, editor. Sloterdijk Now. (Theory Now.) Cambridge: Polity Press. 2012. Pp. xv, 213. $22.95.
- FALASCA-ZAMPONI, SIMONETTA. Rethinking the Political: The Sacred, Aesthetic Politics, and the Collège de Sociologie. (McGill-Queen's Studies in the History of Ideas, number 55.) Ithaca, N.Y.: McGill-Queen's University Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 294. Cloth $95.00, paper $39.95.
- FEIEREISEN, FLORENCE, and ALEXANDRA MERLEY HILL, editors. Germany in the Loud Twentieth Century: An Introduction. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 184. $24.95.
- FITZPATRICK, DAVID. "Solitary and Wild": Frederick MacNeice and the Salvation of Ireland. Dublin: Lilliput Press. 2012. Pp. vii, 427. €40.00.
- FORSSBERG, ANNA MARIA, et al., editors. Organizing History: Studies in Honor of Jan Glete. Lund, Sweden: Nordic Academic Press. 2011. Pp. 383.
- FUCHS, ANNE. After the Dresden Bombing: Pathways of Memory, 1945 to the Present. (Palgrave Macmillan Memory Studies.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. xiii, 275. $85.00.
- GARCÍA, ROBERTO VILLA. La República en las urnas: El despertar de la democracia en España. (Estudios.) Madrid: Marcial Pons Historia. 2011. Pp. 530. €28.00.
- GUBERN, ROMÁN, and PAUL HAMMOND. Luis Buñuel: The Red Years, 1929–1939. (Wisconsin Film Studies.) Madison: University of Wisconsin Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 443. Paper $34.95, e-book $19.95.
- HARPER, WILLIAM L. Isaac Newton's Scientific Method: Turning Data into Evidence about Gravity and Cosmology. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xvii, 424. $75.00.
- HESTON, LEONARD L. The Medical Casebook of Adolf Hitler: Final Diagnoses and World War II. Rev. ed. Shelbyville, Ky.: Wasteland Press. 2011. Pp. 160. $14.95.
- HOWELLS, CHRISTINA. Mortal Subjects: Passions of the Soul in Late Twentieth-Century French Thought. Cambridge: Polity Press. 2011. Pp. x, 263. $26.95.
- HUTTUNEN, NIKO. Raamatullinen sota: Raamatun käyttö ja vaikutus vuoden 1918 sisällissodan tulkinnoissa [Biblical War: The Use and Influence of the Bible in Interpretations of the Civil War of 1918]. (Historiallisia Tutkimuksia, number 255; Suomen kirkkohistoriallisen seuran toimituksia, number 216.) Helsinki: Suomen Historiallinen Seura, and Suomen Kirkkohistoriallinen Seura. 2010. Pp. 301. €28.00.
- JALAGIN, SEIJA, OLLI LÖYTTY, and MARKKU SALAKKA, editors. Kaikille kansoille: Lähetystyö kulttuurien vuoropuheluna [To all Peoples: Missionary Work as Cultural Dialogue]. (Historiallinen Arkisto, number 131.) Helsinki: Suomalaisen Kirjallisuuden Seura. 2010. Pp. 368. €28.00.
- KINNUNEN, TIINA, and VILLE KIVIMÄKI, editors. Finland in World War II: History, Memory, Interpretations. (History of Warfare, number 69.) Boston: Brill. 2012. Pp. xix, 576. $243.00.
- KISS, GYÖNGY KOVÁCS, editor. Studies in the History of Early Modern Transylvania. Translated by MATTHEW CAPLES and THOMAS COOPER. (Atlantic Studies on Society in Change, number 140; East European Monographs, number 786.) Highland Lakes, NJ: Atlantic Research and Publications, Inc.. Boulder, Colo.: Social Science Monographs, distributed by Columbia University Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 616. $65.00.
- KLANICZAY, GÁBOR, MICHAEL WERNER, and OTTÓ GECSE, editors. Multiple Antiquities—Multiple Modernities: Ancient Histories in Nineteenth Century European Cultures. Frankfurt a.M.: Campus Verlag. 2011. Pp. 611. €56.00.
- KUZNETS, SIMON. Jewish Economies: Development and Migration in America and Beyond; Volume 1, The Economic Life of American Jewry. Edited by STEPHANIE LO and E. GLEN WEYL. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Publishers. 2012. Pp. lv, 239. $49.95.
- LAMBERT, ANDREW. The Crimean War: British Grand Strategy against Russia, 1853–56. 2d ed. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2011. Pp. xvi, 380. $104.95.
- LANE, MELISSA S., and MARTIN A. RUEHL, editors. A Poet's Reich: Politics and Culture in the George Circle. (Studies in German Literature, Linguistics, and Culture.) Rochester, N.Y.: Camden House. 2011. Pp. x, 349. $75.00.
- LEONTOVITSCH, VICTOR. The History of Liberalism in Russia. Translated by PARMEN LEONTOVITSCH. Foreword by ALEKSANDR SOLZHENITSYN. (Pitt Series in Russian and East European Studies.) Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 374. $55.00.
- LOYA, SHAY. Liszt's Transcultural Modernism and the Hungarian-Gypsy Tradition. (Eastman Studies in Music.) Rochester, N.Y.: University of Rochester Press. 2011. Pp. xviii, 341. $85.00.
- MACCARTHY, FIONA. The Last Pre-Raphaelite: Edward Burne-Jones and the Victorian Imagination. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. xxiv, 629. $35.00.
- MANIAQUE-BENTON, CAROLINE. French Encounters with the American Counterculture 1960–1980. (Ashgate Studies in Architecture.) Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2011. Pp. xxv, 186. $99.95.
- MANSEL, PHILIP, and TORSTEN RIOTTE, editors. Monarchy and Exile: The Politics of Legitimacy from Marie de Médicis to Wilhelm II. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xii, 361. $85.00.
- MCCOOG, THOMAS M., S.J. The Society of Jesus in Ireland, Scotland, and England, 1589–1597: Building the Faith of Saint Peter upon the King of Spain's Monarchy. (Catholic Christendom, 1300–1700.) Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. Rome: Institutum Historicum Societatis Iesu. 2012. Pp. xiv, 467. $134.95.
- MCCORMACK, MATTHEW. The Independent Man: Citizenship and Gender Politics in Georgian England. (Gender in History.) New York: Manchester University Press. 2005. Pp. ix, 222. $89.00.
- MCCRACKEN-FLESHER, CAROLINE. The Doctor Dissected: A Cultural Autopsy of the Burke and Hare Murders. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 272. $65.00.
- MCINTYRE, KENNETH B. Herbert Butterfield: History, Providence, and Skeptical Politics. (Library of Modern Thinkers.) Wilmington: ISI Books. 2011. Pp. xv, 238. $18.00.
- McKALE, DONALD M. Nazis after Hitler: How Perpetrators of the Holocaust Cheated Justice and Truth. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield. 2012. Pp. xxiii, 405. $39.95.
- McKENZIE, PRECIOUS. The Right Sort of Woman: Victorian Travel Writers and the Fitness of an Empire. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 2012. Pp. vi, 150. $52.99.
- MCPHEE, PETER. Robespierre: A Revolutionary Life. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2012. Pp. xx, 299. $40.00.
- MEISEL, JOSEPH S. Knowledge and Power: The Parliamentary Representation of Universities in Britain and the Empire. (Parliamentary History: Texts and Studies, number 4.) Malden, Mass.: Wiley-Blackwell, for The Parliamentary History Yearbook Trust. 2011. Pp. viii, 197. $39.95.
- MEMELSDORFF, FRANZ, and GEORG HELLER. Im KZ: Zwei jüdische Schicksale 1938/1945. Foreword by ANGELIKA BENZ.

- (Lebensbilder: Jüdische Erinnerungen und Zeugnisse; Die Zeit des Nationalsozialismus.) Frankfurt a.M.: Fischer Taschenbuch Verlag. 2012. Pp. 158. €9.99.
- MERCATANTE, STEVEN D. Why Germany Nearly Won: A New History of the Second World War in Europe. (War, Technology, and History.) Santa Barbara, Calif.: Praeger. 2012. Pp. xviii, 408. $58.00.
- MERLO, GRADO GIOVANNI. Giovanni Miccoli: Elogio della ricerca storica. (Il pellicano rosso nuova serie, number 145.) Brescia: Morcelliana. 2011. Pp. 125. €12.00.
- MONTER, WILLIAM. The Rise of Female Kings in Europe, 1300–1800. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2012. Pp. xviii, 271. $38.00.
- MUCHEMBLED, ROBERT. A History of Violence. Translated by JEAN BIRRELL. Cambridge: Polity Press. 2012. Pp. vi, 377. $29.95.
- OHNEZEIT, MAIK. Zwischen "schärfster Opposition" und dem "Willen zur Macht": Die Deutschnationalen Volkspartei (DNVP) in der Weimarer Republik 1918–1928. (Beiträge zur Geschichte des Parlamentarismus und der politischen Parteien, number 158.) Dusseldorf: Droste Verlag. 2011. Pp. 490. €62.00.
- PARKER, DANNY S. Fatal Crossroads: The Untold Story of the Malmédy Massacre at the Battle of the Bulge. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 390. $26.00.
- PASSMORE, LEITH. Ulrike Meinhof and the Red Army Faction: Performing Terrorism. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xii, 212. $85.00.
- PILKE, HELENA. Julkaiseminen Kielletty: Rintamakirjeenvaihtajat ja päämajan sensuuri 1941–1944 [Publication Forbidden: Correspondents at the Front and Military Censorship 1941–1944]. (Historiallisia tutkimuksia, number 257.) Helsinki: Suomalaisen Kirjallisuuden Seura. 2011. Pp. 304. €38.00.
- PONSO, MARZIA. Una storia particolare: "Sonderweg" tedesco e identità europea. (Annali dell'Istituto storico italo-germanico in Trento; Monografie, number 59.) Bologna: Il Mulino. 2011. Pp. 600. €38.00.
- PULKKINEN, TUIJA, and ANTU SORAINEN, editors. Siveellisydestä seksuaalisuuteen: Poliittisen käsitteen historia [From Morality to Sexuality: The History of a Political Concept]. (Historiallinen Arkisto, number 133.) Helsinki: Suomalaisen Kirjallisuuden Seura. 2011. Pp. 312. €29.00.
- QUAGLIONI, DIEGO, and GERHARD DILCHER, editors. Gli inizi del diritto pubblico, 3: Verso la costruzione del diritto pubblico tra medioevo e modernità/Die Anfänge des öffentlichen Rechts, 3: Auf dem Wege zur Etablierung des öffentlichen Rechts zwischen Mittelalter und Moderne. (Annali dell'Istituto storico italo-germanico in Trento/Jahrbuch des italienisch-deutschen historischen Instituts in Trient, number 25.) Berlin: Duncker und Humblot. Bologna: Il Mulino. 2011. Pp. 858. €53.00.
- RICHARDSON, R. C. Receptions and Re-Visitations: Review Articles, 1978–2011. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 2011. Pp. viii, 150. $52.99.
- ROUNDING, VIRGINIA. Alix and Nicky: The Passion of the Last Tsar and Tsarina. New York: St. Martin's Press. 2012. Pp. xxv, 368. $29.99.
- SANDERS, ANDREW. Inside the IRA: Dissident Republicans and the War for Legitimacy. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press. 2011. Pp. vii, 280. $105.00.
- STANTON, KAMILLE STONE, and JULIE A. CHAPPELL, editors. Transatlantic Literature of the Long Eighteenth Century. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 2011. Pp. xvii, 92. $52.99.
- SZARKA, LÁSZLÓ, editor. A Multiethnic Region and Nation-State in East-Central Europe: Studies in the History of Upper Hungary and Slovakia from the 1600s to the Present. (Atlantic Studies on Society in Change, number 141; East European Monographs, number 787.) Highland Lakes, NJ: Atlantic Research and Publications, Inc. Budapest: Balassi Institute. Boulder, Colo.: Social Science Monographs, distributed by Columbia University Press. 2011. Pp. vii, 520. $65.00.
- TONEZZER, ELENA. Il corpo, il confine, la patria: Associazionismo sportivo in Trentino (1870–1914). (Annali dell'Istituto storico italo-germanico in Trento; Monografie, number 60.) Bologna: Il Mulino. 2011. Pp. 330. €26.00.
- VILJANEN, VALTTERI. Spinoza's Geometry of Power. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 194. $90.00.
- VOLKOV, SHULAMIT. Walther Rathenau: Weimar's Fallen Statesman. (Jewish Lives.) New Haven: Yale University Press. 2012. Pp. ix, 240. $25.00.
- WADDINGTON, KEIR. An Introduction to the Social History of Medicine: Europe since 1500. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xiii, 394. $29.00.
- WESTBERG, JOHANNES, editor. Förskolans aktörer: Stat, kår och individ I förskolans historia [Preschool Actors: State, Staff and Individuals in Preschool History]. (Opuscula Historica Upsaliensia, number 44.) Uppsala: Swedish Science Press. 2011. Pp. 243.
- WÜRLER, ANDREAS, editor. Grenzen des Zumutbaren: Erfahrungen mit der französischen Okkupation und der Helvetischen Republik (1798–1803). Basel: Schwabe Verlag. 2011. Pp. 123. €18.50.

MIDDLE EAST AND NORTHERN AFRICA

- BAHRANI, ZAINAB, ZEYNEP ÇELİK, and EDHEM ELDEM, editors. Scramble for the Past: A Story of Archaeology in the Ottoman Empire, 1753–1914. Istanbul: SALT. 2011. Pp. 519. €49.00.
- BIRDAL, MEHMET SINAN. The Holy Roman Empire and the Ottomans: From Global Imperial Power to Absolutist State. New York: I. B. Tauris. 2011. Pp. xii, 211. £51.50.
- BOLUKBASI, SUHA. Azerbaijan: A Political History. New York: I. B. Tauris. 2011. Pp. xvi, 292. £56.50.
- BRENNER, MICHAEL. Zionism: A Brief History. Translated by SHELLEY L. FRISCH. 2d ed. Princeton, N.J.: Markus Wiener. 2011. Pp. xii, 211. Cloth $68.95, paper $26.95.
- DADRIAN, VAHAKN N., and TANER AKÇAM, editors. Judgment at Istanbul: The Armenian Genocide Trials. New York: Berghahn Books. 2011. Pp. xii, 363. $110.00.
- EVANS, MARTIN. Algeria: France's Undeclared War. (The Making of the Modern World.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xxxv, 457. $35.00.
- HOFMANN, TESSA, BJØRNLUND MATTHIAS, and VASILEIOS MEICHANETSIDIS, editors. The Genocide of the Ottoman Greeks: Studies on the State-Sponsored Campaign of Extermination of the Christians of Asia Minor, 1912–1922 and Its Aftermath: History, Law, Memory. New York: Aristide D. Caratzas. 2011. Pp. xii, 508. $75.00.
- KERMANI, NAVID. The Terror of God: Attar, Job and the Metaphysical Revolt. Translated by WIELAND HOBAN. Cambridge: Polity Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 266. $26.95.
- LYONS, JONATHAN. Islam through Western Eyes: From the Crusades to the War on Terrorism. New York: Columbia University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 260. Cloth $32.50, e-book $25.99.
- SHAVITSKY, ZIVA. The Mystery of the Ten Lost Tribes: A Critical Survey of Historical and Archaeological Records Relating to the People of Israel in Exile in Syria, Mesopotamia and Persia up to ca. 300 BCE. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 2012. Pp. xii, 238. $59.99.
- SULEIMAN, CAMELIA. Language and Identity in the Israel-Palestine Conflict: The Politics of Self-Perception in the Middle East. New York: I. B. Tauris. 2011. Pp. viii, 237. £56.50.

SUB-SAHARAN AFRICA

- ADHIKARI, MOHAMED. The Anatomy of a South African Genocide: The Extermination of the Cape San Peoples. Athens, Ohio: Ohio University Press. 2011. Pp. 120. $16.95.

- AMOAH, MICHAEL. Nationalism, Globalization, and Africa. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xi, 272. $90.00.
- JOHNSON, DAVID. Imagining the Cape Colony: History, Literature, and South African Nation. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 222. $105.00.
- PEEK, PHILIP M., editor. Twins in Africa and Diaspora Cultures: Double Trouble, Twice Blessed. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2011. Pp. vi, 366. Cloth $80.00, paper $27.95.
- ROSS, RICHARD, ANNE KELK MAGER, and BILL NASSON, editors. The Cambridge History of South Africa: Volume Two: 1885–1994. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 724. $165.00.
- SHILLINGTON, KEVIN. Luka Jantjie: Resistance Hero of the South African Frontier. London: Aldridge Press. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. Johannesburg: Wits University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 306. $85.00.
- WAUGH, COLIN M. Charles Taylor and Liberia: Ambition and Atrocity in Africa's Lone Star State. New York: Zed Books. 2011. Pp. x, 374. Cloth $116.95, paper $29.95.
- WEIGERT, STEPHEN L. Angola: A Modern Military History, 1961–2002. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. 272. $85.00.

Communications

A letter to the editor will be considered only if it relates to an article or review published in this journal; publication is solely at the editors' discretion. The AHA disclaims responsibility for statements, of either fact or opinion, made by the writers. Letters should not exceed 1,000 words. They can be submitted by e-mail to ahr@indiana.edu, or by the postal service to Editor, American Historical Review, 914 E. Atwater Ave., Bloomington, IN 47401. For detailed information on the policies for this section, see <http://www.americanhistoricalreview.org>.

REVIEWS

TO THE EDITORS:

In his reply to my response, Eric Ehrenreich reiterates his original contention that I ignored evidence in my book, The Nazi Symbiosis: Human Genetics and Politics in the Third Reich, that von Verschuer willfully pursued a "pseudoscientific" agenda in the field of racial science. Moreover, Ehrenreich contends that my decision not to discuss Verschuer's abject failure of methodological rigor in his publications dealing with racial biology of the Jews "does not make for compelling scholarship." Were this claim true, then it would be a damning indictment indeed.

Because of the severity of his critique, I would like to offer the assessment of another scholar on this issue. In the bibliography of Ehrenreich's own book, The Nazi Ancestral Proof: Genealogy, Racial Science, and the Final Solution (Bloomington, Ind., 2007), he cites Alan E. Steinweis's highly acclaimed work Studying the Jew: Scholarly Antisemitism in Nazi Germany (Cambridge, Mass., 2006). Steinweis's volume, unlike mine, is specifically dedicated to a discussion of science and the "Jewish question" in the Third Reich and devotes several pages to an analysis of von Verschuer's pronouncements at the notorious 1937 and 1938 conferences sponsored by the Jewish Research Department of the Institute for History of the New Germany. Steinweis observes that in both talks von Verschuer "took stock of the then current state of biological knowledge about the Jews, and outlined an agenda for future scientific research employing cutting-edge methods" (p. 50). In contrast to the position Ehrenreich intimates in his review, Steinweis's statement suggests that there was no commonly agreed-upon scientific methodology for studying the racial biology of the Jews in the 1930s. Moreover, Steinweis points out that in his 1938 lecture, von Verschuer focused on medical pathology, using disease patterns within disparate populations. As both Steinweis and Veronika Lipphardt's book Biologie der Juden: Jüdische Wissenschaftler über "Rasse" und Vererbung, 1900–1935 (Göttingen, 2008) demonstrate, many of these studies on Jewish biology had already been undertaken by Jewish scholars. Indeed, several of the studies Verschuer cites come from Jewish sources. These investigations were serious works of scholarship which, as Steinweis makes clear, were subsequently appropriated into a Nazi "antisemitic framework."

In the context of the back-and-forth discussion between me and Ehrenreich on the question of "pseudoscience," one can, I believe, profit from Steinweis's important insight: "Historians of science have sometimes distinguished between the serious 'scientific' work and the 'pseudoscientific' activities conducted by Verschuer, Fischer, Lenz, and similar figures who were active in the Nazi era . . . Lectures and articles about the racial origins of the Jews, in this typology, constituted pseudoscience, but did not necessarily negate the legitimacy of the genuine science conducted concurrently by the same scholars. The distinction between science and pseudoscience is a reasonable one, but it did not exist in the minds of those scientists at the time. In his lectures in 1937 and 1938, when Verschuer emphasized to his audience the desirability of making the study of the Jewish question more scientific, it is unlikely that he imagined to himself that he was engaging in or promoting pseudoscience" (p. 52, my emphasis). Although Steinweis's assessment is not specifically directed to Ehrenreich, I find it a perfect rejoinder to this obsession with labeling von Verschuer's work on race "pseudoscience."

As Ehrenreich himself admits, von Verschuer's research was not devoted to racial biology. Upon receiving a position as the division director for human heredity at the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute for Anthropology, Human Heredity, and Eugenics (KWIA) the year it opened, von Verschuer's longstanding völkisch outlook took a back seat to his significant research in applying twin studies to the field we would today call medical genetics. Adolf von Harnack, a renowned liberal Protestant theologian and the first president of the internationally celebrated Kaiser Wilhelm Society, certainly did not view von Verschuer's mentor at the KWIA—the racial anthropologist Eugen Fischer—as engaging in “pseudoscience” when he appointed him director of the new research institute in 1927. Nor did he suspect von Verschuer of doing so.

In February 1933, Fischer was denounced for a speech where he appeared not to toe the party line on the “Jewish question.” There is little doubt that both Fischer and his protégé were antisemitic. Their prejudices notwithstanding, there is no evidence that they were eager to offer obvious unscientific pronouncements on the “Jewish question” during the Third Reich—if for no other reason than it would harm their reputation among members of the international scientific community. This becomes clear from the following example: having received an invitation to speak at the 1938 antisemitic conference, in a letter von Verschuer persuaded Fischer to join him so that together they could place the “Jewish question” on a more “rational” scientific footing—one resulting in a “calmer view of the topic.” I sincerely doubt that von Verschuer would have written these private words to his mentor had he wished to willfully promote “pseudoscience.”

To be sure, it would have been laudable had von Verschuer refused to give any such talk. But even under circumstances that are far more congenial than those existing under a totalitarian society, people often receive and accept invitations they do not seek. Von Verschuer was not courageous, and he was certainly no resister to the Nazi regime. In order to promote his research in medical genetics, he, like Fischer, tried to negotiate a way through the labyrinth that was the Third Reich without compromising his scientific standing or angering party racial fanatics.

One of the main aims of my book—a volume, by the way, primarily designed for the layperson, not the specialist—is to demonstrate that history, even the history of human genetics in the Third Reich, should not be viewed in black-and-white terms. By seeking to force a sharp demarcation between the production of so-called good science and “pseudoscience” under the swastika, I believe Ehrenreich does a serious disservice to the complexity of this tragic episode in the twentieth century.

SHEILA FAITH WEISS
Clarkson University

ERIC EHRENREICH RESPONDS:

In her response to my reply, Sheila Weiss looks to a book by Alan Steinweis to defend the lack of analysis in her own book regarding the scientific rigor of Verschuer's “racial scientific” pronouncements on the Jews. In 2006, I reviewed the very book on which she relies. And in that review, I took issue with the exact quote that Weiss asserts in her own defense, for much the same reason that I critique Weiss's work. For the sake of efficiency, I simply quote the relevant part of my earlier review here:

Steinweis . . . seems to argue . . . that many of the scholars were simply unaware of the illogic inherent in their assertions about Jews. Indeed, with regard to the “hard scientists” (geneticists, physical anthropologists, and the like), Steinweis claims that a “distinction between science and pseudoscience did not exist in the minds of those scientists at the time” (pp. 52–53). In other words, they could not comprehend that they were spreading ideas that today would be considered “pseudo-scientific.” This assertion is difficult to believe.

Germany in the first third of the twentieth century was home to scientists of the caliber of Albert Einstein (who published his paper on the special theory of relativity in 1905). By 1933, Germans had received more Nobel prizes in science, including the life sciences, than members of any other nationality. Moreover, the life scientists in particular must have been aware of the growing number of (non-German) scholars in the 1930s who disputed the claim that science had “proven” the link between “race” and culture, the key assumption underlying the assertion that Jews constituted a hereditary threat to Germans.[footnote omitted] Were scientists of this caliber really incapable of judging the credibility of a “scientific theory” based on the nature of the data used to support it and its internal logic? It is possible. But because Steinweis does not take into consideration the sophistication of scientific practice in Germany in the first third of the twentieth century, it is hard to buy this assertion without further discussion.

Contrary to Weiss's claim, I am not trying to “force a sharp demarcation between the production of so-called good science and ‘psuedoscience’ under the swastika.” Rather, I am trying to force a sharper analysis of what German life scientists actually did under the swastika. There is no dispute that during the Third Reich the scientists in question claimed that their activities aimed at identifying “racial Jews” complied with proper scientific methodology as then widely understood. My critique of Weiss's book is that it (like Steinweis's book) seems to take these scientists at their word, rather than analyzing what they actually did.

ERIC EHRENREICH
Washington, D.C.

Index to American Historical Review, April 2012

The titles of articles in the AHR are enclosed in quotation marks, and titles of books reviewed are printed in italics. Books of collected essays are designated by (E). The reviewer of a book or film is designated by (R), the author of a letter for the Communications section by (C).

- A. Philip Randolph and the Struggle for Civil Rights*, by Bynum, 548
Adams, Luther, Way Up North in Louisville: African American Migration in the Urban South, 1930–1970, 549
After Moctezuma, by Connell, 575
The Agony of Greek Jews, 1940–1945, by Bowman, 636
Airborne Dreams, by Yano, 555
Alden, Jane, Songs, Scribes, and Society: The History and Reception of the Loire Valley Chansonniers, 591
Alexander, Amir (R), 594
Ali, Omar H. (R), 540
Allen, James Smith (R), 616
Alonso, Paula, Jardines Secretos, Legitimaciones Públicas: El Partido Autonomista Nacional y la política argentina de fines del siglo diecinueve, 581
Alonso, Paula (R), 582
Ames, Eric, Carl Hagenbeck's Empire of Entertainments, 478
Amin, Julius A. (R), 559
Anderson, J. L. (R), 557
Andrade, Tonio, Lost Colony: The Untold Story of China's First Great Victory over the West, 499
Andrew, Rod, Jr. (R), 530
Angels of Mercy, by Seraile, 534
Aron, Cindy S. (R), 543
Arrowsmith, Rupert Richard, Modernism and the Museum: Asian, African, and Pacific Art and the London Avant-Garde, 609
The Assassination of Hole in the Day, by Treuer, 516
Atkins, E. Taylor, Primitive Selves: Koreana in the Japanese Colonial Gaze, 1910–1945, 505
Ax, Christina Folke, et al., editors, Cultivating the Colonies: Colonial States and Their Environmental Legacies (E), 645
- Badel, Laurence, Diplomatie et grands contrats: L'état français et les marchés extérieurs au XX^e siècle, 618
Banks, Stephen, A Polite Exchange of Bullets: The Duel and the English Gentleman, 1750–1850, 603
Baranowski, Shelley, Nazi Empire: German Colonialism and Imperialism from Bismarck to Hitler, 625
Barlow, Tani (R), 502
Barnes, Donna A., The Louisiana Populist Movement, 1881–1900, 540
Barnes, L. Diane, Brian Schoen, and Frank Towers, editors, The Old South's Modern Worlds: Slavery, Region, and Nation in the Age of Progress, 527
Barringer, Tim (R), 609
Baugh, Daniel (R), 603
Becoming Americans in Paris, by Blower, 494
Becoming Metropolitan, by Wood, 633
Before the Revolution, by Richter, 513
Behnken, Brian D., Fighting Their Own Battles: Mexican Americans, African Americans, and the Struggle for Civil Rights in Texas, 546
Bellfy, Phil, Three Fires Unity: The Anishnaabeg of the Lake Huron Borderlands, 516
Belonging and Genocide, by Kühne, 626
Belting, Hans, Florence and Baghdad: Renaissance Art and Arab Science, 486
Ben-Amos, Ilana Krausman (R), 596
Bencivenni, Marcella, Italian Immigrant Radical Culture: The Idealism of the Sovversivi in the United States, 1890–1940, 537
Berman, Sheri (R), 598
Bessler, John D. (R), 567
Bissell, William Cunningham, Urban Design, Chaos, and Colonial Power in Zanzibar, 642
Black Yanks in the Pacific, by Green, 550
Black, Jeremy, The Great War and the Making of the Modern World, 493
Black, Monica, Death in Berlin: From Weimar to Divided Germany, 625
Blobaum, Robert (R), 633
Blood in the Hills, edited by Stewart (E), 646
Blower, Brooke L., Becoming Americans in Paris: Transatlantic Politics and Culture between the World Wars, 494
Body by Weimar, by Jensen, 623
Boehm, Lisa Krissoff (R), 549
Bohstedt, John, The Politics of Provisions: Food Riots, Moral Economy, and Market Transition in England, c. 1550–1850, 602
Bolyanatz, Alexander H. (R), 510
Bombay Islam, by Green, 508
Books as Weapons, by Hench, 495
Border Dilemmas, by Mora, 545
Boris, Eileen (R), 512
Bose, Sugata, His Majesty's Opponent: Subhas Chandra Bose and India's Struggle against Empire, 509
Bosworth, R. J. B., Whispering City: Modern Rome and Its Histories, 620
Bourdin, Bernard, The Theological-Political Origins of the Modern State: The Controversy between James I of England and Cardinal Bellarmine, 595

- Bourke, Joanna (R), 512
 Bouton, Cynthia A., Interpreting Social Violence in French Culture: Buzançais, 1847–2008, 617
 Bowman, Steven B., The Agony of Greek Jews, 1940–1945, 636
 Bradley, Stefan M., Harlem vs. Columbia University: Black Student Power in the Late 1960s, 560
 Branner, David Prager, and Li Feng, editors, Writing and Literacy in Early China: Studies from the Columbia Early China Seminar (E), 646
 Bridenthal, Renate (R), 492
 Brooks, Jennifer E. (R), 549
 Broomhall, Susan, and Jacqueline Van Gent, editors, Governing Masculinities in the Early Modern Period: Regulating Selves and Others (E), 647
 Brown, D. Clayton, King Cotton in Modern America: A Cultural, Political, and Economic History since 1945, 551
 Brown, Philip C., Cultivating Commons: Joint Ownership of Arable Land in Early Modern Japan, 503
 Browning, Christopher R. (R), 627
 Brückner, Martin, editor, Early American Cartographies (E), 645
 Bruggeman, Seth C. (R), 568
 Brusino, Thomas, A Nation Forged in War: How World War II Taught Americans to Get Along, 549
 Bullock, Mary Brown, The Oil Prince's Legacy: Rockefeller Philanthropy in China, 500
 Buschmann, Rainer F. (R), 478
 Bushnell, John (R), 639
 Butler, Matthew (R), 578
 Bynum, Cornelius L., A. Philip Randolph and the Struggle for Civil Rights, 548
 Byrne, Joseph P. (R), 592
- Calhoun, Charles W. (R), 539
 Callahan, Kevin J., Demonstration Culture: European Socialism and the Second International, 1889–1914, 598
Capitalism Takes Command, edited by Zakim and Kornblith (E), 646
 Caprio, Mark E. (R), 505
Captives and Corsairs, by Weiss, 613
Carl Hagenbeck's Empire of Entertainments, by Ames, 478
 Carlisle, Linda V., Elizabeth Packard: A Noble Fight, 533
 Carlson, Keith Thor, The Power of Place, the Problem of Time: Aboriginal Identity and Historical Consciousness in the Cauldron of Colonialism, 514
 Caron, Simone M. (R), 573
 Carp, Benjamin L. (R), 520
 Carton, Benedict (R), 643
 Champion, Craige B. (R), 584
Changing Places, by Murdock, 631
 Chazkel, Amy, Laws of Chance: Brazil's Clandestine Lottery and the Making of Urban Public Life, 581
 "The Children of the Desert and the Laws of the Sea," by Frank, 410
 Choo, Christine (R), 491
Civic Engagement in Postwar Japan, by Kage, 506
 Claeys, Gregory (R), 521
The Clamorgans, by Winch, 525
 Clancy-Smith, Julia A., Mediterraneans: North Africa and Europe in an Age of Migration, c. 1800–1900, 476
- Clarke, Frances M., War Stories: Suffering and Sacrifice in the Civil War North, 529
 Clayson, William (R), 562
Clothed in Robes of Sovereignty, by Irvin, 520
 Cobb, Daniel M. (R), 569
 Coclanis, Peter A. (R), 551
 Cole, Peter (R), 535
Common Sense, by Rosenfeld, 488
 "Commons and Enclosure in the Colonization of North America," by Greer, 365
Communities of Devotion, edited by Crăciun and Fulton, 631
Company of Kinsmen, by Roy, 507
 Connell, William F., After Moctezuma: Indigenous Politics and Self-Government in Mexico City, 1524–1730, 575
Constructing Affirmative Action, by Golland, 558
Continental Divide, by Gordon, 598
The Contours of America's Cold War, by Farish, 553
 Coolidge, Grace E., Guardianship, Gender, and the Nobility in Early Modern Spain, 611
 Coon, Lynda L., Dark Age Bodies: Gender and Monastic Practice in the Early Medieval West, 586
 Cooper, Gail (R), 555
 Coppa, Frank J. (R), 600
Cornelia James Cannon and the Future American Race, by Diedrich, 535
The Cost of Living in America, by Stapleford, 565
 Cotlar, Seth, Tom Paine's America: The Rise and Fall of Transatlantic Radicalism in the Early Republic, 521
 Cotlar, Seth (R), 488
 Cowie, Jefferson, Stayin' Alive: The 1970s and the Last Days of the Working Class, 563
 Crăciun, Maria, and Elaine Fulton, editors, Communities of Devotion: Religious Orders and Society in East Central Europe, 1450–1800, 631
 Crawford, Katherine (R), 614
Crime and Punishment in Istanbul, 1700–1800, by Zarinebaf, 640
 Crook, Tom, Rebecca Gill, and Bertrand Taithe, editors, Evil, Barbarism and Empire: Britain and Abroad, c. 1830–2000 (E), 647
Crusade, Heresy and Inquisition in the Lands of the Crown of Aragon (c. 1167–1276), by Smith, 588
Cuban Sugar Industry, by Curry-Machado, 574
Cultivating Commons, by Brown, 503
Cultivating the Colonies, edited by Christina Folke Ax et al. (E), 645
Culture and Liberty in the Age of the American Revolution, by Rozbicki, 519 Cultures of War, by Dower, 480
 Culver, William W. (R), 583
 Curry-Machado, Jonathan, Cuban Sugar Industry: Transnational Networks and Engineering Migrants in Mid-Nineteenth Century Cuba, 574
 Cutcliffe, Stephen H. (R), 483
- Dabel, Jane E. (R), 534
Dairy Queens, by Martin, 614
Daniel O'Connell and the Anti-Slavery Movement, by Kinealy, 605
Dark Age Bodies, by Coon, 586
 Davis, Jack E. (R), 542
 de Jong, Mayke (R), 586
Death in Berlin, by Black, 625

- Debtor Nation*, by Hyman, 566
Defending Hypatia, by Goulding, 594
 Delanty, Gerard (R), 484
A Democracy of Facts, by Lewis, 524
Demonstration Culture, by Callahan, 598
Developmental Fairy Tales, by Jones, 501
 Diamond, Andrew J. (R), 560
 Diedrich, Maria I., Cornelia James Cannon and the Future American Race, 535
 Diekmann, Christoph (R), 625
 Dinan, John (R), 541
Diplomatie et grands contrats, by Badel, 618
Discerning Characters, by Lukasik, 522
The Door of Hope, by Frantz, 539
 Dormady, Jason, Primitive Revolution: Restorationist Religion and the Idea of the Mexican Revolution, 1940–1968, 578
 Doss, Erika, Memorial Mania: Public Feeling in America, 568
 Dowden-White, Priscilla A., Groping toward Democracy: African American Social Welfare Reform in St. Louis, 1910–1949, 547
 Dower, John W., Cultures of War: Pearl Harbor/Hiroshima/9-11/Iraq, 480
 Downs, Gregory P., “The Mexicanization of American Politics: The United States’ Transnational Path from Civil War to Stabilization,” 387
 Dubow, Sara, Ourselves Unborn: A History of the Fetus in Modern America, 573
- Earenfight, Theresa (R), 611
Early American Cartographies, edited by Brückner (E), 645
The East German State and the Catholic Church, 1945–1989, by Schaefer, 629
 Edgerton, Samuel Y. (R), 486
 Ehrenreich, Eric (C), 662
Elizabeth Packard, by Carlisle, 533
 Ely, Christopher (R), 636
The Emergence of Jewish Ghettos during the Holocaust, by Michman, 627
The Empire’s New Clothes, by Ruane, 636
The End of Byzantium, by Harris, 593
Enduring Battle, by Hamner, 512
Entangling Alliances, by Zeiger, 555
 Ermakoff, Ivan, Ruling Oneself Out: A Theory of Collective Abdications, 601
 Esposito, Matthew D., Funerals, Festivals, and Cultural Politics in Porfirian Mexico, 577
Ethical Imperialism, by Schrag, 484
Evil, Barbarism and Empire, edited by Crook, Gill, and Taithe (E), 647 Evolutionary History, by Russell, 483
- Faires, Nora, and Dirk Hoerder, editors, Migrants and Migration in Modern North America: Cross-Border Lives, Labor Markets, and Politics (E), 645
 Falasca-Zamponi, Simonetta (R), 620
 Farber, David (R), 563
 Farish, Matthew, The Contours of America’s Cold War, 553
The Feminist Promise, by Stansell, 512
 Feng, Li, and David Prager Branner, editors, Writing and Literacy in Early China: Studies from the Columbia Early China Seminar (E), 646
 Ferguson, Priscilla Parkhurst (R), 543
Fighting Their Own Battles, by Behnken, 546
 Flake, Kathleen (R), 572
Florence and Baghdad, by Belting, 486
The Fog of War, edited by Kruse and Tuck (E), 646
 Follett, Richard (R), 527
Food and Fantasy in Early Modern Japan, by Rath, 503
 Foote, David (R), 588
Forty Miles from the Sea, by Moore, 576
The Foundations of British Maritime Ascendancy, by Morriss, 603
 Frank, Alison, “The Children of the Desert and the Laws of the Sea: Austria, Great Britain, the Ottoman Empire, and the Mediterranean Slave Trade in the Nineteenth Century,” 410
 Frantz, Edward O., The Door of Hope: Republican Presidents and the First Southern Strategy, 1877–1933, 539
 Frisken, Amanda (R), 538
 Frobert, Ludovic (R), 617
From Africa to Brazil, by Hawthorne, 487
From Deficit to Deluge, edited by Kaiser and Kley, 615
 Frost, Dennis J., Seeing Stars: Sports Celebrity, Identity, and Body Culture in Modern Japan, 504
 Frost, Jennifer, Hedda Hopper’s Hollywood: Celebrity Gossip and American Conservatism, 554
 Fudeman, Kirsten A., Vernacular Voices: Language and Identity in Medieval French Jewish Communities, 590
 Fulton, Elaine, and Maria Crăciun, editors, Communities of Devotion: Religious Orders and Society in East Central Europe, 1450–1800, 631
Funerals, Festivals, and Cultural Politics in Porfirian Mexico, by Esposito, 577
The Furnace of Affliction, by Graber, 525
- Gandhi in the West*, by Scalmer, 495
 Garland, David, Peculiar Institution: America’s Death Penalty in an Age of Abolition, 567
 Garrard-Burnett, Virginia, Terror in the Land of the Holy Spirit: Guatemala under General Efraín Ríos Montt, 1982–1983, 579
 Garrioch, David (R), 615
 Gellman, David N. (R), 519
Gender and Activism in a Little Magazine, by Schreiber, 538
 George, Timothy S. (R), 506
German City, Jewish Memory, by Roemer, 628
Ghosts of Home, by Hirsch and Spitzer, 635
 Gienow-Hecht, Jessica C. E., Sound Diplomacy: Music and Emotions in Transatlantic Relations, 1850–1920, 492
 Gill, Rebecca, Tom Crook, and Bertrand Taithe, editors, Evil, Barbarism and Empire: Britain and Abroad, c. 1830–2000 (E), 647
 Gilley, Brian (R), 571
 Gilmartin, David (R), 508
 Givens, Bryan, Judging Maria de Macedo: A Female Visionary and the Inquisition in Early Modern Portugal, 612
 Glover, Lorri (R), 525
 Golland, David Hamilton, Constructing Affirmative Action: The Struggle for Equal Employment Opportunity, 558

- Gordon, Peter E., Continental Divide: Heidegger, Cassirer, Davos, 598
- Goulding, Robert, Defending Hypatia: Ramus, Savile, and the Renaissance Rediscovery of Mathematical History, 594
- Governing Masculinities in the Early Modern Period*, edited by Broomhall and Van Gent (E), 647
- Graber, Jennifer, The Furnace of Affliction: Prisons and Religion in Antebellum America, 525
- The Great War and the Making of the Modern World*, by Black, 493
- Green, Michael Cullen, Black Yanks in the Pacific: Race in the Making of American Military Empire after World War II, 550
- Green, Nile, Bombay Islam: The Religious Economy of the West Indian Ocean, 1840–1915, 508
- Greer, Allan, “Commons and Enclosure in the Colonization of North America,” 365
- Gregor, Neil (R), 625
- Gronim, Sara S. (R), 524
- Groping toward Democracy*, by Dowden-White, 547
- Grubbs, Larry, Secular Missionaries: Americans and African Development in the 1960s, 559
- Gruen, Erich S., Rethinking the Other in Antiquity, 584
- Guardianship, Gender, and the Nobility in Early Modern Spain*, by Coolidge, 611
- Guarisco, Claudia (R), 575
- Haines, John (R), 591
- Haley, Andrew P., Turning the Tables: Restaurants and the Rise of the American Middle Class, 1880–1920, 543
- Hall, David D., A Reforming People: Puritanism and the Transformation of Public Life in New England, 517
- Hamilton, C. I., The Making of the Modern Admiralty: British Naval Policy-Making, 1805–1927, 605
- Hamilton, Louis I., A Sacred City: Consecrating Churches and Reforming Society in Eleventh-Century Italy, 588
- Hamner, Christopher H., Enduring Battle: American Soldiers in Three Wars, 1776–1945, 512
- Hanley, Mark Y. (R), 525
- Hardiman, David (R), 495
- Harison, Casey (R), 597
- Harlem vs. Columbia University*, by Bradley, 560
- Harmon, Alexandra (R), 514
- Harrington, Joel F., The Unwanted Child: The Fate of Foundlings, Orphans, and Juvenile Criminals in Early Modern Germany, 621
- Harris, Bernard (R), 607
- Harris, Jonathan, The End of Byzantium, 593
- Harris, Victoria (R), 623
- Hau, Michael (R), 630
- Haulman, Kate (R), 522
- Haumann, Sebastian, “Schade, daß Beton nicht brennt . . .”: Planung, Partizipation und Protest in Philadelphia und Köln 1940–1990, 497
- Haumann, Sebastian (R), 496
- Hauptman, Laurence M. (R), 515
- Hawthorne, Walter, From Africa to Brazil: Culture, Identity, and an Atlantic Slave Trade, 1600–1830, 487
- Healey, Mark A., The Ruins of the New Argentina: Peronism and the Remaking of San Juan after the 1944 Earthquake, 582
- Hedda Hopper's Hollywood*, by Frost, 554
- Hench, John B., Books as Weapons: Propaganda, Publishing, and the Battle for Global Markets in the Era of World War II, 495
- Hersey, Mark D., My Work Is That of Conservation: An Environmental Biography of George Washington Carver, 542
- Hirsch, Marianne, and Leo Spitzer, Ghosts of Home: The Afterlife of Czernowitz in Jewish Memory, 635
- His Majesty's Opponent*, by Bose, 509
- Hoerder, Dirk, and Nora Faires, editors, Migrants and Migration in Modern North America: Cross-Border Lives, Labor Markets, and Politics (E), 645
- Hoffnung-Garskof, Jesse, A Tale of Two Cities: Santo Domingo and New York after 1950, 498
- Howell, David L. (R), 503
- Hyman, Louis, Debtor Nation: The History of America in Red Ink, 566
- Ibson, John (R), 556
- Ideology and Foreign Policy in Early Modern Europe (1650–1750)*, edited by Onnekink and Rommelse (E), 647
- Imperial Entanglements*, by MacLeitch, 515
- In the Shadow of Sectarianism*, by Weiss, 641
- Infectious Ideas*, by Stearns, 592
- Interpreting Social Violence in French Culture*, by Bouton, 617
- Investigating the Supernatural*, by Lachapelle, 618
- The Invisible War*, by Tavárez, 576
- Irvin, Benjamin H., Clothed in Robes of Sovereignty: The Continental Congress and the People Out of Doors, 520
- Islanders*, by Thomas, 510
- Italian Immigrant Radical Culture*, by Bencivenni, 537
- Jacobs, Margaret D., White Mother to a Dark Race: Settler Colonialism, Maternalism, and the Removal of Indigenous Children in the American West and Australia, 1880–1940, 491
- Jaffary, Nora E. (R), 576
- Jardines Secretos, Legitimaciones Públicas*, by Alonso, 581
- Jefferson, Robert F., Jr. (R), 550
- Jensen, Eric N., Body by Weimar: Athletes, Gender, and German Modernity, 623
- Jones, Andrew F., Developmental Fairy Tales: Evolutionary Thinking and Modern Chinese Culture, 501
- Judging Maria de Macedo*, by Givens, 612
- Kagay, Donald J. (R), 589
- Kage, Rieko, Civic Engagement in Postwar Japan: The Revival of a Defeated Society, 506
- Kaiser, Thomas E., and Dale K. Van Kley, editors, From Deficit to Deluge: The Origins of the French Revolution, 615
- Kanarfogel, Ephraim (R), 590
- Karl, Rebecca E. (R), 501
- Kastor, Peter J., William Clark's World: Describing America in the Age of Unknowns, 523
- Khuri-Makdisi, Ilham (R), 476
- Kinealy, Christine, Daniel O'Connell and the Anti-Slavery Movement: “The Saddest People the Sun Sees,” 605
- King Cotton in Modern America*, by Brown, 551

- Kirby, Torrance (R), 595
 Kirschenbaum, Lisa A. (R), 638
 Klein, James E. (R), 544
 Klemek, Christopher, The Transatlantic Collapse of Urban Renewal: Postwar Urbanism from New York to Berlin, 496
 Klemek, Christopher (R), 497
 Klier, John Doyle, Russians, Jews, and the Pogroms of 1881–1882, 637
 Klopotek, Brian, Recognition Odysseys: Indigeneity, Race, and Federal Tribal Recognition Policy in Three Louisiana Indian Communities, 570
 Koikari, Mire (R), 555
 Koopmans, Rachel, Wonderful to Relate: Miracle Stories and Miracle Collecting in High Medieval England, 587
 Koppes, Clayton (R), 495
 Kornblith, Gary J., and Michael Zakim, editors, Capitalism Takes Command: The Social Transformation of Nineteenth-Century America (E), 646
 Kösters, Christoph (R), 629
 Kruse, Kevin M., and Stephen Tuck, editors, The Fog of War: The Second World War and the Civil Rights Movement (E), 646
 Kucherenko, Olga, Little Soldiers: How Soviet Children Went to War, 1941–1945, 638
 Kühne, Thomas, Belonging and Genocide: Hitler's Community, 1918–1945, 626
- Lachapelle, Sofie, Investigating the Supernatural: From Spiritism and Occultism to Psychical Research and Metapsychics in France, 1853–1931, 618
 Landau, Paul S., Popular Politics in the History of South Africa, 1400–1948, 643
The Last Neighborhood Cops, by Umbach, 561
Laws of Chance, by Chazkel, 581
 Leupp, Gary P. (R), 503
 Levenstein, Harvey (R), 494
 Lewis, Andrew J., A Democracy of Facts: Natural History in the Early Republic, 524
 Lewis, Martin W. (R), 553
 Leyser, Conrad, and Lesley Smith, editors, Motherhood, Religion, and Society in Medieval Europe, 400–1400: Essays Presented to Henrietta Leyser (E), 647
 Li, Hongshan (R), 500
 Licence, Tom (R), 587
 Liebersohn, Harry, The Return of the Gift: European History of a Global Idea, 596
 Linstead, Ola, and Sabrina P. Ramet, editors, Serbia and the Serbs in World War Two (E), 648
Little Soldiers, by Kucherenko, 638
Lost Colony, by Andrade, 499
 Lothian, James (R), 610
The Louisiana Populist Movement, 1881–1900, by Barnes, 540
 Lukasik, Christopher J., Discerning Characters: The Culture of Appearance in Early America, 522
 Lumpkins, Charles L. (R), 547
 Lynch, Frances M. B. (R), 618
Lynching, by Thurston, 490
 Lynd, Staughton (R), 518
- Maag, Karin (R), 631
 Machado, Maria Helena P. T. (R), 487
- MacLeitch, Gail D., Imperial Entanglements: Iroquois Change and Persistence on the Frontiers of Empire, 515
 Maddox, Gregory H. (R), 642
 Madison, James H. (R), 490
 Magdalino, Paul (R), 593
 Magliocca, Gerard N., The Tragedy of William Jennings Bryan: Constitutional Law and the Politics of Backlash, 541
 Maier, Bernhard (R), 606
The Making of the Modern Admiralty, by Hamilton, 605
 Malchow, H. L., Special Relations: The Americanization of Britain? 610
Managing the Body, by Zweiniger-Bargielowska, 607
 Mapp, Paul W. (R), 523
 Marotti, William (R), 504
 Marten, James, Sing Not War: The Lives of Union and Confederate Veterans in Gilded Age America, 530
 Marten, James (R), 529
 Martin, Benjamin F. (R), 601
 Martin, Bradford, The Other Eighties: A Secret History of America in the Age of Reagan, 564
 Martin, Meredith, Dairy Queens: The Politics of Pastoral Architecture from Catherine De' Medici to Marie-Antoinette, 614
 Martínez, David (R), 516
The Masculine Woman in Weimar Germany, by Sutton, 623
 Mason, David L. (R), 566
 Mason, Tony, and Eliza Riedi, Sport and the Military: The British Armed Forces, 1880–1960, 608
 Massell, David, Quebec Hydropolitics: The Peribonka Concessions of the Second World War, 511
 Matray, James I. (R), 489
 Matthäus, Jürgen (R), 626
 May, Rachel A. (R), 579
 McWilliams, John (R), 517
Mediterraneans, by Clancy-Smith, 476
Memorial Mania, by Doss, 568
 “The Mexicanization of American Politics,” by Downs, 387
 Michman, Dan, The Emergence of Jewish Ghettos during the Holocaust, 627
Migrants and Migration in Modern North America, edited by Hoerder and Faires (E), 645
 Miller, Cary (R), 516
 Miller, Mark Edwin (R), 570
Mining for the Nation, by Pavilack, 583
Modernism and the Museum, by Arrowsmith, 609
 Monroe, John Warne, “Surface Tensions: Empire, Parisian Modernism, and ‘Authenticity’ in African Sculpture, 1917–1939,” 445
Moonshiners and Prohibitionists, by Stewart, 544
 Moore, Rachel A., Forty Miles from the Sea: Xalapa, the Public Sphere, and the Atlantic World in Nineteenth-Century Mexico, 576
 Mora, Anthony, Border Dilemmas: Racial and National Uncertainties in New Mexico, 1848–1912, 545
 Morantz-Sanchez, Regina (R), 532
 Morgan, William Michael, Pacific Gibraltar: U.S.-Japanese Rivalry over the Annexation of Hawai'i, 1885–1898, 489
 Morriss, Roger, The Foundations of British Maritime Ascendancy: Resources, Logistics and the State, 1755–1815, 603
Moscow Prime Time, by Roth-Ey, 639

- Motherhood, Religion, and Society in Medieval Europe, 400–1400*, edited by Leyser and Smith (E), 647
- Murdock, Caitlin E., Changing Places: Society, Culture, and Territory in the Saxon-Bohemian Borderlands, 1870–1946, 631
- Murdock, Caitlin E. (R), 622
- Murphy, Angela F. (R), 605
- My Work Is That of Conservation*, by Hersey, 542
- A Nation Forged in War*, by Bruscano, 549
- Naylor, James (R), 511
- Nazi Empire*, by Baranowski, 625
- Neurasthenic Nation*, by Schuster, 532
- New York Hustlers*, by Reay, 556
- Nichols, Christopher McKnight, Promise and Peril: America at the Dawn of a Global Age, 552
- The 1972 Munich Olympics and the Making of Modern Germany*, by Schiller and Young, 630
- North, Douglass C., John Joseph Wallis, and Barry R. Weingast, Violence and Social Orders: A Conceptual Framework for Interpreting Recorded Human History, 484
- Novikoff, Alex J., "Toward a Cultural History of Scholastic Disputation," 331
- Oestreicher, Richard (R), 563
- The Oil Prince's Legacy*, by Bullock, 500
- The Old South's Modern Worlds*, edited by Barnes, Schoen, and Towers, 527
- Oliver, Lisi (R), 585
- Onnekink, David, and Gijs Rommelse, editors, Ideology and Foreign Policy in Early Modern Europe (1650–1750) (E), 647
- Order and Chivalry*, by Rodríguez-Velasco, 589
- The Other Eighties*, by Martin, 564
- Ottaway, Susannah (R), 602
- Ourselves Unborn*, by Dubow, 573
- Overmyer-Velázquez, Mark (R), 577
- Pacific Gibraltar*, by Morgan, 489
- Pargas, Damian Alan, The Quarters and the Fields: Slave Families in the Non-Cotton South, 526
- Parron, Tâmis, A política da escravidão no Império do Brasil, 1826–1865, 580
- Pavilack, Jody, Mining for the Nation: The Politics of Chile's Coal Communities from the Popular Front to the Cold War, 583
- Pearson, Susan J., The Rights of the Defenseless: Protecting Animals and Children in Gilded Age America, 531
- Peculiar Institution*, by Garland, 567
- Peltonen, Markku (R), 603
- Pérez, Louis A., Jr. (R), 574
- Perna, Valerio, Relazioni tra Santa Sede e Repubbliche baltiche (1918–1940): Monsignor Zecchini diplomatico, 600
- Peters, Rudolph (R), 640
- Phillips, Andrew, War, Religion, and Empire: The Transformation of International Orders, 485
- Phillips, William D., Jr., and Marguerite Ragnow, editors, Religious Conflict and Accommodation in the Early Modern World (E), 645
- Piccato, Pablo (R), 576
- Pivotal Decade*, by Stein, 563
- Polasky, Janet L., Reforming Urban Labor: Routes to the City, Roots in the Country, 597
- A Polite Exchange of Bullets*, by Banks, 603
- A política da escravidão no Império do Brasil, 1826–1865*, by Parron, 580
- The Politics of Provisions*, by Bohstedt, 602
- Popular Politics in the History of South Africa, 1400–1948*, by Landau, 643
- Poulos, Margarite (R), 636
- The Power of Place, the Problem of Time*, by Carlson, 514
- President of the Other America*, by Schmitt, 562
- Primitive Revolution*, by Dormady, 578
- Primitive Selves*, by Atkins, 505
- Promise and Peril*, by Nichols, 552
- Pugliese, Stanislaw G. (R), 537
- Pulju, Rebecca J., Women and Mass Consumer Society in Postwar France, 619
- Purifying the Nation*, by Solonari, 634
- Putman, John (R), 536
- The Quarters and the Fields*, by Pargas, 526
- Quebec Hydropolitics*, by Massell, 511
- Radding, Cynthia (R), 545
- Ragnow, Marguerite, and William D. Phillips, Jr., editors, Religious Conflict and Accommodation in the Early Modern World (E), 645
- Ramet, Sabrina P., and Ola Listhaug, editors, Serbia and the Serbs in World War Two (E), 648
- Rapaport, Lynn (R), 628
- Rath, Eric C., Food and Fantasy in Early Modern Japan, 503
- Ray, Rajat Kanta (R), 507
- Reay, Barry, New York Hustlers: Masculinity and Sex in Modern America, 556
- Recognition Odysseys*, by Klopotek, 570
- Red Power Rising*, by Shreve, 569
- Redford, Duncan (R), 605
- A Reforming People*, by Hall, 517
- Reforming Urban Labor*, by Polasky, 597
- Regester, Charlene (R), 554
- Relazioni tra Santa Sede e Repubbliche baltiche (1918–1940)*, by Perna, 600
- Religious Conflict and Accommodation in the Early Modern World*, edited by Ragnow and Phillips (E), 645
- Remaking the Heartland*, by Wuthnow, 557
- La Responsabilité de l'écrivain*, by Sapiro, 616
- Rethinking the Other in Antiquity*, by Gruen, 584
- The Return of the Gift*, by Liebersohn, 596
- Reverby, Susan M. (R), 484
- Richter, Daniel K., Before the Revolution: America's Ancient Pasts, 513
- Ricourt, Milagros (R), 498
- Riedi, Eliza, and Tony Mason, Sport and the Military: The British Armed Forces, 1880–1960, 608
- Rifkin, Mark, When Did Indians Become Straight? Kinship, the History of Sexuality, and Native Sovereignty, 571
- The Rights of the Defenseless*, by Pearson, 531
- Robertson, Stephen (R), 531

- Rodríguez-Velasco, Jesús D., Order and Chivalry: Knighthood and Citizenship in Late Medieval Castile, 589
- Roemer, Nils, German City, Jewish Memory: The Story of Worms, 628
- Rommelse, Gijs, and David Onnekink, editors, Ideology and Foreign Policy in Early Modern Europe (1650–1750) (E), 647
- Rosenfeld, Sophia, Common Sense: A Political History, 488
- Ross-Nazzari, Jennifer M., Winning the West for Women: The Life of Suffragist Emma Smith DeVoe, 536
- Roth-Ey, Kristin, Moscow Prime Time: How the Soviet Union Built the Media Empire That Lost the Cultural Cold War, 639
- Rothwell, Victor (R), 493
- Roy, Tirthankar, Company of Kinsmen: Enterprise and Community in South Asian History 1700–1940, 507
- Rozbicki, Michal Jan, Culture and Liberty in the Age of the American Revolution, 519
- Ruane, Christine, The Empire's New Clothes: A History of the Russian Fashion Industry, 1700–1917, 636
- Rubio, Philip F. (R), 558
- The Ruins of the New Argentina*, by Healey, 582
- Ruling Oneself Out*, by Ermakoff, 601
- Russell, Edmund, Evolutionary History: Uniting History and Biology to Understand Life on Earth, 483
- Russians, Jews, and the Pogroms of 1881–1882*, by Klier, 637
- Sachsenmaier, Dominic (R), 485
- A Sacred City*, by Hamilton, 588
- Safley, Thomas Max (R), 621
- Sammartino, Annemarie (R), 631
- Sanctuary and Crime in the Middle Ages, 400–1500*, by Shoemaker, 585
- Sapiro, Gisèle, La Responsabilité de l'écrivain: Littérature, droit et morale en France (XIX^e–XXI^e siècle), 616
- Scalmer, Sean, Gandhi in the West: The Mahatma and the Rise of Radical Protest, 495
- “Schade, daß Beton nicht brennt . . .,” by Haumann, 497
- Schaefer, Bernd, The East German State and the Catholic Church, 1945–1989, 629
- Schiller, Kay, and Christopher Young, The 1972 Munich Olympics and the Making of Modern Germany, 630
- Schmitt, Edward R., President of the Other America: Robert Kennedy and the Politics of Poverty, 562
- Schneider, Eric C. (R), 561
- Schoen, Brian, L. Diane Barnes, and Frank Towers, editors, The Old South's Modern Worlds: Slavery, Region, and Nation in the Age of Progress, 527
- Schrag, Zachary M., Ethical Imperialism: Institutional Review Boards and the Social Sciences, 1965–2009, 484
- Schreiber, Rachel, Gender and Activism in a Little Magazine: The Modern Figures of the Masses, 538
- Schultz, Kirsten (R), 580
- Schuster, David G., Neurasthenic Nation: America's Search for Health, Happiness, and Comfort, 1869–1920, 532
- The Science of Religion in Britain, 1860–1915*, by Wheeler-Barclay, 606
- Secular Missionaries*, by Grubbs, 559
- Seeing Stars*, by Frost, 504
- Seeman, Erik R. (R), 513
- Seraile, William, Angels of Mercy: White Women and the History of New York's Colored Orphan Asylum, 534
- Serbia and the Serbs in World War Two*, edited by Ramet and Linstead (E), 648
- Setting the Table for Julia Child*, by Strauss, 543
- Settlers, Liberty, and Empire*, by Yirush, 518
- Shakers, Mormons, and Religious Worlds*, by Taysom, 572
- Sharp, Lynn L. (R), 618
- Shoemaker, Karl, Sanctuary and Crime in the Middle Ages, 400–1500, 585
- Shreve, Bradley G., Red Power Rising: The National Indian Youth Council and the Origins of Native Activism, 569
- Sing Not War*, by Marten, 530
- Sinners on Trial*, by Teter, 632
- Smith, Damian J., Crusade, Heresy and Inquisition in the Lands of the Crown of Aragon (c. 1167–1276), 588
- Smith, Damian J. (R), 612
- Smith, Lesley, and Conrad Leyser, editors, Motherhood, Religion, and Society in Medieval Europe, 400–1400: Essays Presented to Henrietta Leyser (E), 647
- Smith-Pryor, Elizabeth M. (R), 533
- Solonari, Vladimir, Purifying the Nation: Population Exchange and Ethnic Cleansing in Nazi-Allied Romania, 634
- Songs, Scribes, and Society*, by Alden, 591
- Sound Diplomacy*, by Gienow-Hecht, 492
- Special Relations*, by Malchow, 610
- Spiro, Jonathan Peter (R), 535
- Spitzer, Leo, and Marianne Hirsch, Ghosts of Home: The Afterlife of Czernowitz in Jewish Memory, 635
- Sport and the Military*, by Mason and Riedi, 608
- Stanley, Adam C. (R), 619
- Stansell, Christine, The Feminist Promise: 1792 to the Present, 512
- Stapleford, Thomas A., The Cost of Living in America: A Political History of Economic Statistics, 1880–2000, 565
- Stayin' Alive*, by Cowie, 563
- Stearns, Justin K., Infectious Ideas: Contagion in Premodern Islamic and Christian Thought in the Western Mediterranean, 592
- Stein, Judith, Pivotal Decade: How the United States Traded Factories for Finance in the Seventies, 563
- Stewart, Bruce E., Moonshiners and Prohibitionists: The Battle over Alcohol in Southern Appalachia, 544
- Stewart, Bruce E., editor, Blood in the Hills: A History of Violence in Appalachia (E), 646
- Strand, David, An Unfinished Republic: Leading by Word and Deed in Modern China, 502
- Strauss, David, Setting the Table for Julia Child: Gourmet Dining in America, 1934–1961, 543
- “Surface Tensions,” by Monroe, 445
- Suri, Jeremi (R), 480
- Suriano, Juan (R), 581
- Sutton, Katie, The Masculine Woman in Weimar Germany, 623
- Swope, Kenneth M. (R), 499
- Taithe, Bertrand, Tom Crook, and Rebecca Gill, editors, Evil, Barbarism and Empire: Britain and Abroad, c. 1830–2000 (E), 647
- Takeda, Junko Thérèse (R), 613
- A Tale of Two Cities*, by Hoffnung-Garskof, 498
- Tavárez, David, The Invisible War: Indigenous Devotions, Discipline, and Dissent in Colonial Mexico, 576

- Taylor, Cynthia (R), 548
 Taysom, Stephen C., Shakers, Mormons, and Religious Worlds: Conflicting Visions, Contested Boundaries, 572
 Teller, Adam (R), 632
Terror in the Land of the Holy Spirit, by Garrard-Burnett, 579
 Teter, Magda, Sinners on Trial: Jews and Sacrilege after the Reformation, 632
The Theological-Political Origins of the Modern State, by Bourdin, 595
This Great Struggle, by Woodworth, 528
 Thomas, Nicholas, Islanders: The Pacific in the Age of Empire, 510
Three Fires Unity, by Bellfy, 516
 Thurston, Robert W., Lynching: American Mob Murder in Global Perspective, 490
 Tilse, Mark, Transnationalism in the Prussian East: From National Conflict to Synthesis, 1871–1914, 622
Tom Paine's America, by Cotlar, 521
 "Toward a Cultural History of Scholastic Disputation," by Novikoff, 331
 Towers, Frank, L. Diane Barnes, and Brian Schoen, editors, The Old South's Modern Worlds: Slavery, Region, and Nation in the Age of Progress, 527
The Tragedy of William Jennings Bryan, by Magliocca, 541
The Transatlantic Collapse of Urban Renewal, by Klemek, 496
Transnationalism in the Prussian East, by Tilse, 622
 Treuer, Anton, The Assassination of Hole in the Day, 516
 Troy, Gil (R), 564
 Tuck, Stephen, and Kevin M. Kruse, editors, The Fog of War: The Second World War and the Civil Rights Movement (E), 646
Turning the Tables, by Haley, 543
 Tuten, James (R), 526
 Tyrrell, Ian (R), 552
- Umbach, Fritz, The Last Neighborhood Cops: The Rise and Fall of Community Policing in New York Public Housing, 561
Uneasy Allies, by Zonderman, 535
An Unfinished Republic, by Strand, 502
The Unwanted Child, by Harrington, 621
Urban Design, Chaos, and Colonial Power in Zanzibar, by Bissell, 642
- Vago, Raphael (R), 634
 Van Gent, Jacqueline, and Susan Broomhall, editors, Governing Masculinities in the Early Modern Period: Regulating Selves and Others (E), 647
 Van Kley, Dale K., and Thomas E. Kaiser, editors, From Deficit to Deluge: The Origins of the French Revolution, 615 Vernacular Voices, by Fudeman, 590
Violence and Social Orders, by North, Wallis, and Weingast, 484
 Vose, Robin (R), 588
- Wallis, John Joseph, Douglass C. North, and Barry R. Weingast, Violence and Social Orders: A Conceptual Framework for Interpreting Recorded Human History, 484
 Wang, Jessica (R), 565
War, Religion, and Empire, by Phillips, 485
War Stories, by Clarke, 529
Way Up North in Louisville, by Adams, 549
 Weingast, Barry R., Douglass C. North, and John Joseph Wallis, Violence and Social Orders: A Conceptual Framework for Interpreting Recorded Human History, 484
 Weiss, Gillian, Captives and Corsairs: France and Slavery in the Early Modern Mediterranean, 613
 Weiss, Max, In the Shadow of Sectarianism: Law, Shi'ism, and the Making of Modern Lebanon, 641
 Weiss, Sheila Faith (C), 661
 Wheeler-Barclay, Marjorie, The Science of Religion in Britain, 1860–1915, 606
When Did Indians Become Straight? Kinship, the History of Sexuality, and Native Sovereignty, by Rifkin, 571
Whispering City, by Bosworth, 620
White Mother to a Dark Race, by Jacobs, 491
William Clark's World, by Kastor, 523
 Winch, Julie, The Clamorgans: One Family's History of Race in America, 525
Winning the West for Women, by Ross-Nazzal, 536
 Winter, Stefan (R), 641
 Wolin, Richard (R), 598
Women and Mass Consumer Society in Postwar France, by Pulju, 619
Wonderful to Relate, by Koopmans, 587
 Wood, Andrew Grant (R), 581
 Wood, Nathaniel D., Becoming Metropolitan: Urban Selfhood and the Making of Modern Cracow, 633
 Woodworth, Steven E., This Great Struggle: America's Civil War, 528
 Wooster, Robert (R), 528
Writing and Literacy in Early China, edited by Feng and Branner (E), 646
 Wuthnow, Robert, Remaking the Heartland: Middle America since the 1950s, 557
- Yano, Christine, Airborne Dreams: "Nisei" Stewardesses and Pan American World Airways, 555
 Yirush, Craig, Settlers, Liberty, and Empire: The Roots of Early American Political Theory, 1675–1775, 518
 Young, Christopher, and Kay Schiller, The 1972 Munich Olympics and the Making of Modern Germany, 630
- Zachariah, Benjamin (R), 509
 Zakim, Michael, and Gary J. Kornblith, editors, Capitalism Takes Command: The Social Transformation of Nineteenth-Century America (E), 646
 Zarinebaf, Fariba, Crime and Punishment in Istanbul, 1700–1800, 640
 Zeiger, Susan, Entangling Alliances: Foreign War Brides and American Soldiers in the Twentieth Century, 555
 Zelden, Charles L. (R), 546
 Zimmerman, Joshua D. (R), 635
 Zipperstein, Steven J. (R), 637
 Zonderman, David A., Uneasy Allies: Working for Labor Reform in Nineteenth-Century Boston, 535
 Zweiniger-Bargielowska, Ina, Managing the Body: Beauty, Health, and Fitness in Britain, 1880–1939, 607
 Zweiniger-Bargielowska, Ina (R), 608

American Historical Association

Founded in 1884. Chartered by Congress in 1889.

Office: 400 A St. SE, Washington, DC 20003

President: William Cronon, University of Wisconsin-Madison

President-Elect: Kenneth Pomeranz, University of California, Irvine

Executive Director: James R. Grossman

Controller: Randy Norell

MEMBERSHIP: Persons interested in historical studies, whether professionally or otherwise, are invited to membership. The present membership and subscription total is approximately 18,000. Members elect the officers by ballot.

MEETINGS: The Association's next annual meeting will take place January 3–6, 2013, in New Orleans. Many professional historical groups meet within or jointly with the Association at this time. The Pacific Coast Branch holds separate meetings on the Pacific Coast and publishes the Pacific Historical Review.

PUBLICATIONS AND SERVICES: The American Historical Review is published five times a year and is sent to all members. It is available by subscription to institutions. The Association also publishes Perspectives (a newsmagazine with classified listings) and a variety of pamphlets on historical subjects. To promote history and assist historians, the Association offers other services, including a Department and Organization Services Program. It also maintains close relations with international, specialized, state, and local historical societies through conferences and correspondence.

BOOK PRIZES: The Herbert Baxter Adams Prize, awarded annually for a first book in the field of European history. The George Louis Beer Prize, awarded annually for a book on any phase of European international history since 1895. The Albert J. Beveridge Award, given annually for the best book on the history of the United States, Latin America, or Canada since 1492. The Paul Birdsall Prize, awarded biennially for a major work by a U.S. or Canadian historian in European military and strategic history since 1870. The James Henry Breasted Prize, awarded annually for the best book in English in any field of history prior to 1000 A.D. The Albert B. Corey Prize, awarded biennially for the best book on the history of Canadian-American relations, administered jointly with the Canadian Historical Association. The John H. Dunning Prize, awarded biennially for a book on any subject in U.S. history. The John K. Fairbank Prize, awarded annually for East Asian history substantially after the year 1800. The Morris D. Forkosch Prize, awarded annually to the best book in British, British imperial, or British Commonwealth history. The Leo Gershoy Award, given annually for outstanding work in seventeenth- or eighteenth-century western European history. The Clarence H. Haring Prize, awarded every five years for Latin American history by a Latin American. The J. Franklin Jameson Prize, awarded every two years for outstanding editorial achievement. The Joan Kelly Memorial Prize, awarded annually for the best book in women's history. The Martin A. Klein Prize in African History, awarded annually for the most distinguished work of scholarship on continental Africa, including those islands usually treated as countries of Africa. The Waldo G. Leland Prize, awarded every five years for the most outstanding reference tool. The Littleton-Griswold Prize, awarded annually for the best work on the history of American law and society. The J. Russell Major Prize, awarded annually for the best work in English on any aspect of French history. The Helen and Howard R. Marraro Prize, awarded annually for Italian or Italian-U.S. history. The George L. Mosse Prize, awarded annually for European intellectual and cultural history since the Renaissance. The Premio del Rey Prize, awarded biennially for early Spanish history and culture (500–1516 A.D.). The James A. Rawley Prize in Atlantic History, awarded annually for an outstanding book in the history of the Atlantic worlds before the twentieth century. The John F. Richards Prize, awarded annually for the best book in South Asian history. The James Harvey Robinson Prize, awarded biennially for the teaching aid that has made the most outstanding contribution to the teaching of history. The Wesley-Logan Prize, awarded annually in African Diaspora history by the AHA and the Association for the Study of African American Life and History. Book prizes are awarded at each AHA annual meeting.

CORRESPONDENCE: Inquiries for the AHA should be addressed to Executive Director, 400 A St. SE, Washington, DC 20003. Our e-mail address is aha@historians.org. Our web address is <http://www.historians.org>.

Inquiries for the AHR Editorial Office, including correspondence regarding manuscript submissions and books for review, should be addressed to Editor, American Historical Review, 914 E. Atwater Ave., Bloomington, IN 47401. Our e-mail address is ahr@indiana.edu. No manuscript will be considered for publication if it is concurrently under consideration by another journal or press or if it has been published or is soon to be published elsewhere. Both restrictions apply to the substance as well as to the exact wording of the manuscript. If the manuscript is accepted, the editors expect that its appearance in the AHR will precede republication of the essay, or any significant part thereof, in another work. Specific guidelines and policies for the preparation of manuscripts for submission to and publication in the AHR can be found at www.americanhistoricalreview.org or will be sent upon request. Unsolicited book reviews are not accepted.

Afghanistan

A Cultural and Political History

Thomas Barfield

"[A]n invaluable book. Mr. Barfield . . . provide[s] the context necessary for good policymaking."

—Doug Bandow, Washington Times

"Barfield has written a magnificent, learned, provoking book. He knows Afghanistan better than almost anyone writing on the topic today. He matches that knowledge with keen insight into how human societies grow and change."

—Paul D. Miller, Books and Culture

Paper $16.95 978-0-691-15441-1

Reading Obama

Dreams, Hope, and the American Political Tradition

James T. Kloppenberg

"Kloppenberg, one of America's foremost intellectual historians, persuasively argues that [there is] a broader shift in American philosophy away from appeal to general principles, valid at all times and in all places, toward a reliance on local, historically particular values and ideals. Kloppenberg's own endeavor . . . is to argue for the coherence, the Americanness, and the plausibility of Obama's approach to politics and the Constitution."

—Kwame Anthony Appiah, New York Review of Books

Paper $17.95 978-0-691-15433-6

A Dictionary of 20th-Century Communism

Edited by Silvio Pons & Robert Service

"Access to archives in the former Soviet Union and its satellites behind the iron curtain has enabled the 160 scholars who contributed articles to this compendium to present information formerly out of the reach of all but a few in those countries. . . . No other comparable, current source covers twentieth-century communism in similar topical fashion."

—James Rettig, Booklist

Paper $45.00 978-0-691-15429-9

Power over Peoples

Technology, Environments, and Western Imperialism,
1400 to the Present

Daniel R. Headrick

"This is a major contribution to historical studies, as well as the study of technological change and economic history. Headrick asks a set of questions that are infrequently discussed, and analyzes them in an interesting way. This will be an important and widely cited book."

—Stanley L. Engerman, University of Rochester

Paper $24.95 978-0-691-15432-9

A King Travels

Festive Traditions in Late Medieval and Early Modern Spain

Teofilo F. Ruiz

"This book opens a new chapter in our current understanding of Spanish ceremonial life. And except for books published in Spanish, it virtually stands alone. It spans two broad periods of time, contrasting and comparing the Middle Ages with the early modern era, and does so in an engagingly, very appealing manner. Ruiz's study is both original and important."

—Richard L. Kagan, Johns Hopkins University

Paper $45.00 978-0-691-15358-2

Cloth $75.00 978-0-691-15357-5

The Wind from the East

French Intellectuals, the Cultural Revolution, and the Legacy of the 1960s

Richard Wolin

"The Wind from the East must be regarded as a monument of committed scholarship. It is also a fascinating chronicle of people who, however ludicrous they may seem at times, did on occasion think and act with profound seriousness. . . . [A] valuable addition to the literature of the era."

—David Gress, Wall Street Journal

Paper $24.95 978-0-691-15434-3

The Axe and the Oath

Ordinary Life in the Middle Ages

Robert Fossier

Translated by Lydia G. Cochrane

"This is a wonderful book—the product of a lifetime's immersion in the documents and artefacts that survive from the 1,000 years that we call the 'Middle Ages.' . . . In the end, Fossier concludes, 'I felt like saying all this, and that is enough.' More than enough, when a book as absorbing and challenging as this is the result."

—Helen Castor, Times Higher Education

Paper $18.95 978-0-691-15431-2

Memphis Under the Ptolemies

Second Edition

Dorothy J. Thompson

"This thoroughly revised and updated account presents a clear picture of one of the most important cities of Ptolemaic Egypt, but it also takes the reader deep into the world of Egyptian temples, the priests who served the various cults, and the religious, economic, and social practices of the diverse communities who lived in and around Memphis."

—J. G. Manning, Yale University

Paper $35.00 978-0-691-14033-9

A Primer for Teaching World History
Ten Design Principles
ANTOINETTE BURTON
376 pages, paper, $20.00

The Camera as Historian Amateur Photographers and Historical Imagination,
1885–1928
ELIZABETH EDWARDS
Objects/Histories
344 pages, 121 illustrations,
paper, $20.00

The Parlors of Yesterday
African Migrants in Paris
LESLIE PAGE MOCH
272 pages, 21 illustrations,
paper, $20.00

Foreign Front
Cold War Politics
in Sixties West Germany
QUINN SLOBODIAN
Radical Perspectives
272 pages, 74 photographs,
paper, $22.00

Poverty in Common
The Politics of Community Action during the American Century
ALYSHA GOLDSTEIN
272 pages, 17 illustrations,
paper, $26.00

Obeah and Other Powers
The Politics of Caribbean
Religion and Healing
DIANA PATON and
MAARIT FORDE, editors
176 pages, 9 illustrations,
paper, $22.00

The Sexual Life of English Languages of Caste and Desire in Colonial India
SHEFALI CHANDRA
Next Wave: New Directions in Women's Studies
400 pages, paper, $24.00

The Making of the Middle Class
Toward a Transnational History
A. RICARDO LÓPEZ and BARBARA WEINSTEIN, editors
Racial Perspectives
464 pages, paper, $27.00

Decolonizing Native Histories Collaboration, Knowledge, and Language in the Americas
FLORENCIA E. MALLON, editor
Narrating Native Histories
272 pages, paper, $24.00

Beyond the Lettered City
Indigenous Literacies in the Andes JOANNE RAFFAPORT and TOM CUMMINS
Narrating Native Histories
272 pages, 67 illustrations, incl. 9 color, paper, $25.00

Histories of Race and Racism
The Andes and Mesoamerica from Colonial Times to the Present
LAURA GÓTKOWITZ, editor
376 pages, 13 illustrations,
paper, $25.00

The Flower and the Scorpion
Sexuality and Ritual in Early Nahuatl Culture
PETE SIGAL
Latin America Otherwise
272 pages, 43 illustrations,
paper, $25.00

Culture of Class
Radio and Cinema
in the Making of a Divided Argentina, 1920–1946
MATTHEW B. KARUSH
262 pages, 12 illustrations,
paper, $25.00

Adiós Muchachos
A Memoir of the Sandinista Revolution
SERGIO RAMÍREZ
American Encounters/Global Interactions
Latin America in Transition
160 pages, paper, $24.00

Order online!

DUKE UNIVERSITY PRESS
www.dukeupress.edu

The Tea Party

A Brief History

Ronald P. Formisano

"Formisano merits attention for providing even-handed perspective on and clarifying misconceptions about America's recent political phenomenon."

—Publishers Weekly
$19.95 hardcover

Grand Central's Engineer

William J. Wilgus and the Planning of Modern Manhattan
Kurt C. Schlichting

Few people have had as profound an impact on New York City as William J. Wilgus, chief engineer of the New York Central Railroad.
$49.95 hardcover

Social Poison

The Culture and Politics of Opiate Control in Britain and France, 1821–1926
Howard Padwa

Examines the divergent paths taken by Britain and France in managing opiate abuse.
$55.00 hardcover

Biomedical Computing

Digitizing Life in the United States
Joseph November
Explores the early attempts, in the 1950s and 1960s, to computerize biomedical research.
$60.00 hardcover

The Practical Einstein

Experiments, Patents, Inventions
József Illy
The theoretical genius had an eminently practical side as well.
$60.00 hardcover

Rights, action, reaction

Protesting Affirmative Action

The Struggle over Equality after the Civil Rights Revolution
Dennis Deslippe

"Illuminates a critical part of recent American history."
—Edward D. Berkowitz,
George Washington University
$55.00 hardcover

Psychology Comes to Harlem

Rethinking the Race Question in Twentieth-Century America
Jay Garcia

Reveals the critical and intellectual innovation of literary artists who bridged psychology and antiracism to challenge segregation.
$50.00 hardcover

The Morehouse Mystique

Becoming a Doctor at the Nation's Newest African American Medical School Marybeth Gasman
with Louis W. Sullivan

This book tells the history of one of only four predominantly black medical schools in the U.S.
$35.00 hardcover

Remembering the Crusades

Myth, Image, and Identity edited by Nicholas Paul and Suzanne Yeager

"A serious and substantial contribution."—Robert M. Stein, Purchase College, State University of New York
$65.00 hardcover

Booker T. Washington Rediscovered

edited by Michael Scott Biese
and Marybeth Gasman

Explores Washington's life and work through his writings and speeches.
$34.95 paperback

Epic in American Culture

Settlement to Reconstruction
Christopher N. Phillips
"A major new interpretation of epic in American literature and culture."—Sandra M. Gustafson, University of Notre Dame
$70.00 hardcover

The Jewish Movement in the Soviet Union

edited by Yaacov Ro'i with an epilogue by George P. Shultz

The first scholarly survey of one of the most successful Soviet dissident movements.
Woodrow Wilson Center Press
$65.00 hardcover

Now in paperback

Born Southern

Childbirth, Motherhood, and Social Networks in the Old South
V. Lynn Kennedy
$30.00 paperback

Manly Meals and Mom's Home Cooking

Cookbooks and Gender in Modern America
Jessamyn Neuhaus
$30.00 paperback

Deliver Me from Pain

Anesthesia and Birth in America
Jacqueline H. Wolf
$30.00 paperback

THE JOHNS HOPKINS UNIVERSITY PRESS

1-800-537-5487 • press.jhu.edu

$42.50 cloth

$40.00 cloth

$34.95 cloth

$39.95 cloth

$27.50 paper

$19.95 paper

LSU Press

Available in bookstores and online at lsupress.org

WAR! WHAT IS IT GOOD FOR?

Black Freedom Struggles and the U.S. Military from World War II to Iraq

KIMBERLEY L. PHILLIPS

"Tells the long overdue story of the disproportionate impact of American wars on African Americans and their resistance to this unequal burden. The book sounds off beautifully, voicing cries of freedom through the guns of war."

—Bill V. Mullen, author of Afro-Orientalism and Popular Fronts
352 pages $34.95 cloth

ARC OF EMPIRE

America's Wars in Asia from the Philippines to Vietnam

MICHAEL H. HUNT AND STEVEN I. LEVINE

"A lucid, persuasive, path-breaking study . . . Readers will find this absorbing and provocative start to finish, and many teachers will surely discover that it is terrific for classroom use."

—John W. Dower, Massachusetts Institute of Technology
352 pages $35.00 cloth
Online Instructor's Manual Also Available

THE REVOLUTION OF 1861

The American Civil War in the Age of Nationalist Conflict

ANDRE M. FLECHE

"Fleche shows how the revolutions that wracked Europe influenced U.S. politics in the lead-up to the Civil War, and how the Civil War, in turn, profoundly affected notions of nationalism in Europe. An important study."

—Richard Blackett, Vanderbilt University
224 pages $39.95 cloth

SEXUAL REVOLUTIONS IN CUBA

Passion, Politics, and Memory

CARRIE HAMILTON

Foreword by Elizabeth Dore

"Based on a precious trove of oral histories, this book offers the first comprehensive study of the history of sexuality in post-revolutionary Cuba. A much welcome addition to the scholarship."

—Alejandro de la Fuente, University of Pittsburgh
320 pages $39.95 cloth

THE CORNER OF THE LIVING

Ayacucho on the Eve of the Shining Path Insurgency

MIGUEL LA SERNA

"This book adds a new dimension to our understanding of Peru's war by focusing on two mountain villages at the very center of the storm."

—Orin Starn, Duke University
304 pages $65.00 cloth / $29.95 paper
A project of First Peoples: New Directions in Indigenous Studies

Most UNC Press books are also available as E-Books.

Sign up for monthly new book announcements, special offers and more at www.uncpress.unc.edu

1922
90
2012

THE UNIVERSITY of NORTH CAROLINA PRESS

at bookstores or 800-848-6224 • www.uncpress.unc.edu • uncpressblog.com

CELEBRATING 90 YEARS OF PUBLISHING EXCELLENCE

Congratulations to the winner of the inaugural

George and Ann Richards Prize

Anne Marshall has won the inaugural George and Ann Richards Prize for the best article published in The Journal of the Civil War Era in 2011. Her article, "The 1906 Uncle Tom's Cabin Law and the Politics of Race and Memory in Early-Twentieth-Century Kentucky," was selected by a two-person panel from the journal's editorial board. The prize earns the recipient a $1,000 award.

The article examined early twentieth century efforts by the Lexington chapter of the United Daughters of the Confederacy to block stage productions of the popular play, Uncle Tom's Cabin. In announcing the prize, the panel praised the essay for conveying "a sense of the rich dialogue over how slavery ought to be remembered" and demonstrating "how this was not just a local Kentucky issue, but also something that resonated nationally." Marshall's essay expands the parameters of the Civil War Era in ways that correspond with the goals of the journal.

Marshall is assistant professor of history at Mississippi State University. Her research focuses on nineteenth century southern history and women's history. Professor Marshall published her first book, Creating a Confederate Kentucky: The Lost Cause and Civil War Memory in a Border State with the University of North Carolina Press in 2010. Her essay, "'A Crisis in Our Lives': African-American Protest and the Kentucky Separate Coach Law, 1892-1900" in the summer 2000 issue of the Register of the Kentucky Historical Society was awarded the journal's Richard Collins Prize.

Awarded annually, the prize recognizes the generosity of George and Ann Richards, who have been instrumental in the growth of the Richards Civil War Era Center and in the founding of The Journal of the Civil War Era.

For more information, visit www.journalofthecivilwarera.com.

American Pandemic

The Lost Worlds of the 1918 Influenza Epidemic
NANCY K. BRISTOW
2012 Hardback $34.95

The European Reformation

Second Edition
EUAN CAMERON
2012 Paperback $45.00

The Origins of Sex

A History of the First Sexual Revolution
FARAMERZ DABHOIWALA
2012 Hardback $34.95

Sick from Freedom

African-American Illness and Suffering during the Civil War and Reconstruction
JIM DOWNS
2012 Hardback $29.95

Golden Harvest

Events at the Periphery of the Holocaust
JAN TOMASZ GROSS
Contributions by IRENA GRUDZINSKA GROSS
2012 Hardback $16.95

Fateful Lightning

A New History of the Civil War and Reconstruction
ALLEN C. GUELZO
2012 Paperback $19.95

The Acadian Diaspora

An Eighteenth-Century History
CHRISTOPHER HODSON
2012 Hardback $34.95

Russian History

A Very Short Introduction
GEOFFREY HOSKING
2012 Paperback $11.95

The Kingdom of Matthias

A Story of Sex and Salvation in 19th-Century America
Second Edition
PAUL E. JOHNSON and SEAN WILENTZ
2012 Paperback $19.95

On the Edge of the Cold War

American Diplomats and Spies in Postwar Prague IGOR LUKES
2012 Hardback $34.95

Enlightened

U.S. Development ■ Foreign Policy in Ethiopia
AMANDA KAY McVETY
2012 Hardback $74.00

American Genesis

The Evolution Controversies from Scopes to Creation Science
JEFFREY P. MORAN
2012 Hardback $29.95

What's Good for Business

Business and American Politics since World War II
Edited by KIM PHILLIPS-FEIN and JULIAN E. ZELIZER
2012 Hardback $99.00 Paperback $24.95

The Pursuit of the Nazi Mind

Hitler, Hess, and the Analysts
DANIEL PICK
2012 Hardback $35.00

The Oxford History of Historical Writing

Volume 3: 1400-1800
Edited by JOSE RABASA, MASAYUKI SATO, EDOARDO TORTAROLO, and DANIEL WOOLF
2012 Hardback $185.00

The Production of Difference

Race and the Management of Labor in U.S. History
DAVID R. ROEDIGER and ELIZABETH D. ESCH
2012 Hardback $34.95

The Mongols

A Very Short Introduction
MORRIS ROSSABI
2012 Paperback $11.95

New in Paperback

This Birth Place of Souls

The Civil War Nursing Diary of Harriet Eaton
Edited by JANE E. SCHULTZ
2012 Paperback $24.95

The City-State in Europe, 1000-1600

Hinterland, Territory, Region
TOM SCOTT
2012 Hardback $65.00

Hippies, Indians, and the Fight for Red Power

SHERRY L. SMITH
2012 Hardback $34.95

Active Bodies

A History of Women's Physical Education in Twentieth-Century America
MARTHA H. VERBRUGGE
2012 Hardback $55.00

Titanic

The Last Night of a Small Town
JOHN WELSHMAN
2012 Hardback $29.95

Oxford Scholarship Online

Over 6,000 history eBooks full-text available to students and faculty from Oxford's unparalleled History list

www.oxfordscholarship.com

Delivered by University Press Scholarship Online www.universitypressscholarship.com

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Prices are subject to change and apply only in the US.

To order or for more information, visit our website at www.oup.com/us

NEW IN AMERICAN HISTORY FROM PENGUIN GROUP (USA)

DAVID C. UNGER
THE EMERGENCY STATE

America's Pursuit of Absolute Security at Any Costs

"Like a skilled surgeon, David Unger lays bare the pathologies that have disfigured U. S. national security policy over the course of many decades. The result is a thoughtful, judicious, immensely readable, and vitally important book."

—Andrew J. Bacevich, Boston University.

Penguin Press • 368 pp. • 978-1-59420-324-4 • $27.95

JAMES R. BARRETT
THE IRISH WAY

Becoming American in the Multi-Ethnic City

This lively, street-level history of turn-of-the-century urban life explores the Americanizing influence of the Irish on successive waves of migrants to the American city.

Penguin Press • 400 pp. • 978-1-59420-325-1 • $29.95

JOHN M. BARRY
ROGER WILLIAMS AND THE CREATION OF THE AMERICAN SOUL
Church, State, and the Birth of Liberty

Acclaimed historian John M. Barry examines the man who was the first to link religious freedom to individual liberty, and who created in America the first government and society on earth informed by those beliefs.

Viking • 480 pp. • 978-0-670-02305-9 • $35.00

BRENDA J. CHILD
HOLDING OUR WORLD TOGETHER
Ojibwe Women and the Survival of Community
Penguin Library of American Indian History

A groundbreaking exploration of the remarkable women in the Native American communities of Lake Superior and the Mississippi River over the last three centuries.

Viking • 240 pp. • 978-0-670-02324-0 • $22.95

JON GERTNER
THE IDEA FACTORY: Bell Labs and the Great Age of American Innovation

"More than just the fascinating story of the amazing innovations and colorful innovators of Bell Labs, The Idea Factory gives incredible insight into the ways in which Bell Labs not only invented the future but invented new ways of invention."—Bill Joy, Co-founder and CTO, Sun Microsystems.

Penguin Press • 432 pp. • 978-1-59420-328-2 • $29.95

ERIC ALTERMAN AND KEVIN MATTSON
THE CAUSE: The Fight for American Liberalism from Franklin Roosevelt to Barack Obama

Viking • 416 pp. • 978-0-670-02343-1 • $29.95

STACY A. CORDERY
JULIETTE GORDON LOW
The Remarkable Founder of the Girl Scouts

Viking • 400 pp. • 978-0-670-02330-1 • $27.95

GREGG JONES
HONOR IN THE DUST
Theodore Roosevelt, War in the Philippines, and the Rise and Fall of America's Imperial Dream
 "America's brutal war of conquest in the Philippines is amazingly little-known....In his much-needed, highly readable book on this forgotten war, Gregg Jones has written both a compelling page-turner and a work of careful scholarship."—Adam Hochschild, author of To End All Wars.
 NAL • 448 pp. • 978-0-451-22904-5 • $24.95

PENGUIN GROUP (USA)

Academic Marketing Department • 375 Hudson Street • New York, New York 10014

www.penguin.com/academic

NEW IN HISTORY FROM PENGUIN GROUP (USA)

TONY JUDT with TIMOTHY SNYDER
THINKING THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

Where Judt's masterpiece Postwar redefined the history of modern Europe by uniting the stories of its eastern and western halves, Thinking the Twentieth Century unites the century's conflicted intellectual history into a single soaring narrative. Penguin Press • 432 pp. • 978-1-59420-323-7 • $35.00

SIMON PRICE AND PETER THONEMANN
THE BIRTH OF CLASSICAL EUROPE

A History from Troy to Augustine

"Offers a seamless history across more than two millennia....By insisting on the unifying relationship between the present and what has gone on before, Price and Thonemann place themselves in the same intellectual tradition as Augustine." —BBC History Magazine (UK)

Penguin • 416 pp. • 978-0-14-312045-2 • $20.00

JOHN B. THOMPSON
MERCHANTS OF CULTURE

The Publishing Business in the Twenty-First Century

Sociology professor Thompson charts the publishing business's transformation since the 1960s. "All you need to know about the industry at a time of momentous change"—Drake McFeely, chairman and president, W. W. Norton & Company.

Plume • 336 pp. • 978-0-452-29772-2 • $16.00

JOHN CAMPBELL
THE IRON LADY: Margaret Thatcher, from Grocer's Daughter to Prime Minister Abridged by David Freeman

Penguin • 576 pp. • 978-0-14-312087-2 • $16.00

LIZZIE COLLINGHAM
THE TASTE OF WAR

World War II and the Battle for Food

A detailed exploration of how the control of food shaped the events of World War II—affecting millions of individuals in Europe and throughout colonial empires across the globe.

Penguin Press • 656 pp. • 978-1-59420-329-9 • $35.00

DANIEL HALPERIN and CRAIG TIMBERG
TINDERBOX

How the West Sparked the AIDS Epidemic and How the World Can Finally Overcome It

Penguin Press • 432pp. • 978-1-59420-327-5 • $27.95

IBN FADLĀN
IBN FADLĀN AND THE LAND OF DARKNESS
 Arab Travellers in the Far North

Newly Translated with an Introduction by Caroline Stone and Paul Lunde

Based on an expedition to the upper Volga River in 922 AD, Ibn Fadlān and the Land of Darkness provides rare and valuable insight into the world of Arab geographers and the medieval lands of northern Europe.

Penguin Classics • 288 pp. • 978-0-14-045507-6 • $16.00

NANCY GOLDSTONE
THE MAID AND THE QUEEN
 The Secret History of Joan of Arc

On the six hundredth anniversary of the birth of Joan of Arc, this fascinating book explores the relationship between Joan and Yolande of Aragon, the extraordinary queen who championed her during the Hundred Years War.

Viking • 320 pp. • 978-0-670-02333-2 • $26.95

Available April 2012

PENGUIN GROUP (USA)

Academic Marketing Department • 375 Hudson Street • New York, New York 10014

www.penguin.com/academic

The Shaping of America

Harper: 978-0-06-179228-1 (hc)
$26.99 ($29.99 Can.) • 448 pages

Devil in the Grove

Thurgood Marshall, the Groveland Boys, and the Dawn of a New America
Gilbert King

"The tragic Groveland saga—with its Faulknerian echoes of racial injustice spinning around an accusation of rape—comes astonishingly alive in Gilbert King's narrative. It is both heartbreaking and unforgettable."

—Wil Haygood, author of King of the Cats: The Life and Times of Adam Clayton Powell, Jr.

Secret Heroes

Everyday Americans Who Shaped Our World
Paul Martin

"Paul Martin creates a fascinating subtext to American history: the literally unsung hero who through imagination, daring, perseverance, and occasional great risk affects the shaping of democracy."

—James Conaway, author of Napa: The Story of an American Eden

William Morrow: 978-0-06-209604-3 (pb)
$14.99 ($16.99 Can.) • 352 pages

The Big Scrum

How Teddy Roosevelt Saved Football
John J. Miller

"[An] enjoyable history of a seldom-explored turning point in American sports history." —Booklist

Harper Perennial: 978-0-06-174452-5 (pb)
$15.99 ($17.99 Can.) • 272 pages

The Human Dimension

William Morrow: 978-0-06-187684-4 (hc)
$26.99 ($29.99 Can.) ■ 352 pages

Voyagers of the Titanic

Passengers, Sailors, Shipbuilders, Aristocrats, and the Worlds They Came From Richard Davenport-Hines

"A shattering human story that is also, when told as well as Davenport-Hines tells it, utterly compelling."

—Sunday Times (London)

Moral Combat

Good and Evil in World War II

Michael Burleigh

"A bold, blunt, and sometimes beautiful defense of morality in history... Mr. Burleigh poses the moral questions to the people that mattered at the great turning points of a vast war." —The Wall Street Journal

Harper Perennial: 978-0-06-058098-8 (pb)
$18.99 ($24.50 Can.) ■ 672 pages

Cleopatra the Great

The Woman Behind the Legend

Joann Fletcher

"With the vision of a unified Egypt before her, she succeeded in a region riven by operatic, chronic conflict. Cleopatra was, indeed, not just a 'baleful beauty'; she was great." —History Today

Harper Perennial: 978-0-06-058559-4 (pb)
$17.99 ■ 464 pages

HARPER

William Morrow WILLIAM MORROW

HARPER PERENNIAL

www.HarperAcademic.com

New from Stanford University Press

Romantic Nationalism in Eastern Europe

Russian, Polish, and Ukrainian Political Imaginations

SERHIY BILENKY

"Greatly enriches our understanding of Russian, Polish, and Ukrainian political imaginations by examining them during their formative period, the age of Romantic nationalism."

—Frank E. Sysyn,
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta

Stanford Studies on Central and Eastern Europe
$65.00 cloth

Divided Together

The United States and the Soviet Union in the United Nations, 1945-1965

ILYA V. GAIDUK

"This volume picks up on familiar threads, synthesizes them, embellishes them with excellent materials from Soviet sources, and presents them clearly."

—Mel Leffler,
University of Virginia
*Cold War International History Project
Copublished with the Woodrow Wilson Center Press*
$60.00 cloth

Totalitarianism and Political Religion

An Intellectual History

A. JAMES GREGOR

"A. James Gregor is indisputably the foremost authority on totalitarian philosophy and practice in the English-speaking world (at least). This magisterial book will add to that reputation."

—Anthony James Joes,
Saint Joseph's University
$65.00 cloth

The Revolt of the Whip

JOSEPH L. LOVE

"A solid contribution to our understanding of color, class, and politics in Brazil's Old Republic."

—Jeffrey D. Needell,
University of Florida
$22.95 paper $70.00 cloth

Sephardism

Spanish Jewish History and the Modern Literary Imagination

Edited by Yael Halevi-Wise

"This book offers a fresh and creative take on the ways that modern authors have imagined Sephardic Jews or employed the trope of Sepharad in order to advance various political, moral, or literary projects."

—Julia Phillips Cohen,
Vanderbilt University
Stanford Studies in Jewish History and Culture
$45.00 cloth

After Empire

The Conceptual Transformation of the Chinese State, 1885-1924

PETER ZARROW

"This is a deeply researched and intellectually ambitious work."

—Henrietta Harrison,
Harvard University
$27.95 paper $85.00 cloth

Divided Memory

French Recollections of World War II from the Liberation to the Present

OLIVIER WIEVIORKA

Translated by GEORGE HOLOCH

"This learned, pithy book is the best treatment I have seen of the phases through which France's memory of the Second World War has traveled to reach its current, complicated, and debilitated form."

—Patrice Higonnet,
Harvard University
$55.00 cloth

Most Stanford titles are available in e-books:
www.sup.org/ebooks

Stanford
University Press

800.621.2736

www.sup.org

New from ILLINOIS

Making Sense of American Liberalism

Edited by JONATHAN BELL and
TIMOTHY STANLEY

Distinguished contributors assess the problems liberals have confronted in the twentieth century, examine their strategies for reform, and chart the successes and potential for future liberal reform.

Hardcover $55.00

Africans to Spanish America Expanding the Diaspora

Edited by SHERWIN K. BRYANT, RACHEL SARAH O'TOOLE, and BEN VINSON III

"A pioneering effort to write the history of Africans in colonial Spanish America using the African diaspora paradigm."—Kris Lane, author of The Colour of Paradise: The Emerald in the Age of Gunpowder Empires

Illus. Hardcover $50.00
The New Black Studies Series

Child Care in Black and White Working Parents and the History of Orphanages

JESSIE B. RAMEY

This innovative study examines the development of institutional childcare in the United States, raising new questions about its role in constructing and perpetrating social inequality.

Illus. Hardcover $55.00
The Working Class in American History

A People's History of Baseball MITCHELL NATHANSON

"Chronicles the historic power struggles among those seeking to define and regulate pro baseball. . . . A fine book."—Library Journal

Hardcover $29.95

Chicago in the Age of Capital Class, Politics, and Democracy during the Civil War and Reconstruction JOHN B. JENTZ and RICHARD SCHNEIROV

Boldly traces the dramatic capitalist transition in a period that saw the rise of a permanent wage-worker class and the formation of an industrial middle class.

Illus. Hardcover $55.00
The Working Class in American History

Pacific Citizens

Larry and Guyo Tajiri and Japanese American Journalism in the World War II Era

Edited, with an Introduction and
Notes, by GREG ROBINSON

Collects key writings of Larry S. Tajiri, ■ leading figure in Nisei political life as the central purveyor of news for and about Japanese Americans during World War II.

Illus. Hardcover $60.00
The Asian American Experience

Saving the World

A Brief History of Communication for Development and Social Change
EMILE G. McANANY

Summarizes the history of the field of communication for development to build a new paradigm of communication for development and social change that includes social entrepreneurship.

*Hardcover $80.00; Paperback $25.00
The History of Communication

A New Language, A New World Italian Immigrants in the United States, 1890–1945

NANCY C. CARNEVALE

"Outstanding from start to finish."—Choice

New in Paperback $25.00
Statue of Liberty–Ellis Island Centennial Series

*Unjacketed

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS PRESS

Publishing Excellence since 1918

www.press.uillinois.edu

European History from Chicago

Inventing Chemistry

Herman Boerhaave and the Reform of the Chemical Arts

JOHN C. POWERS

"In a work of meticulous and imaginative scholarship, Powers has shown how Boerhaave built his reputation by organizing chemistry for the purpose of pedagogy. In Boerhaave's classroom, as he shows, chemistry shrugged off its alchemical heritage and emerged as a science of the Enlightenment."

—Jan Golinski, University of New Hampshire

Cloth $40.00

Reproduction by Design

Sex, Robots, Trees, and Test-Tube Babies in Interwar Britain

ANGUS MCLAREN

"Sometimes melancholy and often hilarious, Reproduction by Design is an indispensably erudite tour de force for understanding modern British sexualities and culture."—Judith A. Allen, Indiana University, Bloomington

Cloth $55.00

Steam-Powered Knowledge

William Chambers and the Business of Publishing, 1820–1860

AILEEN FYFE

"In this pioneering study, Aileen Fyfe offers a superbly accessible guide to the complex and often risky business of providing information to newly literate readers on both sides of the Atlantic."

—James A. Secord, University of Cambridge

Cloth $50.00

FROM THE UNIVERSITY OF EXETER PRESS

The Black Legend of Prince Rupert's Dog

Witchcraft and Propaganda during the English Civil War

MARK STOYLE

"[Stoyle] has an enviable record of identifying new and illuminating lines, of offering fresh interpretations backed up by extensive and impeccable research and of presenting his work clearly and attractively."—Peter Gaunt, University of Chester

Cloth $85.00

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS www.press.uchicago.edu

Medieval and Early Modern Europe

FROM CHICAGO

Authoring the Past

History, Autobiography, and Politics in Medieval Catalonia

JAUME AURELL

"The strength of Jaume Aurell's book lies in its double vision. He re-places Catalan chroniclers in both their local and their European context, and he analyzes their texts with literary skills as well as historical ones."—Peter Burke, University of Cambridge

Cloth $45.00

FROM BODLEIAN LIBRARY

Bodleian Library
UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD

The Romance of the Middle Ages

NICHOLAS PERKINS and ALISON WIGGINS

This beautifully illustrated history explores the conjunctions of violence, love, sex, and piety that marked medieval romance legends as well as the influence of these myths on modern cultural production.

"A gorgeous, utterly delightful book."—James Simpson, Harvard University

Paper $35.00

FROM REAKTION BOOKS

Lords of the Sea

A History of the Barbary Corsairs

ALAN JAMIESON

Lords of the Sea is an engrossing tale of exploration, slavery, and conquest. It recounts the history of the Barbary corsairs, examining their dramatic impact as the maritime vanguard of the Ottoman Empire in the early 1500s through their break from Ottoman control in the early seventeenth century.

Cloth $39.00

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS www.press.uchicago.edu

American History

FROM CHICAGO

Fear of Food

A History of Why We Worry about What We Eat

HARVEY LEVENSTEIN

"Levenstein explores one of the striking anomalies of American culture—its love/hate relationship with eating and the particularly perplexing choices that humans have to make about the food they eat because they can eat everything."

—James Gilbert, University of Maryland

Cloth $25.00

NOW IN PAPERBACK

Banquet at Delmonico's

The Gilded Age and the Triumph of Evolution in America

BARRY WERTH

"What Werth has done, cleverly, in addition to drawing Spencer out from behind Darwin's shadow . . . is to create a narrative double helix of his own."—Los Angeles Times

"Histories of ideas are rarely page turners, but Werth has done the trick."—Kirkus, starred review

Paper $19.00

FROM THE UNIVERSITY OF ALASKA PRESS

On Time Delivery

The Dog Team Mail Carriers

WILLIAM SCHNEIDER

On Time Delivery chronicles the history of the unique postal service in early twentieth-century Alaska, where dog team mail carriers were charged with maintaining the trail systems and carrying the mail until they were replaced in the late 1930s and '40s by airplane mail service.

Paper $24.95

The Fur Farms of Alaska

Two Centuries of History and a Forgotten Stampede

SARAH CRAWFORD ISTO

"For more than 200 years 'soft gold' brought many people to Alaska. . . . Sarah Isto writes of the many efforts, successes, and ultimately of the fur farming industry's failure. . . . This is a story that has long needed to be written."

—Joan M. Antonson, Alaska State Historian

Paper $29.95

Early Christianity

FROM CHICAGO

Economic Origins of Roman Christianity

ROBERT B. EKELUND JR. and ROBERT D. TOLLISON

"An engrossing and insightful account of the branding of early Christianity through entrepreneurship, networking, manipulation of civil governments, and the control of entry into the Roman religion market. This is a major contribution to the study of religion."—Rachel M. McCleary, Harvard University

Cloth $45.00

FROM LIVERPOOL UNIVERSITY PRESS

The Chronicle of Pseudo-Zachariah Rhetor

Church and War in Late Antiquity

Edited by GEOFFREY GREATREX and

Translated by ROBERT R. PHENIX and CORNELIA B. HORN

With Contributions by Sebastian P. Brock and Witold Witakowski

The first translation of this seminal text to a modern language in more than one hundred years, this new edition benefits from improvements in Syriac lexicography and expanded research. Beyond a mere translation, it is a key resource for understanding the development of Christianity in Turkey, Iraq, and the Near East.

Paper $36.95

Chalcedon in Context

Church Councils 400–700

Edited by RICHARD PRICE and MARY WHITBY

"With regard to thoroughness and overall attention, there is no equivalent to this collection available in English: each essay, followed by a comprehensive bibliography, offers yet one more illustration of how Chalcedon continues to speak to all of Christ's church."—Journal of Ecclesiastical History

Paper $34.95

Theophilus of Edessa's Chronicle

The Circulation of Historical Knowledge in Late Antiquity and Early Islam

Translated by ROBERT HOYLAND

Though no longer extant, the work of Theophilus of Edessa, a Greek scholar in the court of the eighth-century Muslim caliphs, is known from extensive citations by later historians. Robert Hoyland has collected and translated these citations to present the scope of the original text.

Paper $34.95

New Paperbacks from Chicago

A Tenth of a Second

A History

JIMENA CANALES

"Although time is indefinitely divisible in theory, in practice it is not, as this book illustrates beautifully. . . . In refereeing the dispute between Bergson and Einstein, Jimena Canales shows the fecundity of this other dimension of time, that of the new history of science."—Bruno Latour, Institut d'études politiques de Paris

Paper $25.00

Duke Ellington's America

HARVEY G. COHEN

"Cohen's volume . . . is substantial, richly sourced, intelligent, and, in many ways, persuasive. And unlike many other writers on Ellington, Cohen gives proper attention to all phases of Ellington's career, and in so doing unveils information that is new or has been overlooked. . . . This is an important work and one that Ellington scholarship will benefit from and draw on for new debates."—Times Higher Education

Paper $22.50

A Slaveholders' Union

Slavery, Politics, and the Constitution in the Early American Republic

GEORGE WILLIAM VAN CLEVE

"Van Cleave argues emphatically and persuasively that 'the Constitution was pro-slavery in its politics, its law, and its economics.' No one has made this point so clearly and with so much evidence and strong analysis to back it up. . . . A dazzling addition to scholarship."—Annette Gordon-Reed, New York Law School

Paper $22.50

Autophobia

Love and Hate in the Automotive Age

BRIAN LADD

"Although most histories of the automobile discuss problems and critics, no work to date has made criticism its central focus, making Autophobia a welcome contribution to the literature. No car lover, Ladd does a laudable job presenting the views of the automobile's proponents as well. But the book's great strength is its multinational scope."—Journal of American History

Paper $15.00

Welsh History from the University of Wales Press

The Entrepreneurial Society of the Rhondda Valleys 1840-1920

Power and Influence in the Porth-Pontypridd Region

RICHARD GRIFFITHS

Most studies of the Welsh coal boom of the late 1800s and early 1900s have concentrated on the workers and the unions. Richard Griffiths focuses his attention instead on the middle class and reveals how several of these individuals were able to build up considerable wealth and power.

Cloth $70.00

Thomas Matthews's Welsh Records in Paris

A Study in Selected Welsh Medieval Records

DYLAN REES and J. GWYNFOR JONES

In 1910 Thomas Matthews published a collection of several Welsh documents held in the Archives Nationales in France. With this volume, the editors have reproduced Matthews's edition and have supplemented it with essays that provide context for both the original works and Matthews's evaluations of them.

Cloth $70.00

NOW IN PAPERBACK

A History of Wales

1815-1906 New Edition

D. GARETH EVANS

A History of Wales: 1815-1906 is the third volume in a series that explores Welsh history from 1485. This textbook offers a major new study of the principal changes of this dynamic era.

"Students and teachers . . . owe Gareth Evans a debt for this volume."

—Welsh History Review

Paper $25.00

DISTRIBUTED BY THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS
www.press.uchicago.edu

NEW FROM HILL AND WANG

A division of Farrar, Straus and Giroux

David J. Silbey
THE BOXER REBELLION AND THE GREAT GAME IN CHINA

$26.95 272 pages cloth

Jon T. Coleman
HERE LIES HUGH GLASS
A Mountain Man, a Bear, and the Rise of the American Nation

$28.00 272 pages cloth

AVAILABLE MAY 2012

Bradford Martin
THE OTHER EIGHTIES
A Secret History of America in the Age of Reagan

$15.95 272 pages paper

Andrew E. Kersten
CLARENCE DARROW
American Iconoclast

$18.00 320 pages paper

AVAILABLE MAY 2012

Jay Sexton
THE MONROE DOCTRINE
Empire and Nation in Nineteenth-Century America

$16.95 304 pages paper

Adrian Burgos, Jr.
CUBAN STAR
How One Negro-League Owner Changed the Face of Baseball

$16.00 336 pages paper

AVAILABLE MAY 2012

Academic Marketing, 175 Fifth Avenue, 21st floor, NY, NY 10010 • email: academic@fsgbooks.com

VISIT OUR WEBSITE: www.MacmillanAcademic.com

NYUPRESS

Keep reading.

Satisfaction Not Guaranteed

Dilemmas of Progress in Modern Society
PETER N. STEARNS

"Wide-ranging, eloquently argued, and deeply insightful."

— Susan J. Matt,
author of Homesickness

$35.00 • CLOTH

NEW IN PAPERBACK

Taxi!

A Social History of the New York City Cabdriver
GRAHAM RUSSELL
GAO HODGES

"[An] informative, solid history."

— Pete Hamill,
New York Times Book Review

$21.00 • PAPER

NEW IN PAPERBACK

Beyond the Bonus March and GI Bill

How Veteran Politics
Shaped the New Deal Era
STEPHEN R. ORTIZ

"Stimulating, clearly written, and meticulously documented."

— The Journal of Military History

$24.00 • PAPER

The Political Thought of Frederick Douglass

In Pursuit of American Liberty
NICHOLAS BUCCOLA

"[A] well-conceived, well-researched, and well-argued new study."

— Peter C. Myers, author of Frederick Douglass

$49.00 • CLOTH

The Fervent Embrace

Liberal Protestants,
Evangelicals, and Israel
CAITLIN CARENEN

"Deeply researched, insightful, and sharply focused."

— Frank Castigliola,
University of Connecticut

$55.00 • CLOTH

Muscular Nationalism

Gender, Violence, and Empire in India and Ireland, 1914–2004
SIKATA BANERJEE

"So gritty and smart....

This is feminist analysis at its sharpest."

— Cynthia Enloe, author of Nimo's War, Emma's War

$49.00 • CLOTH

In the Gender and Political Violence series

Words Made Flesh

Nineteenth-Century Deaf
Education and the Growth of Deaf Culture
R.A.R. EDWARDS

"Gracefully written... offers both a fascinating narrative and a provocative, revisionist thesis."

— Douglas Baynton,
University of Iowa

$55.00 • CLOTH

In the History of Disability series

NEW IN PAPERBACK

The Mystery of the Rosary

Marian Devotion and the Reinvention of Catholicism
NATHAN D. MITCHELL

"Sheds much needed light on the contemporary Catholic Church."

— Kevin Seasoltz, author of A Sense of the Sacred

$24.00 • PAPER

NYU PRESS IS A MEMBER OF THE University Press

Content Consortium

www.nyupress.org

NEW FROM PENN PRESS

ELIZABETH PATTERSON BONAPARTE
An American Aristocrat in the Early Republic
 Charlene M. Boyer Lewis
 Jul 2012 | 312 pages | 14 illus. | Cloth | $34.95

1812
War and the Passions of Patriotism
 Nicole Eustace
 Early American Studies
 May 2012 | 352 pages | 19 illus. | Cloth | $34.95

CONSUMING PLEASURES
Intellectuals and Popular Culture in the Postwar World
 Daniel Horowitz
 The Arts and Intellectual Life in Modern America
 2012 | 528 pages | 15 illus. | Cloth | $34.95

ASTOUNDING WONDER
Imagining Science and Science Fiction in Interwar America
 John Cheng
 2012 | 384 pages | 20 illus. | Cloth | $45.00

PIETY AND PUBLIC FUNDING
Evangelicals and the State in Modern America
 Axel R. Schäfer
 Politics and Culture in Modern America
 May 2012 | 288 pages | Cloth | $45.00

TAX AND SPEND
The Welfare State, Tax Politics, and the Limits of American Liberalism
 Molly C. Micheltore
 Politics and Culture in Modern America
 2012 | 248 pages | 8 illus. | Cloth | $39.95

CALIFORNIA CRUCIBLE
The Forging of Modern American Liberalism
 Jonathan Bell
 Politics and Culture in Modern America
 2012 | 352 pages | Cloth | $47.50

THE RIGHT AND LABOR IN AMERICA
Politics, Ideology, and Imagination
 Edited by Nelson Lichtenstein and Elizabeth Tandy Shermer
 Politics and Culture in Modern America
 May 2012 | 432 pages | Cloth | $49.95

NEW IN PAPERBACK
BLACK CONSERVATIVE INTELLECTUALS IN MODERN AMERICA
 Michael L. Ondaatje
 2011 | 232 pages | Paper | $22.50

NEW IN PAPERBACK
PUBLIC CULTURE
Diversity, Democracy, and Community in the United States
 Edited by Marguerite S. Shaffer
 2011 | 392 pages | 34 illus. | Paper | $26.50

MAKING SEAFOOD SUSTAINABLE
American Experiences in Global Perspective
 Mansel G. Blackford
 American Business, Politics, and Society
 Mar 2012 | 296 pages | 20 illus. | Cloth | $45.00

NEW IN PAPERBACK
CITIZENS OF A CHRISTIAN NATION
Evangelical Missions and the Problem of Race in the Nineteenth Century
 Derek Chang
 Politics and Culture in Modern America
 May 2011 | 248 pages | Paper | $24.95

NEW NETHERLAND AND THE DUTCH ORIGINS OF AMERICAN RELIGIOUS LIBERTY
 Evan Haefeli
 Early American Studies
 May 2012 | 384 pages | 8 illus. | Cloth | $45.00

JOHN WOOLMAN'S PATH TO THE PEACEABLE KINGDOM
A Quaker in the British Empire
 Geoffrey Plank
 Early American Studies
 2012 | 320 pages | 15 illus. | Cloth | $39.95

NEW IN PAPERBACK
DEATH IN THE NEW WORLD
Cross-Cultural Encounters, 1492–1800
 Erik R. Seeman
 Early American Studies
 2012 | 384 pages | 28 illus. | Paper | $24.95

POLITICAL GASTRONOMY
Food and Authority in the English Atlantic World
 Michael A. LaCombe
 Early American Studies
 Jun 2012 | 240 pages | 18 illus. | Cloth | $39.95

NEW IN PAPERBACK
FRIENDS AND STRANGERS
The Making of a Creole Culture in Colonial Pennsylvania
 John Smolenski
 Early American Studies
 2012 | 416 pages | 15 illus. | Paper | $24.95

NEW IN PAPERBACK
SENECA POSSESSED
Indians, Witchcraft, and Power in the Early American Republic
 Matthew Dennis
 Early American Studies
 2012 | 328 pages | 16 illus. | Paper | $24.95

A NATION OF WOMEN
Gender and Colonial Encounters Among the Delaware Indians
 Gunlög Fur
 Early American Studies
 2012 | 264 pages | 17 illus. | Paper | $24.95

NEW IN PAPERBACK
A NEW NATION OF GOODS
The Material Culture of Early America
 David Jaffee
 Early American Studies
 2012 | 424 pages | 117 illus. | Paper | $27.50

UNIVERSITY OF PENN SYLVANIA
PRESS

www.pennpress.org
 1-800-537-5487

VIRGINIA

Slavery by Any Other Name

African Life under Company Rule in Colonial Mozambique

Eric Allina

$49.50 | CLOTH | RECONSIDERATIONS IN SOUTHERN AFRICAN HISTORY

Civil War Talks

Further Reminiscences of George S. Bernard and His Fellow Veterans

Edited by Hampton Newsome, John Horn, and John G. Selby

$35.00 | CLOTH | A NATION DIVIDED

Light and Liberty

Thomas Jefferson and the Power of Knowledge

Edited by Robert M. S. McDonald

$40.00 | CLOTH | JEFFERSONIAN AMERICA

"Those Who Labor for My Happiness"

Slavery at Thomas Jefferson's Monticello

Lucia Stanton

$24.95 | PAPER | JEFFERSONIAN AMERICA

Whispers of Rebellion

Narrating Gabriel's Conspiracy

Michael L. Nicholls

$42.50 | CLOTH | CARTER G. WOODSON INSTITUTE SERIES

Rambles of a Runaway from Southern Slavery

Henry Goings

Edited by Calvin Schermerhorn, Michael Plunkett, and Edward Gaynor

$45.00 | CLOTH | CARTER G. WOODSON INSTITUTE SERIES

Brothers Born of One Mother

British-Native American Relations in the Colonial Southeast

Michelle LeMaster

$39.50 | CLOTH

Worth a Dozen Men

Women and Nursing in the Civil War South

Libra R. Hilde

$39.50 | CLOTH | A NATION DIVIDED

The Fuggers of Augsburg

Pursuing Wealth and Honor in Renaissance Germany

Mark Häberlein

$39.50 | CLOTH | STUDIES IN EARLY MODERN GERMAN HISTORY

Parallel Worlds

The Remarkable Gibbs-Hunts and the Enduring (In)significance of Melanin

Adele Logan Alexander

$19.95 | PAPER

KANSAS

Scarlet Fields

The Combat Memoir of a World War I Medal of Honor Hero

John Lewis Barkley

Introduction and notes by Steven Trout

Afterword by Joan Barkley Wells

"Barkley was one of the war's outstanding heroes and his memoir is one of the most readable and detailed accounts of an American soldier's experiences to emerge from it."

—Edward M. Coffman, author of The War to End All Wars

"A gripping combat narrative that portrays the war as both horrific slaughter and rite of passage."—Jennifer D. Keene, author of World War I: The American Soldier Experience

Modern War Studies

240 pages, 14 photos, Cloth $29.95

Corinth 1862

Siege, Battle, Occupation

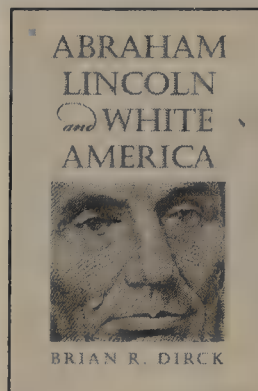

Timothy B. Smith

"This is Civil War military history at its finest."—William C. Davis, author of Lincoln's Men and Jefferson Davis

"A splendid blending of military and social history that brings to life the tragedies and humanity of a war-torn town."—Michael B. Ballard, author of Vicksburg: The Campaign That Opened the Mississippi

Modern War Studies

472 pages, 22 photos, 8 maps, Cloth $39.95

Abraham Lincoln and White America

Brian R. Dirck

"Most historians writing about Lincoln have overlooked the significance of his racial identity. Without being tendentious or overly theoretical, Dirck carefully puts Lincoln's whiteness into historical context. It's an approach so obviously useful to understanding Lincoln that future generations will be amazed it took so long for someone to write such a book."—Gerald J. Prokopowicz, author of Did Lincoln Own Slaves? And Other Frequently Asked Questions about Abraham Lincoln

"An imaginative work. Dirck has a true historian's feel for the culture in which Lincoln was born and bred—its language, its folk customs, and, most important, its racial assumptions."—James Oakes, author of The Radical and the Republican

240 pages, 9 photos, Cloth $29.95

The President's Czars Undermining Congress and the Constitution

Mitchel A. Sollenberger and Mark J. Rozell

"This important and timely book tackles the subject of executive 'czars' by placing them in legal, political, and historical context. Thoroughly researched and strongly argued."—Robert J. Spitzer, author of Saving the Constitution from Lawyers

356 pages, Cloth $39.95, Paper $24.95

KANSAS

The FBI's Obscene File

J. Edgar Hoover and the Bureau's Crusade against Smut

Douglas M. Charles

"Originality. Not many scholars achieve it, but Charles impresses with this example of breakthrough research. His interpretive thrust, seeing the FBI as the creature of societal changes, personality, and politics, throws light on topics as diverse as the Lavender Scare of the 1950s and the neoconservative appeal to moralism in the recent presidency of George Bush. If you are at all interested in the deeper currents of American history, read this book."—Rhodri Jeffreys-Jones, author of The FBI: A History
200 pages, Cloth $24.95

Frontier Manhattan

Yankee Settlement to Kansas Town, 1854–1894

Kevin G. W. Olson

"Olson paints a clear and delightful word picture of how Manhattan came to be and how it grew. The book will undoubtedly become a classic."—David Dary, author of True Tales of Old-Time Kansas
280 pages, 45 photos, 1 map, Cloth $29.95

Time's Shadow

Remembering a Family Farm in Kansas

Arnold J. Bauer

"Bauer's story is told clearly and convincingly and at times reaches a level of touching eloquence. . . . Will be a contribution to the understanding of the changes in rural life and family farms on the Great Plains from the 1910s to 1960s."—Rex Buchanan, author of Roadside Kansas: A Traveler's Guide to Its Geology and Landmarks
176 pages, 9 photos, Cloth $24.95

Landmark Law Cases and American Society

Peter Charles Hoffer and N. E. H. Hull, series editors

The Woman Who Dared to Vote

The Trial of Susan B. Anthony

N. E. H. Hull

"A truly refreshing, invigorating, and spirited story! Hull's close legal study of the charges against Anthony breaks new ground. A must read for students of women's history and law alike."—Kathleen Barry, author of Susan B. Anthony: A Biography of a Singular Feminist
232 pages, Cloth $34.95, Paper $17.95

Plessy v. Ferguson

Race and Inequality in Jim Crow America

William James Hull Hoffer

"With a keen eye for personalities and telling details, Hoffer forcefully situates Plessy v. Ferguson and its doctrine of 'equal, but separate' within the long and troubling history of America's struggle with race down to the present day."—Charles A. Lofgren, author of The Plessy Case: A Legal-Historical Interpretation
224 pages, Cloth $34.95, Paper $17.95

University Press of Kansas

Phone 785-864-4155 • Fax 785-864-4586 • www.kansaspress.ku.edu

American Historical Association

New Titles in the Essays on Global and Comparative History series

Locating the United States in Twentieth-Century World History
by Carl J. Guarneri

The Impact of the Two World Wars in a Century of Violence
by John H. Morrow Jr.

World Migration in the Long Twentieth Century
by Jose C. Moya and Adam McKeown

Women in the Twentieth-Century World
by Bonnie G. Smith

Twentieth-Century Urbanization: In Search of an Urban Paradigm for an Urban World
by Howard Spodek

A Century of Environmental Transitions
by Richard P. Tucker

All of the above titles are $10 (AHA members receive a 30% discount).
For more information on these and other AHA titles, and to purchase, visit the AHA's online Pubshop at www.historians.org/pubshop.

Nominations invited for the American Historical Association's

John F. Richards Prize

in South Asian History

The John F. Richards Prize in South Asian History recognizes the most distinguished work of scholarship on South Asian history published in English during the previous calendar year. South Asia is defined as the geographic area included in the modern states of Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Burma, India, the Maldives, Nepal, Pakistan, and Sri Lanka. Eligibility will be defined quite broadly, including books on any period or field of South Asian historical studies and works which integrate South Asian history with broader global issues and movements. In making its selection, the prize committee will pay particular attention to depth of research, methodological innovation, conceptual originality and literary excellence. Works that reinterpret old themes or develop new theoretical perspectives are welcome. Anthologies, encyclopedias and other edited volumes will not be considered. Books published between May 1, 2011, and April 30, 2012, are eligible for the 2012 award.

The deadline for submission of entries is Monday, May 15, 2012.

Each entry must be labeled clearly: "Richards Award Entry." Entries will not be returned.

Recipients will be announced at the 127th Annual Meeting (January 3–6, 2013) in New Orleans.

For submission guidelines and more information about the prize, visit:

www.historians.org/Richards

American Historical Association

Call for Nominations for the American Historical Association's

Herbert Feis Award

for Distinguished Contributions to Public History

The American Historical Association invites public historians to nominate themselves or colleagues for this prestigious award for distinguished contributions to public history during the previous ten years.

The award is named in memory of Herbert Feis (1893–1972), public servant and historian of recent American foreign policy.

The terms of the award define both “contribution” and “public history” broadly. The award can recognize either a significant project or long-term achievement.

Previous honorees include: Alfred Goldberg, Historical Office of the Office of the Secretary of Defence (2011); Heather Huyck, College of William and Mary (2010); Noel J. Stowe, Arizona State University (2009); Richard Kohn, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill (2008); David H. DeVorkin, National Air and Space Museum (2007), and Victoria A. Harden, American University and National Institutes of Health (retired) (2006).

The application deadline is May 15, 2012.

Application instructions and further details can be found online at www.historians.org/Feis.

American Historical Association

2012 Book Prizes & Awards

THE DEADLINE FOR SUBMISSIONS IS MAY 15, 2012

PRIZES

THE HERBERT BAXTER ADAMS PRIZE honors a distinguished book by an American author in the field of European history.

THE GEORGE LOUIS BEER PRIZE honors the best work by a U.S. citizen or permanent resident on European international history since 1895.

THE ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE AWARD is conferred annually for the best work on American history from 1492 to the present (history of the United States, Canada, or Latin America).

THE PAUL BIRDSALL PRIZE is offered biennially for a major work in European military and strategic history since 1870.

THE JAMES HENRY BREASTED PRIZE recognizes an outstanding book in any field of history prior to CE 1000.

THE RAYMOND J. CUNNINGHAM PRIZE is awarded for the best article written by an undergraduate student and published in a history department journal.

THE JOHN K. FAIRBANK PRIZE IN EAST ASIAN HISTORY is awarded for an outstanding book in the history of China proper, Vietnam, Chinese Central Asia, Mongolia, Manchuria, Korea, or Japan substantially after 1800.

THE MORRIS D. FORKOSCH PRIZE is offered for the best book in the fields of British, British Imperial, or British Commonwealth history since 1485.

THE LEO GERSHOY AWARD honors the most outstanding work in English on any aspect of the field of 17th- and 18th-century western European history.

THE JOAN KELLY MEMORIAL PRIZE IN WOMEN'S HISTORY recognizes the best work in women's history or feminist theory.

THE MARTIN A. KLEIN PRIZE IN AFRICAN HISTORY recognizes the most distinguished work of scholarship on African history published in English.

THE LITTLETON-GRISWOLD PRIZE honors the best book in any subject on the history of American law and society.

THE J. RUSSELL MAJOR PRIZE recognizes the best work in English on any aspect of French history.

THE HELEN AND HOWARD R. MARRARO PRIZE celebrates the best work in any epoch of Italian history, Italian cultural history, or Italian-American relations.

THE GEORGE L. MOSSE PRIZE honors a major work in European intellectual and cultural history since the Renaissance.

THE PRIMIO DEL REY honors a distinguished book in English in the field of early Spanish history.

THE JAMES A. RAWLEY PRIZE IN ATLANTIC HISTORY honors historical writing exploring the integration of Atlantic worlds before the 20th century.

THE JOHN F. RICHARDS PRIZE recognizes the most distinguished work of scholarship on South Asian history published in English during the previous calendar year.

THE JAMES HARVEY ROBINSON PRIZE is awarded biennially for the teaching aid which has made the most outstanding contribution to the teaching and learning of history in any field for public or educational purposes.

THE WESLEY-LOGAN PRIZE honors an outstanding book on some aspect of the history of the dispersion, settlement, and adjustment, or return of peoples originally from Africa.

AWARDS

THE EQUITY AWARDS recognize individuals and institutions that have achieved excellence in recruiting and retaining underrepresented racial and ethnic groups into the historic profession.

THE HERBERT FEIS AWARD recognizes distinguished contributions to public history during the previous ten years.

THE JOHN E. O'CONNOR FILM AWARD recognizes outstanding interpretations of history through the medium of film or video.

THE ROY ROSENZWEIG PRIZE FOR INNOVATION IN DIGITAL HISTORY honors innovative work that has a thoughtful, critical, and rigorous engagement with technology and the practice of history.

There are no application forms. Entrants must submit one copy of their work to each committee member. Further information and submission guidelines are available on the AHA web site at www.historians.org/prizes.

Index of Advertisers

American Historical Association
1(a), 28(a)–31(a)

Bedford/St. Martin's Covers 2 & 3

Duke University Press 4(a)

HarperCollins Publishers 12(a)–13(a)

Johns Hopkins University Press 5(a)

Louisiana State University
Press 6(a)

Macmillan Academic 22(a)

New York University Press 23(a)

Oxford University Press 9(a)

Penguin Academic 10(a)–11(a)

Princeton University
Press 2(a)–3(a), Cover 4

Stanford University Press 14(a)

University of Chicago
Press 16(a)–21(a)

University of Illinois Press 15(a)

University of North Carolina
Press 7(a)–8(a)

University of Pennsylvania
Press 24(a)

University Press of Kansas 26(a)–27(a)

University of Virginia Press 25(a)

BEDFORD/ST. MARTIN'S

serious about history | bedfordstmartins.com

Rich and vivid social history, designed for understanding

[bedfordstmartins.com/
mckaywestunderstanding](http://bedfordstmartins.com/mckaywestunderstanding)

Understanding Western Society A Brief History

John P. McKay, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

Bennett D. Hill, late of Georgetown University

John Buckler, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

Clare Haru Crowston, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

Merry E. Wiesner-Hanks, University of Wisconsin – Milwaukee

Joe Perry, Georgia State University

 We know you have a budget: consider an e-book.

Based on the successful A History of Western Society, this briefer, less expensive edition offers a distinctive pedagogy that captures students' interest and helps them focus on significant developments.

Free when packaged with Understanding Western Society

[bedfordstmartins.com/
mckaywestdocs/catalog](http://bedfordstmartins.com/mckaywestdocs/catalog)

New from the Bedford Series in History and Culture

The Young Turks' Crime against Humanity

The Armenian Genocide and Ethnic Cleansing in the Ottoman Empire
Taner Akçam

"This is an extraordinary book in many ways. It is an important contribution to the documentation of the Armenian Genocide and stands as a marker to what we now know. And it is simply stunning to read through the documents gathered by Akçam and to hear the voices of those who ordered the deportations and killings."

—Ronald Suny, University of Michigan

Cloth $39.50 978-0-691-15333-9

Krupp

A History of the Legendary German Firm
Harold James

"Drawing on his deep knowledge of German economic and political history, Harold James has written an important book of impressive range and scope that focuses not merely on the Krupp family but also on the role of technological change, the company's relationships with banks and governments, and the effects of international competition and war."

—V. R. Berghahn, Columbia University

Cloth $35.00 978-0-691-15340-7

Foreign Relations

American Immigration in Global Perspective
Donna R. Gabaccia

"No one has done more than Donna Gabaccia to develop a global framework for understanding the history of American immigration. In this book, she brings together her earlier work on international migration with a new interest in American foreign relations. The result is a bold, sweeping, and provocative recasting of America's encounter with immigrants past and present."

—Gary Gerstle, author of American Crucible: Race and Nation in the Twentieth Century

Cloth $29.95 978-0-691-13419-2

The First Modern Jew

Spinoza and the History of an Image
Daniel B. Schwartz

"This is a spectacular book, deeply researched and brilliantly written, on a riveting subject—the historical reception of Spinoza from the seventeenth to the twentieth centuries. Schwartz demonstrates his command of European philosophy, modern European Jewish history, Hebrew and Yiddish literature, and Zionist culture. A tour de force."

—David Biale, University of California, Davis

Cloth $39.50 978-0-691-14291-3

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS

See our E-Books at princeton.edu

The American Historical Review

CURRENT YR/VOL

Marygrove College Library
8425 West McNichols Road
Detroit, MI 48221

Published for the
AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

American Historical Association

New Series

American History Now

edited by Eric Foner & Lisa McGirr

Continuing where The New American History left off twenty years ago, American History Now is an informative, up-to-date collection of eighteen essays that examine new historiographical developments in every major field of American history. With an entirely new group of authors, the series challenges prevailing assumptions in earlier scholarship, analyzes new burgeoning fields of study—such as environmental history, American religion, and capitalism—and provides new approaches to the study of established fields such as women's history, African American history, and immigration history.

Originally produced by Temple University Press, each essay is now available as a separate pamphlet:

SQUARING THE CIRCLES: THE REACH OF COLONIAL AMERICA

By Alan Taylor

AMERICAN REVOLUTION AND EARLY REPUBLIC

By Woody Holton

JACKSONIAN AMERICA

By Seth Rockman

SLAVERY, THE CIVIL WAR, AND RECONSTRUCTION

By Adam Rothman

THE POSSIBILITIES OF POLITICS: DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA, 1877–1917

By Robert D. Johnston

THE INTERWAR YEARS

By Lisa McGirr

THE UNCERTAIN FUTURE OF AMERICAN POLITICS, 1940 TO 1973

By Mug Jacobs

1973 TO THE PRESENT

By Kim Phillips-Fein

THE UNITED STATES IN THE WORLD

By Erez Manela

THE “CULTURAL TURN”

By Lawrence B. Glickman

AMERICAN RELIGION

By John T. McGreevy

FRONTIERS, BORDERLANDS, WESTS

By Stephen Aron

ENVIRONMENTAL HISTORY

By Sarah T. Phillips

HISTORY OF AMERICAN CAPITALISM

By Evan Beckert

WOMEN'S AND GENDER HISTORY

By Rebecca Edwards

IMMIGRATION AND ETHNIC HISTORY

By Mae M. Ngai

AMERICAN INDIANS AND THE STUDY OF U.S. HISTORY

By Ned Blackhawk

AFRICAN AMERICAN HISTORY

By Kevin Gaines

Each essay in the American History Now series is an invaluable resource for students, teachers, and everyone interested in learning more about the American past. For more information on these essays, and to purchase, visit the AHA's online publications store at:

www.historians.org/pubstore

The American Historical Review

AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION
Founded in 1884. Chartered by Congress in 1889.

Elected Officers

President: WILLIAM CRONON, University of Wisconsin–Madison
President-Elect: KENNETH POMERANZ, University of California, Irvine
Vice-Presidents: JOHN R. MCNEILL, Georgetown University, Research Division
PATRICIA NELSON LIMERICK, University of Colorado at Boulder, Teaching Division
JACQUELINE JONES, University of Texas at Austin, Professional Division

Appointed Officers

Executive Director: JAMES R. GROSSMAN
AHR Editor: ROBERT A. SCHNEIDER, Indiana University, Bloomington
Controller: RANDY NORELL

Elected Council Members

ANTHONY GRAFTON
Princeton University
Immediate Past President

SARA ABOSCH
University of Memphis

STEPHEN ARON
UCLA and Autry National Center

CHERYLL ANN CODY
Houston Community College– West Loop Campus

MARTHA C. HOWELL
Columbia University

ANNE F. HYDE
Colorado College

PETER A. PORTER JR.
*Montville Township, N.J.,
High School and Seton Hall University*

ANDREW J. ROTTER
Colgate University

LAURA ISABEL SERNA
University of Southern California

THOMAS J. SUGRUE
University of Pennsylvania

Cover Illustration: For more than a generation, the concept of “turns” has been employed to capture dramatic shifts in historical thinking, particularly in the United States. The most prominent of these were the cultural and linguistic “turns,” which, following a long period when social history was dominant, called for a radical reorientation of historical thinking toward language, representations, texts, discourse, and the like. The six contributors to the AHR Forum in this issue consider the meaning, legitimacy, and historicity of “turn talk” and its effects on how we think and write about history. The “no right turn” sign that serves as our cover image is not meant to be read in any ideological sense. Nor is it intended literally, to signal a direction. Rather, it is meant to signify that there is “no correct turn,” alluding to the variety of interpretations represented in the forum and the view that the very nature of historiographical turns is open to dispute.

The American Historical Review is the official publication of the American Historical Association and appears in February, April, June, October, and December of each year. The journal is published by The University of Chicago Press, 1427 E. 60th Street, Chicago, IL 60637 on behalf of the American Historical Association, 400 A St. SE, Washington, DC 20003 (phone 202-544-2422). Our editorial offices are located at Indiana University, where our mailing address is 914 E. Atwater Ave., Bloomington, IN 47401. Phone: 812-855-7609; fax: 812-855-5827; e-mail: ahr@indiana.edu. Our web address is www.americanhistoricalreview.org. The AHR is sent to members of the American Historical Association and to institutions holding subscriptions.

Membership dues: Contributing Member, $300 annually; for incomes over $150,000, $215; over $100,000, $185; over $70,000, $158; over $45,000, $117; over $25,000, $86; under $25,000, $47; for students, $40; for Early Career Members (available only after three years of student membership), $50; for teachers of K–12 (AHA/SHE) without the AHR, $72; for K–12 with the AHR, $103; for joint members or spouse/partners, $50; for associate members (nonhistorians), $89. A life membership is $3,500. Non-U.S. members add $20 for postage. The proportion of dues allocated to the AHR is $17. Members also receive Perspectives on History and the program of the annual meeting.

Further information on membership is available at <http://www.historians.org/>, or at the back of the journal on page 1(a), immediately preceding the advertisements.

Institutional subscription rates: Institutional print + electronic and electronic-only subscriptions to the AHR are available in 2012 through JSTOR’s Current Scholarship Program and include unlimited online access to current issues as well as the AHR’s full back run. Rates are tiered according to an institution’s type and research output: $347 to $694 (print + electronic), $287 to $577 (electronic-only). Institutional print-only is $347. Additional taxes and/or postage for non-U.S. subscriptions may apply. Single copies of individual issues published within the past three years are available from the University of Chicago Press for $83 per copy; copies of issues older than three years may be purchased from Periodicals Services Company, 11 Main St., Germantown, NY 12526. For more information, please visit <http://www.journals.uchicago.edu/AHR/order.html>.

Manuscript submissions: For basic information on the submission and publication of manuscripts, see p. 1(a) at the back of the journal, immediately preceding the advertisements. Full guidelines and policies can be found at <http://www.americanhistoricalreview.org> or will be sent upon request. Unsolicited book reviews are not accepted.

For permission to reprint: Contact Permissions Coordinator, Journals Division, University of Chicago Press, 1427 E. 60th Street, Chicago, IL 60637 USA. Fax: 773-834-3489; e-mail: journalpermissions@press.uchicago.edu.

For inquiries about advertising: Contact Journals Advertising, University of Chicago Press, 1427 E. 60th Street, Chicago, IL 60637. Phone: 773-702-7361; fax: 773-702-0172; e-mail: j-advertising@press.uchicago.edu.

The AHR disclaims responsibility for statements, of either fact or opinion, made by contributors.

© AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION 2012
All rights reserved

Periodicals postage paid at Chicago, IL, and at additional mailing offices.

Postmaster: Please send notification (Form 3579) regarding undelivered journals to: American Historical Association, 400 A St. SE, Washington, DC 20003. Publication identification number: American Historical Review (ISSN 0002-8762).

The paper used in this publication meets the minimum requirements of the American National Standard for Information Sciences—Permanence of Paper for Printed Library Materials, ANSI Z39.48–1984.

The American Historical Review

AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

Editor: ROBERT A. SCHNEIDER

Associate Editor: LARA KRIEDEL

Reviews Editor: MOUREEN COULTER

Articles Editor: JANE LYLE

Operations Manager: CRIS COFFEY

Production Assistant: JESSICA SMITH

Editorial Assistants: MARC L. ANTONE, BRIAN E. CWIEK, MARIA D. DUARTE, BRENDAN GILLIS, AMANDA J. KOCH, CHRISTOPHER A. MOLNAR, SCOTT R. REYNOLDS

Board of Editors

JONATHAN C. BROWN
*University of Texas
at Austin*

HAROLD J. COOK
Brown University

PHILIP ETHINGTON
University of Southern California

PAUL FREEDMAN
Yale University

JOCHEN HELLBECK
Rutgers University

DAGMAR HERZOG
The Graduate Center, CUNY

JANE KAMENSKY
Brandeis University

WILLIAM J. NOVAK
University of Michigan

JEREMY POPKIN
University of Kentucky

SUMATHI RAMASWAMY
Duke University

RUTH ROGASKI
Vanderbilt University

MEGAN VAUGHAN
King's College, University of Cambridge

| | |
|----------------|------|
| In This Issue | xiii |
| In Back Issues | xvi |

Article

| | |
|--|-----|
| The International Politics of Vaccine Testing in Interwar Algiers BY CLIFFORD ROSENBERG | 671 |
|--|-----|

AHR Forum: Historiographic “Turns” in Critical Perspective

| | |
|--|-----|
| Introduction | 698 |
| When Was the Linguistic Turn? A Genealogy BY JUDITH SURKIS | 700 |
| From Optic to Topic: The Foreclosure Effect of Historiographic Turns BY GARY WILDER | 723 |
| The Kids Are All Right: On the “Turning” of Cultural History BY JAMES W. COOK | 746 |
| Another Set of Imperial Turns? BY DURBA GHOSH | 772 |
| Comment: Not Yet Far Enough BY JULIA ADENEY THOMAS | 794 |
| Comment: Generational Turns BY NATHAN PERL-ROSENTHAL | 804 |

Featured Reviews

| | | | |
|--|-----|---|-----|
| LAUREN BENTON. A Search for Sovereignty: Law and Geography in European Empires, 1400–1900. By Miles Ogborn | 814 | AMANDA FOREMAN. A World on Fire: Britain's Crucial Role in the American Civil War. By Timothy Mason Roberts | 816 |
|--|-----|---|-----|

Reviews of Books

METHODS/THEORY

- KERWIN LEE KLEIN. From History to Theory.
By Mark Day 819
- PERO GAGLO DAGBOVIE. African American History Reconsidered.
By Yohuru Williams 820
- MICHAEL ROTHBERG. Multidirectional Memory: Remembering the Holocaust in the Age of Decolonization.
By Harold Marcuse 820
- DOMINIC SACHSENMAIER. Global Perspectives on Global History: Theories and Approaches in a Connected World.
By Arif Dirlik 821
- DAVID PALUMBO-LIU, BRUCE ROBBINS, and NIRVANA TANOUKHI, editors. Immanuel Wallerstein and the Problem of the World: System, Scale, Culture.
By Peter Wagner 822

COMPARATIVE/WORLD

- JEREMY BLACK. Fighting for America: The Struggle for Mastery in North America, 1519–1871.
By James D. Drake 824
- JAMES SIMPSON. Creating Wine: The Emergence of a World Industry, 1840–1914.
By Henriette de Bruyn Kops-Rahusen 824
- JIMENA CANALES. A Tenth of a Second: A History.
By Jutta Schickore 825
- JESSICA B. TEISCH. Engineering Nature: Water, Development, and the Global Spread of American Environmental Expertise.
By Jennifer Karns Alexander 826
- DAVID STEVENSON. With Our Backs to the Wall: Victory and Defeat in 1918.
By John Horne 827
- STEFAN GOEBEL and DEREK KEENE, editors. Cities in Battlefields: Metropolitan Scenarios, Experiences, and Commemorations of Total War.
By Tammy M. Proctor 828
- RONALD IAN HEIFERMAN. The Cairo Conference of 1943: Roosevelt, Churchill, Chiang Kai-shek, and Madame Chiang.
By Fraser J. Harbutt 829
- STEPHAN FEUCHTWANG. After the Event: The Transmission of Grievous Loss in Germany, China, and Taiwan.
By Vera Schwarz 829
- SARAH B. SNYDER. Human Rights Activism and the End of the Cold War: A Transnational History of the Helsinki Network.
By Max Paul Friedman 830
- JAMES SIEKMEIER. The Bolivian Revolution and the United States, 1952 to the Present.
By Robert O. Kirkland 831

ASIA

- K. E. BRASHIER. Ancestral Memory in Early China.
By Michael Nylan 832
- SOPHIE VOLPP. Worldly Stage: Theatricality in Seventeenth-Century China.
By Patricia Sieber 832

- HO-FUNG HUNG. Protest with Chinese Characteristics: Demonstrations, Riots, and Petitions in the Mid-Qing Dynasty.
By Helen Dunstan 833
- ETHAN ISAAC SEGAL. Coins, Trade, and the State: Economic Growth in Early Medieval Japan.
By Sybil Anne Thornton 834
- KÄREN WIGEN. A Malleable Map: Geographies of Restoration in Central Japan, 1600–1912.
By Daniel Botsman 835
- DAQING YANG. Technology of Empire: Telecommunications and Japanese Expansion in Asia, 1883–1945.
By Barak Kushner 836
- MITHI MUKHERJEE. India in the Shadows of Empire: A Legal and Political History 1774–1950.
By Nandini Chatterjee 837
- PARNA SENGUPTA. Pedagogy for Religion: Missionary Education and the Fashioning of Hindus and Muslims in Bengal.
By Nita Kumar 838
- HOWARD SPODEK. Ahmedabad: Shock City of Twentieth-Century India.
By Lisa Trivedi 839

OCEANIA AND THE PACIFIC ISLANDS

- CHRISTINE WRIGHT. Wellington's Men in Australia: Peninsular War Veterans and the Making of Empire c. 1820–40.
By Angela Woollacott 839

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

- KAREN A. BALCOM. The Traffic in Babies: Cross-Border Adoption and Baby-Selling between the United States and Canada, 1930–1972.
By Judith Modell Schachter 840
- VERONICA STRONG-BOAG. Fostering Nation? Canada Confronts Its History of Childhood Disadvantage.
By Lori Chambers 841
- ARTHUR PONTYNEN and ROD MILLER. Western Culture at the American Crossroads: Conflicts over the Nature of Science and Reason.
By Carl J. Richard 842
- DAVID F. HOLLAND. Sacred Borders: Continuing Revelation and Canonical Restraint in Early America.
By Richard A. Bailey 843
- ELIZABETH A. CLARK. Founding the Fathers: Early Church History and Protestant Professors in Nineteenth-Century America.
By Benjamin Justice 843
- ANN OSTENDORF. Sounds American: National Identity and the Music Cultures of the Lower Mississippi River Valley, 1800–1860.
By Shirley E. Thompson 844
- BEVERLY C. TOMEK. Colonization and Its Discontents: Emancipation, Emigration, and Antislavery in Antebellum Pennsylvania.
By Friederike Baer 845

- JENNIFER HULL DORSEY. Hirelings: African American Workers and Free Labor in Early Maryland.
By John Craig Hammond 846
- PAUL FINKELMAN and DONALD R. KENNON, editors. In the Shadow of Freedom: The Politics of Slavery in the National Capital.
By David F. Ericson 847
- LORI LEE WILSON. The Joaquín Band: The History behind the Legend.
By Carlos Manuel Salomon 848
- MATTHEW WARSHAUER. Connecticut in the American Civil War: Slavery, Sacrifice, and Survival.
By Benjamin Cloyd 849
- PATRICK Q. MASON. The Mormon Menace: Violence and Anti-Mormonism in the Postbellum South.
By Steven C. Harper 850
- FRANK NINKOVICH. Global Dawn: The Cultural Foundation of American Internationalism, 1865–1890.
By Leslie Butler 851
- STEVEN A. RIESS. The Sport of Kings and the Kings of Crime: Horse Racing, Politics, and Organized Crime in New York, 1865–1913.
By David G. Schwartz 852
- SUSAN MILLAR WILLIAMS and STEPHEN G. HOFFIUS. Upheaval in Charleston: Earthquake and Murder on the Eve of Jim Crow.
By W. Scott Poole 853
- MARY E. FREDERICKSON. Looking South: Race, Gender, and the Transformation of Labor from Reconstruction to Globalization.
By Alex Lichtenstein 853
- ERIC J. MORSER. Hinterland Dreams: The Political Economy of a Midwestern City.
By John M. McCarthy 854
- S. PAUL O'HARA. Gary, the Most American of All American Cities.
By Eric Morser 855
- PHILIP VANDERMEER. Desert Visions and the Making of Phoenix, 1860–2009.
By Margaret O'Mara 856
- DONA BROWN. Back to the Land: The Enduring Dream of Self-Sufficiency in Modern America.
By Brian Q. Cannon 857
- CHRISTINE SKWIOT. The Purposes of Paradise: U.S. Tourism and Empire in Cuba and Hawai'i.
By Cyrus Veaser 858
- ROXANNE WILLIS. Alaska's Place in the West: From the Last Frontier to the Last Great Wilderness.
By Mark Harvey 859
- CYNTHIA M. BLAIR. I've Got to Make My Livin': Black Women's Sex Work in Turn-of-the-Century Chicago.
By Mara L. Keire 860
- RUTH CROCKER. Mrs. Russell Sage: Women's Activism and Philanthropy in Gilded Age and Progressive Era America.
By Sylvia D. Hoffert 860
- TANYA SHEEHAN. Doctored: The Medicine of Photography in Nineteenth-Century America.
By Jennifer Green-Lewis 861
- JENNIFER BUREK PIERCE. What Adolescents Ought to Know: Sexual Health Texts in Early Twentieth-Century America.
By Heather Munro Prescott 862
- BELINDA A. STILLION SOUTHARD. Militant Citizenship: Rhetorical Strategies of the National Woman's Party, 1913–1920.
By Ruth Crocker 863
- JULIA C. OTT. When Wall Street Met Main Street: The Quest for an Investors' Democracy.
By Edwin J. Perkins 864
- BETH LINKER. War's Waste: Rehabilitation in World War I America.
By Jennifer D. Keene 865
- KEITH WAILOO. How Cancer Crossed the Color Line.
By Kirsten E. Gardner 865
- JULIE BUCKNER ARMSTRONG. Mary Turner and the Memory of Lynching.
By Rebecca Hill 866
- TRACY A. THOMAS and TRACEY JEAN BOISSEAU, editors. Feminist Legal History: Essays on Women and Law.
By Amy Dru Stanley 867
- TIMOTHY R. BUCKNER and PETER CASTER, editors. Fathers, Preachers, Rebels, Men: Black Masculinity in U.S. History and Literature, 1820–1945.
By Gerald R. Butters, Jr. 868
- ANASTASIA C. CURWOOD. Stormy Weather: Middle-Class African American Marriages between the Two World Wars.
By Karen Dunak 869
- REBECCA T. ALPERT. Out of Left Field: Jews and Black Baseball.
By Amy Bass 870
- WILLIAM J. MELLO. New York Longshoremen: Class and Power on the Docks.
By David Palmer 871
- ALEXANDER J. FIELD. A Great Leap Forward: 1930s Depression and U.S. Economic Growth.
By Eric Rauchway 872
- JAMES T. SPARROW. Warfare State: World War II Americans and the Age of Big Government.
By Michael G. Carew 873
- MELISSA A. MCEUEN. Making War, Making Women: Femininity and Duty on the American Home Front, 1941–1945.
By Rachel Waltner Goossen 874
- KENNETH OSGOOD and ANDREW K. FRANK, editors. Selling War in a Media Age: The Presidency and Public Opinion in the American Century.
By Melvin Small 875
- RONALD H. LIMBAUGH. Tungsten in Peace and War, 1918–1946.
By Timothy James LeCain 876
- SHANE J. MADDOCK. Nuclear Apartheid: The Quest for American Atomic Supremacy from World War II to the Present.
By David Tal 877
- NAOKO WAKE. Private Practices: Harry Stack Sullivan, the Science of Homosexuality, and American Liberalism.
By Carolyn Herbst Lewis 878
- MARTIN WOESSNER. Heidegger in America.
By Thomas Wheatland 879
- GRACE ELIZABETH HALE. A Nation of Outsiders: How the White Middle Class Fell in Love with Rebellion in Postwar America.
By Dewar MacLeod 879
- CARRIE PITZULO. Bachelors and Bunnies: The Sexual Politics of Playboy.
By Bill Osgerby 880

- ERIN HATTON. The Temp Economy: From Kelly Girls to Permatemps in Postwar America.
By James P. Kraft 881
- PETER EISENSTADT. Rochdale Village: Robert Moses, 6,000 Families, and New York City's Great Experiment in Integrated Housing.
By Christopher Bonastia 882
- DAYO F. GORE. Radicalism at the Crossroads: African American Women Activists in the Cold War; ERIK S. MCDUFFIE. Sojourning for Freedom: Black Women, American Communism, and the Making of Black Left Feminism.
By Andrea Friedman 883
- JEFFREY A. TURNER. Sitting In and Speaking Out: Student Movements in the American South, 1960–1970.
By Stefan M. Bradley 885
- TIMOTHY J. MINCHIN and JOHN A. SALMOND. After the Dream: Black and White Southerners since 1965.
By Anders Walker 886
- LEIGH RAIFORD. Imprisoned in a Luminous Glare: Photography and the African American Freedom Struggle.
By Julia L. Foulkes 886
- SIMON HALL. American Patriotism, American Protest: Social Movements since the Sixties.
By Bradford Martin 887
- JOHN MCMILLIAN. Smoking Typewriters: The Sixties Underground Press and the Rise of Alternative Media in America.
By David Barber 888
- JONATHAN B. KRASNER. The Benderly Boys and American Jewish Education.
By Hasia R. Diner 889
- KEVIN M. SCHULTZ. Tri-Faith America: How Catholics and Jews Held Postwar America to its Protestant Promise.
By Jason Stevens 890
- JAMES C. BURKEE. Power, Politics, and the Missouri Synod: A Conflict That Changed American Christianity.
By Steven P. Miller 891
- DANIEL K. WILLIAMS. God's Own Party: The Making of the Christian Right.
By Sean P. Cunningham 892
- SEAN P. CUNNINGHAM. Cowboy Conservatism: Texas and the Rise of the Modern Right.
By Jeff Roche 893
- GREGORY A. DADDIS. No Sure Victory: Measuring U.S. Army Effectiveness and Progress in the Vietnam War.
By Peter S. Kindsvatter 894
- LOUISE BARNETT. Atrocity and American Military Justice in Southeast Asia: Trial by Army.
By Stein Tønnesson 895
- DAVID ZIERLER. The Invention of Ecocide: Agent Orange, Vietnam, and the Scientists Who Changed the Way We Think about the Environment.
By Scott Hamilton Dewey 895
- CHIA YOUYEE VANG. Hmong America: Reconstructing Community in Diaspora.
By Shelley S. Lee 896
- BETH BAILEY. America's Army: Making the All-Volunteer Force.
By Michael S. Foley 897
- GRETA R. KRIPPNER. Capitalizing on Crisis: The Political Origins of the Rise of Finance.
By Julia C. Ott 898
- ANDREW L. YARROW. Measuring America: How Economic Growth Came to Define American Greatness in the Late Twentieth Century.
By Thomas A. Stapleford 899
- NICHOLAS EVAN SARANTAKES. Dropping the Torch: Jimmy Carter, the Olympic Boycott, and the Cold War.
By Allen Guttman 900
- JEFFREY CRAIG SANDERS. Seattle and the Roots of Urban Sustainability: Inventing Ecotopia.
By Michael F. Logan 901
- PHILIP MIROWSKI. Science-Mart: Privatizing American Science.
By Jennifer Burns 902
- KEITH POMAKOY. Helping Humanity: American Policy and Genocide Rescue.
By Rafael Medoff 903
- ### CARIBBEAN AND LATIN AMERICA
- PHILLIP DEHNE. On the Far Western Front: Britain's First World War in South America.
By Martin Horn 904
- MELINA PAPPADEMOS. Black Political Activism and the Cuban Republic.
By Gwendolyn Midlo Hall 904
- MARISELLE MELÉNDEZ. Deviant and Useful Citizens: The Cultural Production of the Female Body in Eighteenth-Century Peru.
By Gabriela Ramos 905
- JAMES A. WOOD. The Society of Equality: Popular Republicanism and Democracy in Santiago de Chile, 1818–1851.
By Julio Pinto Vallejos 906
- LESSIE JO FRAZIER. Salt in the Sand: Memory, Violence, and the Nation-State in Chile, 1890 to the Present.
By Michael Monteón 907
- ### EUROPE: ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL
- PETER HUNT. War, Peace, and Alliance in Demosthenes' Athens.
By Ian Worthington 907
- BEZALEL BAR-KOCHVA. The Image of the Jews in Greek Literature: The Hellenistic Period.
By Shaye J. D. Cohen 908
- HENRIK MOURITSEN. The Freedman in the Roman World.
By Kyle Harper 909
- ERIC ADLER. Valorizing the Barbarians: Enemy Speeches in Roman Historiography.
By Jane D. Chaplin 910
- RAYMOND VAN DAM. Remembering Constantine at the Milvian Bridge.
By Robert M. Frakes 911
- FLORIN CURTA. The Edinburgh History of the Greeks, c. 500 to 1050: The Early Middle Ages.
By Walter E. Kaegi 912
- PAUL J. E. KERSHAW. Peaceful Kings: Peace, Power, and the Early Medieval Political Imagination.
By Eric J. Goldberg 913
- WENDY DAVIES and PAUL FOURACRE, editors. The Languages of Gift in the Early Middle Ages.
By Stephen D. White 914

EUROPE: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN

- ELISHEVA CARLEBACH. Palaces of Time: Jewish Calendar and Culture in Early Modern Europe.
By David B. Ruderman 915
- ARNOUD S. Q. VISSER. Reading Augustine in the Reformation: The Flexibility of Intellectual Authority in Europe, 1500–1620.
By Stefania Tutino 916
- ULINKA RUBLACK. Dressing Up: Cultural Identity in Renaissance Europe.
By Carole Collier Frick 917
- URS APP. The Birth of Orientalism.
By Nicholas Dew 918
- ALEXANDER C. T. GEPPERT. Fleeting Cities: Imperial Expositions in Fin-de-Siècle Europe.
By Jeffrey A. Auerbach 919
- MICHAEL S. NEIBERG. Dance of the Furies: Europe and the Outbreak of World War I.
By Adrian Gregory 920
- WILLIAM PHILPOTT. Three Armies on the Somme: The First Battle of the Twentieth Century.
By John H. Morrow, Jr. 921
- DAVID REDVALDSEN. The Labour Party in Britain and Norway: Elections and the Pursuit of Power between the World Wars.
By Clare V. J. Griffiths 921
- QUENTIN SKINNER, editor. Families and States in Western Europe.
By Tara Zahra 922
- WARREN JOHNSTON. Revelation Restored: The Apocalypse in Later Seventeenth-Century England.
By William E. Burns 923
- GERALD MACLEAN and NABIL MATAR. Britain and the Islamic World, 1558–1713.
By Michael H. Fisher 924
- JONATHAN SCOTT. When the Waves Ruled Britannia: Geography and Political Identities, 1500–1800.
By John R. Gillis 925
- STEPHEN CONWAY. Britain, Ireland, and Continental Europe in the Eighteenth Century: Similarities, Connections, Identities.
By J. C. D. Clark 926
- JAMES G. PATTERSON. In the Wake of the Great Rebellion: Republicanism, Agrarianism and Banditry in Ireland after 1798.
By Sean Farrell 927
- JOSEPH M. FEWSTER. The Keelmen of Tyneside: Labour Organisation and Conflict in the North-East Coal Industry, 1600–1830.
By Simon Cordery 928
- WILLIAM M. MEIER. Property Crime in London, 1850–Present.
By Keith Laybourn 929
- JOHN E. ARCHER. The Monster Evil: Policing and Violence in Victorian Liverpool.
By David Taylor 929
- BRENT E. KINSER. The American Civil War in the Shaping of British Democracy.
By Robert Saunders 930
- SAM JOHNSON. Pogroms, Peasants, Jews: Britain and Eastern Europe's "Jewish Question," 1867–1925.
By Geoffrey Alderman 931
- SAMUEL J. M. M. ALBERTI. Morbid Curiosities: Medical Museums in Nineteenth-Century Britain.
By A. W. Bates 932
- THEODORE KODITSCHKE. Liberalism, Imperialism, and the Historical Imagination: Nineteenth-Century Visions of a Greater Britain.
By Jennifer Pitts 933
- STUART EAGLES. After Ruskin: The Social and Political Legacies of a Victorian Prophet, 1870–1920.
By Marjorie Wheeler-Barclay 934
- LAURA TABILI. Global Migrants, Local Culture: Natives and Newcomers in Provincial England, 1841–1939.
By Wendy M. Gordon 935
- DAMON IEREMIA SALESA. Racial Crossings: Race, Inter-marriage, and the Victorian British Empire.
By Jayeeta Sharma 936
- SANDRA TRUDGEN DAWSON. Holiday Camps in Twentieth-Century Britain: Packaging Pleasure.
By Cecilia Morgan 937
- FERGAL MCCLUSKEY. Fenians and Ribbonmen: The Development of Republican Politics in East Tyrone, 1898–1918.
By R. V. Comerford 938
- ANDREW DAVID STEDMAN. Alternatives to Appeasement: Neville Chamberlain and Hitler's Germany.
By James P. Levy 938
- NATASHA VALL. Cultural Region: North East England, 1945–2000.
By Andrea Geddes Poole 939
- MADELEINE DOBIE. Trading Places: Colonization and Slavery in Eighteenth-Century French Culture.
By Bernard Moitt 940
- MATTHEW SHAW. Time and the French Revolution: The Republican Calendar, 1789–Year XIV.
By Paul R. Hanson 941
- SARAH A. CURTIS. Civilizing Habits: Women Missionaries and the Revival of French Empire.
By Sandra Horvath-Peterson 942
- M. BRADY BROWER. Unruly Spirits: The Science of Psychic Phenomena in Modern France.
By Mary Pickering 943
- ELIZABETH CAMPBELL KARLSGODT. Defending National Treasures: French Art and Heritage under Vichy.
By Jonathan Petropoulos 944
- SARA B. PRITCHARD. Confluence: The Nature of Technology and the Remaking of the Rhône.
By Rosalind Williams 945
- LOTTE VAN DE POL. The Burgher and the Whore: Prostitution in Early Modern Amsterdam.
By Mary Lindemann 946
- EVA GILOI. Monarchy, Myth, and Material Culture in Germany 1750–1950.
By Susan A. Crane 947
- LISA FETHERINGILL ZWICKER. Dueling Students: Conflict, Masculinity, and Politics in German Universities, 1890–1914.
By Troy R. E. Paddock 948
- SCOTT STEPHENSON. The Final Battle: Soldiers on the Western Front and the German Revolution of 1918.
By Jeffrey Verhey 949
- JULIA ROOS. Weimar through the Lens of Gender: Prostitution Reform, Woman's Emancipation, and German Democracy, 1919–33.
By Cornelia Usborne 950

- ANNA HOLIAN. Between National Socialism and Soviet Communism: Displaced Persons in Postwar Germany.
By Adam R. Seipp 950
- CHRISTINA MORINA. Legacies of Stalingrad: Remembering the Eastern Front in Germany since 1945.
By Michael Meng 951
- INGA MARKOVITS. Justice in Lüritz: Experiencing Socialist Law in East Germany.
By Devin O. Pendas 952
- YAACOB DWECK. The Scandal of Kabbalah: Leon Modena, Jewish Mysticism, Early Modern Venice.
By Shaul Magid 953
- KATHERINE WENTWORTH RINNE. The Waters of Rome: Aqueducts, Fountains, and the Birth of the Baroque City.
By Roberta J. Magnusson 954
- ALLISON SCARDINO BELZER. Women and the Great War: Femininity under Fire in Italy.
By Jane Slaughter 955
- PAWEŁ MACIEJKO. The Mixed Multitude: Jacob Frank and the Frankist Movement, 1755–1816.
By Marcin Wodziński 956
- BRIAN PORTER-SZUCS. Faith and Fatherland: Catholicism, Modernity, and Poland.
By Larry Wolff 957
- GREGOR THUM. Uprooted: How Breslau Became Wrocław during the Century of Expulsions.
By Padraic Kenney 959
- MALGORZATA FIDELIS. Women, Communism, and Industrialization in Postwar Poland.
By Andrea Peto 959
- PAULINA BREN. The Greengrocer and His TV: The Culture of Communism after the 1968 Prague Spring.
By Muriel Blaive 960
- GAIL KLIGMAN and KATHERINE VERDERY. Peasants under Siege: The Collectivization of Romanian Agriculture, 1949–1962.
By Melissa Bokovoy 961
- EMILY GREBLE. Sarajevo, 1941–1945: Muslims, Christians, and Jews in Hitler's Europe.
By Holly Case 962
- KEVIN M. F. PLATT. Terror and Greatness: Ivan and Peter as Russian Myths.
By Stephen M. Norris 963
- DAVID SCHIMMELPENNINCK VAN DER OYE. Russian Orientalism: Asia in the Russian Mind from Peter the Great to the Emigration; VERA TOLZ. Russia's Own Orient: The Politics of Identity and Oriental Studies in the Late Imperial and Early Soviet Periods.
By Jeff Sahadeo 964
- TRACY DENNISON. The Institutional Framework of Russian Serfdom.
By Steven L. Hoch 966
- SCOTT B. SMITH. Captives of Revolution: The Socialist Revolutionaries and the Bolshevik Dictatorship, 1918–1923.
By Peter Holquist 967
- IRINA PAPERNO. Stories of the Soviet Experience: Memoirs, Diaries, Dreams.
By Nina Tumarkin 968
- WILLIAM JAY RISCH. The Ukrainian West: Culture and the Fate of Empire in Soviet Lviv.
By Taras Kuzio 968

MIDDLE EAST AND NORTHERN AFRICA

- PHILIP WOOD. 'We have no King but Christ': Christian Political Thought in Greater Syria on the Eve of the Arab Conquest (c.400–585).
By Adam M. Schor 970
- TAYEB EL-HIBRI. Parable and Politics in Early Islamic History: The Rashidun Caliphs.
By Yossef Rapoport 971
- NORMAN CALDER. Islamic Jurisprudence in the Classical Era.
By Mawil IzziDien 971
- WALTER E. KAEGI. Muslim Expansion and Byzantine Collapse in North Africa.
By John Haldon 972
- CHRISTINE M. PHILLIOU. Biography of an Empire: Governing Ottomans in an Age of Revolution.
By Ebru Boyar 973
- PAULA SANDERS. Creating Medieval Cairo: Empire, Religion, and Architectural Preservation in Nineteenth-Century Egypt.
By Brian L. McLaren 974
- FATMA MÜGE GÖÇEK. The Transformation of Turkey: Redefining State and Society from the Ottoman Empire to the Modern Era.
By Mustafa Aksakal 975
- JOSHUA SCHREIER. Arabs of the Jewish Faith: The Civilizing Mission in Colonial Algeria.
By Osama W. Abi-Mershed 975

SUB-SAHARAN AFRICA

- CAROL POLSGROVE. Ending British Rule in Africa: Writers in a Common Cause.
By Bill Schwarz 976

Collected Essays

EUROPE: ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL

- CHRISTIAN KRÖTZL and KATARIINA MUSTAKALLIO, editors. On Old Age: Approaching Death in Antiquity and the Middle Ages. 978

- THOMAS F. X. NOBLE and JOHN VAN ENGLEN, editors. European Transformations: The Long Twelfth Century. 977

EUROPE: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN

FLORENCE BUTTAY and AXELLE GUILLAUSSÉAU, editors. Des saints d'État? Politique et sainteté au temps du concile de Trente. 978

SILVANA PATRIARCA and LUCY RIALI, editors. The Risorgimento Revisited: Nationalism and Culture in Nineteenth-Century Italy. 979

MAARTEN VAN GINDERACHTER and MARNIX BEYEN, editors. Nationhood from Below: Europe in the Long Nineteenth Century. 979

MARTIN THOMAS, editor. The French Colonial Mind. 979

ALEX J. KAY, JEFF RUTHERFORD, and DAVID STAHEL, editors. Nazi Policy on the Eastern Front, 1941: Total War, Genocide, and Radicalization. 980

| | | | |
|------------------------------|-----|----------------------|-------|
| Documents and Bibliographies | 981 | Index | 991 |
| Other Books Received | 982 | Index of Advertisers | 28(a) |
| Communications | 989 | | |

Topical Table of Contents

| | | | |
|--------------------------|--|-----------------------|--|
| Administration | 835, 836 | Consumption/Consumers | 880, 947 |
| Agriculture | 826 | Crime/Violence | 840, 848, 850, 852, 860, 866, 895, 927, 929, 931, 946 |
| Anthropology/Archaeology | 829, 907 | Cultural | 828, 842, 844, 845, 848, 852, 861, 862, 865, 866, 868, 879, 891, 908, 914, 915, 917, 919, 923, 924, 926, 934, 937, 939, 941, 944, 953, 960, 963, 968 |
| Art/Architecture | 905, 939, 944, 954, 974 | Demography | 935 |
| Biography | 860, 889, 956, 968, 973 | Diasporas | 896 |
| Body | 874, 905, 932 | Economic | 824, 834, 840, 846, 854, 864, 872, 898, 899, 904, 966 |
| Business/Finance | 824, 855, 864, 881, 899, 937 | Education/Students | 820, 838, 843, 862, 885, 889, 948 |
| Careers/Professions | 881, 928 | Elites | 832, 839, 851, 904 |
| Childhood/Youth | 840, 841, 862, 879, 922 | Empire | 814, 824, 836, 858, 910, 933, 936, 940, 942, 964, 970, 973 |
| Class | 841, 860, 871, 881, 928, 929, 937 | Environment/Landscape | 826, 853, 856, 859, 876, 895, 901, 925, 945 |
| Colonial/Postcolonial | 820, 837, 839, 877, 905, 927, 938, 940, 964, 975, 976 | Ethnicity | 848, 889, 896, 908, 912, 931, 975 |
| Comparative | 816, 821, 829, 840, 842, 853, 858, 914, 921, 926, 930, 951 | Exploration/Travel | 858 |
| Constitutional | 837 | | |

- Family
 - 846, 869, 922, 936
- Film/Photography
 - 861, 874, 886, 963
- Foreign Relations/Diplomatic
 - 816, 824, 827, 829, 830, 831, 851, 875, 877, 900, 904, 907, 913, 920, 924, 931, 938
- Frontiers/Borderlands
 - 840, 843, 854
- Gay/Lesbian
 - 878, 887
- Gender
 - 853, 860, 863, 866, 867, 869, 874, 878, 880, 883, 936, 937, 948, 950, 955, 959
- Genocide
 - 820, 903
- Health/Disease
 - 861, 865, 878, 932
- Historiography
 - 819, 821, 843, 910, 911, 918, 933, 963
- Identity
 - 838, 844, 879, 890, 915, 917, 925, 936, 948, 950, 956, 957, 962, 964, 970
- Immigration/Migration
 - 896, 931, 935, 950, 959
- Indigenous Peoples
 - 964
- Industry
 - 859, 928, 959
- Institutions
 - 827, 839, 843, 891, 894, 897, 898, 902, 921, 929, 932, 934, 945
- Intellectual
 - 820, 842, 843, 845, 851, 862, 879, 890, 902, 916, 918, 933, 934, 953, 964, 971
- Labor
 - 846, 853, 860, 871, 881, 928, 952
- Language/Linguistics
 - 889
- Legal/Legislative
 - 814, 837, 867, 872, 886, 895, 898, 903, 950, 952, 971
- Leisure/Entertainment
 - 880, 937
- Literature
 - 832, 868, 908, 924, 930, 939, 940, 963, 968, 971
- Local/Regional
 - 828, 835, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 852, 853, 854, 855, 859, 860, 861, 870, 882, 885, 893, 901, 912, 927, 929, 935, 938, 939
- Maritime
 - 925
- Masculinity/Men
 - 868
- Material Culture
 - 825, 917, 947
- Media/Communications
 - 875, 886, 888, 960
- Medicine
 - 861, 865, 878, 932, 943
- Memory
 - 820, 829, 866, 907, 911, 951, 959, 963, 975
- Methods
 - 819, 822
- Military
 - 839, 849, 876, 877, 894, 895, 897, 921, 949, 972
- Music
 - 844, 879
- National Histories
 - 821, 841, 941, 944, 945, 955, 975
- Nationalism
 - 890, 899, 920, 925, 933, 935, 950, 957, 962, 968, 970, 974
- Nobility
 - 947
- Oral History
 - 829, 961
- Peace
 - 907, 913
- Peasants
 - 961, 966
- Philanthropy
 - 860, 903, 914, 942
- Philosophy
 - 825, 842, 879
- Political
 - 816, 824, 828, 829, 830, 831, 833, 837, 840, 847, 848, 849, 852, 853, 854, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 870, 873, 875, 877, 879, 883, 886, 887, 888, 891, 892, 893, 899, 900, 903, 904, 906, 907, 913, 921, 923, 925, 926, 927, 930, 934, 938, 947, 948, 950, 951, 952, 959, 960, 961, 967, 968, 973, 975
- Print/Print Culture
 - 835, 850, 862, 880, 888, 915, 916, 953, 976
- Psychology/Psychiatry
 - 878, 943
- Public History
 - 974
- Race/Racism
 - 820, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 853, 865, 866, 868, 869, 870, 882, 883, 885, 886, 904, 936, 957
- Reform
 - 852, 855, 860, 863, 865, 882, 887, 916, 930, 934, 938, 941

Religion

832, 838, 843, 850, 889, 890, 891, 892, 914, 915, 916, 918, 923, 924, 931, 942, 953, 956, 957, 970, 971

Revolution

927, 949, 967

Rhetoric/Propaganda

874, 875, 910, 911

Ritual/Celebration

832, 914

Rural

857, 859, 966

Science/Technology

825, 826, 836, 842, 861, 876, 877, 895, 902, 943,
945, 954

Sexuality

860, 862, 869, 878, 880, 950

Slavery

845, 846, 847, 849, 909, 940

Social History

833, 841, 853, 906, 928, 935, 946, 954, 959, 961,
966, 968

Social Movements

830, 833, 845, 857, 871, 879, 883, 885, 886, 887, 888, 892, 893, 901

Social Policy

865, 882, 922

Space/Place

824, 919

Sports

852, 870, 900

State-Building/States

814, 831, 834, 835, 839, 849, 873, 906, 975

Theater

832

Theology

843, 850, 923

Theory

819, 820, 821, 822

Tourism

858

Trade

824, 834, 876, 904, 924, 926

Transportation

872

Urban/Suburban

828, 839, 854, 855, 856, 882, 901, 909, 919, 929,
946, 954, 959, 962, 974

Wars

816, 824, 827, 828, 829, 849, 865, 873, 874, 875,
894, 895, 897, 904, 907, 920, 921, 930, 938, 949,
951, 955, 962, 967, 972, 975

Women

860, 863, 867, 869, 874, 880, 887, 942, 955, 959

World

821, 822, 824, 826, 830

In This Issue

The June issue contains a stand-alone article on medical testing in early-twentieth-century Algeria and an AHR Forum on historiographical turns that consists of four essays and two comments. There are also two featured reviews, followed by our usual extensive book review section. "In Back Issues" draws attention to articles and features in the AHR from one hundred, seventy-five, and fifty years ago.

Article

In "The International Politics of Vaccine Testing in Interwar Algiers," Clifford Rosenberg examines a European debate over standards of scientific truth that resulted in a massive human experiment carried out in Algeria. The debate pitted one of Europe's leading laboratory scientists, the microbiologist Albert Calmette, against a group of statisticians gathered in 1928 by the newly founded League of Nations Health Committee, who had called into question the efficacy of Calmette's new TB vaccine, BCG. In his response to the League, Calmette took advantage of connections overseas to run a fully randomized clinical trial with a control group in the Algiers Kasbah. The density of the patronage networks that Calmette mobilized suggests that colonies and quasi-colonial territories such as Algeria were not as isolated from metropolitan conflicts as most work on colonial "laboratories of modernity" has assumed. This experiment combined a backward-looking kind of power—a metropolitan mandarin taking advantage of national resources overseas—with a kind of medical modernism, in response to a newly powerful international agency. It created a triangular relationship between a major pharmaceutical company, international regulators in Geneva, and poor African test subjects, thereby anticipating some of the moral problems raised by AIDS research in contemporary Africa and Asia.

AHR Forum

The AHR Forum, "Historiographic 'Turns' in Critical Perspective," looks at what several of the contributors call "turn talk"—a preoccupation with dramatic or decisive changes in historical understanding in the last thirty years. The best-known of these are the cultural and linguistic turns proclaimed at the end of the 1980s, transformations in the theorizing and practice of history that both grew out of and critiqued the prevailing mode of social history. But subsequent turns have been announced with increasing alacrity—the transnational turn, the spatial turn, the moral turn, the emotional turn, and the digital turn, among others—suggesting that perhaps the concept itself has lost some of its heuristic value. The six contributors to the forum offer particular, and often personal, interpretations of the history of this historiography.

In “When Was the Linguistic Turn? A Genealogy,” Judith Surkis revisits the storied rise and fall of the “linguistic turn.” Tracing its emergence in a specific Euro-American historiographical context, she illustrates the difficulty of identifying a single coherent “turn” as ever having taken place. The term has come to describe a discipline-wide moment of methodological ferment in a way that both relegates it to the past and preempts our contesting its implications and assumptions. Rather than endorse this hegemonic narrative, she attempts to both complicate and provincialize our understanding of “the turn.” Providing a genealogical counternarrative, Surkis restores a sense of what was at stake in the many debates in a variety of fields—European intellectual and social history, feminist history, and subaltern studies. She ultimately questions the usefulness of the concept of “turns” itself. “Turn talk” implies the supersession of one disciplinary trend by another, especially when understood as an attribute of a specific historiographical generation. While seeming to signal innovation and renewal, the spatio-temporal logic of a “turn” more often than not entails foreclosure. Surkis aims, instead, to keep multiple strains of historical critique open for the future.

Gary Wilder also emphasizes this theme of foreclosure in “From Optic to Topic: The Foreclosure Effect of Historiographic Turns.” Indeed, he argues that the analytical openings created by the linguistic and cultural turns were foreclosed through a process of domestication whereby new “optics” gave way to routine research topics that reaffirmed traditional historiographical practices and assumptions. He argues that proponents of the turns themselves bear some responsibility for this development insofar as they framed the turns in terms of a new theoretical consensus, decisive transformations, and professional rapprochement following divisive discussion. Because the linguistic turn conflated positivistic social history with structural analysis more generally, and because it tended to restrict “theory” to poststructuralism, its advocates tended to marginalize critical social theory and history concerned with large-scale social processes. Wilder forcefully argues for the need both to recover the linguistic turn’s commitment to fundamental epistemological questioning and to reclaim for history Marxism’s concern with social formations and long-term transformations.

In “The Kids Are All Right: On the ‘Turning’ of Cultural History,” James W. Cook both acknowledges the importance of this historiographical development and interrogates its meaning. It is hard to escape “the cultural turn,” he notes, citing as evidence the fact that in Google Books alone, this phrase generates more than 100,000 hits, many of which refer to works of academic history. Like Surkis and Wilder, however, he questions its very nature and historicity. Above all, he seeks to explicate the broader patterns of recent “turn talk,” a fast-forming discourse that has increasingly come to define our broader sense of cultural history. But he also challenges turn talk’s larger assumptions. Indeed, his central contention is that much of this talk has made it harder to see the shifting contours of cultural history—how it has changed, the varied forms it has taken, and what it means to practice it now.

In “Another Set of Imperial Turns?” Durba Ghosh identifies three moments of the recent British imperial turn’s engagement with other historiographical turns—the global, the postcolonial, and the archival. Instead of arguing that the imperial turn represents a revision of existing historical methods, her essay shows how the imperial turn is both the product and the source of other historiographical developments. Through a compressed and selective retelling of the history of British imperial history, she challenges scholars of the British Empire who have called for imperial history to be “detached and apolitical” or dispassionate. From the late nineteenth century to the present, histories of British imperialism were frequently generated during moments of colonial conquest or “new imperialisms.” Although there have been many disagreements over the last century, they are largely battles within a shared political project, that of anti-colonialism and anti-imperialism. Rather than a singular or comprehensive method for imperial history, Ghosh’s essay calls for a continuation of scholarly work along these same lines of critique and engagement.

The two comments are contributions in their own right. In “Not Yet Far Enough,” Julia Adeney Thomas submits each of the four essays to a critical reading, arguing especially with some of Surkis’s and Wilder’s claims and interpretations. But her comment, which is both critical and appreciative of the authors’ intellectual engagement, does not end with these historiographical issues. Rather, she urges us to go beyond the concerns evoked by “turn talk” and confront the challenges of climate change and environmental crisis, which she discusses in the last pages of her comment. Calling for a “new materialism,” she urges, in a sense, a qualitatively different kind of turn, one that “will produce new questions, new objects of study, and new types of evidence beyond those developed through the social, linguistic, cultural, and imperial turns.”

Nathan Perl-Rosenthal takes a very different approach in “Generational Turns.” Positioning himself within a generational cohort that is just now coming of professional age, he notes that a generational self-consciousness seems to characterize the whole subject of turns, including the essays in the forum. Seizing upon this perspective, he surveys a number of dissertations by younger scholars, in part to “re-examine the balance between continuity and disjuncture in scholarly generations.” He finds that while many of the concerns central to the cultural and linguistic turns play a part in current thinking and practice, these are framed by a “pragmatic approach” illustrated by a renewed interest in the histories of communication, transportation, material culture and political economy.

~

With this issue, the terms of five members of the Board of Editors come to an end. We would like to thank Jonathan Brown, Paul Freedman, Jane Kamensky, Jeremy Popkin, and Ruth Rogaski for their service over the last three years. In addition, William Novak has had to resign. Their successors will be announced in the October issue.

In Back Issues

In the hope of encouraging readers to dip into the long history of scholarship contained in the pages of the American Historical Review (now in the 117th year of its publishing history), and to take advantage of the digital availability of this archive to most readers, the AHR editors offer a look back at issues from one hundred, seventy-five, and fifty years ago. What follows is not a comprehensive survey of the contents of those issues, but rather a glance at some of the articles and other features that might be of interest, or even of use, today.

Volume 17, Number 4 (July 1912)

The first two articles in the July 1912 issue offer an interesting study in contrasting styles and methods of historical scholarship. "The European Reconquest of North Africa" is by Archibald Cary Coolidge (1866–1928), who became professor of history at Harvard in 1908 and two years later was named the first director of the university library. (The library he led was soon to have a benefactor in the mother of Henry Elkins Widener, a young victim of the Titanic disaster, which occurred on April 15 of that year—probably while Coolidge was putting the finishing touches on this piece.) His article hinges on an interesting question. After a brisk survey of the history of North Africa that emphasizes its relationship to Europe across the centuries—the various phases from antiquity through the rise of Islam when it was a part of either "Asia" or the West—he pauses at the year 1830, when the French marched into Algiers, and asks, "As we muse over these latest transformations, we wonder not so much that they have occurred as that they did not occur centuries earlier." What puzzled Coolidge, in other words, was why North Africa remained under the control of "Asiatic" Muslims while other parts of the world, from the Western Hemisphere to the Indian subcontinent, fell into the possession of the West. "Why did such weak, barbarous states, lying closer to many parts of Europe than these do to each other, remain so long unconquered, when the vast and remote empires of the Incas and of the Moghuls had for generations been in European hands?" His answer, however, is less interesting than the question. After discounting Islam's power to resist European control, he simply posits that compared to these other lands, North Africa offered very little to tempt the Spanish, French, or British to its shores except for the occasional bout with Barbary pirates. His account also allows that competition among European powers blocked serious attempts at conquest on the part of any single one of them. In any case, his survey—which, it must be said, is virtually devoid of sources or references—ends with some revealing ruminations on whether French control would have merely material or "moral" consequences. "Granting that the majority of the people will always be of the primitive native stock, what will be the expression of their civilization, the French of advanced modern thought or the Arabic of the Koran?"

"Canada versus Guadeloupe: An Episode of the Seven Years' War," by William L. Grant, is a very different piece of work, although not without its own moral commentary. Grant, who taught history at Upper Canada College, examines the so-called paper war in the early 1760s, which involved an intense exchange of pamphlets pertaining to the future of the British Empire in the Western Hemisphere in anticipation of the end of the Seven Years' War. Indeed, his article is impressive for the number of texts he discusses and the clarity with which he parses the issues in play. Essentially, the matter came down to whether Britain would focus its imperial intentions on the Caribbean, which promised great profits with the endlessly expansive sugar market as well as more opportunities to extend its sea power, or whether it would turn its colonial interests toward Canada, which, while not promising riches, was favored by many as an outlet for expanded settlements and a market for British industry. Those in support of Canada embraced the vision of "an Universal Empire on the Continent of North America," bolstered by the claim that "a northern colony is . . . healthier and more suited to the development of a white race." But their opponents saw this union in alarming terms, asserting, with rather remarkable prescience, that this vast territory across the ocean, with its untapped resources and a growing population, would one day seek independence from Britain. "Thus from these measures you lay the surest foundation of unpeopling Britain, and strengthening America to revolt; a people who must become more licentious from their liberty, and more factious and turbulent from the distance of the power that rules them," wrote one pamphleteer. Interestingly, this argument was countered by the best-known participant in the paper war, Benjamin Franklin, who, perhaps disingenuously, pointed to the hopelessly fractious nature of the American colonies as insurance against this possibility. Ultimately, the advocates of North American expansion prevailed. And while Grant concedes that Prime Minister William Pitt was subject to pressure from West Indian planters in the House of Commons, who feared that the addition of Guadeloupe would rival their interests, he tentatively concludes, "Let us hope that no such motives really influenced the Great Commoner." An unabashed champion of British imperialism, Grant frames the choice as a crucial step in Britain's progress from a strictly self-contained mercantilist empire to one based on "liberty." But his pathbreaking research underscores the genuinely interesting finding that "imperial theories were much more a subject of discussion than is sometimes thought to be the case."

Volume 42, Number 4 (July 1937)

The July 1937 issue contains several workmanlike articles, including one on the political thought of an early Tudor lawyer by the Yale intellectual historian Franklin Le Van Baumer, and another on the use of hot-air balloons in the Civil War by J. Duane Squires, author of a four-volume history of New Hampshire. There are also two articles listed under "Notes and Suggestions." The second of these is probably the most interesting piece in this issue, an essay on "Fictitious Biography" by Margaret Castle Schindler, who was on the faculty of Goucher College. This is a first-rate exercise in historical sleuthing, which does nothing less than reveal the existence of widespread fraud in the six-volume Appletons' Cyclopaedia of American Biography (1887–1889). This venerable publication, which even in 1937 had no equal, contained entries on 20,000 individuals who had played a part in the history of North and South America. The articles were unsigned. That some were fraudulent was first revealed in 1919 by a botanist named John Hendley Barnhart, who used his expertise to prove that fourteen of the Europeans cited in the Cyclopaedia as supposedly having studied plant life in Latin America never even existed. Schindler's AHR article goes farther; through a thorough examination of the entries under the letter "H," she was able to add fifteen more to "the list of those believed to be fictitious. Three additional sketches found in other letters of the alphabet, in the course of this study, bring the number of fictitious articles to at least forty-seven." Subsequent research demonstrated that a full two hundred of the biographies had been fabricated. Schindler's method consisted mostly of tracking down the works ascribed to each subject and cited in the entries. In most cases, the trail ended in a bibliographical black hole. For other entries, the subjects were real but, as Schindler demonstrates, did not live when the authors claimed they did. Authors were free to submit entries, which were apparently never verified by the editors; they were paid for each contribution, suggesting that financial gain was their motivation. As Schindler notes, however, the authors, while unscrupulous, were certainly not ignorant. Their fraudulent labors required the linguistic capacity to adapt or invent titles of books in six languages as well as knowledge of the history, geography, and botany of Latin America, as most of the entries in question deal with that part of the Western Hemisphere. The existence of fraud on this scale in a widely distributed reference work might give pause to those today who insist that scholarship could easily do without editorial and peer review.

Volume 67, Number 4 (July 1962)

The July 1962 issue is distinguished by the appearance of David M. Potter's important article "The Historian's Use of Nationalism and Vice Versa," a piece that continues to be cited to this day. Potter was a well-known historian of the American South who taught at both Yale and Stanford. His service as president of the American Historical Association was cut short by his untimely death in 1971. This article begins as a kind of think piece, reviewing and criticizing the ways historians have understood, or rather misunderstood, nationalism. More than anything, it urges an appreciation of the complexity of nationalism as an experience, not simply as an expression of political identity, and certainly not as a mere ideology. Nationalism is both theory and practice. Thus while nationalism as an ideology may seem to embody a supreme form of group allegiance, trumping or even negating all lesser sorts of loyalty, in actuality it can easily coexist with strong attachments to family, region, religious group, or another collectivity. Indeed, he argues for the exact opposite: that different loyalties are mutually reinforcing, not competing. "The only citizens who are capable of strong national loyalty," he asserts, "are those who are capable of strong group loyalty." (It is not likely, however, that many historians today would illustrate this point by adding, "A well-known phrase runs: 'For God, for Country, and for Yale'—not 'For God, or Country, or for Yale.'") In general terms, Potter sees nationalism as dually constituted: it is composed of both common feelings—that is, a culture—and a set of interests.

Up until this point, Potter's article is an elegant and tightly reasoned argument for conceiving nationalism as a complex phenomenon requiring an appreciation of its psychological, subjective, and cultural dimensions, while also taking into account the different political and social contexts that can create a variety of nationalistic expressions. For the present-day reader, however, who is likely coming to this article with an understanding derived from works such as Benedict Anderson's Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism (1983), there is not much in Potter's presentation that seems novel. But the first part of the article, which treats the subject in very general terms, is really a wind-up for the second—an interpretation of nationalism in the context of the American Civil War. Here is where his analysis bears fruit, for it becomes clear that all along, Potter was preparing us to accept a very particular—and probably contentious—interpretation of the sentiments and allegiances of southerners. In short, he argues that it is a mistake to ascribe nationalism to the North while seeing the South as merely sectionalist. Rather, he urges that we adjust our perspective and admit that southerners were just as nationalistic as northerners. "The equation of northernism with nationalism and southernism with sectionalism prejudices by definition the question which purports to be under scrutiny," he argues, "and denies without actual analysis of group feelings, that the southern movement could have been truly national." The rest of the essay goes on to argue the point. He emphasizes that strong regional sentiments, which are often cited as "proof" of southerners' primary loyalties and their lack of allegiance to the nation, are hardly inimical to nationalism—no more so than were the regional affinities among people living in the North. Northerners had no monopoly on American nationalism, something borne out, he argues, by the fact that long before the period of the Civil War and long afterward, the South remained steeped in nationalist sentiments. Potter does not spare his fellow southern historians, especially regarding the common assertion that the South's "claim to nationhood was validated by a complete cultural separateness." Such antitheses are simply caricatures, he insists. To be sure, Potter fully admits that there was a lot at stake in the Civil War, especially a clash of interests ignited by tariffs and the extension of slavery. But these issues, while fundamental, did not override the historically more durable identification of southerners with the American nation. "The historical process is far too intricate to be handled in terms of the simple dualisms of culture versus culture, nation versus section, interest versus interest, or Americanism versus southernism." Today this seems like a perfectly reasonable methodological assertion. Fifty years ago, when the memory of the Civil War was only a century old—and at the high-water mark of the civil rights movement—its reasonableness as a guide to understanding the conflict was in all likelihood more difficult to accept.

The ancient core of Algiers, with its narrow, winding streets, the Kasbah is built into the hillside facing the Mediterranean. Poor and overcrowded, it was the segregated colonial city's one predominantly Muslim neighborhood: 75–80 percent of its residents were Muslims (Arabs and Kabyles) in the early twentieth century. Rates of tuberculosis and other respiratory diseases soared along with population densities, as the dispossessed from the surrounding agricultural hinterland arrived with their families. Between the world wars, the Pasteur Institute began a massive human experiment there involving the administration of a new tuberculosis vaccine to children.

The International Politics of Vaccine Testing in Interwar Algiers

CLIFFORD ROSENBERG

IN 1928, ALBERT CALMETTE, one of the most powerful scientists in the world, found himself in a bind. Heir apparent to Émile Roux at the Pasteur Institute and a leading contender for a Nobel Prize, Calmette was convinced that he had found a successful vaccine for tuberculosis, the Holy Grail of medical research. Since Louis Pasteur and Robert Koch, vaccines have held out the promise of preventing the world's deadliest diseases, none a greater killer than TB. Years of careful laboratory work and animal testing suggested that Calmette had succeeded where his rivals had failed. His initial human trials at a Paris maternity clinic confirmed his laboratory work, or so he thought.¹ But a bitter international dispute called his findings and the efficacy of his vaccine, known as BCG, into question.² A commission of expert statisticians convened by the newly formed Health Organization of the League of Nations—men Calmette considered his professional inferiors—repudiated his reading of the evidence. More effectively than any international advisory panel had been able to do before, the assembled experts in Geneva called for a set of best practices for establishing the worth of medical interventions.³ They insisted on a randomized clinical Research for this article was made possible by grants from the American Council of Learned Societies and the Professional Staff Congress of the City University of New York. Earlier versions were presented as papers at the Davis Center at Princeton University; the 2010 meeting of the French Colonial History Society; the City College of New York; the University of Minnesota, Twin Cities; the Université de Paris-I; the Université d'Oran Es-Sénia; and the Centre d'Études Diocésain Les Glycines in Algiers. In addition to those audiences, I thank Beth Baron, Jeffrey Blustein, Alice Conklin, Gregory Downs, Eric Jennings, Andreas Killen, Patricia Lorcin, Ava Navin, Tom Navin, Deborah Neill, Jennifer Johnson Onyedum, Rosalind Rosenberg, Pierre-Yves Saunier, Darren Staloff, Judith Stein, and Helen Tilley, as well as Robert Schneider, Konstantin Dierks, Sarah Knott, and the anonymous reviewers for the AHR.

¹ On Calmette, see his unpublished autobiography, "Quelques notes sur ma vie et ma carrière pour mes fils et pour mes petits enfants," 1932, Archives de l'Institut Pasteur, Paris [hereafter IP], Fonds Calmette, CAL A/1; as well as Lion Murard and Patrick Zylberman, L'hygiène dans la République: La santé publique en France, ou l'utopie contrariée, 1870–1918 (Paris, 1996), chap. 17; and Noël Bernard, La vie et l'œuvre d'Albert Calmette (Paris, 1961). For the initial human trials in Paris, see Benjamin Weill-Hallé and Raymond Turpin, "Premiers essais de vaccination antituberculeuse de l'enfant par le bacille Calmette-Guérin (BCG)," Bulletins et mémoires de la Société médicale des hôpitaux de Paris 49 (1925): 1589–1601. Calmette provides a thorough review of prior efforts to develop a tuberculosis vaccine in La vaccination préventive contre la tuberculose par le "BCG" (Paris, 1927), 13–58.

² BCG stands for Bacillus Calmette-Guérin.

³ Norman Howard-Jones, The Scientific Background of the International Sanitary Conferences, 1851–1938 (Geneva, 1975); Howard-Jones, International Public Health between the Two World Wars: The Organizational Problems (Geneva, 1978); Neville M. Goodman, International Health Organizations and Their Work, 2nd ed. (Edinburgh, 1971); Martin David Dubin, "The League of Nations Health Organization," in Paul Weindling, ed., International Health Organisations and Movements, 1918–1939 (Cambridge, 1995), 56–80; Weindling, "Philanthropy and World Health: The Rockefeller Foundation and the trial with a control group, laying out in detail many of the criteria that have since been adopted by scientists and regulatory agencies around the world.⁴

The problem, for Calmette, was both political and practical. There were precious few places he could carry out such a study. He knew immediately that French family doctors and their powerful unions would block his efforts on the mainland. No other European country seemed any more hospitable, and he feared the likelihood of damaging publicity, especially after a laboratory error in Germany in 1930 killed dozens of infants and infected many others.⁵ So he turned to French colonial populations: he worked first with African soldiers on the mainland, and when that failed to produce meaningful results, he moved his efforts overseas.⁶ But the colonial territories he tried did not have adequate civil recordkeeping. He could vaccinate huge numbers of children, but he could not monitor them long enough to convince critics that his vaccine had given them protection. The only place experiencing rampant tuberculosis that also offered civil records he could use, without facing resistance from patients or their doctors, was neither colonial, in formal terms, nor part of the French mainland: Algeria. Invaded in 1830 and annexed four years later, the former Ottoman territory became part of France in 1848. When civil authorities took over from the military in 1870, the minister of the interior in Paris rather than the minister of colonies appointed its governor-general, who shared power with European settlers.⁷ That quasi-colonial status, combining massive social and political inequality with a functioning administrative state, set Algeria apart and made it an ideal site for vaccine testing.

Calmette called on colleagues at the Algiers branch of the Pasteur Institute in League of Nations Health Organisation," Minerva 35, no. 3 (1997): 269–281; Iris Borowy, Coming to Terms with World Health: The League of Nations Health Organisation, 1921–1946 (Frankfurt, 2009); John Farley, To Cast Out Disease: A History of the International Health Division of the Rockefeller Foundation, 1913–1951 (Oxford, 2004); Susan Pedersen, "Back to the League of Nations," American Historical Review 112, no. 4 (October 2007): 1091–1117; and Sunil Amrith, Decolonizing International Health: India and Southeast Asia, 1930–65 (New York, 2006).

⁴ Harry M. Marks, The Progress of Experiment: Science and Therapeutic Reform in the United States, 1900–1990 (Cambridge, 1997); Christian Bonah, Histoire de l'expérimentation humaine en France: Discours et pratiques, 1900–1940 (Paris, 2007); Desirée Cox-Maksimov, "The Making of the Clinical Trial in Britain, 1910–1945: Expertise, the State and the Public" (Ph.D. thesis, University of Cambridge, 1997); J. P. Bull, "The Historical Development of Clinical Therapeutic Trials," Journal of Chronic Disease 10 (1959): 218–248; Anne Fagot-Largeault, "Les origines de la notion d'essai contrôlé randomisé en médecine," Cahiers d'histoire et de philosophie des sciences 40 (1992): 281–300; and Abraham M. Lilienfeld, "Ceteris Paribus: The Evolution of the Clinical Trial," Bulletin of the History of Medicine 56, no. 1 (1982): 1–18.

⁵ Philippe Menut, "The Lübeck Catastrophe and Its Consequences for Anti-Tuberculosis BCG Vaccination," in Anne Marie Moulin and Alberto Cambrioso, eds., Singular Selves: Historical Issues and Contemporary Debates in Immunology (Amsterdam, 2001), 202–210.

⁶ On the overseas Pasteur institutes and Calmette's influence, see Annick Guénel, "The Creation of the First Overseas Pasteur Institute, or the Beginning of Albert Calmette's Pastorian Career," Medical History 43 (1999): 1–25; Anne Marie Moulin, especially "The Pasteur Institutes between the Two World Wars: The Transformation of the International Sanitary Order," in Weindling, International Health Organisations and Movements, 244–265; Moulin, "Patriarchal Science: The Network of the Overseas Pasteur Institutes," in Patrick Petitjean, Catherine Jami, and Anne Marie Moulin, eds., Science and Empires: Historical Studies about Scientific Development and European Expansion (Dordrecht, 1992), 307–322; and Jean-Pierre Dedet, Les Instituts Pasteur d'outre-mer: 120 ans de microbiologie française dans le monde (Paris, 2000).

⁷ Claude Collot, Les institutions de l'Algérie durant la période coloniale, 1830–1962 (Algiers, 1987).

FIGURE 1: The main building of the Algiers branch of the Pasteur Institute in 1934. © Pasteur Institute.

his bid to satisfy League statisticians.⁸ Scientists used birth records held by the Government General to create a random sample and sent teams of nurses to the second arrondissement, the Kasbah, the poorest, most overcrowded neighborhood in the city. Those nurses delivered oral doses of BCG and observed a control group (without giving a placebo), returning periodically to provide boosters to the vaccinated and to monitor both groups' health. They tested and tracked some 40,000 subjects over the course of a generation, from 1930 to 1956. The Algiers BCG trial was the largest study of its kind carried out anywhere in the world before the Salk, Sabin, and Koprowski polio trials of the 1950s, which got under way just as the Algerian War put a stop to testing in Algiers.⁹

Calmette's inability to carry out his experiment in a formal colony, such as Indochina or West Africa, shows the limitations of an approach to empire that has been enormously fruitful over the past generation. Colonial reformers routinely likened empire to the controlled conditions of the laboratory, and scholars of imperialism followed suit. Since Paul Rabinow and Gwendolyn Wright's landmark works in the 1980s, the metaphorical notion of colonies as "laboratories of modernity" has been ⁸ Calmette, "Quelques notes sur ma vie et ma carrière," fol. 25; M.-P. Laberge, "Les instituts Pasteur du Maghreb: La recherche scientifique dans le cadre de la politique coloniale," Revue française d'histoire d'Outre-Mer 74 (1987): 27–42; John Strachan, "The Pasteurization of Algeria?," French History 20, no. 3 (2006): 260–275.

⁹ John R. Paul, A History of Poliomyelitis (New Haven, Conn., 1971), 426–440; and David M. Oshinsky, Polio: An American Story—The Crusade That Mobilized the Nation against the Twentieth Century's Most Feared Disease (Oxford, 2005), chap. 12.

ubiquitous in the literature on empire. In this view, colonial settings, isolated from Europe and unencumbered by stifling regulations and domineering mainland mandarins, enabled mid-level experts—Rabinow calls them “specific intellectuals”—to elaborate new forms of social discipline from the Maghreb to Madagascar and French Indochina. Even earlier, one of Rabinow’s mentors, Bernard Cohn, had called attention to the energy the British Raj devoted to marking boundaries between colonizers and colonized.¹⁰ Work in this vein on the history of science has had the virtue of calling attention to scientific research that political and environmental conditions made impossible in Europe.¹¹

Increasingly, however, the idea of a distinct colonial modernity has come to seem problematic. Area studies specialists have long objected that colonies were never empty spaces that Europeans could manipulate at will. Latin Americanists have shown that nineteenth-century experiments in free trade depended upon financial institutions built by indigenous elites, not a power vacuum left by the collapse of Spanish authority.¹² More recently, international historians and immigration specialists have discovered the salience of juridical categories—protectorates, condominiums, mandates, dominions—too often lumped together as “colonial,” which influenced how local administrative infrastructures related both to European capitals and to an increasingly dense international system.¹³ Moreover, European colonies, as Meghan Vaughan has pointed out, were not modern states at all for most of their existence. They refused to treat colonial subjects as autonomous individuals, and they relied on brute force rather than Foucauldian discipline to impose their will. Other scholars, especially those working on penitentiaries, have gone so far as to describe the French Empire as a brutal throwback to an archaic, Old Regime style of governance.¹⁴

Placing European mainlands, colonies, and quasi-colonial territories such as Algeria into a single analytical frame requires broad context. It requires breaking down a series of basic colonial oppositions, starting with colony/metropole and colonizer/

¹⁰ Paul Rabinow, French Modern: Norms and Forms of the Social Environment (Cambridge, Mass., 1989), 16, and chap. 8 for “specific intellectuals”; Gwendolyn Wright, The Politics of Design in French Colonial Urbanism (Chicago, 1991); Bernard S. Cohn, An Anthropologist among the Historians and Other Essays (Oxford, 1987); Cohn, Colonialism and Its Forms of Knowledge: The British in India (Princeton, N.J., 1996).

¹¹ See in particular Roy MacLeod, ed., Nature and Empire: Science and the Colonial Enterprise, Special Issue, Osiris 15 (2000).

¹² Paul Gootenberg, Between Silver and Guano: Commercial Policy and the State in Postindependence Peru (Princeton, N.J., 1989).

¹³ Pedersen, “Back to the League of Nations”; Susan Pedersen, “The Meaning of the Mandates System: An Argument,” Geschichte und Gesellschaft 32, no. 4 (2006): 560–582; and Alexis Spire, Étrangers à la carte: L’administration de l’immigration en France (1945–1975) (Paris, 2005), chap. 6. For science and medicine, see Amrith, Decolonizing International Health; Helen Tilley, Africa as a Living Laboratory: Empire, Development, and the Problem of Scientific Knowledge, 1870–1950 (Chicago, 2011); and Deborah Neill, “Paul Ehrlich’s Colonial Connections: Scientific Networks and Sleeping Sickness Drug Therapy Research, 1900–1914,” Social History of Medicine 22, no. 1 (2009): 61–77.

¹⁴ For the concept of discipline, see Michel Foucault, Surveiller et punir: Naissance de la prison (Paris, 1975). For critiques, see Megan Vaughan, Curing Their Ills: Colonial Power and African Illness (Stanford, Calif., 1991), esp. 8–12; Guillaume Lachenal, “Le médecin qui voulut être roi: Médecine coloniale et utopie au Cameroun,” Annales: Histoire, Sciences Sociales 65, no. 1 (January–February 2010): 121–156; Frank Dikötter and Ian Brown, eds., Cultures of Confinement: A History of the Prison in Africa, Asia, and Latin America (Ithaca, N.Y., 2007); Florence Bernault, ed., A History of Prison and Confinement in Africa (Portsmouth, N.H., 2003); and Peter Zinoman, The Colonial Bastille: A History of Imprisonment in Vietnam, 1862–1940 (Berkeley, Calif., 2001).

colonized, and recognizing that the meanings of “tradition” and “modernity” were contested, not only overseas but in Europe as well. A generation of scholars have shown how colonized peoples adapted, appropriated, and translated Western scientific ideas in a wide range of contexts.¹⁵ But the most influential currents of post-colonial scholarship continue to rely on a reductive notion of “post-Enlightenment rationality,” a monolithic “imaginary figure . . . embedded in clichéd and shorthand forms” that Dipesh Chakrabarty calls a “hyperreal Europe.”¹⁶ Frederick Cooper has countered that these efforts to challenge European narratives of progress have too often simply reversed their value judgments without altering their terms: “the history they evoke is canned, a three-hundred- or four-hundred-year story that we need only name . . . Hegel stands in for a European history reduced to the claim of progress.”¹⁷

In the case of Calmette’s human experiment, a complex interplay of colonial, national, and international forces shaped a major scientific dispute within Europe, a dispute within the Enlightenment tradition. In response to the League of Nations, Calmette took advantage of patronage networks that radiated out from Paris and bound colonies and quasi-colonial entities such as Algeria together with the metropole. It was the very depth of Algeria’s implication in metropolitan webs of influence and power that enabled him to use the Kasbah as a laboratory. Like the Pasteur Institute’s work on rabies in French Indochina and Madagascar and Robert Koch’s on sleeping sickness (human trypanosomiasis) in German East Africa and Togo—but unlike later work on sleeping sickness in sub-Saharan Africa, which was much more international—the Algiers trial calls to mind old-fashioned imperialism. A metropolitan research institute took advantage of opportunities created by overseas expansion. In this respect it was broadly similar to the trial of the contraceptive pill Enovid, launched in Puerto Rico in the 1950s to avoid the jurisdiction of the Comstock Laws, which made the testing of contraceptives illegal in most U.S. states.¹⁸

If Calmette’s experiment relied on a rather backward kind of power, it was no throwback to the Old Regime. The Algiers BCG trial stands at the crossroads of two ¹⁵ Gyan Prakash, Another Reason: Science and the Imagination of Modern India (Princeton, N.J., 1999); Omnia El Shakry, The Great Social Laboratory: Subjects of Knowledge in Colonial and Postcolonial Egypt (Stanford, Calif., 2007); Nancy Rose Hunt, A Colonial Lexicon of Birth Ritual, Medicalization, and Mobility in the Congo (Durham, N.C., 1999); Luise White, Speaking with Vampires: Rumor and History in Colonial Africa (Berkeley, Calif., 2000); and Julia Livingston, Debility and the Moral Imagination in Botswana (Bloomington, Ind., 2005).

¹⁶ Dipesh Chakrabarty, Provincializing Europe: Postcolonial Thought and Historical Difference (Princeton, N.J., 2000), 3–4, 27, 37, 39–40, 45, emphasis in original.

¹⁷ Frederick Cooper, Colonialism in Question: Theory, Knowledge, History (Berkeley, Calif., 2005), quotes from 124 and 20. See also Lachenal, “Le médecin qui voulut être roi,” esp. 123–131; Tilley, Africa as a Living Laboratory, 9–11; and, more generally, “AHR Roundtable: Historians and the Question of ‘Modernity,’” American Historical Review 116, no. 3 (June 2011): 631–751.

¹⁸ Laurence Monnais-Rousselot, Médecine et colonisation: L’aventure indochinoise, 1860–1939 (Paris, 1999), 403–416; Eric T. Jennings, “Confronting Rabies and Its Treatments in Colonial Madagascar, 1899–1910,” Social History of Medicine 22, no. 2 (2009): 263–282. On sleeping sickness, see Neill, “Paul Ehrlich’s Colonial Connections”; Tilley, Africa as a Living Laboratory, chap. 4; Wolfgang U. Eckart, “The Colony as Laboratory: German Sleeping Sickness Campaigns in German East Africa and in Togo, 1900–1914,” History and Philosophy of the Life Sciences 24, no. 1 (2002): 69–89; Myriam Mertens, “Chemical Compounds in the Congo: A Belgian Colony’s Role in Chemotherapeutic Knowledge Production during the 1920s” (paper presented at ECAS 2009: 3rd European Conference on African Studies, Leipzig, June 4–7, 2009); Vaughan, Curing Their Ills, chap. 2; and Maryinez Lyons, The Colonial Disease: A Social History of Sleeping Sickness in Northern Zaire, 1900–1940 (Cambridge, 1992). For the Enovid trial, see Lara Marks, Sexual Chemistry: A History of the Contraceptive Pill (New Haven, Conn., 2001), chap. 4.

momentous transitions: it provides an early example of an international agency dictating the terms on which scientific claims are evaluated, and at the same time it represents an important step in the emergence of recognizably modern clinical trials and, more broadly, in the spread of statistical modes of thinking.¹⁹

The BCG trial also anticipated many of the moral and practical problems of human subject research in developing countries that have emerged as major concerns in the age of AIDS.²⁰ European scientists in Algiers were much less invasive than those in the British Raj, which experienced an outbreak of bubonic plague in the late nineteenth century, not to mention Victorian England, where mandatory vaccination laws provoked powerful resistance.²¹ They did not withhold treatment, as Dr. Vonderlehr and his colleagues did in the notorious Tuskegee syphilis experiment in the United States.²² In fact, they made routine care available to people in desperate need. In the process, the Algiers BCG trial created a new, triangular relationship between European researchers, poor African test subjects, and regulators in Geneva. The vast human experiment was controlled by experts and addressed concerns that had little if anything to do with conditions in the Maghreb, even as it provided access to cutting-edge care.

THE ALGIERS BCG TRIAL, like so many overseas experiments, resulted from the difficulty of carrying out research on the European mainland.²³ Calmette and his colleague Camille Guérin, a veterinarian, began to develop BCG at the Pasteur Institute laboratory in Lille, France, in 1905. They noticed that animals that ingested a small quantity of tuberculosis bacilli tested tuberculin-positive and developed a resistance

¹⁹ For the history of clinical trials, see fn. 4 above. For the emergence of statistical modes of thinking, see Theodore M. Porter, The Rise of Statistical Thinking, 1820–1900 (Princeton, N.J., 1986); Ian Hacking, The Taming of Chance (Cambridge, 1990); Russell C. Maulitz, “Physician versus Bacteriologist: The Ideology of Science in Clinical Medicine,” in Morris J. Vogel and Charles E. Rosenberg, The Therapeutic Revolution: Essays in the Social History of American Medicine (Philadelphia, 1979), 91–107; and Gerald L. Geison, “Divided We Stand: Physiologists and Clinicians in the American Context,” ibid., 67–90.

²⁰ Marcia Angell, “Ethical Imperialism? Ethics in International Collaborative Clinical Research,” New England Journal of Medicine 319, no. 16 (1988): 1081–1083; Angell, “The Ethics of Clinical Research in the Third World,” New England Journal of Medicine 337, no. 12 (1997): 847–849; Peter Lurie and Sidney M. Wolfe, “Unethical Trials of Interventions to Reduce Perinatal Transmission of the Human Immunodeficiency Virus in Developing Countries,” ibid., 853–856; Harold Varmus and David Satcher, “Ethical Complexities of Conducting Research in Developing Countries,” ibid., 1003–1005; Ronald Bayer, “Ethical Challenges of HIV Vaccine Trials in Less Developed Nations: Conflict and Consensus in the International Arena,” AIDS: Official Journal of the International AIDS Society 14, no. 8 (2000): 1051–1057; and David J. Rothman, “The Shame of Medical Research,” New York Review of Books 47, no. 19 (November 30, 2000): 60–64.

²¹ David Arnold, “Touching the Body: Perspectives on the Indian Plague, 1896–1900,” in Ranajit Guha, ed., Subaltern Studies V: Writings on South Asian History and Society (Delhi, 1987), 55–90; Amal Das, “Calcutta Plague: Epidemic, Colonial Intervention and Indigenous Society, 1898–1900,” in Chitabrata Palit and Achintya Kumar Dutta, eds., History of Medicine in India: The Medical Encounter (Delhi, 2005), 87–110; and Nadja Durbach, Bodily Matters: The Anti-Vaccination Movement in England, 1853–1907 (Durham, N.C., 2005).

²² Allan M. Brandt, “Racism and Research: The Case of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study,” Hastings Center Report 6, no. 8 (1978): 21–29; James H. Jones, Bad Blood: The Tuskegee Syphilis Experiment, new and expanded ed. (New York, 1993); and Susan M. Reverby, ed., Tuskegee’s Truths: Rethinking the Tuskegee Syphilis Study (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2000).

²³ This section builds on the work of Christian Bonah, especially Histoire de l’expérimentation humaine en France.

to active TB.²⁴ They spent the better part of the next sixteen years developing culture media and conducting exhaustive animal testing to attenuate what remained a live virus and make it safe for use in humans. In 1921, after 230 successive cultures and repeated testing, they declared their attenuated virus completely safe, incapable of causing lesions even when injected in massive doses into the most sensitive laboratory animals. At that point, Calmette and Guérin felt they had exhausted the potential for animal testing.²⁵

Calmette and his colleagues studiously avoided mention of the term “human testing,” which remained a particularly strong taboo in France, especially for live vaccines administered to otherwise healthy infants.²⁶ Testing vaccines on human subjects has always posed unique ethical, practical, and political problems. Vaccines, unlike other medications, expose patients to definite risk in order to combat an uncertain threat. The vaccinated, usually young children, run the risk of complications or, in rare cases, death to gain protection against a disease they may never contract.²⁷ There was tremendous optimism in the early twentieth century that vaccines could render infectious diseases obsolete. “It is within the power of man to eradicate infectious disease from the earth,” Pasteur famously proclaimed.²⁸ That optimism, however, was tempered by memories of the resistance that compulsory vaccination against smallpox had provoked; Edward Jenner’s smallpox vaccine remained the only one required by the French government until just before World War II. In this context, Calmette had to proceed cautiously and persuade the public that his new vaccine was safe and effective.²⁹

Above all, he had to convince doctors. General practitioners were uncommonly powerful in France and jealous of their prerogatives.³⁰ They would not have rec-

²⁴ A. Calmette and C. Guérin, “Origine intestinale de la tuberculose pulmonaire,” Annales de l’Institut Pasteur 19 (1905): 611.

²⁵ Albert Calmette, L’Infection bacillaire et la tuberculose chez l’homme et chez les animaux, 2nd ed. (Paris, 1922).

²⁶ Philippe Menut, “Éthique et ethos de la recherche biomédicale en France: L’introduction de la vaccination par le BCG, 1921–1931,” in Christian Bonah, Étienne Lépicaud, and Volker Roelcke, eds., La médecine expérimentale au tribunal: Implications éthiques de quelques procès médicaux du XX^e siècle européen (Paris, 2003), 95–124; Giovanni Maio, “Das Humanexperiment vor und nach Nürnberg: Überlegungen zum Menschenversuch und zum Einwilligungsbegriff in der französischen Diskussion des 19. und 20. Jahrhunderts,” in Claudia Wiesemann and Andreas Frewer, eds., Medizin und Ethik im Zeichen von Auschwitz: 50 Jahre Nürnberger Ärzteprozess (Jena, 1996), 45–78; and Bonah, Histoire de l’expérimentation humaine en France.

²⁷ Douglas S. Diekema and Edgar K. Marcuse, “Ethical Issues in the Vaccination of Children,” in G. Roberto Burgio and John D. Lantos, eds., Primum Non Nocere Today, 2nd ed. (Amsterdam, 1998), 37–47; Ross D. Silverman and Thomas May, “Private Choice versus Public Health: Religion, Morality, and Childhood Vaccination Law,” Margins 1, no. 2 (2001): 505–521.

²⁸ Pasteur quoted without attribution by René Dubos and Jean Dubos, The White Plague: Tuberculosis, Man, and Society (1952; repr., New Brunswick, N.J., 1987), 228.

²⁹ France began to require vaccination for diphtheria in November 1939, and for typhoid in 1940; smallpox vaccination was required until 1984, well after the disease was eradicated. For smallpox vaccination in France, see Pierre Darmon, La longue traque de la variole: Les pionniers de la médecine préventive (Paris, 1986); Anne Marie Moulin, ed., L’aventure de la vaccination (Paris, 1996); and Murard and Zylberman, L’hygiène dans la République, 369–393; for the rest of Europe, see Peter Baldwin, Contagion and the State, 1830–1930 (Cambridge, 1999), chap. 4; and for England, see Durbach, Bodily Matters. For vaccination in the United States, see James Colgrove, State of Immunity: The Politics of Vaccination in Twentieth-Century America (Berkeley, Calif., 2006), esp. chap. 3, “Diphtheria Immunization: The Power, and the Limits, of Persuasion.”

³⁰ Dominique Damamme, “La jeunesse des syndicats de médecins ou l’enchantement du syndicalisme,” Genèses: Sciences sociales et histoire 3, no. 3 (1991): 31–54; Bénédicte Vergez-Chaignon, “Le

commended a therapy without evidence that it worked; once convinced of its efficacy, however, they felt bound to provide it to their patients. Most independent doctors rejected the idea that any method, no matter how sophisticated, could surpass their own cultivated clinical judgment. The idea of leaving their patients' treatment to chance was anathema. The democracy of the French healthcare system, the disproportionate influence enjoyed by general practitioners at the expense of specialists and government ministries, has often been seen as a sign of backwardness.³¹ Their power posed formidable challenges for research institutes and government agencies interested in applying new forms of applied mathematics to medical research and provided a powerful defense for the interests of individual patients at the expense of the community. It compelled Calmette to rush his work and attempt to keep debate from spilling over into the metropolitan public sphere.

The first human vaccinations with BCG took place in a Paris maternity ward in 1921.³² Calmette later emphasized that the director of the Hôpital de la Charité's École de puériculture had asked for access to his new vaccine and offered to obtain parental permission to vaccinate children Calmette thought were certain to contract TB. By writing that a doctor had approached him—Calmette said he was “tormented” by the shift from animal to human subjects and “would likely have hesitated for quite some time”—the microbiologist distanced himself from accusations of human experimentation.³³ After seven years of testing, using an oral dose to ease compliance and avoid resistance even though it was known to be less effective, Calmette and his team showed that the vaccine was safe by taking temperature and weight readings of all the children and comparing them to established norms.³⁴ Establishing its efficacy, however, was much more difficult.³⁵

In order to prove that BCG worked, they would have to show that vaccinated children developed active TB less often than unvaccinated children. French doctors were not obligated to report TB cases; there were no definitive statistics. Calmette tried to resolve the issue by sending a questionnaire to 500 dispensaries around France. From the replies, he calculated an infant mortality rate of 24 percent. That is, he claimed that 24 out of every 100 children in France would die within their first year if one of their immediate relatives had a declared case of active TB.³⁶ syndicalisme médical français de sa naissance à sa refondation: Intérêts et morale au pays de l'individualisme (1892–1945),” Revue d'histoire moderne et contemporaine 43, no. 4 (1996): 709–734; Martha L. Hildreth, “Medical Rivalries and Medical Politics in France: The Physicians' Union Movement and the Medical Assistance Law of 1893,” Journal of the History of Medicine and Allied Sciences 42, no. 1 (1987): 5–29; Claudine Herzlich, “The Evolution of Relations between French Physicians and the State from 1880 to 1980,” Sociology of Health and Illness 4, no. 3 (1982): 241–253; and Julie Fette, Exclusions: Practicing Prejudice in French Law and Medicine, 1920–1945 (Ithaca, N.Y., 2012), chaps. 1–3. For comparison, see Michael H. Kater, “Professionalization and Socialization of Physicians in Wilhelmine and Weimar Germany,” Journal of Contemporary History 20, no. 4 (1985): 677–701.

³¹ In particular by Murard and Zylberman, L'hygiène dans la République, and following them, Baldwin, Contagion and the State.

³² Weill-Hallé and Turpin, “Premiers essais de vaccination antituberculeuse.”

³³ Calmette, La vaccination préventive contre la tuberculose par le “BCG,” 186.

³⁴ Ibid., 186, 212–213. The dose had to be delivered in the first ten days, so that it could be absorbed properly. Yet the boosters given after that initial period were still given orally rather than by injection.

³⁵ Bonah, Histoire de l'expérimentation humaine, chap. 4.

³⁶ Infection with the TB bacillus, testing “tuberculin-positive,” may or may not lead to active disease. In most cases, infection creates a primary lesion, usually in the lungs, within four to twelve weeks. The primary lesion may heal or, more often, become calcified or ossified in a complex that contains the

From his study of vaccinated children at La Charité, he found a death rate of 0.8 percent.³⁷

Armed with this evidence, Calmette emulated his idol, Louis Pasteur. In 1924, he presented his work to the Academy of Medicine, and it was immediately taken up by the medical press. He was inundated with requests from French physicians for samples of BCG, which he sent them free of charge, in return for the doctors' observations; he used the responses to supplement his findings from the Charité hospital. In 1927, he published the final results and went on a whirlwind publicity tour, insisting that BCG offered a safe and effective means to prevent what remained the leading cause of death in France.³⁸ As Christian Bonah has shown, for Calmette as for Pasteur, laboratory work took pride of place in establishing the worth of a medical procedure. Calmette allotted only a few pages of his major 1927 presentation of BCG to statistical evidence while devoting more than one hundred pages to his laboratory work. Although he hired statisticians to validate his experiments, he ultimately treated statistical evidence as an afterthought, useful only to compensate for the practical limitations on human experimentation and to lend support to his laboratory work.³⁹ This fits with Harry Marks's observation that in the United States, even "in laboratory disciplines that had long ago embraced quantification, researchers still [the 1950s] regarded a merely statistical study as intellectually inferior to a carefully planned out program of experimental investigation."⁴⁰

Even before Calmette published his final results, a violent controversy erupted. Criticism of his work emerged on two fronts. The first challenge, and the one he found most upsetting, came from a veterinarian trained at the Pasteur Institute, and a fellow member of the French Academy of Medicine. In 1927, José Lignières insisted that the absence of lesions found during an animal autopsy did not prove that BCG was innocuous. Recognizing that most subjects supported the vaccine, he suggested that a live vaccine might nevertheless pose a risk for an unquantifiable minority of people, especially those with compromised immune systems. He was rebuffed the following year by Calmette, who suggested that as a veterinarian, Lignières lacked the standing to engage in debate.⁴¹

A series of pediatricians and statisticians from Scandinavia and, especially, England issued a more damaging critique. They took immediate aim at Calmette's claim that 24 percent of infants born to parents with active TB would die within a year.

tubercle bacilli, preventing them from spreading through the body. At this point, the subject remains asymptomatic but will likely test tuberculin-positive. Unless treated with antibiotics, the infection will remain and may progress to active TB at a later date, often many years later, if the subject's immune system is compromised.

³⁷ Calmette, La vaccination préventive contre la tuberculose par le "BCG," 206–210.

³⁸ Calmette, "Quelques notes sur ma vie et ma carrière"; and Calmette, La vaccination préventive contre la tuberculose par le "BCG."

³⁹ Bonah, Histoire de l'expérimentation humaine, 232–237.

⁴⁰ Marks, The Progress of Experiment, 137.

⁴¹ See the following series of articles by José Lignières: "Contribution à l'étude des qualités pathogènes du vaccin BCG contre la tuberculose," Bulletin de l'Académie de médecine 91, 3^{ème} série, no. 98 (session of July 26, 1927): 127–145; "Nouvelle contribution à l'étude des propriétés pathogènes du vaccin BCG et son application à la prophylaxie de la tuberculose," ibid. 92, 3^{ème} série, no. 99 (session of May 15, 1928): 512–529; and "Le vaccin BCG, bien que très atténué et sans action tuberculigène, reste encore trop pathogène pour l'espèce humaine," ibid. 92, 3^{ème} série, no. 100 (session of July 24, 1928): 865–878. For Calmette's reply, see ibid. (session of October 23, 1928): 1038–1048.

A careful study of unvaccinated children in a pair of Copenhagen dispensaries found an overall mortality rate of 7.7 percent within the first year, and a TB mortality rate of 4.9 percent. The authors corroborated their findings by comparing them with other contemporary studies, which had reached similar results. The magnitude of the reduction that Calmette claimed, from 24 percent to less than 1 percent, led others to wonder about selection bias: how did the children who received the vaccine compare to those who did not?⁴²

Perhaps the most searching questions came from University of London professor Major Greenwood, a central figure in the new field of epidemiology. How did Calmette select children to vaccinate? Were they separated from their parents long enough for the vaccine to take effect (as much as two months)? How were they fed and looked after? Different treatment in the first weeks of life, Greenwood asserted, could easily account for Calmette's findings. If the Copenhagen study was correct, and Greenwood thought that it was, the risk posed by TB was too small to measure with the sample sizes that Calmette had worked with, even if they were truly random.⁴³ His final conclusion was damning: "Dr. Calmette has deliberately appealed to the statistical method, and in my submission, his use of that method has been so gravely defective, that no confidence can be placed either in his statistical inferences or in the reliability of the data which he has assembled." In a similar vein, the Swedish pediatrician Arvid Wallgren accused Calmette of having gotten so carried away with enthusiasm for his new vaccine that he had overlooked the basic rules of logic.⁴⁴

BEFORE WORLD WAR I, SCIENTISTS would likely have solved this kind of standoff themselves. In this case, however, resolution came from a new international agency, the League of Nations Health Organization. For all that Calmette's hard-charging personality and the prestige of the Pasteur Institute had done to win over the French public, the international community remained hesitant about the new vaccine. The Health Organization operated on a shoestring budget. It lacked the legal standing or power to enforce its decisions. But that very weakness presented an opportunity: it conferred the appearance, at least, of neutrality, of objectivity, and thus the ability to arbitrate the competing claims of interested parties.⁴⁵ Moreover, widespread respect for its director, the charismatic Pasteur-trained Polish doctor Ludwik Rajchman, earned it considerable influence. Rajchman wanted to surpass the achievements of prewar international health organizations, which had been limited primarily to coordinating responses to epidemics. Distancing himself from his Anglo-French sponsors, he cultivated support from the Rockefeller Foundation to help guard his ⁴² The study, by R. Kjer-Petersen and J. Ostenveld, originally presented in the Ugeskrift for Læger, March 31, 1927, 257, is quoted in the British Medical Journal, May 7, 1927, 845–846.

⁴³ Major Greenwood, "Prophylactic Vaccination of the Newly Born against Tuberculosis," British Medical Journal 1, no. 3466 (June 11, 1927): 1082–1083.

⁴⁴ M. Greenwood, "Professor Calmette's Statistical Study of B.C.G. Vaccination," British Medical Journal 1, no. 3514 (May 12, 1928): 795; and Arvid Wallgren, "Observations critiques sur la vaccination antituberculeuse de Calmette," Acta Paediatrica 7, no. 3–4 (1927): 120–137, esp. 134–135. For a thorough analysis of these critiques, see Bonah, Histoire de l'expérimentation humaine, 244–285.

⁴⁵ Borowy points out that members of the Health Committee routinely informed their governments of goings-on in Geneva, and governments, in turn, routinely lobbied the committee; Coming to Terms with World Health, esp. 69.

independence and take the initiative in making public health policy. Unable to fund ambitious field programs, he endeavored instead to establish international standards for biological products and to have his Health Organization act as an international agency for sanitary reform.⁴⁶

The BCG controversy presented Rajchman and his colleagues with an ideal opportunity. On short notice, in the fall of 1928, the organization's Health Committee invited a select group of leading experts to take part in a conference on the status of the new vaccine. Who convinced Rajchman to call the meeting? Was it Greenwood, in an effort to establish the power of the new discipline of medical statistics? Did Wallgren approach the League to save what he thought was a useful vaccine from its critics and to advance his own alternative method of delivery? Rajchman's close friend and colleague Thorwald Madsen, director of the Health Committee and its program in medical standardization, as well as the Danish Statens Serum Institute (which produced BCG), was surely interested. Perhaps Calmette sought to use the League to put the criticism to rest? If so, his efforts to influence the selection process had no effect, much to his consternation. Rajchman and Madsen selected the experts from hospitals, government agencies, and research institutes, primarily in Europe. With the help of Yves Biraud, a specialist in medical statistics, they directed the panel to pay special attention to the kind of proof that would be required to determine the vaccine's protective power. In deference to Calmette, they held the event at Pasteur's campus in Paris.⁴⁷

The expert panel, chaired by Danish statistician Harald Westergaard, roundly dismissed Lignières's critique of BCG. After a thorough review of the literature, the committee issued an official report accepting all of Calmette's claims for safety. The years of intensive testing, without documented mishaps attributable to BCG, impressed the experts:

It seems reasonable to say that nearly everyone who has published on BCG, either on an experimental level or in veterinary or human practice, agrees that it is innocuous at the doses prescribed by Professor Calmette and his collaborators; that efforts to provoke active tuberculosis with BCG have failed and that the hypothesis of its spontaneous return to virulence, a hypothesis contradicted by observation up to the present, shall remain in the realm of pure speculation for the foreseeable future.⁴⁸

Rajchman's study commission was not willing to condemn years of work by one of Europe's leading scientists on the basis of conjecture.

Nor, however, were the international experts on the commission prepared to ⁴⁶ In addition to the works cited in fn. 3 above, see Marta A. Balinska, For the Good of Humanity: Ludwik Rajchman, Medical Statesman, trans. Rebecca Howell (Budapest, 1998).

⁴⁷ While the published minutes of the Health Committee indicate that Calmette proposed the conference, in private correspondence with Rajchman he had previously written that if Rajchman and Madsen were so inclined, he had no objection to a conference to study BCG; League of Nations Archives, Geneva [hereafter SDN], Organisation d'hygiène, Comité d'hygiène, Procès-verbaux, 12^e session, May 5, 1928, C.254.M.79, 43; Calmette to Rajchman, February 3, 1928. For Calmette's attempt to influence the selection process, see Calmette to Biraud, June 26, 1928; and for the selection process, see the correspondence between Biraud and Madsen, all in SDN 8A [General], ser. 552, cart. R5850. See also League of Nations Health Organization, Report of the Technical Conference for the Study of Vaccination against Tuberculosis by Means of BCG (Geneva, 1928).

⁴⁸ SDN, Organisation d'hygiène, Vaccination antituberculeuse par le BCG, typescript report, "Note sur l'innocuité du BCG," 30, SDN C.H./BCG/1-38 (1928-1929) [397].

accept the claims for the vaccine's efficacy. Greenwood's attack on Calmette's statistical reasoning earned their full support. The experts were merciless on the subject of selection bias. Calmette, they pointed out in unison, had never explained how he selected which children to vaccinate; nor could he account for which children his study followed. He minimized the mortality rate of vaccinated children with a series of apparently careless errors. In the absence of autopsies, many of the deaths he attributed to "other causes" could well have resulted from tuberculosis. While the report writers were willing to admit that the mortality rate among vaccinated children in France was probably lower than the rate for the general population, just how much lower was impossible to say.⁴⁹ At the end of the conference, a Commission of Expert Statisticians set out guidelines for future research, which were published and circulated widely, to avoid the pitfalls of Calmette's work. The most challenging section insisted:

It is essential to use the method of sampling in selecting experimental (vaccinated) and control (unvaccinated) groups, preferably by vaccinating alternate infants in tuberculous families, in which the factors referred to in the special Sub-Committee's report . . . are comparable.⁵⁰

The statistical committee went beyond consultation and the sharing of information, as earlier international meetings had typically done; it handed down guidelines that vaccine developers were expected to follow.⁵¹ This was hardly the crowning moment of Calmette's publicity tour, as historians of science have written.⁵² The microbiologist replied bitterly to a colleague at the League: "How could such supposedly intelligent men come up with this? I forget which moralist said that statistics is the official language of liars. I'm beginning to think he was right and that, in any event, we cannot allow statisticians to have the final word on BCG."⁵³

The League's effort to establish guidelines for clinical research marks an important milestone in relations between statisticians and medical researchers. Even in England, home to the most important national bureau of medical statistics, the Medical Research Council (MRC), most of whose members had been trained by one of the key figures of modern epidemiology, Karl Pearson, statisticians appear to have had very little influence over the design of clinical trials before World War II.⁵⁴

⁴⁹ Ibid., typescript report, "Note sur l'efficacité prémunisante du BCG chez l'homme," esp. 10–35. See also the preparatory memoranda by Drs. Siegfried Rosenfeld (Ministry for Social Administration, Vienna) and Professor Carl Prausnitz (State Institute of Hygiene, Breslau), and correspondence from Greenwood, who recommended that any testing be conducted outside France, all in SDN C.H./BCG/1-38 (1928–1929) [397].

⁵⁰ League of Nations, Health Committee, published Minutes of the Fourteenth Session, May 2–8, 1929, "Statistical Appraisal of Data Concerning the Results of Vaccination by Means of BCG," 100, in SDN C.H./BCG/1-38 (1928–1929) [397].

⁵¹ Neill, "Paul Ehrlich's Colonial Connections," 61–62; and Howard-Jones, The Scientific Background of the International Sanitary Conferences.

⁵² Bonah, Histoire de l'expérimentation humaine, 243, claims that the League of Nations capped Calmette's publicity tour of 1927 by approving BCG. For a similar account, see Institut national de la santé et de la recherche médicale, Tuberculose: Place de la vaccination dans la maîtrise de la maladie (Paris, 2004), 116–117.

⁵³ Calmette to anonymous, duplicate letter, on Pasteur Institute letterhead, May 4, 1929, SDN 8A (General), ser. 5370, cart. R5890, doss. Tuberculosis, Vaccination by BCG, Correspondence with Pasteur Institute, Paris.

⁵⁴ Pearson had recently developed the chi square test, which remains fundamental to modern epidemiology, and his student Major Greenwood ran the statistical office. For Pearson, see Theodore M. Porter, Karl Pearson: The Scientific Life in a Statistical Age (Princeton, N.J., 2004). For the MRC's sta-

Doctors generally approached statisticians late in the day, to help minimize problems they encountered after experimental design was complete. Greenwood's student Austin Bradford Hill—who later designed the landmark trials of the antibiotic streptomycin (1948) and persuaded British clinicians to adopt the principles of controlled experimentation—wrote of his experience at the MRC in the 1920s and 1930s that he and Greenwood had “worked hard and well in correcting and improving the statistics in the reports the Council proposed to publish.”⁵⁵ Desirée Cox-Maksimov found no evidence of written consultation between statisticians and clinicians before the war.⁵⁶ As one wag put it, “like the pathologist, the statistician was consulted only after the damage was done,” to determine “what the experiment died of.”⁵⁷

The recommendations issued by the League statisticians in 1929 posed enormous problems for Calmette and compelled him to start over with the help of professional statisticians. As the League itself recognized, the experts presented what they considered to be best practices, but those practices were not necessarily feasible. Rajchman's staff pointed out to Calmette that a truly systematic study would face insurmountable legal and administrative barriers, not to mention resistance from French family doctors. In reply to a proposal from Calmette, an attempt to accommodate the new guidelines, the League asked him:

How do you plan to impose systematic vaccination on all children, even the premature or disabled in a district? How, moreover, do you plan to prevent doctors in the other [control] district from performing a vaccination they deem beneficial? It would be difficult to justify the legal obligation to vaccinate in one district since the non-vaccination in the other would highlight the experimental character of the operation.⁵⁸

Accommodating the League became even more important the following year. In 1930, seventy-six newborns died in Lübeck, Germany, after being inoculated with contaminated doses of BCG. The Pasteur Institute was ultimately absolved, but the catastrophe resulted in a lengthy trial, which dominated news coverage and exacerbated doubts about the vaccine. Even though Calmette had been experiencing serious health problems, he persevered. “I’ve begun working again,” he wrote to Charles Nicolle, the Nobel Prize-winning director of the Pasteur Institute in Tunis, “and cannot even think of rest. I have to go to Bern and Lausanne by train, to Bar-tistical unit, see Edward Higgs, “Medical Statistics, Patronage and the State: The Development of the MRC Statistical Unit, 1911–1948,” Medical History 44 (2000): 323–340; Cox-Maksimov, “The Making of the Clinical Trial in Britain”; and Anne Hardy and M. Eileen Magnello, “Statistical Methods in Epidemiology: Karl Pearson, Ronald Ross, Major Greenwood and Austin Bradford Hill, 1900–1945,” Sozial- und Präventivmedizin 47, no. 2 (2002): 80–89.

⁵⁵ Austin Bradford Hill, “Introduction,” in Major Greenwood, The Medical Dictator and Other Biographical Studies (London, 1986), xi.

⁵⁶ Cox-Maksimov, “The Making of the Clinical Trial in Britain,” 208.

⁵⁷ That was no less than R. A. Fischer, the British geneticist who, along with Egon Pearson and Jerzy Neyman, helped develop the statistical theory of modern experimental design; quoted in Marks, The Progress of Experiment, 148. Hill urged that testing be carried out before doctors came to believe in a new treatment; A. Bradford Hill, “The Clinical Trial,” British Medical Bulletin 7 (1951): 279.

⁵⁸ SDN Health Section to Calmette, March 19, 1929, SDN 8A (General), ser. 5370, cart. R5890, doss. Tuberculosis, Vaccination by BCG, Correspondence with Pasteur Institute, Paris. Cf. Greenwood, “Professor Calmette’s Statistical Study of B.C.G. Vaccination,” 795.

celona on April 13, always for BCG . . . You know, I'm out there on the barricades. This is no time to let up."⁵⁹

Calmette turned first to the French army. In fact, he had done so even before opposition to BCG arose. When he began sending samples of the vaccine to interested doctors in 1924, he took the liberty of approaching the French army command. For years the Pasteur Institute and army medical staff tested African soldiers, who doctors thought were less likely to have been exposed to the disease, working out the dosage for subcutaneous delivery.⁶⁰ Perhaps in response to Greenwood and the League, Calmette carried out random trials with control groups in 1929, to achieve "acceptable" levels of side effects such as cold abscesses, which initially sent many to the hospital. One virtue of testing the new vaccine on soldiers was that Calmette encountered no resistance from civil doctors. Military leaders had no qualms about forcing troops, especially African troops, to serve as test subjects for the good of the service. Despite the army's help, however, the trials proved inconclusive. TB rates among soldiers were too low by the late 1920s for a determination to be made about whether the vaccine made any appreciable difference. The director of the army's vaccine program concluded that soldiers did not make the best test subjects; they were too well fed and too healthy: "tuberculosis is extremely rare in both groups [vaccinated and control]. Appropriate testing would need to take place under less favorable conditions" to produce meaningful results.⁶¹

To find less favorable conditions, Calmette looked to the colonies. As a former navy doctor and member of the medical staff for colonial troops, he had connections throughout the empire. He had played a central role in creating outposts of the Pasteur Institute in Saigon in 1904, as he had in Lille in 1895, and in reorganizing the Algiers Institute in 1909–1912. He had placed members at several other new overseas branches, including Tunis, Tangiers, and Dakar. Inaugurated in 1888 with a mix of private and public gifts and the proceeds from vaccine sales, the Pasteur Institute in Paris initially focused exclusively on rabies. Its activities quickly expanded, however, to include a mix of pure and applied sciences aimed at tackling all infectious diseases.⁶² The overseas Pasteur institutes were charged with applying the pure science developed in Paris, although scientists in the colonies often chafed at playing such a subordinate role. Researchers went overseas to make careers, hoping to profit from exotic locales by discovering new diseases or cures. Tuberculosis research was not a high priority among them, but it was Calmette's singular obses-

⁵⁹ Menut, "The Lübeck Catastrophe and Its Consequences for Anti-Tuberculosis BCG Vaccination"; and Calmette to Nicolle, February 21, 1930, IP, Fonds Nicolle, NIC.A.3, doss. Correspondance avec Albert Calmette. See also Calmette's letter to Nicolle, November 3, 1931, in the same dossier, which expresses his frustration over the Lübeck disaster's influence on public and expert opinion. On Nicolle, see Kim Pelis, Charles Nicolle, Pasteur's Imperial Missionary: Typhus and Tunisia (Rochester, N.Y., 2006).

⁶⁰ On the use of colonial troops during World War I, see Marc Michel, L'appel à l'Afrique: Contributions et réactions à l'effort de guerre en A.O.F., 1914–1919 (Paris, 1982); Myron Echenberg, Colonial Conscripts: The "Tirailleurs Sénégalais" in French West Africa, 1857–1960 (Portsmouth, N.H., 1991); and Richard S. Fogarty, Race and War in France: Colonial Subjects in the French Army, 1914–1918 (Baltimore, 2008).

⁶¹ C. Toullec to Calmette, January 26, 1932, quoted by Bonah, Histoire de l'expérimentation humaine, 340.

⁶² On the early history of the Pasteur Institute and its complex mix of private, public, and commercial activity, see Ilana Löwy, "On Hybridizations, Networks and New Disciplines: The Pasteur Institute and the Development of Microbiology in France," Studies in History and Philosophy of Science 25, no. 5 (1994): 655–688.

sion. If he had little leverage with the likes of Nicolle, he enjoyed considerable influence elsewhere. Especially in Saigon and Algiers, directors had put aside their own work to devote themselves to Calmette's cause since the mid-1920s.

The Pasteur Institute in Saigon vaccinated huge numbers of children. According to an internal report, the local institute administered some eight hundred doses a week throughout Cochinchina in 1924–1925.⁶³ Over the next half-dozen years, nurses vaccinated some 300,000 infants, and by the 1930s they were vaccinating more than 100,000 per year.⁶⁴ However, as Calmette himself recognized all too well in the wake of his encounters with statisticians, the number of vaccinations mattered little as a brute fact on its own. Without centralized administrative records, what the French call état-civil, doctors had no means of tracking the people they vaccinated. Calmette remarked: “In effect, the absence of état-civil and the resulting impossibility of finding mothers and children among the masses constitute virtually insurmountable obstacles. It must be acknowledged, moreover, that hospital patients often register under assumed names and give false addresses,” thwarting any effort to study the effects of a vaccine, or any other treatment.⁶⁵

The northern coastal zone of Algeria was better served with the rudiments of an administrative state than more classically colonial territories. Unlike Indochina, Algeria had a functioning system of public records.⁶⁶ Its major cities—Oran, Constantine, Bône, and especially Algiers—with their predominantly European populations, enjoyed the most fully developed civil administration and public services in the empire outside the French mainland. After a pair of false starts, an 1882 law imposed the French état-civil on Algeria. Already in the late nineteenth century, French authorities had begun to create genealogical trees and to impose officially recognized names. Within a decade, they had recorded the names, birthdates, and marital status of more than 3 million Muslims; imperfect as it was, the civil bureaucracy in Algeria had been keeping basic administrative records for nearly fifty years by the time BCG became available.⁶⁷

The capital city of Algiers also suffered devastating levels of tuberculosis mortality. The disease began to alarm French colonial and medical authorities before the turn of the twentieth century. A member of the French Academy of Medicine, Victor Widal, told his colleagues in 1890:

It is impossible to say, in the end, if phthisis [tuberculosis] existed in our colony before the French occupation. We have no records on that score. What is certain is that, in the first years of the conquest, we saw some cases among our soldiers and settlers, but everything suggests ⁶³ J. Bablet, “Les vaccinations antituberculeuses des nourrissons par ingestion de BCG en Cochinchine (1924–25),” mimeo, n.d., IP, Fonds BCG, cart. 37, BCG dans les colonies.

⁶⁴ Laurence Monnais, “Preventive Medicine and ‘Mission Civilisatrice’: Uses of the BCG Vaccine in French Colonial Vietnam between the Two World Wars,” International Journal of Asia-Pacific Studies 2, no. 1 (2006): 57.

⁶⁵ Calmette, typed mimeo, n.d., doc. no. 10, IP, Fonds BCG, cart. 37, BCG dans les colonies.

⁶⁶ French Indochina did have the most sophisticated, most highly developed police force in the French Empire, especially its political branch. See Patrice Morlat, La répression coloniale au Vietnam, 1908–1940 (Paris, 1990).

⁶⁷ E. Cornu, Guide pratique pour la constitution de l'état civil des indigènes (Algiers, 1889); and Charles-Robert Ageron, Les algériens musulmans et la France, 1871–1919, 2 vols. (Paris, 1968), 1: 176–183.

that the root of the problem was not encountered in Algeria but brought from France . . . [I]f it can't be proven that we imported phthisis, we have at least helped propagate it.⁶⁸

He went on to note that during his nearly twelve years in Algeria, from 1853 to 1867, he had seen no more than perhaps twenty cases of pulmonary tuberculosis. Since then, however, there had been a dramatic increase.⁶⁹ TB constituted 2 percent of reported deaths in Algiers in 1838, 7.5 percent in 1860, and 14.7 percent, on average, for the years from 1900 to 1905.⁷⁰ By 1913, the general mortality rate in the Algiers Kasbah, where most Muslims lived, had reached 380 per 10,000, with TB the leading cause.⁷¹

As in so many other areas, World War I magnified trends that were already under way. Tuberculosis mortality exploded during and then again after the war. Rudimentary statistics for tuberculosis become available in Europe only in the late nineteenth century. Doctors were not required to report TB cases in France until 1964, and recordkeeping in the colonies was always unreliable. Mortality rates in French Algeria must therefore be taken as orders of magnitude and not precise indicators, more trustworthy for European citizens than for Muslim subjects. In this regard, local hospital records can help establish rough benchmarks. According to the records for Algiers, provided by the director of the city's TB program at the Mustapha Hospital, the disease routinely accounted for less than 15 percent of hospital deaths for Europeans in the city in the 1920s; the Muslim share was consistently more than twice that number, hovering just over 30 percent in the same time period.⁷² This ratio of 2:1—two Muslims dying of TB for every one European in a hospital setting—must have been lower than the ratio in Algeria as a whole. Given the glaring inequalities in access to medical care, it seems likely that a much greater percentage of European TB patients ended up in hospitals when they got sick, and thus the disparity in TB mortality rates between Europeans and Muslims was even wider than that 2:1 ratio. TB rates recorded for European settlers in Algiers were roughly the same as those in Paris at the time, which seems plausible. If those figures are correct, the Muslim rate was almost certainly greater than 50 per 10,000, and probably reached much higher levels. Referring to the TB epidemic, the head of the city's health office (the Bureau d'hygiène), Dr. Lemaire, said that "anyone who lives in the Kasbah has cut his life expectancy in half."⁷³ One of Lemaire's students recalled in his medical thesis: "We often diagnosed pulmonary phthisis just by listening to them cough and an affirmative response to the question, 'Have you been in France?'"⁷⁴ By the mid-1930s, 95 percent of Muslims who had traveled to France and back tested tuberculin-

⁶⁸ Vidal "Sur la prophylaxie de la tuberculose," Bulletin de l'Académie de Médecine, 3rd ser., vol. 23 (session of January 7, 1890), 9, 13.

⁶⁹ Ibid., 13.

⁷⁰ Dr. Gillot, "Progression de la tuberculose en Algérie," in Congrès international de la tuberculose, tenu à Paris du 2 au 7 octobre 1905, 3 vols. (Paris, 1906), 1: 550.

⁷¹ The municipal record leaves the percentage of TB mortality unspecified in the breakdown by arrondissement. Ville d'Alger, Compte rendu des travaux du Bureau municipal d'hygiène pour 1912 et 1913 (Algiers, 1914), 107.

⁷² A. Lévi-Valensi, "La tuberculose pulmonaire chez l'indigène musulman algérien (adulte)," Algérie médicale, 4th ser., 37, no. 66 (June 1933): 347–392.

⁷³ Dr. Gaston Lemaire, quoted by his student André Albou, Étude sur la tuberculose des travailleurs indigènes algériens dans les grandes villes: France et Algérie—De son expansion des centres vers les campagnes (Algiers, 1930), 28.

⁷⁴ Ibid., 13.

Tuberculosis Mortality in Algiers

TABLE 1: From A. Lévi-Valensi, "La tuberculose pulmonaire chez l'indigène musulman," Algérie médicale, 4th ser., 37, no. 66 (June 1933): 356.

positive.⁷⁵ The settler government proved deaf to appeals to address TB until it appeared the disease might spread to European neighborhoods.⁷⁶

Whether or not their mortality rates reached the recorded highs, the Muslims of Algiers clearly experienced one of the great TB epidemics of the twentieth century, obscured by population growth in Algeria as a whole.⁷⁷ If the figures recorded by the health office—which were routinely cited by well-informed local doctors—are correct, they are staggering: in the 1920s, Muslims in Algiers were four to five times more likely than Europeans to die of TB.⁷⁸ The levels at which Muslims suffered tuberculosis were comparable to those among blacks in South Africa at the height

⁷⁵ Although the authors do not cite the sample size for this cell of their table, it appears to have been several thousand. F. Trens, "Étude de l'infection tuberculeuse chez les indigènes de la Grande Kabylie par la cuti-réaction à la tuberculine," Archives de l'Institut Pasteur d'Algérie 12, no. 2 (June 1934): 198.

⁷⁶ At that point, in the mid-1930s, they looked to the North African services on the French mainland as a model. See Archives Nationales de l'Algérie, Algiers [hereafter ANA], materials on the Commission de la tuberculose in series 17E cartons 660, 662, and 663. For the reference to the metropolitan services, see "Assistance et préservation anti-tuberculeuse indigène," n.d. (1933?), page 8, in carton 663, folder 1. On the Paris services, see Clifford Rosenberg, Policing Paris: The Origins of Modern Immigration Control between the Wars (Ithaca, N.Y., 2006), chap. 7.

⁷⁷ Louis Chevalier, Le problème démographique nord-africain (Paris, 1947); and Kamel Kateb, Européens, "indigènes" et juifs en Algérie (1830–1962): Représentations et réalités des populations (Paris, 2001).

⁷⁸ Lemaire claimed that Muslims were six times more likely to be infected and suffered mortality rates three times higher than Europeans. He based that claim on different, less deadly, years in "La lutte contre la tuberculose en Algérie," Algérie médicale, 4th ser., 37, no. 67 (July 1933): 487.

of the mining boom and apartheid years, in terms of both the TB mortality rate (in devastated areas) and the disparity between dominant and subaltern groups; and they were greater than the 66 per 10,000 suffered by the Parisian Communards during the Prussian siege of 1870–1871 and the 60 per 10,000 Jews who died of TB in the Warsaw Ghetto in 1942.⁷⁹

When the statistical experts at the League of Nations asked for random groups of subjects living in areas with rampant tuberculosis who could be monitored over a period of years, Algeria was the only place in the French Empire where it was practical to undertake such work. The Pasteur Institute provided vaccines and laboratory services, as local branches did elsewhere. Leading Pasteur scientists worked with the medical faculty in Algiers: they helped train doctors and collaborated in public health campaigns. Those ties enabled Calmette to enlist the colonial government's help where others, offering vastly greater resources, had failed. The director of public health services in Algeria, the indefatigable Lucien Raynaud, sought out the support of the Rockefeller Foundation in 1923 for his chronically underfunded office. The director of the Rockefeller Foundation's International Health Board in New York, Frederick Russell, showed immediate interest and dispatched his deputy, Selskar Gunn, to Algeria the next fall. Gunn spent three weeks in Algeria and returned an enthusiastic advocate.⁸⁰ Raynaud clearly made a good impression. Richard Pearce, who accompanied Gunn, noted in his diary: "Raynaud in public health is a corker—splendid administrator and excellent grasp of problems, but he finds Government slow to furnish funds for anything not already on paper."⁸¹ This auspicious start soon collapsed, when the new Socialist governor-general of Algeria, Maurice Violette, proved wary of outside influences and dissuaded Raynaud from working with the Americans.⁸² He could not, however, turn down Calmette's advances. With the help of the French government in Algeria, Calmette took a haphazard vaccine program like the ones in Indochina, in Senegal, and on the French mainland and, by 1935, turned it into a random trial with a control group that continued into the 1950s.

UNLIKE THE CADASTRAL SURVEYS and censuses carried out by the British Raj after the 1857 mutiny or the state-sponsored urban reform projects in Morocco following World War I, the Algiers BCG trial was run by a para-public research institute. If it took advantage of inequalities wrought by the French presence in Algeria, this was ⁷⁹ Dubos and Dubos, The White Plague, 191, report rates of 900 per 10,000 at the Qu'Appelle Valley Reservation in western Canada without providing a date or source; see p. 195 for the Warsaw Ghetto. On the Paris Commune, see David S. Barnes, The Making of a Social Disease: Tuberculosis in Nineteenth-Century France (Berkeley, Calif., 1995), 7; and for South African blacks, Randall M. Packard, White Plague, Black Labor: Tuberculosis and the Political Economy of Health and Disease in South Africa (Berkeley, Calif., 1989), 34–38, 83–89, 145, 160, 212.

⁸⁰ Selskar M. Gunn, "Public Health in Algeria," typescript report (1925), Rockefeller Archive Center, Sleepy Hollow, N.Y. [hereafter RAC], Record Group 6.1, Paris Field Office, Pre-war Correspondence, ser. 1.3, box 45, fol. 521.

⁸¹ Pearce Diary, February 7–8, 1925, RAC, International Health Board Record Group 1.2, ser. 501, box 234, fol. 2996.

⁸² Gunn to Russell, letter no. 441, October 15, 1925, ibid. For Violette's instructions to Raynaud, see the manuscript note dated October 7, 1925, on the letterhead of the Cabinet du Secrétaire Général, Gouvernement Général de l'Algérie, in ANA 17E 663, folder 1.

no “high modernist” attempt to mark boundaries or remake the world.⁸³ It was a defensive effort to respond to scientific critics and would-be regulators.

The Pasteur Institute in Algiers had created a lab to produce BCG before controversy erupted in Europe, around the same time Calmette gave his work-in-progress lecture at the Academy of Medicine (1924). For the first few years, the local branch of the Pasteur Institute gave samples to doctors and veterinarians who requested them, and began recording their own efforts at shelters and dispensaries in several cities. In the wake of the public controversies of 1927–1928 and the Lübeck catastrophe, Yves Biraud, director of epidemiology at the League of Nations, joined the team in Algiers. Biraud had worked with Calmette before, reviewing and helping to present the initial statistical evidence that Calmette published in 1927 to buttress his laboratory work. Now the microbiologist called in Biraud, the statistician, in the initial stages to help design the study.⁸⁴

Under Biraud’s watch, the Algiers team limited their purview. Instead of working with dispensaries wherever they could find them, they concentrated on the Kasbah, with a population density of more than 2,000 people per hectare.⁸⁵ The authors asserted that focusing on a single poor neighborhood reduced the possibility of selection bias. All of the families there endured the same grinding poverty. Children had no opportunity to escape to a wet nurse or a healthy environment in the countryside. During the three years of the study, 4,260 children were born in the second arrondissement. The team vaccinated more than half of them, then compared their mortality over time to that of the unvaccinated, as a control. At this stage, they calculated that BCG decreased the general mortality rate by 29 percent for the first year of life.⁸⁶

In 1935, the Algiers team moved to a fully randomized trial with a control group. Following the League’s guidelines, Pasteur researchers published their research plan. The vaccine would be administered by mouth to newborns in their homes, “under medical conditions,” with revaccinations at specified intervals: at one, three, seven, and fifteen years of age. All procedures would be followed “like a laboratory experiment.” The campaign would cover more than 40,000 subjects, more than 20,000 vaccinated and another 20,000 unvaccinated as a control, over the course of a generation.⁸⁷

The scope of the study bears comment. While James Lind famously conducted ⁸³ See Rabinow, French Modern; Wright, The Politics of Design in French Colonial Urbanism; Cohn, An Anthropologist among the Historians and Other Essays; and Cohn, Colonialism and Its Forms of Knowledge. On high modernism, see James C. Scott, Seeing Like a State: How Certain Schemes to Improve the Human Condition Have Failed (New Haven, Conn., 1998).

⁸⁴ Biraud was, notably, the author of the Preliminary Report on the Causes of the Recent Decline of Tuberculosis Mortality, Health Committee doc. no. 291 (Geneva, 1925); he had served as an independent expert for Calmette’s initial studies of BCG on the mainland, and would later become the director of epidemiology for the World Health Organization. See fn. 8 above on the Algiers branch of the Pasteur Institute.

⁸⁵ To be precise, 2,255 per hectare in 1926. René Lespès, Alger: Étude de géographie et d’histoire urbaines (Paris, 1930).

⁸⁶ Edmond Sergent, Henriette Ducros-Rougebief, and Yves Biraud, “Enquête sur les résultats de la vaccination antituberculeuse par le BCG dans la Casba d’Alger dans les années 1931–1932–1933,” Archives de l’Institut Pasteur d’Algérie 14, no. 1 (March 1936): 1–5.

⁸⁷ Édmond Sergent, A. Catanei, and Henriette Ducros-Rougebief, “Prémunition antituberculeuse par le BCG: Campagne poursuivie depuis 1935 sur 21,244 nouveau-nés vaccinés et 20,063 non-vaccinés, première note,” Archives de l’Institut Pasteur d’Algérie 32, no. 1 (March 1954): 2.

a controlled test on the use of lemons in the treatment of scurvy in the 1740s, the first semi-random experimental trial was carried out in Denmark in the 1890s: Johannes Fibiger gave diphtheria antitoxin to several hundred patients on successive days. In the twentieth century, between the world wars, the British MRC struggled to coordinate semi-random trials of serum treatment for pneumonia in several research settings in England and Scotland, applying the same methods Fibiger had used a generation earlier.⁸⁸ In the United States, the Cooperative Clinical Group, a collaborative effort to evaluate syphilis treatments, struggled to construct a sample of 150 patients in the 1920s.⁸⁹ The Algiers BCG trial was the largest trial yet attempted that was coordinated in a single setting, and its randomization was the most sophisticated until the MRC's streptomycin trials after World War II.

The Algiers Pasteur Institute worked in the Kasbah, taking advantage of the neighborhood's poverty in a way that Calmette had not been able to do with African soldiers in France: "With families this destitute, this malnourished, over-crowded and vulnerable to the elements, the risk of disease is extreme. Mortality rates, not only from tuberculosis but from all pulmonary and intestinal afflictions . . . , are extremely high. The slightest reduction in general mortality, coincident with the use of BCG, would be highly significant."⁹⁰ Here the reference is not to the moral impact of success, but to the statisticians' complaints about trials involving African soldiers, in which almost no one in the control group got sick. There was no discussion of the ethical problems posed by working in the Kasbah.

A team of certified visiting nurses—European women, most likely from the French mainland—administered the vaccinations.⁹¹ At first there were only two nurses, but by 1946 there were fourteen, working in teams of two or three. On appointed afternoons, the nurses noted the names and addresses of all newborns declared by Muslim families the day before at their local city hall. The governor-general of Algeria had no hesitation about granting the Pasteur Institute (illegal) access to Muslim families' personal records, which was essential so that a random sample could be created. The nurses wrote down the names in a special register and numbered them: even numbers were vaccinated with BCG; odd numbers were observed as a control. The nurses contacted the families and administered the oral vaccine the following morning; then they returned to administer two successive doses with two days in between. They visited and observed the control group on the same timetable, without giving a placebo. In both cases (vaccinated and non-vaccinated), the nurses referred patients to local clinics for any health problems they discovered. "Very quickly," the authors noted, "the mothers appreciated the solicitude shown them, and when a child is born in their neighborhood, they wait for the nurse to come and then follow her."⁹²

The Muslim reaction to the vaccination effort remains difficult to assess. Al-

⁸⁸ Accepting patients for a trial on alternating days to achieve a random sample can introduce bias if doctors know which days count toward their study.

⁸⁹ See Marks, The Progress of Experiment, 59.

⁹⁰ Sergent, Catanei, and Ducros-Rougebief, "Prémunition antituberculeuse par le BCG," 2.

⁹¹ The French government in Algeria began to recruit and train Muslim women as nurses in 1935: Gouvernement général de l'Algérie, Direction de la santé publique, Recrutement et formation des infirmières-visiteuses indigènes (Algiers, 1935). Formal standards for nurse training emerged in the early twentieth century. Most nurses in Algeria came from Catholic mission organizations.

⁹² Sergent, Catanei, and Ducros-Rougebief, "Prémunition antituberculeuse par le BCG," 4.

though authors of Pasteur reports had every reason to want to convey the impression that there was minimal resistance, there are grounds to believe that the Muslim community in the Kasbah accepted their efforts. The French police did not record any trace of discontent in their routine reports on Muslim opinion.⁹³ Nor was any recorded in the popular press.⁹⁴ Algerian Muslims had a long familiarity with French medicine, dating back to the smallpox vaccination campaigns in Algiers in the 1830s; before then, variolation had been common practice in the countryside. Yvonne Turin points out that if Muslims resented those earlier vaccination efforts, their protests were no stronger than those of French settlers and other Europeans. By the late nineteenth century, moreover, she notes that the use of Muslim vaccinators eased any residual tensions, and she counts vaccination as the most successful effort by the French to spread their values to the Maghreb:

With respect to [smallpox] vaccination, for example, it is clear that the Arab population did not rush—did Europeans?—to demand immunization for their children. But there was, all the same, the experience of Arab vaccinators, and especially after 1870, the wave of “rumors” seems to disappear.⁹⁵

Pasteur researchers also benefited, perhaps unwittingly, from an ongoing publicity campaign in favor of the vaccine that had been launched several years before their study got under way in a systematic manner. Calmette was already convinced that BCG was safe and effective, and he wanted to vaccinate as many children as possible. Several clinics and a dispensary near the Kasbah had begun vaccinating children in the late 1920s, so BCG was not unknown. The public health office supported them by plastering the following tract, in Arabic, on the walls of buildings in the Kasbah, publishing it in the local Arabic press, and handing it out to families:

PROTECT YOUR CHILDREN AGAINST TUBERCULOSIS

Everyone knows this is a terrible disease, and its contagiousness is undeniable. In your families, in your houses, a person with tuberculosis poses a real danger to everyone, especially young children. Do not hesitate to vaccinate them against this disease. The vaccine that has been discovered by the French savants MM. Calmette and Guérin is absolutely safe . . .

Spread this information broadly in your neighborhood. Good health is a right for rich and poor alike. Thousands of French children have been vaccinated, and more are vaccinated every day. These are not trials that are being carried out; we want your children to benefit from the progress of French medicine. Just as you vaccinate your children against smallpox, do the same to protect them from the terrible tuberculosis.⁹⁶

The tract said that BCG was the standard of care, the pride of the French medical establishment. It also insisted that the testing phase for the vaccine was complete.

⁹³ Gouvernement général d'Algérie, “Rapport sur la situation politique et administrative des indigènes,” quarterly, 1920–1925, Archives Nationales de la France, Centre d'Archives d'Outre-Mer, Aix-en-Provence, 11 H 46 and 47.

⁹⁴ Amrith found no press reports of resistance to BCG vaccination in post–World War II India; Decolonizing Public Health, 142.

⁹⁵ Yvonne Turin, Affrontements culturels dans l'Algérie coloniale: Écoles, médecines, religion, 1830–1880 (Paris, 1971), 408.

⁹⁶ French translation in Madeleine Forgeot, La tuberculose pulmonaire chez les nourrissons arabes et kabyles à Alger (thèse de médecine, University of Algiers, 1930), 93, emphasis added.

Indeed, Calmette had claimed no less to anyone who would listen during his publicity tour several years earlier.⁹⁷

Compliance rates were initially high, and the ability of the Pasteur teams to follow subjects over decades suggests that there was at least a bare minimum of acceptance, if not more. According to Pasteur reports, the scientists expanded their study outside the Kasbah—that is, they changed the scope of the study and compromised its statistical power—at the request of mothers from nearby neighborhoods who saw the teams from across the street and wanted their children to have access to the new vaccine.⁹⁸ It no doubt helped that the trial was run by a metropolitan research institute, with metropolitan nurses, as opposed to male representatives of the settler government, who tended to blame the local inhabitants for conditions in the Kasbah and the TB crisis. At least two contemporary medical theses corroborate the institute's claim that families welcomed them with open arms, and Pasteur researchers themselves noted quite candidly years later, during the Algerian War, that they had lost public confidence.⁹⁹ The institute called off the trial when Algerian nationalists assassinated the nurses' driver in 1956.¹⁰⁰

The Algiers BCG trial ran for twenty-six years, yielding encouraging but not definitive results. Working with larger samples and avoiding the selection bias of earlier studies produced more sober numbers, generally showing that the mortality rate in the first year was roughly 3 percent lower for the vaccinated than for the control group. Given the numbers of people sampled and the extremely high general mortality rate, that was a significant improvement. The protection conferred, moreover, appeared impressive for the youngest age groups—BCG cut the general mortality rate by nearly 60 percent for children below the age of 11. It is critical to stress, however, that the scientists never showed what part a decline in TB mortality played in that larger trend.¹⁰¹

THE ALGIERS TRIAL RAISES far-reaching ethical questions. Unlike sleeping sickness or malaria, TB remained a major problem on the French mainland in the interwar years: the Pasteur Institute went to Algeria exclusively for political expediency. Calmette and his colleagues violated the confidentiality of Algerian Muslims' personal records (état-civil) and, it appears, failed to obtain informed consent as well. The sources are ⁹⁷ It also calls into question the Pasteur Institute's ability to abide by the guidelines that League statisticians imposed. The same policies that made testing difficult on the mainland may have skewed results in Algiers. Giving out BCG free of charge to any doctor or clinic that requested it surely tainted the control group. Although Geneviève Bottin notes that the Kasbah was a living laboratory for the Pasteur Institute, she also notes that every child in the Mustapha Hospital maternity ward was vaccinated and lists a range of dispensaries, doctors, midwives, and clinics that vaccinated thousands. It remains unclear whether the Pasteur Institute stopped sending BCG to those groups once their study got under way. Bottin, Prophylaxie de la tuberculose infantile en Algérie (thèse de médecine, University of Algiers, 1941), 81–83.

⁹⁸ Sergent, Catanei, and Ducros-Rougebieff provide no explanation for the decision, saying only that they granted mothers' wishes; "Prémunition antituberculeuse par le BCG," 3.

⁹⁹ Forgeot, La tuberculose pulmonaire chez les nourrissons arabes et kabyles à Alger; and Bottin, Prophylaxie de la tuberculose infantile en Algérie.

¹⁰⁰ IP, IPO.B 1 (1956).

¹⁰¹ To do so would have required autopsies and raised the cost of the study. Sergent, Catanei, and Ducros-Rougebieff, "Prémunition antituberculeuse par le BCG," 131–137.

notably silent, for example, on the subject of the propaganda campaign on behalf of BCG before the trial began. Researchers viewed the trial as a service to the Muslim community and gave no thought to any special protections that might be appropriate in a study carried out on such a vulnerable population. In response to powerful taboos against experiments on healthy human subjects, Pasteur researchers failed in Algiers, as they had on the mainland, to provide clear statements about their study's intent. They took advantage of their subjects' poverty and the absence of independent general practitioners ultimately for their own ends. It is critical to stress that informed consent was not included in formal ethical guidelines until after World War II, and Pasteur researchers took advantage of poor patients in the Charité maternity ward as well. The initial study of BCG vaccination in Paris made no mention of consent, although Calmette felt compelled to suggest that he had obtained it when he presented his work in Paris for public approval (but not in Algiers), suggesting that scientists appreciated the principle before its formal adoption.¹⁰² The major difference was that running the BCG trial in Algiers allowed the Pasteur team to withhold treatment from patients and create a valid statistical control.

By the standards of its day, before the Nuremberg Code (1947) or the Declaration of Helsinki (1964), the human experiment carried out in Algiers was relatively benign.¹⁰³ Western scientists provided access to cutting-edge care that had virtually no side effects with oral delivery and that significantly reduced the death toll in a very deadly neighborhood. They did not inoculate children with tuberculosis, as Austrian doctors did as the Algiers trial was being carried out.¹⁰⁴ They did not impose lumbar punctures or inject patients with Atoxyl, an arsenic-based drug that can cause blindness, as their Pasteur colleague Eugène Jamot did when he was competing with German scientists to find a cure for sleeping sickness in sub-Saharan Africa.¹⁰⁵ But the Algiers BCG trial did anticipate some of the moral problems raised by AIDS research in contemporary Africa and Asia. Most of the ethical debate has centered on the use of placebos and the withholding of a known effective treatment—a long course of zidovudine (AZT)—to see whether a short course could reduce mother-to-child transmission of HIV infection; some scholars and activists have challenged ¹⁰² On informed consent, see Ruth R. Faden and Tom L. Beauchamp, A History and Theory of Informed Consent (New York, 1986). On the initial trials at the Charité, see fn. 1 above; on Calmette's presentation of those results for a broad public audience, see La vaccination préventive contre la tuberculose par le "BCG," esp. 186.

¹⁰³ George J. Annas and Michael A. Grodin, eds., The Nazi Doctors and the Nuremberg Code: Human Rights in Human Experimentation (Oxford, 1992); Paul Weindling, "The Origins of Informed Consent: The International Scientific Commission on Medical War Crimes, and the Nuremberg Code," Bulletin of the History of Medicine 75, no. 1 (2001): 37–71; and Ulf Schmidt and Andreas Frewer, eds., History and Theory of Human Experimentation: The Declaration of Helsinki and Modern Medical Ethics (Stuttgart, 2007).

¹⁰⁴ Matthias Dahl, "'... deren Lebenserhaltung für die Nation keinen Vorteil bedeutet': Behinderte Kinder als Versuchsobjekte und die Entwicklung der Tuberkulose-Schutzimpfung," Medizinhistorisches Journal 37, no. 1 (2002): 57–90.

¹⁰⁵ Jean-Pierre Dozon, "Quand les Pastoriens traquaient la maladie du sommeil," Sciences sociales et santé 3, no. 3–4 (1985): 27–56; and the works cited in fn. 18 above. For human subject research more broadly, see Wolfgang U. Eckart, ed., Man, Medicine, and the State: The Human Body as an Object of Government Sponsored Medical Research in the 20th Century (Stuttgart, 2006); Bonah, Histoire de l'expérimentation humaine; Susan E. Lederer, Subjected to Science: Human Experimentation in America before the Second World War (Baltimore, 1995); and Jordan Goodman, Anthony McElligott, and Lara Marks, eds., Useful Bodies: Humans in the Service of Medical Science in the Twentieth Century (Baltimore, 2003).

the validity of consent obtained in developing countries. But there were other questions raised by the AZT trials that have become increasingly important in the years since they were carried out. Ethicists began to move beyond a procedural emphasis on informed consent and clinical practice. They have increasingly emphasized the risk that research subjects assume and the value they contribute to drug development, insisting that trial subjects receive fair benefits, if not delivery of the proven interventions that their participation helped create. The 2001 Hastings Center Conference on Ethical Aspects of Research in Developing Countries stressed that “as the benefits to the sponsors, researchers, and others outside the population increase, the benefits to the host population should also increase.”¹⁰⁶ These considerations have become pressing around the world in recent years with the dramatic growth in industry-sponsored trials in developing countries, as clinical research increasingly serves as a surrogate for underfunded state healthcare systems.

COLONIES AND QUASI-COLONIAL TERRITORIES such as Algeria were useful to reformers not because they were empty but because they offered unique opportunities. They brought together authoritarian governments willing to overlook their subjects’ interests in a way that no democratic state could, often unique ecological conditions, and, in some instances, cutting-edge technical capacity. Recent debates about colonial modernity show no signs of abating, in large part because the combination of those variables, and of local state resources, has varied widely. The most influential work on colonial reform projects has concentrated on extreme cases—state-sponsored urbanism and population policy, on the one hand, and penitentiaries, on the other.¹⁰⁷

Responding to powerful international pressure, the Algiers BCG trial fit between those extremes. The initial impetus for running a randomized trial with a control came from pragmatic reformers with ties to Geneva. They initiated a public debate about the relative weight that should be accorded to different kinds of technical expertise. Calmette’s answer to their challenge, the Algiers trial, bought him time and goodwill. That response, and the Pasteur Institute’s decision to bring Health Committee epidemiologists on board, not only to review data but to help design trials from the outset, kept international experts from turning against the new vaccine when they were ready to do so. It also, inadvertently, reinforced the League’s authority to define standards for clinical trials at the expense of French voters and, especially, family doctors, who resented challenges to their clinical judgment.

¹⁰⁶ For the initial AZT controversy, see fn. 20 above. For works insisting that research subjects and their communities be compensated for their contribution to trials, see Peter Wilmshurst, “Scientific Imperialism: If They Won’t Benefit from the Findings, Poor People in the Developing World Shouldn’t Be Used in Research,” British Medical Journal 314, no. 7084 (1997): 840–841; Ezekiel J. Emanuel, David Wendler, Jack Killen, and Christine Grady, “What Makes Clinical Research in Developing Countries Ethical? The Benchmarks of Ethical Research,” Journal of Infectious Diseases 189, no. 5 (2004): 930–937; Jennifer S. Hawkins and Ezekiel J. Emanuel, eds., Exploitation and Developing Countries: The Ethics of Clinical Research (Princeton, N.J., 2008); and the collective statement by participants in the 2001 Conference on Ethical Aspects of Research in Developing Countries, “Moral Standards for Research in Developing Countries: From ‘Reasonable Availability’ to ‘Fair Benefits,’” Hastings Center Report 34, no. 3 (2004): 17–27, quote from 22.

¹⁰⁷ In addition to the works cited in fn. 10 above, see Timothy Mitchell, Rule of Experts: Egypt, Techno-Politics, Modernity (Berkeley, Calif., 2002); Nicholas B. Dirks, The Scandal of Empire: India and the Creation of Imperial Britain (Cambridge, Mass., 2006); Zinoman, The Colonial Bastille; and Dikötter and Brown, Cultures of Confinement.

Calmette's ability to call upon associates in Algiers and throughout the French Empire suggests the need to rethink basic assumptions about French colonialism. The same kinds of social and political inequality that enabled "specific intellectuals" to conduct experiments overseas created opportunities for Parisian mandarins as well.¹⁰⁸ The French colonies were not as isolated from metropolitan conflicts, patronage networks, and patterns of influence as most work on colonial modernity has contended. But Algeria did serve as a laboratory in this case for a human experiment that combined traditional paternalism with a kind of medical modernity in complex and contradictory ways. By falling back on national, colonial, and quasi-colonial resources, Calmette was able to parry a threat posed by a newly powerful international agency. He was able to overcome practical and political challenges to vaccine testing on an unprecedented scale.

The Algiers trial failed to provide conclusive proof of BCG's efficacy, but it cemented a lasting partnership with the League of Nations. After World War II, doctors at the much more powerful and better-funded World Health Organization, the League Health Organization's successor, worked with Calmette's successors at the Pasteur Institute to conduct massive BCG vaccination campaigns throughout North Africa and in dozens of countries around the world.¹⁰⁹ The vaccine was inexpensive and easier to administer than any other form of TB control, and it appeared to offer a significant, if unspecified, level of protection. It fit the postwar fascination with technology and its power to reshape the world in the era of eradication campaigns.¹¹⁰ The postwar campaigns were among the largest undertakings in the World Health Organization's history.¹¹¹ Despite continued doubts over its protective powers, which remain uncertain, Calmette's vaccine is still one of the most widely used in the world, administered to roughly 100 million children every year.¹¹²

¹⁰⁸ "Specific intellectuals" is from Rabinow, French Modern.

¹⁰⁹ Calmette died in 1933.

¹¹⁰ Randall Packard, "No Other Logical Choice": Global Malaria Eradication and the Politics of International Health in the Postwar Era," Parassitologia 40, no. 1–2 (1998): 217–229.

¹¹¹ World Health Organization, Tuberculosis Research Office, Mass BCG Vaccination Campaigns, 1948–1951 (Copenhagen, 1954); and Niels Brimnes, "BCG Vaccination and WHO's Global Strategy for Tuberculosis Control, 1948–1983," Social Science & Medicine 67, no. 5 (2008): 863–873.

¹¹² Results have varied widely, from a finding of no protection at all to rates as high as 80 percent. The largest study carried out to date, the Chingleput study in southern India in the 1970s, found that BCG offered no protection. There are several explanations for the disparate results. Different studies have used different doses. Even if dosages were kept constant, BCG is a live vaccine, produced at several sites around the world. Before the technology to freeze-dry standardized seed lots became available in the 1960s, several distinct versions of the vaccine had evolved from the original source in Paris. Each version is now referred to by origin: BCG (Paris), BCG (Trice), BCG (Montreal), and BCG (Copenhagen), among others. Some epidemiologists speculate that exposure to other environmental mycobacteria—the genus of bacteria that includes TB—creates a non-specific immune response against all mycobacteria, and thus BCG does not provide any additional benefit. The lowest results have generally been found in southern latitudes with dense mycobacterial populations (e.g., Chingleput and the U.S. state of Georgia); studies in the United Kingdom, by contrast, have consistently shown high levels of protection, ranging from 50 to 80 percent. Finally, population geneticists have found variable levels of susceptibility to tuberculosis. A thorough review of the medical literature concluded that BCG confers "over 50 percent [protection], on average"; G. A. Colditz, C. S. Berkey, F. Mosteller, T. F. Brewer, M. E. Wilson, E. Burdick, and H. V. Fineberg, "The Efficacy of Bacillus Calmette-Guérin Vaccination of Newborns and Infants in the Prevention of Tuberculosis: Meta-Analyses of the Published Literature," Pediatrics 96, no. 1 (1995): 29–35. See also their "Efficacy of BCG Vaccine in the Prevention of Tu-

FIGURE 2. A non-postal stamp (1948) sold by the private Comité national de défense contre la tuberculose to raise money for their TB program, sponsored by Nestlé. © Pasteur Institute.

The very success of controlled clinical trials as a means of evaluating medical interventions poses great challenges today. Human testing is the most expensive part of vaccine development, and the available pool of research subjects is shrinking in saturated Western markets. Pharmaceutical companies have responded to these pressures and the demands of regulatory agencies by shifting their trials from disadvantaged domestic groups to poor countries overseas.¹¹³ As in interwar Algiers, clinical trials in developing countries often offer the only means that sick people have to obtain basic medical care, blurring the already fuzzy distinction between research and treatment. Basic moral questions remain unresolved: Who assumes the risk in vaccine and drug development? Who benefits? How are health resources allocated between rich and poor countries, and between rich and poor communities more generally? Like many pharmaceutical companies today, the Pasteur Institute resorted to a study in a poor country to prove the worth of its new product and to make good on a significant investment. Unlike those companies—which devote 90 percent of their research to conditions that make up 10 percent of the global disease burden, in a quest to find blockbuster drugs for the developed world—Calmette and his colleagues sought a remedy for a problem that was devastating test subjects and their berculosis," Journal of the American Medical Association 271, no. 9 (1994): 698–702; and George Wills Comstock's widely influential "Field Trials of Tuberculosis Vaccines: How Could We Have Done Them Better?" Controlled Clinical Trials 15, no. 4 (1994): 247–276. On its current use, see World Health Organization, position paper on BCG, Weekly Epidemiological Record 79, no. 4 (2004): 34.

¹¹³ Adriana Petryna, When Experiments Travel: Clinical Trials and the Global Search for Human Subjects (Princeton, N.J., 2009).

community.¹¹⁴ At the behest of international experts in Geneva, they obtained results faster and much more easily than they could have in Europe, in an effort to prevent a disease that was ravaging, and continues to ravage, the developing world.

¹¹⁴ Sameera Al-Tuwaijri et al., The 10/90 Report on Health Research, 2003–2004 (Geneva, 2004); Doctors Without Borders, Drugs for Neglected Diseases Working Group, Fatal Imbalance: The Crisis in Research and Development for Drugs for Neglected Diseases (Geneva, 2001).

Clifford Rosenberg is Associate Professor of History at City College and the Graduate Center of the City University of New York. He has published Policing Paris: The Origins of Modern Immigration Control between the Wars (Cornell University Press, 2006). This article is drawn from his current project on the spread of TB from France to Algeria and back, and efforts to combat that spread, from 1830 to the present.

AHR Forum
Historiographic “Turns” in Critical Perspective
Introduction

How should we now understand the various “turns” that have marked the recent history of the writing and theorizing of history? One way might be to think of them as merely historiographical markers, denoting definable moves or shifts in how some in our profession have understood, approached, and explained their work. In an academic environment where a premium is increasingly placed on novelty and innovation, and where an interest in theory has long marked the humanities, it is perhaps not surprising that many have been eager to characterize their scholarship in ways that call attention to precisely these qualities. In history, especially in the wake of the enormous—and intellectually transformative—impact of social history in the 1960s and 1970s, there was clearly a powerful pull to see subsequent shifts in scholarly approaches in similarly decisive terms. Hence the cultural and linguistic “turns” taken by many historians who came of professional age in the late 1980s—a development whose relationship to social history was dramatically depicted in Geoff Eley’s 2005 study A Crooked Line, itself the subject of an AHR Forum in April 2008. Without the tsunami effects of social history, would the proclamations of “turns” have even been conceivable?

While the contributors to this forum present different views on this intellectual trajectory, for the most part they refuse to see “turning” as a simple or unproblematic feature in the recent past of our profession. Rather, they both analyze the turns and historicize them—subjecting them to a searching and wide-ranging critique that at once reminds us of what can be gained by such historiographical retrospection and also what might be lost in thinking of them in both definitive and categorical terms.

This is especially true with the first two essays here. In “When Was the Linguistic Turn? A Genealogy,” Judith Surkis casts a skeptical light on the very notion of a single “turn,” suggesting that such a formulation not only is wrong but also has the regrettable effect of foreclosing possibilities and blocking from view the variety of approaches and intellectual trends that were in play at the time. The sense of foreclosure is explicit in Gary Wilder’s “From Optic to Topic: The Foreclosure Effect of Historiographic Turns.” For Wilder, the balance sheet for the cultural and linguistic turns is negative indeed, especially insofar as their critique of supposedly positivistic social history also meant the abandonment of the structural analysis of long-term social developments.

In “The Kids Are All Right: On the ‘Turning’ of Cultural History,” James W. Cook takes a similarly critical look at “turn talk,” but his intent is less to criticize the cultural or linguistic turns than to interrogate what they mean for the practice of history both in recent times and today. He too historicizes the turns, reminding us that speaking of the cultural turn ignores the considerable work in cultural history that preceded the proclaiming of its advent in the 1990s as well as more recent work that continues to explore its possibilities. With Durba Ghosh's "Another Set of Imperial Turns?," the forum shifts to a historiography that is both older and newer than the cultural and linguistic turns. Focusing on the history of British imperialism, Ghosh points to several "turns" that have marked the recent historiography of this field: the global, the postcolonial, and the archival. Whatever the relationship between these different approaches and the study of imperialism may be, she argues that the most revealing work has always been infused with a critical understanding of the historical experiences of imperialism and colonialism.

The two comments offer arguments in their own right. In "Not Yet Far Enough," Julia Adeney Thomas vigorously critiques each of the four essays, pushing back especially against some of Surkis's and Wilder's claims and conclusions regarding the nature and status of the cultural turn. But she also suggests that none of the essays are "broad and bracing enough." Calling attention to the phenomenon of long-term climate change, she argues, in essence, for another "turn"—a historically grounded but scientifically informed "new materialism" that addresses "the precarious state of our world." In "Generational Turns," Nathan Perl-Rosenthal takes a very different approach. Underscoring the generational aspect of the discussion of historiographical turns, he surveys the scholarship of twenty or so younger historians, mostly dissertations, and shows that their work in the history of communication, transportation, and material culture reflects an enduring interest in culture, now enriched by the language of "practice and process."

There is undoubtedly more to say about historiographic turns, and more insights will surely be generated as we gain greater perspective on this fertile period of historical innovation and critique. One also suspects that with time, we will develop a greater appreciation for the deep history that generated these turns, rendering some of their claims to novelty and "turning" less convincing and some of the fears of foreclosure expressed in this forum less well-founded.

When Was the Linguistic Turn? A Genealogy

JUDITH SURKIS

One cannot make true or erroneous statements about the digestive or reproductive processes of centaurs.

Paul Veyne

An examination of descent also permits the discovery, under the unique aspect of a trait or a concept, of the myriad events through which—thanks to which, against which—they were formed.

Michel Foucault

IN HIS WORK ON THE HISTORY of historical periodization, Reinhart Koselleck describes the experience of “acceleration” as a distinguishing feature of an implicitly European modernity. He figures this process as a speeding-up of the rate at which “one’s own time is distinguished from the preceding time.”¹ According to Koselleck, the rhythm of temporal compression is marked by an increasingly rapid retrospective designation of moments consigned to the past. Starting in the Enlightenment, and especially after the French Revolution, he claims, this accelerated sense of historical time gave rise to a new notion of the present as well. In the sped-up temporality of European modernity, the present is always also a moment of transition to an immanent future. Conceived in the crucible of colonialism and capitalism, Neuzeit established and encapsulated difference in terms of “the contemporaneity of the noncontemporaneous.”² From the vantage of Europe’s modernity, the pasts of Greco-Roman antiquity and the “Middle Ages” also became “fundamentally other.”³ In Koselleck’s narrative

Many friends and colleagues have offered critical insights and generous suggestions on the arguments set forth in this piece. Special thanks to Gil Anidjar, Elizabeth Bernstein, Warren Breckman, Rita Chin, Jay Cook, Kathleen Davis, Geoff Eley, Durba Ghosh, Peter Gordon, Manu Goswami, Ken Lipartito, Harold Mah, Sam Moyn, Uta Poiger, Joan Scott, Dan Smail, Gabrielle Spiegel, Jeffrey Stout, Carol Symes, Julia Adeney Thomas, John Toews, and Gary Wilder, as well as audiences at the AHA Annual Meeting, the Radcliffe Institute Workshop on Modern European Intellectual History, and the Institute for Advanced Study. Thanks also to Konstantin Dierks and Robert Schneider, the editorial board of the AHR, and four anonymous reviewers.

¹ Reinhart Koselleck, “The Eighteenth Century as the Beginning of Modernity,” in Koselleck, The Practice of Conceptual History: Timing History, Spacing Concepts, trans. Todd Samuel Presner, Kerstin Behnke, and Jobst Welge (Stanford, Calif., 2002), 154–169, here 168.

² Reinhart Koselleck, “‘Neuzeit’: Remarks on the Semantics of the Modern Concepts of Movement,” in Koselleck, Futures Past: On the Semantics of Historical Time, trans. Keith Tribe (Cambridge, Mass., 1985), 231–266, here 246.

³ Ibid., 250.

of modernity's narrative, the present is demarcated from this past and resolutely oriented toward a new, secularized vision of the future. The concept of "progress" (as well as its paired concept of "decline") emerged in and underwrote this movement. Grouping together many meanings and experiences under a single term, progress, like the history it authorizes, moves forward in the "collective singular," even as it produces difference in the form of uneven development.⁴

Koselleck is invoked here not to unproblematically endorse his claims, but to suggest how normative assumptions about the relationship between time and an implicitly European modernity are written into historical and historiographical writing itself. By historicizing the modern practice of history, Koselleck's work is a case in point. In his self-referential account, the periodization whose emergence he traces also underwrites his conception of "conceptual history." In his view, the disciplinary coherence of history depends on a theory of periodization: "without such a theory, history loses itself in boundlessly questioning everything."⁵ Taking modern European history as his object of study, Koselleck's work renders explicit some of the temporal concepts that conventionally govern "modern" historiography: logics of periodization and a view of history as a "collective singular," as well as attendant ideas of both decline and delay.

The periodizing impulse that Koselleck describes as quintessentially "modern" has, of late, proceeded at an accelerated clip. History-writing seems to have undergone a rapid succession of historiographical moments or "turns." If the "linguistic turn" initiated a turn to turn talk, it was soon followed by the cultural and the imperial, and more recently the transnational, global, and spatial turns. The problem of how to narrativize these historiographical developments has become a minor historiographical subfield in its own right.⁶ Ideas of succeeding—and competing—his-

⁴ Reinhart Koselleck, "'Progress' and 'Decline': An Appendix to the History of Two Concepts," in Koselleck, The Practice of Conceptual History, 218–235, here 229. For a critical discussion of Koselleck's account of modernity, the temporal logic of capitalism, and its attendant "time lags," see Harry Harootunian, "Remembering the Historical Present," Critical Inquiry 33, no. 3 (2007): 471–494, here 479.

⁵ Reinhart Koselleck, "On the Need for Theory in the Discipline of History," in Koselleck, The Practice of Conceptual History, 1–19, here 4. For a powerful critique of Koselleck's model of periodization, see Kathleen Davis, Periodization and Sovereignty: How Ideas of Feudalism and Secularization Govern the Politics of Time (Philadelphia, 2008). See as well the AHR Roundtable "Historians and the Question of 'Modernity,'" American Historical Review 116, no. 3 (June 2011): 631–751, especially Carol Symes, "When We Talk about Modernity," 715–726.

⁶ See, in addition to the other essays in this forum, "Forum: Critical Pragmatism, Language, and Cultural History: On Roger Chartier's On the Edge of the Cliff," French Historical Studies 21, no. 2 (1998): 213–264; "AHR Forum: Geoff Eley's A Crooked Line," American Historical Review 113, no. 2 (April 2008): 391–437; Victoria E. Bonnell and Lynn Hunt, eds., Beyond the Cultural Turn: New Directions in the Study of Society and Culture (Berkeley, Calif., 1999); Antoinette Burton, ed., After the Imperial Turn: Thinking with and through the Nation (Durham, N.C., 2003); Roger Chartier, On the Edge of the Cliff: History, Language, and Practices, trans. Lydia G. Cochrane (Baltimore, 1997); Geoff Eley, A Crooked Line: From Cultural History to the History of Society (Ann Arbor, Mich., 2005); Georg G. Iggers, Historiography in the Twentieth Century: From Scientific Objectivity to the Postmodern Challenge (Hanover, N.H., 1997); Georg G. Iggers and Q. Edward Wang, A Global History of Modern Historiography (Harlow, 2008); Akira Iriye, "The Transnational Turn," Diplomatic History 31, no. 3 (2007): 373–376; Terrence J. McDonald, ed., The Historic Turn in the Human Sciences (Ann Arbor, Mich., 1996); Yair Mintzker, "Between the Linguistic and the Spatial Turns: A Reconsideration of the Concept of Space and Its Role in the Early Modern Period," Historical Reflections 35, no. 3 (2009): 37–51; William H. Sewell, Jr., Logics of History: Social Theory and Social Transformation (Chicago, 2005); Gabrielle M. Spiegel, "Revising the Past/Revisiting the Present: How Change Happens in Historiography," History and Theory 46, no. 4 (2007): 1–19; Spiegel, "The Task of the Historian," 2008 AHA Presidential Address, American Historical Review 114, no. 1 (February 2009): 1–15; Ronald Grigor Suny, "Back and Beyond: Reversing the Cultural toriographical turns have proliferated. But in this methodological whirlwind, little attention has been paid to the implicit temporality of turn talk itself. What does it mean to describe a historiographical moment as a “turn”?

A brief history of what has come to be called the “linguistic turn” can be useful in addressing this broader question. The reason for undertaking such a review is not to offer a more comprehensive narrative of the “linguistic turn” or to privilege one version of it over another, but rather to question the usefulness of the concept itself. As a look at some key texts in the adventure of this concept will show, it is difficult to clearly pinpoint a singular or coherent “turn” as having taken place.⁷ In addition to being reductive and constraining, the temporality of turn talk presumes a supersession of one disciplinary trend by another. While a turn seems to signal innovation and renewal, its spatio-temporal logic more often than not entails foreclosure. By contrast, a genealogical counternarrative can keep multiple strains of critical interrogation open for the historiographical future.

Closely linked to a spatio-temporal logic of supersession is a generational model of historiographical development. In narrativizing the “linguistic turn,” historians have drawn on implicit and explicit arguments about historiographical “generations” as one way to lend coherence to an otherwise diverse and mutually questioning set of methods and epistemologies. But what are the limits of such generational thinking and the logic of supersession that it often implies?⁸ What are the contours of a historiographical generation? When and where is it located? These questions can be answered through an exploration of how the idea of the “linguistic turn” took shape within a specific Euro-American historiographical context. The goal is not to reassert the hegemony of this narrative, but to provincialize it.⁹

Gabrielle Spiegel’s 2008 AHA presidential address provides a good point of entry.¹⁰ Her comments can be read as exemplary in their adroit summary of much recent work on the shifting paradigms of postwar Euro-American historiography. Given that she made them as president of the American Historical Association, her remarks carried symbolic and institutional as well as temporally ritualized significance.

In keeping with generic convention, Spiegel’s speech takes stock of recent historiographical trends in order to offer thoughts on the future of the discipline. Her narrative describes the “semiotic challenge” to “traditional” ways of writing history that arose in the period following the Second World War.¹¹ As she recounts it, this Turn?,” American Historical Review 107, no. 5 (December 2002): 1476–1499; John E. Toews, “Intellectual History after the Linguistic Turn,” American Historical Review 92, no. 4 (October 1987): 879–907; Barney Warf and Santa Arias, The Spatial Turn: Interdisciplinary Perspectives (London, 2009).

⁷ I borrow the phrase from Martin Jay, Marxism and Totality: The Adventures of a Concept from Lukács to Habermas (Berkeley, Calif., 1984).

⁸ Conversations with Peter Gordon have clarified my thinking on this point. On the problem of generational thinking, see the introduction to Gordon, Continental Divide: Heidegger, Cassirer, Davos (Cambridge, Mass., 2010), 1–42.

⁹ On the “provincialization” of European historical temporality, see Dipesh Chakrabarty, Provincializing Europe: Postcolonial Thought and Historical Difference (Princeton, N.J., 2000). For a related account of the provincialism of the linguistic turn when viewed from the perspective of American, Latin American, and hemispheric studies, see the essay in this forum by James W. Cook.

¹⁰ Spiegel, “The Task of the Historian.”

¹¹ Spiegel first used the expression “semiotic challenge,” adopted from John Toews, in 1990: Ga-challenge issued from multiple domains at once: philosophical investigations of language, anthropological explorations of culture, psychoanalytic interrogations of subject formation, and radical questionings of the possibilities and limits of knowledge formation. While admittedly diverse and divergent, these strands of epistemological questioning roughly coincided in time. And, Spiegel argues, they took on great significance for the generation of European and American historians who came of age in the 1960s and 1970s; that generation, in turn, went on to pose new questions about the objects and subjects of historical knowledge. The resulting linguistic, cultural, and poststructuralist “turns” provoked what Spiegel describes as a “massive change in our understanding of the nature of historical reality.”¹² Her account of this “massive change” in many ways depends on a grouping together of these “turns.” Such groupings have now become something of a historiographical commonplace. In tracing a genealogy of the “linguistic turn,” we can critically reexamine (and unsettle) these conflations.

Spiegel’s argument parallels and draws on another recent account of historiographical trends, William Sewell’s Logics of History (2005). Sewell likewise links “history’s linguistic turn” to broader trends in cultural history, which questioned materialist accounts of historical causality, especially in the field of European social history.¹³ For Sewell, “a linguistic model of the social” subtended these developments in both cultural history and cultural anthropology. And it is this linguistic model, he claims, that informs “the ontological assumptions underlying contemporary cultural history.”¹⁴ But can we make broad generalizations about debates that were themselves intently focused on questions of existence? As recent commentators have noted, “French theory” alone is a problematic assemblage. Distinct institutional and intellectual convergences, in the United States and France, certainly fostered demonstrable personal and philosophical connections between French thinkers and their American acolytes. It was, however, the contentious debate between Heideggerians and Marxists, psychoanalysts and literary critics, structuralists and historians of science, that made those encounters so bracing. When the scope of thinkers assembled under the rubric of the “linguistic turn” is further widened to include Clifford Geertz, Jürgen Habermas, and Quentin Skinner, its coherence becomes still more difficult to sustain.¹⁵ brielle M. Spiegel, “History, Historicism, and the Social Logic of the Text in the Middle Ages,” Speculum 65, no. 1 (1990): 59–86.

¹² Spiegel, “The Task of the Historian,” 2. Spiegel offers a fuller account of this narrative in the introduction to Gabrielle M. Spiegel, ed., Practicing History: New Directions in Historical Writing after the Linguistic Turn (New York, 2005). “Practicing history” appears here as a supersession of the “linguistic turn.” For a critical appraisal of this project, see Dominick LaCapra, History and Its Limits: Human, Animal, Violence (Ithaca, N.Y., 2009), 45–52.

¹³ Sewell, Logics of History, 23. For an examination of the problematic conflation of the “cultural turn” with “cultural history,” see Cook, this forum.

¹⁴ Sewell, Logics of History, 331.

¹⁵ See the sample list ibid. Sewell notably discusses some of the instability and incoherence of both the “linguistic turn” and “French theory” in an extended review of Roger Chartier’s essay collection, in which Chartier critiques the “American linguistic turn.” William H. Sewell, Jr., “Language and Practice in Cultural History: Backing Away from the Edge of the Cliff,” French Historical Studies 21, no. 2 (1998): 241–254, here 245–246. Recent analyses of the history of “French theory” include Warren Breckman, “Times of Theory: On Writing the History of French Theory,” Journal of the History of Ideas 71, no. 3 (2010): 339–361; François Cusset, French Theory: How Foucault, Derrida, Deleuze, & Co. Trans-

It is not enough, however, to merely call for more nuance and complexity. We need to interrogate how the distinct strands of thought highlighting “language” as constitutive of intellectual and social life were braided together. How, when, and where did these presumptive convergences take place? And why describe them in terms of a “turn”?

The model of the “turn” is, of course, itself a trope or turn of phrase. It implies a change of course or direction, a turning away at the same time as a turning toward, which lies at the Latin root of “conversion.”¹⁶ Etymologically, it is linked to the notion of “revolution”—and to “lathe” in ancient Greek. Turns can be understood not only to have directional movement, but also as formative: they shape and reshape by cutting away.¹⁷ Similarly, the language of linguistic and other “turns” not only describes, it produces a specific understanding of the epistemological challenges described by Spiegel and Sewell (among others) as a discernible historiographical event. Did a “massive change” take place? Was this shift part of a collective, singular movement or historical logic? Who was included, and when?

A number of assumptions have been written into narrative accounts of historiography as a succession of “turns.” Because it “fragments what was thought unified” and “shows the heterogeneity of what was imagined consistent with itself,” genealogy is particularly well suited to the endeavor of revising those suppositions.¹⁸ It was in the field of European intellectual history that the language of the “linguistic turn” formed the Intellectual Life of the United States, trans. Jeff Fort (Minneapolis, 2008). While works of synthesis and summary have long been available, intellectual histories of thinkers associated with “French theory” are just now beginning to appear. These histories are distinguished by their efforts to keep epistemological and political stakes vibrant in and by contextualization. See, for example, Edward Baring, The Young Derrida and French Philosophy, 1945–1968 (Cambridge, 2011); Julian Bourg, After the Deluge: New Perspectives on the Intellectual and Cultural History of Postwar France (Lanham, Md., 2004); Bourg, From Revolution to Ethics: May 1968 and Contemporary French Thought (Montreal, 2007); Tamara Chaplin, Turning On the Mind: French Philosophers on Television (Chicago, 2007); Michael Scott Christofferson, French Intellectuals against the Left: The Antitotalitarian Moment of the 1970s (New York, 2004); Stefanos Geroulanos, An Atheism That Is Not Humanist Emerges in French Thought (Stanford, Calif., 2010); Ethan Kleinberg, Generation Existential: Heidegger’s Philosophy in France, 1927–1961 (Ithaca, N.Y., 2005); James D. Le Sueur, Uncivil War: Intellectuals and Identity Politics during the Decolonization of Algeria, 2nd ed. (Lincoln, Neb., 2005); Samuel Moyn, Origins of the Other: Emmanuel Levinas between Revelation and Ethics (Ithaca, N.Y., 2005); Camille Robcis, The Law of Kinship: Anthropology, Psychoanalysis, and the Politics of the Family in 20th-Century France (Ithaca, N.Y., forthcoming 2013).

¹⁶ OED, s.v. “conversion.”

¹⁷ OED, s.v. “turn.”

¹⁸ Michel Foucault, “Nietzsche, Genealogy, History,” in Foucault, Language, Counter-Memory, Practice: Selected Essays and Interviews, trans. Donald F. Bouchard (Ithaca, N.Y., 1977), 139–164, here 147. Genealogy as an approach has been taken up primarily by political theorists, philosophers of history, and anthropologists, but not by historians—perhaps because of its presumptive “presentism.” See, for example, Talal Asad, Genealogies of Religion: Discipline and Reasons of Power in Christianity and Islam (Baltimore, 1993); Mark Bevir, “What Is Genealogy?,” Journal of the Philosophy of History 2, no. 3 (2008): 263–275; Wendy Brown, “Politics without Banisters: Genealogical Politics in Nietzsche and Foucault,” in Brown, Politics out of History (Princeton, N.J., 2001), 91–120; Raymond Geuss, “Nietzsche and Genealogy,” European Journal of Philosophy 2, no. 3 (1994): 274–292; Webb Keane, “Self-Interpretation, Agency, and the Objects of Anthropology: Reflections on a Genealogy,” Comparative Studies in Society and History 45, no. 2 (2003): 222–248; Martin Saar, “Understanding Genealogy: History, Power, and the Self,” Journal of the Philosophy of History 2, no. 3 (2008): 295–314. For the historical interest of genealogy, see Joan W. Scott, “History-Writing as Critique,” in Keith Jenkins, Sue Morgan, and Alun Munslow, eds., Manifestos for History (London, 2007), 19–38. Some recent work by historians might nonetheless be characterized as genealogical, including Samuel Moyn, The Last Utopia: Human Rights in History (Cambridge, Mass., 2010).

first emerged. Even in that delimited domain, however, these turns were multiple and mutually questioning rather than singular or synonymous. When European social historians seized on the notion of the turn, further occasions for conflation and confusion proliferated. By recalling the at once diverse and circumscribed contexts in which the expression “linguistic turn” took on meaning, as well as the skepticism expressed by some of its earliest chroniclers, we gain insight into how, when, whether, and for whom this historiographical event took place. The point is not to better secure the epistemological or political foundation of the “linguistic turn,” but rather to interrogate the periodizing impulse on which its postulation and subsequent passing depends. These temporal and disciplinary presumptions show how turn talk constrains our vision of the historical and historiographical future.

AS AN EXPRESSION, THE “linguistic turn” has an involved history, whose complexity is to some extent belied by the concise movement that a “turn” is supposed to describe. One landmark in this history is the 1967 anthology edited by philosopher Richard Rorty.¹⁹ As Spiegel notes in her presidential address, the essays collected in that volume were devoted to contemporary trends in analytical, rather than continental, philosophy.²⁰ The figures that Rorty discussed were thus, for the most part, logical positivists and ordinary language philosophers, not the structuralist and post-structuralist thinkers who are most often cited by historians as having influenced the discipline’s epistemological crisis. The term “linguistic turn” was coined by one of these figures, Gustav Bergmann, who quickly qualified his use of it to distinguish between two competing schools (he called them formalists and anti-formalists) whose relationship, he suggested, was characterized by “much strain and lack of mutual appreciation.” Between these two sides, Bergmann sought out a “middle position.”²¹

In citing Bergmann, Rorty sought to pose questions about this turn, rather than simply confirm its existence.²² More specifically, in outlining the multiple claims (and contestations) of “linguistic philosophy,” he interrogated whether it had, in fact, achieved a thoroughgoing disciplinary “revolution.”²³ In this sense, his invocation of “a turn” was ironic. By highlighting the diversity of its proponents’ arguments, he pointed to the role of “linguistic philosophy” (especially that espoused by Rudolf Carnap) in rejuvenating debate within the discipline. But Rorty also resisted the purported turn’s more hyperbolic and totalizing claims about purifying philosophical language of metaphysics. As Jürgen Habermas noted, the collection of essays thus served an ambivalent double purpose: “In summing up a triumphant progression, they are intended at the same time to signal its end.”²⁴ Analogous qualifications and

¹⁹ Richard Rorty, The Linguistic Turn: Recent Essays in Philosophical Method (1967; repr., Chicago, 1992).

²⁰ Spiegel, “The Task of the Historian,” 2.

²¹ Gustav Bergmann, “Two Types of Linguistic Philosophy,” Review of Metaphysics 5, no. 3 (1952): 417–438, here 417, 419.

²² Richard M. Rorty, “Introduction: Metaphysical Difficulties of Linguistic Philosophy,” in Rorty, The Linguistic Turn, 1–39, here 9.

²³ Ibid., 33.

²⁴ Jürgen Habermas, “Richard Rorty’s Pragmatic Turn,” in Habermas, On the Pragmatics of Com-

ambivalence can be detected among intellectual historians who adopted and adapted the language of the “linguistic turn.”

Martin Jay was one of the first to usher the expression into the domain of history proper with his 1982 essay “Should Intellectual History Take a Linguistic Turn? Reflections on the Habermas-Gadamer Debate.” As in Rorty’s case, Jay’s use of the term contained within it an element of critical questioning, as is indicated by the essay’s title. That questioning was borne out in his careful exploration of the plurality of contemporary philosophical investigations of language. Indeed, his piece aimed principally to distinguish between several “linguistic turns” in order to determine which paradigm might prove most fruitful to intellectual historians. Thus, while pointing, at the outset, to a generalized interest in the “question of language,” Jay insisted that “linguistic turns . . . may take very different directions.”²⁵ These directions included: first, ordinary language philosophy inspired by Wittgenstein; second, the “very different” path taken by Saussurean linguistics; and third, a “very different linguistic turn,” namely the German hermeneutical tradition. The latter—which Jay further subdivided into the existentialist tradition (represented by Hans-Georg Gadamer) and the Critical Theory tradition (taken up by Habermas)—was the main focus of his essay.

Importantly for Jay, then, there was no single linguistic turn. Indeed, the critical force of his essay depended on this very point. After indicating certain parallels between respective linguistic theories, he rejected the viability—and indeed the desirability—of a Gadamerian “fusion of the horizons.”²⁶ His analysis of these differences left open the space for critical evaluation and ongoing argument. It refused uniform pronouncements and unreflective endorsement. Thus, while the philosophies under discussion by Jay were distinct from those that concerned Rorty in 1967, both authors shared a desire to question the coherence, decisiveness, and indeed desirability of a definitive disciplinary “turn.”

While posed by Jay in 1982 as an open-ended prospect, by 1987 the “linguistic turn” had, according to John Toews’s often-cited article “Intellectual History after the Linguistic Turn,” already taken place within the field of Anglophone writing on European intellectual history. In the wake of that shift, Toews discerned a shared problematic among some rather sharply distinguished (in both senses of the word) figures: Martin Jay and Dominick LaCapra; Keith Baker, J. G. A. Pocock, and Quentin Skinner; Allan Megill and Mark Poster. While Jay’s essay was a work of analysis, Toews’s (as befitting a Hegel specialist) is a work of synthesis. To put it in more vernacular terms, one splits, while the other lumps. Toews thus claims that “although no easily discernible, common position emerges,” the authors grouped together in munication, ed. Maeve Cooke (Cambridge, Mass., 1998), 343–382, here 345. Rorty’s future work pursued the post-metaphysical project by appealing to “postanalytic” or pragmatic means.

²⁵ Martin Jay, “Should Intellectual History Take a Linguistic Turn? Reflections on the Habermas-Gadamer Debate,” in Dominick LaCapra and Steven L. Kaplan, eds., Modern European Intellectual History: Reappraisals and New Perspectives (Ithaca, N.Y., 1982), 86–110, here 106. See also Carla Hesse, “The New Empiricism,” Cultural and Social History 1, no. 2 (2004): 201–207.

²⁶ Jay, “Should Intellectual History Take a Linguistic Turn?,” 106. Habermas has recently seemed more open to the idea of fusion in his discussion of the “linguistic turn” in philosophy; Jürgen Habermas, “Hermeneutic and Analytic Philosophy: Two Complementary Versions of the Linguistic Turn?,” Royal Institute of Philosophy Supplement 44 (1999): 413–441.

his essay can “be seen as participating in a common discourse.” Their commonality lies, in his view, in a shared effort to understand the difference and dialectical unity of “meaning,” on the one hand, and “experience,” on the other.²⁷ In seeking to comprehend this “common discourse,” Toews was, of course, doing his job as the writer of a magisterial review essay. And he was also participating in the very trend that he describes. For, as he goes on to claim, one consequence of the “linguistic turn” was “a focus on ‘discourse’ as an organizing term for conceptualizing and practicing the history of meaning.”²⁸ Toews, in other words, appeals to the framework of “discourse” in order to explain what these authors all shared.

The conceptions of discourse that Toews details are, however, quite distinct. First there is a Foucauldian archaeological conception articulated by Mark Poster, of which Toews is quite critical. In this guise, discourses are “impersonal, anonymous, ‘objective’ systems of rules” that ultimately construct “experience.”²⁹ Then there is the concept elaborated by exponents of early modern Anglo-American political theory (Skinner, Pocock), whose focus was on reconstructing linguistic contexts in order to better understand authorial speech-acts. Toews is somewhat more partial to this school, which seemed to cast discourse as more dynamic than static in its provision for creative reappropriations and individualized linguistic performances. Or, as he remarks, this model “implies the communicative context of an intersubjective community of free individuals.”³⁰ Finally, there are histories that trace the trajectories of a specific problematic, such as Martin Jay’s account of “the discourse of totality” in Western Marxism. While approving of Jay’s refusal to reduce contextualization to intertextuality, Toews finds the work lacking in its limited effort to relate individual authors’ lives (their “experiences”) to their works.

Toews’s account of the “linguistic turn” is thus structured by a suspicion of what he views to be the dangerous excesses of textualism. He wonders, specifically in reference to Dominick LaCapra’s critiques of reductive contextualization, whether “the theory of linguistic density and complexity of texts, contexts, and their apparently circular relationships” has “outrun its possible utility.”³¹ The “linguistic turn” in this guise is a dead end. It is thus unsurprising that Toews worries in his conclusion about a new form of “reductionism,” and indeed “a new form of intellectual hubris”: that of the “wordmakers who claim to be the makers of reality.”³² By foregrounding “experience” as irreducible to a purely discursive frame, he aims to keep that hubris in check.

The terms of Toews’s argument about the linguistic turn are familiar and have been the subject of a fair amount of critical commentary, including by authors cited in the piece.³³ But there are two historical points that might be made regarding this ²⁷ Toews, “Intellectual History after the Linguistic Turn,” 882.

²⁸ Ibid., 889.

²⁹ Ibid., 890.

³⁰ Ibid., 892.

³¹ Ibid., 886.

³² Ibid., 906.

³³ Martin Jay, “The Textual Approach to Intellectual History,” in Jay, Force Fields: Between Intellectual History and Cultural Critique (New York, 1993), 158–166; Dominick LaCapra, “History, Reading, and Critical Theory,” in LaCapra, History and Reading: Tocqueville, Foucault, French Studies (Toronto, 2000), 21–72, here 57–64. For some of Toews’s most recent reflections, see John E. Toews, “Manifesting, Producing, and Mobilizing Historical Consciousness in the ‘Postmodern Condition,’” History and Theory

pivotal essay. First, in casting the linguistic turn as part of a “common discourse,” Toews’s essay played a productive, rather than merely descriptive, role. In other words, it both helped to consolidate the apparent coherence of the “turn” and issued a set of normative judgments about the epistemologies he associated with it. Few subsequent pieces of writing on the topic can forgo its citation, even though the quite sizable corpus under review was relatively circumscribed to the field of modern European intellectual history (with some somewhat marginalized American exceptions). For example, the essay notably drew no connection between the intellectual historical “linguistic turn” and contemporaneous historical interest in either anthropology (Clifford Geertz’s name does not appear) or feminism.

Second, Toews’s concluding appeal to generational logic articulated this “common discourse” with a presumptively shared experience. He figured “intellectual historians of the younger (post-1968) generation” as particularly implicated in the shift. Seeking to restore a balance “lost in recent oscillations between opposing reductionisms,” he called on his contemporaries “to recognize and examine the recent turn away from experience as a specific response to particular events and developments in the history of experience.”³⁴ Toews appealed to the model of the “generation” in order to hold the strains of “discourse” and “experience” together in his own account. The suggestive correlation between “events . . . in the history of experience” and this generation’s “common discourse” of the linguistic turn remained unspecified. He left it for other historians to speculate on those epistemological, social, and political connections.

European intellectual historians thus played an important early role in both introducing and critiquing a variety of questions and methods now associated with the “linguistic turn.” But the consecration of the phrase as a shorthand for what was increasingly framed as a profession-wide wave of revisionism and epistemological crisis took several more years to catch on. According to Peter Novick’s That Noble Dream, for example, intellectual historians raised new epistemological questions that paralleled other critical interpretive interventions—from Geertzian anthropology to critical histories of gender and race. For Novick, however, these parallel—occasionally intersecting but as often conflicting—moves did not constitute a general and generalized “linguistic turn.” Indeed, the central narrative of Novick’s book is one of divergence and fragmentation, not convergence—a kind of “fall” into disciplinary 48, no. 3 (2009): 257–275, here 266–267. Both Jay and LaCapra have also, more recently, tackled the intellectual history of “experience”; see Jay, Songs of Experience: Modern American and European Variations on a Universal Theme (Berkeley, Calif., 2005); LaCapra, “Experience and Identity,” in LaCapra, History in Transit: Experience, Identity, Critical Theory (Ithaca, N.Y., 2004), 35–71. Other significant interventions include Joan W. Scott, “The Evidence of Experience,” Critical Inquiry 17, no. 4 (1991): 773–797; John H. Zammito, “Reading ‘Experience’: The Debate in Intellectual History among Scott, Toews, and LaCapra,” in Paula M. L. Moya and Michael R. Hames-García, eds., Reclaiming Identity: Realist Theory and the Predicament of Postmodernism (Berkeley, Calif., 2000), 279–311.

³⁴ Toews, “Intellectual History after the Linguistic Turn,” 906, 907. Not all intellectual historians concurred with Toews’s synthesis. For example, two years later, in an essay in the AHR, David Harlan highlighted the strong divergences between the Cambridge school and poststructuralist approaches to language; Harlan, “Intellectual History and the Return of Literature,” American Historical Review 94, no. 3 (June 1989): 581–609. Donald Kelley, meanwhile, expressed skepticism about the newness of the question of language for intellectual history—and hence about what was purported to be “a turn”; Kelley, “What Is Happening to the History of Ideas?,” Journal of the History of Ideas 51, no. 1 (1990): 3–25.

anarchy and anomie—as his final chapter, titled “There Is No King in Israel,” so clearly intimates.³⁵

By the end of the decade, however, debates surrounding the crisis of materialist explanation in modern European social history also came to be described in terms of a “linguistic turn.”³⁶ As contemporaries often noted, the radical transformations of 1989 reinforced this connection and may have contributed to a new conception of that turn as a distinct event—a watershed moment in the history of the discipline of history.³⁷ As Michael Geyer and Konrad Jarausch noted in their preface to a special issue of Central European History, “History had come unstuck from all sorts of framing devices that historians had devised in order to nail it down.”³⁸

Linkages between revisionist, post-Marxist histories and a critical interest in language were, of course, not new. In 1980, a skeptical editorial in History Workshop Journal described how “for some time now linguistics—or an appeal to its authority—has been widely used to challenge materialist theories of knowledge.”³⁹ And in an influential 1981 review of François Furet’s landmark revisionist text Rethinking the French Revolution, Lynn Hunt drew parallels between Furet’s reading of Jean-Jacques Rousseau and Derrida’s account in Of Grammatology.⁴⁰ (Furet later denied the connection, and for many Derrideans, the feeling was mutual.)⁴¹

Hunt pursued similar parallels in the 1989 introduction to her New Cultural His-

³⁵ Novick thus wrote in his final chapter: “By the 1980s more and more practitioners were reluctantly concluding that even by the most generous definition, history no longer constituted a coherent discipline; not just that the whole was less than the sum of its parts, but that there was no whole—only parts.” Peter Novick, That Noble Dream: The “Objectivity” Question in the American Historical Profession (Cambridge, 1988), 577.

³⁶ For one example of a genealogy, the term travels from Toews’s article to Spiegel to Joyce to Stone and Samuel. Spiegel, “History, Historicism, and the Social Logic of the Text in the Middle Ages”; Patrick Joyce and Catriona Kelly, “History and Post-Modernism,” Past and Present, no. 133 (November 1991): 204–213, here 208; Lawrence Stone, “History and Post-Modernism,” Past and Present, no. 135 (May 1992): 189–208, here 190; Raphael Samuel, “Reading the Signs, II: Fact-Grubbers and Mind-Readers,” History Workshop Journal, no. 33 (Spring 1992): 220–251, here 222. For further examples of this articulation, see Lenard R. Berlanstein’s review article “Working with Language: The Linguistic Turn in French Labor History,” Comparative Studies in Society and History 33, no. 2 (1991): 426–440. See also the essays in Berlanstein, ed., Rethinking Labor History: Essays on Discourse and Class Analysis (Urbana, Ill., 1993).

³⁷ The editors of History Workshop Journal claimed: “The idea of a progressive socialist history has been seen by many to be thrown into question, not just by events in the communist East, but also by developments within academic studies in the West . . . scholars now often turn to theory—predominantly literary theory—for answers to larger questions, rather than to the historical archives.” “Editorial,” History Workshop Journal, no. 32 (Autumn 1991): v. One might note that in German, the historical transformation associated with reunification and the “linguistic turn” are both described as a Wende.

³⁸ Michael Geyer and Konrad H. Jarausch, “The Future of the German Past: Transatlantic Reflections for the 1990s,” Theory, Practice, and Technique, Special Issue, Central European History 22, no. 3/4 (1989): 229–259, here 229. As the editors explain, the volume was based on a conference that was held in October 1989, but authors were given time after the events of November to revise their contributions. Jane Caplan’s piece, a sensitive exploration of different strands of post-Marxism and poststructuralism, did not rely on the trope of the “linguistic turn.” She was, in fact, suspicious of how, when framed as a “battle,” “more exacting definitions and distinctions may go by the board.” Caplan, “Postmodernism, Poststructuralism, and Deconstruction: Notes for Historians,” ibid., 260–278, here 260.

³⁹ “Editorial: Language and History,” History Workshop Journal, no. 10 (Autumn 1980): 1.

⁴⁰ Lynn Hunt, review of François Furet, Penser la Révolution française, History and Theory 20, no. 3 (1981): 313–323. In a 1989 review article on the historiography of the French Revolution, Sarah Maza figured her reading of Furet’s relationship to poststructuralism as “much indebted to Hunt’s”; Maza, “Politics, Culture, and the Origins of the French Revolution,” Journal of Modern History 61, no. 4 (1989): 704–723, here 708 n. 12.

⁴¹ Christofferson, French Intellectuals against the Left, 266. On the limitations of Furet’s theory of tory anthology. She juxtaposed—without, however, synthesizing—a series of approaches: (a) post-Marxist political histories; (b) Michel Foucault's genealogies; (c) Geertzian anthropology and Annales-style histories of mentalité; (d) literary theory; and (e) gender history. Hunt did not, at the time, use the trope of the "turn" to describe the shared foundations of cultural history. Furthermore, she argued that some trends exercised more force than others, with anthropology's influence "reigning supreme" and Foucault's "anti-method" and agenda remaining "idiosyncratic."⁴² The influence of literary theory (meaning the largely French thinkers who came to be associated with "literature departments" in the United States), she claimed, had, until that point, remained mostly the preserve of intellectual historians. The field is represented in the volume by Lloyd Kramer's essay on Hayden White and Dominick LaCapra, whose respective approaches, as Hunt underscored, differed significantly: "the former emphasizes unity; the latter, difference."⁴³

With the dissemination of the term, however, debates surrounding revisionist political histories and critical histories of gender and race, as well as those in intellectual history, came to turn around it—and to become collapsed and confused. The "turn" was increasingly described as something that historians should or should not take, as if it were a road or a means of transport (leading off, especially when conflated with poststructuralism, into an implicitly wild unknown). Framed by scare quotes that implied an unspecified citation and ironic distance, references to this turn became increasingly commonplace in historiographical essays. In the 1989 volume of Central European History, Thomas Childers described German historians as "caught on a conceptual roundabout, uncertain whether to . . . take the 'linguistic turn' into uncharted territory."⁴⁴ In the often-cited "Is All the World a Text?," Geoff Eley claimed that only "a relatively small number of historians" had, like Joan Scott, "taken the train to the end of the line, through the terrain of textuality to the land of discourse and deconstruction." This poststructuralist train was not exactly a bandwagon. And while Eley endorsed "the basic usefulness and interest of poststructuralist theory," he nonetheless described "the rest of us" as "partly there for the ride, partly curious to see where it goes, and not at all sure we'll stay very long at the destination."⁴⁵ The "turn," in other words, was becoming part of a disciplinary spatio-temporal imaginary.

language, see Mark Poster, "Furet and the Deconstruction of 1789," in Poster, Cultural History and Postmodernity: Disciplinary Readings and Challenges (New York, 1997), 72–107.

⁴² Lynn Hunt, ed., The New Cultural History (Berkeley, Calif., 1989), 10. Writing at almost the same moment, Allan Megill largely concurred with her assessment of Foucault; Megill, "The Reception of Foucault by Historians," Journal of the History of Ideas 48, no. 1 (1987): 117–141.

⁴³ Hunt, The New Cultural History, 15.

⁴⁴ Thomas Childers, "Political Sociology and the 'Linguistic Turn,'" Central European History 22, no. 3/4 (1989): 381–393, here 381.

⁴⁵ Geoff Eley, "Is All the World a Text? From Social History to the History of Society Two Decades Later," in Terrence J. McDonald, ed., The Historic Turn in the Human Sciences (Ann Arbor, Mich., 1996), 193–243, here 214. The essay was originally delivered as a paper in 1990 at a conference at the University of Michigan and first appeared as CSST Working Paper #55/CRSO Working Paper #445. American historian Joyce Appleby took the vehicular metaphor to its logical extreme—the car wreck: "After historians made that last turn marked 'linguistic,' they ran into some dangerous curves. Scholarly vehicles were totaled; avenues of inquiry left in disrepair"; Appleby, "One Good Turn Deserves Another: Moving beyond the Linguistic—A Response to David Harlan," American Historical Review 94, no. 5 (December 1989): 1326–1332, here 1326. Roger Chartier gave the metaphor a different and more positive valence

Despite the ludic tone of Eley's proclamation, the debate over whether to take this "train" or "turn" was quite fierce, not least in the pages of the British journal Social History (of whose editorial board Eley is a member). Such debates were, in fact, as much about the purported turn's identity (and indeed coherence) as about whether historians should get on board. There were, in other words, multiple trains, and they did not lead in the same direction. In revisiting these exchanges not only between advocates and critics but also among purported advocates, we get a firm sense of important and politically salient differences between them, especially with respect to the future of Marxism.

Reactions to Gareth Stedman Jones's revisionist history of Chartism spurred the debate. But there were significant methodological and epistemological differences between Stedman Jones and other self-proclaimed proponents of the "linguistic turn." For some, such as Patrick Joyce and James Vernon, Foucault's critical rethinking of "the social" itself was an indispensable point of departure.⁴⁶ Stedman Jones, by contrast, argued vigorously against what he believed to be Foucault's excessive weight and influence (which, it will be recalled, Hunt's introduction had denied): "If a linguistic approach to history is to be further developed, it is important to refuse this identification. The 'linguistic turn' did not begin with Foucault, nor did it—nor does it—in any sense depend upon Foucault's version of what it meant. Foucault's theory was only one of many possible variants of a linguistic approach."⁴⁷ In his view, Foucault's writing remained overly indebted to Marxist narratives and categories (the bourgeoisie, in particular), even as he took distance from them. For Stedman Jones, "the implications of 1989" were clear: historians needed to "assess and move on from the unsorted debris left by the death of Marxism."⁴⁸

Against starker pronouncements, Eley and Social History editor Keith Nield argued for nuance and complexity—and against a wholesale abandonment of Marxism. Taking Patrick Joyce as their main target, they sought to split some of the opposing camps. Rejecting an "all-too familiar simplification" ("an undifferentiated 'Marxism' is assumed to be 'past' in some irretrievable and unlamented way"), they reaffirmed by invoking Michel de Certeau's figuration of Foucault's theories as akin to a car driving along a cliff. Importantly, for Certeau, what lay over the cliff was not pure discursivity, but rather a non-discursive space where "the usually reliable foundation of language is missing." Certeau, "Micro-Techniques and Panoptic Discourse: A Quid Pro Quo," in Certeau, Heterologies: Discourse on the Other (Minneapolis, 1986), 185–192, here 189. See also Chartier, On the Edge of the Cliff. For another analysis of these metaphors, see Sewell, "Language and Practice in Cultural History." In debates around Subaltern Studies, the problem of poststructuralism was framed in terms of multiplicity and incommensurability—hence the metaphors of attempting to ride "two horses at once." Gyan Prakash, "Can the 'Subaltern' Ride? A Reply to O'Hanlon and Washbrook," Comparative Studies in Society and History 34, no. 1 (1992): 168–184.

⁴⁶ James Vernon, "Who's Afraid of the 'Linguistic Turn'? The Politics of Social History and Its Discontents," Social History 19, no. 1 (1994): 81–97.

⁴⁷ Gareth Stedman Jones, "The Determinist Fix: Some Obstacles to the Further Development of the Linguistic Approach to History in the 1990s," History Workshop Journal, no. 42 (Autumn 1996): 19–35, here 21. See also Roger Chartier's response, in which he denies Stedman Jones's description of him as "a follower" of Foucault; Chartier, "Why the Linguistic Approach Can Be an Obstacle to the Further Development of Historical Knowledge: A Reply to Gareth Stedman Jones," History Workshop Journal, no. 46 (Autumn 1998): 271–272.

⁴⁸ Jones, "The Determinist Fix," 32–33.

Marxism's historical and intellectual plurality.⁴⁹ At the same time, they warned against the flattening of "postmodernism" into a "seductive and spurious singularity."⁵⁰

The problem, of course, is that the phrase "linguistic turn," especially when preceded by a definite article, lends itself to homogenization. The fields and methods of inquiry that became grouped under the moniker had distinct trajectories—at the level of institutions, networks, and publications, as well as intellectual influences—and different agendas, although they did on occasion intersect. To return to our prior example, Toews's review concentrated on a circumscribed set of intellectual historians. It did not register how questions about "discourse" and "experience" were under discussion in other domains, such as European social history, feminist history, or Subaltern Studies.⁵¹

For example, William Sewell and Joan Scott each published essays that directly addressed the relationship between "experience" and discourse, taking The Making of the English Working Class as their point of departure. Sewell's essay pointed to what he viewed as the unsustainable theoretical weight that E. P. Thompson's book placed on experience as the crucible of working-class identity. He argued that Thompson's narrative lacked a necessary and parallel account of transformations in "class discourse" (transformations that he describes in terms of structural shifts).⁵² If Sewell supplemented Thompson's account in order to make it more theoretically coherent, Scott's essay privileged analysis. It raised questions about the coherence of class as a category of identity, and hence of the experience that Thompson posited as its ground.⁵³ Scott's and Sewell's essays thus worked in different directions. But what their arguments shared—in contrast to Toews—was a pointed questioning of experience as a coherent concept or category in historical writing.

Also writing in 1988, Rosalind O'Hanlon drew a parallel between debates surrounding the category of experience in Thompson's work and presumptions about identity, experience, and recovery in the writings of the Subaltern Studies school. In a powerful review essay, she deconstructed presumptions about the unicity of experience and its autonomy in ways that paralleled Scott's critique of Thompson. O'Hanlon's critical account of Subaltern Studies, while informed by thinkers such ⁴⁹ Geoff Eley and Keith Nield, "Starting Over: The Present, the Post-Modern and the Moment of Social History," Social History 20, no. 3 (1995): 355–364, here 356.

⁵⁰ Ibid., 363.

⁵¹ Toews did discuss parallels between trends of new historicism, the social history of ideas, intellectual history, and social history in a later essay, but he was hesitant about grouping them together under the term "linguistic turn." Indeed, he remarked at one point, with respect to the influence of Geertzian anthropology, "For historians this turn to interpreting the past in terms of a process of reconstruction based on cultural units as systems of signification has often been conflated in both revealing and confusing ways with what is sometimes called the 'linguistic' turn." John E. Toews, "Stories of Difference and Identity: New Historicism in Literature and History," Monatshefte 84, no. 2 (1992): 193–211, here 196.

⁵² William H. Sewell, Jr., "How Classes Are Made: Critical Reflections on E. P. Thompson's Theory of Working-Class Formation," in Harvey J. Kaye and Keith McClelland, eds., E. P. Thompson: Critical Debates (Philadelphia, 1990), 50–77. Sewell's article first appeared as CRSO Working Paper #336 (University of Michigan, July 1986).

⁵³ Joan Wallach Scott, "Women in The Making of the English Working Class," in Scott, Gender and the Politics of History (New York, 1988), 68–90. My point is not to suggest that Toews should have known about or cited this work, which was published after his own. It is instead to indicate both the echoes and the differences between these parallel discussions.

as Raymond Williams, Louis Althusser, Michel Foucault, Antonio Gramsci, Toril Moi, and Gayatri Spivak, was not cast in terms of a presumptive opposition between discourse and experience. Nor did she reduce these thinkers to a shared position or movement. She rather drew on their resources in order to raise questions about the Subaltern Studies project, namely its implicit effort to restore the autonomy of subaltern experience.⁵⁴

Joan Scott eventually brought these parallel discussions together in her well-known 1991 article "The Evidence of Experience," in which she discussed historians' recourse to "experience" as a foundational category. Naming Toews as one example among several, Scott questioned the broad framework opposing language and experience on which his account was based. Rather than reasserting the autonomy of the linguistic over and above an "irreducible experience," she interrogated the oppositional (and homogenizing) terms in which Toews had cast the debate.⁵⁵

Written in part as a response to Scott, Kathleen Canning's 1994 essay "Feminist History after the Linguistic Turn" echoed Toews's title, and to some extent his argument, especially with respect to "experience." At the same time, Canning claimed the autonomy—and even precedence—of feminist history's "linguistic turn" from that taken in intellectual history, which had its origins in "the influence of Foucault, Derrida, and/or Lacan."⁵⁶ Feminist history's "linguistic turn" was thus, for Canning, distinct from rather than dependent on poststructuralist theories, of which she remained suspicious. In a double move, she both questioned the "turn's" coherence and reasserted a discourse/experience opposition. She thus wrote: "the linguistic turn' (like the term postmodernism) has become a catch-all phrase for divergent critiques of established historical paradigms, narratives, and chronologies, encompassing not only poststructuralist literary criticism, linguistic theory, and philosophy but also cultural and symbolic anthropology, new historicism, and gender history."⁵⁷ While questioning the coherence of the "turn," Canning nonetheless reasserted the opposition between "discourse" and "experience" that Toews used to characterize ⁵⁴ Rosalind O'Hanlon, "Recovering the Subject: Subaltern Studies and Histories of Resistance in Colonial South Asia," Modern Asian Studies 22, no. 1 (1988): 189–224. O'Hanlon's subsequent arguments with Subaltern Studies were more pointed. With David Washbrook, she would go on to figure the "anti-foundationalist" strain in Subaltern Studies as insufficiently attentive to class and capital, and hence as politically compromised—i.e., as "the bad conscience of liberalism." O'Hanlon and Washbrook, "After Orientalism: Culture, Criticism, and Politics in the Third World," Comparative Studies in Society and History 34, no. 1 (1992): 141–167, here 166. See also Prakash, "Can the 'Subaltern' Ride?" In her account of Subaltern Studies in Latin American history, Florencia Mallon was more measured in her assessment of the tensions between a Gramscian focus on hegemony and subaltern experience, Foucauldian accounts of the microphysics of power, and a Derridean focus on the instability of meaning. Following Prakash, Mallon described these tensions as politically and intellectually productive rather than disabling. Notably, these authors, while focused on the relationship between Marxism and anti-foundationalism, do not use the rhetoric of the "linguistic turn." Mallon, "The Promise and Dilemma of Subaltern Studies: Perspectives from Latin American History," American Historical Review 99, no. 5 (December 1994): 1491–1515.

⁵⁵ Scott, "The Evidence of Experience," 788.

⁵⁶ Kathleen Canning, "Feminist History after the Linguistic Turn: Historicizing Discourse and Experience," Signs 19, no. 2 (1994): 368–404, here 370. It is worth noting the institutional connections here. The original version of Scott's essay "Historicizing Experience" was presented at the same 1990 conference where Geoff Eley first presented "Is All the World a Text?" Canning's response, meanwhile, appeared initially as a working paper in the same series, minus the titular reference to Toews: Canning, "Contesting the Power of Categories: Discourse, Experience, and Feminist Resistance" (CSST Working Paper #83/CRSO Working Paper #479, University of Michigan, 1992).

⁵⁷ Canning, "Feminist History after the Linguistic Turn," 369.

intellectual history's "linguistic turn." She sought, by contrast, to identify mediating terms (the body, agency) as a way beyond this presumptive opposition. Vacillating between deployment and disavowal, Canning's usage exemplified historians' ambivalent relationship to the epistemological questions the "turn" supposedly entailed. By the mid-1990s, the term had become routinized—oddly meaningful despite (or was it because of?) its ambiguousness. In a sense, the disciplinary fixation on the "turn" can be seen as a fetish in the psychoanalytic sense. It simultaneously acknowledged and disavowed epistemological challenges and strenuous arguments, thus overcoming and containing a perceived threat.⁵⁸

THE POINT HERE IS NOT TO recycle old debates, but rather to highlight the gaps and fissures that existed at the very moment that this decisive turn was supposed to be happening. Historians have nonetheless continued to use the language of the "turn" and figured it to be both a general and a generational event. As Eley recalled it in 2005, "In the world of historians, this was the much vaunted 'linguistic turn'—a general discursive shift in the rhetoric and practice of the profession from 'social' to 'cultural' modes of analysis."⁵⁹

Indeed, recent accounts suggest that the shift became "hegemonic."⁶⁰ The claim may seem surprising, given that, as Spiegel notes as an aside in her presidential address, "the actual number of historians actively engaged with these questions was probably relatively small in comparison to the field as a whole."⁶¹ Spiegel nonetheless asserts here—and elsewhere—that the impact of the "turn" was so broad-based and significant as to have radically modified the kinds of claims that all historians are now prepared to make. Citing Sewell, she reads the recent "revisionist" turn away from semiotic analysis and toward questions of practice and agency as demonstrative of this prior prominence. In a sense, these newer developments are supposed to prove the previous moment's (albeit now fading) "hegemony."⁶²

Given the diversity of the trends associated with the linguistic turn as well as the constantly contested character of its reception, Spiegel's invocations of the first person plural possessive pronoun "our" and her repeated references to a collective "we" of historians are at once striking and significant. "We all sense that this profound change has run its course," she remarks. And further: "we need some explanation of how and why this sea change in history occurred." The goals of her analysis, then, ⁵⁸ Sigmund Freud, "Fetishism," in Freud, The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, ed. James Strachey, 24 vols. (London, 1961), 21: 147–157, here 154.

⁵⁹ Eley, A Crooked Line, 125.

⁶⁰ The introduction to the AHR Forum on A Crooked Line thus describes how, by the late 1980s, "Many, if not most, of [social history's] practitioners had turned to cultural history, which soon achieved hegemonic status"; American Historical Review 113, no. 2 (April 2008): 391–392, here 391.

⁶¹ Spiegel, "The Task of the Historian," 3 n. 5.

⁶² Ibid., 3. Sewell figures the publication of Hunt's 1989 volume as a marker of cultural history's "hegemonic position." Sewell, Logics of History, 48. Neither Sewell nor Spiegel elaborates on their usage of hegemony as a way to describe the "turn's" trajectory. It is worth recalling the genealogy of the term offered by post-Marxist theorists Ernesto Laclau and Chantal Mouffe in the 1980s. They drew implicit historical parallels between the "postmodern" present and hegemony's emergence in Gramsci's work at another moment in which Marxist historical narrative was in crisis. Drawing on Foucault, they argue that hegemony emerged to "fill a hiatus that had opened in the chain of historical necessity." Laclau and Mouffe, Hegemony and Socialist Strategy: Towards a Radical Democratic Politics (London, 1985), 7.

are simultaneously retrospective and prospective, as she hopes to “offer some insights into what remains valuable as we move forward into a new era of historical concerns.”⁶³ Her account of the historiographical past is therefore marshaled toward a vision of the historiographical future. She thus signals the topics that have been put on the agenda of history’s future (into which we have now moved): questions of economy and technology; diaspora and displacement; empire, territoriality, and the transnational. It is difficult to argue with Spiegel’s assessment of these current trends. But how should we understand the relationship between thematic shifts and theoretical or epistemological reorientation?

It is important to underscore that Spiegel positions herself as favorably disposed to the “semiotic challenge” and as anxious to preserve some of its insights for future historical practice. Structured analytically and metaphorically by a generational model, her speech at once indicates a waning interest in the “linguistic turn” and traces the afterlife of her cohort’s contributions. On the one hand, she suggests that their work is done, now that “the ‘semiotic challenge’ has been addressed, absorbed.” On the other, she signals the importance of preservation, the need, at the very least, to “appreciate and employ what poststructuralism has taught us.”⁶⁴ But does her narrative of generational supersession work against rather than toward that end?

A model of successive and specific historical “generations” is at the heart of Spiegel’s analysis. Remaining within a Euro-American frame, she correlates the radical epistemological questioning of postwar (French) philosophy with the ineffable sense of loss specific to the second post-Holocaust generation. The connection, she argues, is not directly causal, but a displacement, or “alchemy,” exemplified in the thought of Jacques Derrida. Derrida’s insistent assertions of unstable origins, present absences, and impossible wholes thus exemplify, in her view, “an entire generation’s understanding of the wreck of history attendant upon the war and the revelations of its horrors.”⁶⁵ This is in many ways a provocative analysis, especially given the skepticism with which historians so often treat Derrida’s thought (when they treat it at all).⁶⁶ The argument is, however, difficult to assess, in part because Spiegel never clearly explains who belongs to this generation and why. Even if we accept “post-Holocaust” as a chronological marker (although questions might be raised about this, too), its status as a generational demarcation is more fraught. How are we to map the contours of the “generation[s]” formed by “the event” not only chronologically, but also geographically? Even scholars who focus specifically on Holocaust survivors and their children worry over the importance of drawing careful distinctions along the lines of age, nationality, and experience.⁶⁷

⁶³ Spiegel, “The Task of the Historian,” 3, emphasis added.

⁶⁴ Ibid., 10–11.

⁶⁵ Ibid., 8. For a brilliant account of the multiple factors—at once institutional, religious, philosophical, and political—that influenced the “young Derrida,” see Baring, The Young Derrida and French Philosophy.

⁶⁶ For a discussion of historians’ vexed relationship to Derrida, see Ethan Kleinberg, “Haunting History: Deconstruction and the Spirit of Revision,” History and Theory 46, no. 4 (2007): 113–143.

⁶⁷ Susan Rubin Suleiman, “The 1.5 Generation: Thinking about Child Survivors and the Holocaust,” American Imago 59, no. 3 (2002): 277–295. On the difficult chronology of when the Holocaust, as such, was “known,” particularly in the French context, see Samuel Moyn, A Holocaust Controversy: The Treblinka Affair in Postwar France (Waltham, Mass., 2005); Henry Rousso, The Vichy Syndrome: History and Memory in France since 1944, trans. Arthur Goldhammer (Cambridge, Mass., 1991). See also Tara Zahra, The Lost Children: Reconstructing Europe’s Families after World War II (Cambridge, Mass., 2011).

Spiegel's account is likewise notable for the starkness with which it adopts not only a generational, but also a distinctly Euro-American frame. She focuses on how the metaphysical concerns of the post-Holocaust generation intersected with political and institutional developments, especially in the United States. She thus suggests elsewhere that "it is worth noting how tied to the experiences of a single generation these transformations appear to be."⁶⁸ Here again, her argument parallels that of Sewell, and in certain ways Eley's A Crooked Line. And she indeed draws on their generational analyses as evidence for her case.⁶⁹ For Spiegel, the rise of the "linguistic" and/or the "cultural" turn can be explained by a generational convergence between "post-Holocaust" metaphysical concerns, on the one hand, and the more directly political, economic, and institutional trends traced by Sewell and Eley, on the other. How can we historically assess this recent "turn" to a generational account of historiography itself?

In a 1973 essay, "The Historical Problem of Generations," Alan B. Spitzer wrote: "Each generation writes its own history of generations."⁷⁰ His exploration of this problem was marked by self-awareness, as he invoked at the outset a proliferation of work on "generations" in the wake of contemporary student revolts. Spitzer drew on an earlier set of discussions, going back to the 1920s, on the usefulness of the generation as a category of historical analysis. That earlier debate had included the likes of sociologist Karl Mannheim, who sought to refine the concept, and historian Lucien Febvre, who questioned its explanatory power.⁷¹ In other words, the notion of generation in history is tied to a distinct intellectual and political history. Pierre Nora, for example, locates the advent of "generational consciousness" in and with the historical rupture of the French Revolution, and he depicts it as a decisive, and constitutive, moment in specifically French historical consciousness. In citing these moments, Nora thus asserts that "generations are powerfully, perhaps even primarily, fabricators of lieux de mémoire, or mnemonic sites, which form the fabric of their provisional identities and stake out the boundaries of their generational memories."⁷² Featured in a book devoted to French national "realms of memory," the claim is intended to be performative: it seeks to create what it describes—including the construction and consignment of the "generation of 1968" to the space of memory.⁷³

Generational arguments are not only a powerful way to carve up historical time. They also reassert the boundaries of collective identity, not only in specific times, but also in specific places. As a result, the construction of a "generation" cannot be assumed as self-evident: it is a productive, rather than merely descriptive, concept. For some time, history, as a discipline, was supposed to be internally riven and scat-

⁶⁸ Spiegel, "Revising the Past/Revisiting the Present," 18.

⁶⁹ Ibid., 15.

⁷⁰ Alan B. Spitzer, "The Historical Problem of Generations," American Historical Review 78, no. 5 (December 1973): 1353–1385, here 1353.

⁷¹ On the history of proliferation of thought about "generations" in this period, see Robert Wohl, The Generation of 1914 (Cambridge, 1979).

⁷² Pierre Nora, "Generation," in Lawrence Kritzman, ed., Realms of Memory: Rethinking the French Past (New York, 1996), 499–531, here 526. See also Hans Jaeger, "Generations in History: Reflections on a Controversial Concept," History and Theory 24, no. 3 (1985): 273–292.

⁷³ On the stakes of this "generational" account of May 1968 in France, see Kristin Ross, May '68 and Its Afterlives (Chicago, 2002).

tered in multiple directions—in part as a result of the innovations (or incursions) that came to be associated with the “linguistic turn.” But recent accounts of the past historiographical generation (those presumed to have participated, in one way or another, in the “turn”) strikingly reassert community. Does this narrative consign that once-troubled past to history in order to reassert the coherence and comity of the discipline in the process?⁷⁴

The historiographical “generation” dovetails conveniently with a coherent conception of historiographical “turns.” It presupposes collective new beginnings as well as eventual endings. In its wake, space is made for new “turns,” now that, according to Spiegel—and others—the postwar revisionist moment is “effectively over.”⁷⁵

In order to explain this now-passed postwar moment of historical revision, Spiegel draws on Michel de Certeau’s account of how “historiography separates its present time from a past.”⁷⁶ This model of the “historiographical operation” is taken from his now-classic work The Writing of History, which was first published in 1975. The book has a complex relationship to the thematics of memory, loss, and death that Spiegel aims to historicize. As she explains, he articulates the death and ritual mourning of the past with a vital present and future. For Certeau, then, “‘to mark’ a past is to make a place for the dead, but also to redistribute the space of possibility.” Historiography uses “the narrativity that buries the dead as a way of establishing a place for the living.”⁷⁷ An analogous logic underlies the aim of Spiegel’s address: by describing and explaining a temporal and historiographical scission, its narrative arc is supposed to make room for younger historians by historicizing the recent historiographical past.

But even as it describes this generational movement, Spiegel’s argument indicates the impossibility of creating sharp chronological (and methodological) ruptures—not least in her own (re)turn to Certeau as guide. She thus rejects an absolute break between the historical past and future, and suggests that the insights of “postmodernism” cannot be “so easily jettisoned.”⁷⁸ And indeed, Certeau’s own account of historical writing highlights a similar difficulty. He forcefully challenges models of discrete periodization, even as he describes the logic implicit in the “historiographical operation.” In his view, the past’s intelligibility in terms of distinct moments or periods is based on procedures of selection. The apparent coherence of those moments remains fragile, however, as the return of what he describes as repressed “shards” and “remainders” can always “discreetly perturb the pretty order of a line of ‘progress’ or a system of interpretation.”⁷⁹

Revisiting some of the crucial early moments of writing about the “linguistic turn” can help us recall some of those remainders to the surface. The complex debates that ⁷⁴ For a related discussion, see Geoff Eley, “Peace in the Neighborhood,” Left History 12, no. 1 (2007): 111–125.

⁷⁵ Spiegel, “Revising the Past/Revisiting the Present,” 3. The argument is first elaborated in Gabrielle M. Spiegel, “Orations of the Dead/Silences of the Living: The Sociology of the Linguistic Turn,” in Spiegel, The Past as Text: The Theory and Practice of Medieval Historiography (Baltimore, 1997), 29–43. For a parallel critique of this logic of “entombment,” see Sylvia Schafer, “Still Turning: Language, ‘Theory’ and History’s Fascination with the New,” forthcoming in differences 23, no. 2 (2012).

⁷⁶ Michel de Certeau, The Writing of History, trans. Tom Conley (New York, 1988), 3.

⁷⁷ Ibid., 100.

⁷⁸ Spiegel, “The Task of the Historian,” 11.

⁷⁹ Certeau, The Writing of History, 4.

took place in the 1980s and 1990s—about discourse and subjectivity, or the relationship between “linguistic” structures, agency, and experience—show that there was no singular “turn.” These discussions did not occur once and for all, in an orderly logic of progression and supersession, or uniformly across the discipline. To take another example, the chronologically contemporaneous theoretical and methodological ferment associated with Subaltern Studies figures unevenly and problematically in European historians’ retrospective accounts of the “linguistic turn,” despite certain shared attributes, Marxist revisionism, and a concern with symbolic representation among them. Eley thus writes: “this South Asian historiography both presaged and paralleled the course of the ‘linguistic turn’ in the West.”⁸⁰ The assessment is provocative because it posits parallelism and indeed priority to “post-colonial” historiography, rather than reasserting the rhetoric of temporal delay that figures such as Dipesh Chakrabarty have so powerfully critiqued.⁸¹ Eley does not posit incommensurability between these histories (he notes, for example, a shared Gramscian heritage), but he nonetheless presents the “linguistic turn” as a specific moment in Euro-American historiography, not as a cross-disciplinary trend.⁸²

If historians have returned to these questions of late, it is because they are as concerned about history’s future as they are about its past. Sewell’s Logics of History is exemplary in this regard. In the chapter titled “The Political Unconscious of Social and Cultural History,” he strongly states his goal: “to revive some of the lost virtues of social history without abandoning the tremendous intellectual gains attendant upon history’s linguistic turn.”⁸³ This is an engaged history, both politically and personally: the future of the discipline—and his relationship to it—is at stake.

Sewell construes a linguistic theory of the social to be the shared epistemological basis of “cultural history”—and the principal source of its rupture from “social history.” In order to map future directions, he reconstructs the political effects of Euro-American historians’ linguistic epistemologies in the postwar decades. His narrative traces two parallel paths in order, in the end, to suggest a causal relationship between them. His “internalist” account of this recent history is a truncated prosopography, in which he groups himself together with Lynn Hunt and Joan Scott. Without sidelining his own contributions, Sewell argues that “the rapidity of the rise of cultural history in the 1980s and the widening of the epistemological fissure dividing it from social history were disproportionately fueled by developments in women’s history.” Here he credits feminism, the “critical and deconstructive historical analysis of central cultural categories—sex and gender,” with helping “to radicalize and energize cultural history as a whole.”⁸⁴ This is, however, an ambivalent attribution of credit, given Sewell’s subsequent critique of the political limitations of cultural history (and especially its linguistic epistemology).

⁸⁰ Eley, A Crooked Line, 146. This argument is more difficult to make with respect to Latin Americanists’ appropriation of the subaltern model.

⁸¹ Chakrabarty, Provincializing Europe.

⁸² For a forceful critique of the logic of incommensurability and its political implications, see Manu Goswami’s contribution to the AHR Forum on Eley’s book: Goswami, “Remembering the Future,” American Historical Review 113, no. 2 (April 2008): 417–424. She here elaborates on arguments set forth in Goswami, Producing India: From Colonial Economy to National Space (Chicago, 2004).

⁸³ Sewell, Logics of History, 23.

⁸⁴ Ibid., 47, 48. For a contrasting account of the recent history of historiography, see Scott, “History-Writing as Critique.”

Sewell's social and structural account recapitulates arguments by Fredric Jameson (hence the reference to the "political unconscious") and David Harvey—they themselves first formulated, it should be recalled, in the 1980s—on the historical convergence of postmodernism, post-Fordism, and neoliberal ideology.⁸⁵ Following their analyses, he writes: "I think it is essential to recognize that the cultural turn was also fueled, in ways we were essentially unaware of, by a secret affinity with an emergent logic of capitalist development."⁸⁶ According to Sewell, history's turn to language and culture misrecognized late capitalist logics of history. In his generational analysis, "1960s rebels" misread their historical moment: they attacked a "collapsing Fordist order" when their actual target should have been the emerging "order of globalized flexible accumulation."⁸⁷ In this melancholic narrative, the "turn" was politically well-intentioned, but ultimately misguided.

In order to restore clarity to historical—and political—vision, Sewell calls for a (re)turn to social science: "Critical awareness of the potential complicities between contemporary forms of capitalism and a purely cultural history seems to me an essential condition of clearheaded and efficacious epistemological, methodological, and practical work in historical studies today."⁸⁸ A number of historical and political assumptions are written into this call, not least that his generation's "linguistic turn" produced what he describes as a "purely cultural history" and that its practitioners were blind to this complicity.⁸⁹ Sewell's narrative ends up minimizing the history of dissension in social theory and historical practice, even though their implicit and explicit political effects were chief differends in those debates. Like Spiegel, he seeks to preserve some of the theoretical and critical insights generated in past decades. But by turning the "turn" into a shared generational event or moment, Sewell also suggests that it is a time whose time has come—and gone. We are collectively urged, instead, to write histories of late capitalism's present that understand deeper (structural) logics rather than misreading (or, worse, perpetuating) its surface cultural effects.

SEWELL THUS OFFERS US a cautionary tale about the dangers of untimely thinking. His call for disciplinary reorientation in the present assumes periodization, generational unity, and implicit world-historical movement. But does this narrative hold together? What happens to this story when the presumptive methodological, generational, and global coherence of the "linguistic turn" is contested? The evidence, when examined closely, suggests that the "linguistic turn" was not a coherent moment. It cannot be conceived as the intellectual property of a single historiographical generation or consigned to a collective past.

It is unclear, for example, how feminist analysis coincides with Sewell's claims of generational cecity. According to his account, feminism's focus on the historical con-

⁸⁵ David Harvey, The Condition of Postmodernity: An Enquiry into the Origins of Cultural Change (Oxford, 1989); Fredric Jameson, "Postmodernism, or the Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism," New Left Review, no. 146 (1984): 53–92.

⁸⁶ Sewell, Logics of History, 62.

⁸⁷ Ibid., 60.

⁸⁸ Ibid., 62.

⁸⁹ Ibid.

stitution of sex and gender lent cultural history political energy, but it also entailed a radically linguistic—and hence critically limited—epistemology. The “micro” focus of histories of gender and sexuality (and in particular, those influenced by Foucault) were, he suggests, ill-equipped to address broad structural economic and social change. For Sewell, an emphasis on the plasticity of cultural categories is politically symptomatic rather than analytically trenchant.⁹⁰

This view of feminist history and theory is not only inexact, it is politically limiting. Consider how a focus on gender and sexuality helped to establish the historical and historiographical significance of feminized consumption alongside masculinized production.⁹¹ Today, feminist analyses, and especially those that draw on Foucauldian accounts of governmentality, provide signal insights into the contemporary dynamics of consumption and capitalism, neoliberalism and globalization. While by no means unified by a single position or approach, such work demonstrates how gendered constructions of agency, desire, and sexual victimization are integral to the contemporary restructuring of markets, state sovereignty, and international order.⁹² What is more, it helps to illuminate what anthropologist Elizabeth Povinelli has recently described as the distinct “grammars” of temporality—orientations toward futurity as well as civilizational rhetorics of “pastness”—that structure the differential distribution of neoliberalism’s, or what she refers to as late liberalism’s, global effects.⁹³ In sum, it is crucial to recall that such feminist analysis remains a vital historical and political resource.

⁹⁰ On the link between Foucauldian microphysics and the eclipse of structural analysis, see ibid., 59. On the eclipsing of “the social” by a focus on “culture and gender,” in the case of History Workshop Journal, see ibid., 65. Daniel Rodgers pursues an analogous line of argument about the divisive effects of microanalyses of power, including by feminists, as part of a broader dynamic of social fragmentation in America; Rodgers, Age of Fracture (Cambridge, Mass., 2011). For a critique of this elision, see Samuel Moyn, “Studying the Fault Lines,” Dissent 58, no. 2 (2011): 101–105, here 103. In a parallel argument, Nancy Fraser has suggested a “perverse, subterranean elective affinity” between feminism and neoliberalism; see Fraser, “Feminism, Capitalism, and the Cunning of History,” New Left Review 56 (March–April 2009): 97–117, here 108.

⁹¹ For how Sewell’s own recent reflections on the history of consumption register this insight, see William H. Sewell, “The Empire of Fashion and the Rise of Capitalism in Eighteenth-Century France,” Past and Present 206, no. 1 (2010): 81–120. Some of the landmarks in the Euro-American field include Victoria de Grazia, Irresistible Empire: America’s Advance through Twentieth-Century Europe (Cambridge, Mass., 2005); Victoria de Grazia with Ellen Furlough, eds., The Sex of Things: Gender and Consumption in Historical Perspective (Berkeley, Calif., 1996); Jennifer M. Jones, Sexing La Mode: Gender, Fashion and Commercial Culture in Old Regime France (Oxford, 2004); Kathy Peiss, Hope in a Jar: The Making of America’s Beauty Culture (New York, 1998); Katherine Pence and Paul Betts, Socialist Modern: East German Everyday Culture and Politics (Ann Arbor, Mich., 2008); Erika Diane Rappaport, Shopping for Pleasure: Women in the Making of London’s West End (Princeton, N.J., 2000); Mary Louise Roberts, “Gender, Consumption, and Commodity Culture,” American Historical Review 103, no. 3 (June 1998): 817–844; Judith R. Walkowitz, City of Dreadful Delight: Narratives of Sexual Danger in Late-Victorian London (Chicago, 1992). On the colonial and global dimensions of consumption, see Timothy Burke, Lifebuoy Men, Lux Women: Commodification, Consumption, and Cleanliness in Modern Zimbabwe (Durham, N.C., 1996); Inderpal Grewal and Caren Kaplan, Scattered Hegemonies: Postmodernity and Transnational Feminist Practices (Minneapolis, 1994); Anne McClintock, Imperial Leather: Race, Gender and Sexuality in the Colonial Conquest (New York, 1995); Alys Eve Weinbaum and the Modern Girl Around the World Research Group, The Modern Girl around the World: Consumption, Modernity, and Globalization (Durham, N.C., 2008).

⁹² Notable contributions from the field of political theory, sociology, and anthropology include Özlem Aslan and Zeynep Gambetti, “Provincializing Fraser’s History: Feminism and Neoliberalism Revisited,” History of the Present 1, no. 1 (2011): 130–147; Suzanne Bergeron, “Political Economy Discourses of Globalization and Feminist Politics,” Signs 26, no. 4 (2001): 983–1006; Elizabeth Bernstein, Temporarily Yours: Intimacy, Authenticity, and the Commerce of Sex (Chicago, 2007); Wendy Brown, “American Nightmare: Neoliberalism, Neoconservatism, and De-Democratization,” Political Theory 34, no. 6 (2006): 690–714; Brown, “Neo-Liberalism and the End of Liberal Democracy,” Theory and Event 7, no. 1 (2003): 1–19; Lisa Duggan, The Twilight of Equality? Neoliberalism, Cultural Politics, and the Attack on Democracy (Boston, 2003); Michel Feher, “Self-Appreciation; or, the Aspirations of Human Capital,” Public Culture 21, no. 1 (2009): 21–41; Janet R. Jakobsen, “Perverse Justice,” GLQ 18, no. 1 (2012): 19–45; Rosalind Morris, “Failures of Domestication: Speculations on Globality, Economy, and the Sex of Excess in Thailand,” differences 13, no. 1 (2002): 45–76; Aihwa Ong, Neoliberalism as Exception:

The temporalizing logic of turn talk forecloses these critical possibilities rather than creating new horizons. It implicitly consigns still-vibrant analytic resources to a periodized posterity and politically compromised epistemology.⁹⁴ What is at stake here is not the positive or negative legacy of a purported “linguistic turn,” but the usefulness and disadvantages of such fetishized “turns” for history’s life. If narratives of generational supersession represent analytical and political foreclosure, what kind of horizon does the re-membling of this past open up?

Here again, feminist analysis remains salient, not least because feminists have examined the at once epistemological and political limits of “generational thinking.” Histories of feminist “generations” or “waves” regularly grapple with questions of temporality: how to articulate past achievements, present-day urgencies, and visions of an alternative future. Should the new challenges in the present be understood as a sign and symptom of past or current failures? As Judith Roof has noted, “generational” models of feminist history ironically remain beholden not only to an oedipalized and reproductive conception of family, but also to a linear conception of historical time. In recasting historical temporality, Roof suggests that “generations” no longer appear as the most accurate or productive framework for articulating past, present, and future: “In a paradigm where history, governed by linear time, becomes the cause of ensuing events, the concepts of originality, pioneer, tradition, and precedent make sense. But if we challenge the very notions of time and history that ground these ideas, generation becomes an insignificant term in the creation, re-creation, sharing, and proliferation of feminist knowledges.”⁹⁵ Thus “generational thinking” may limit the proliferation of knowledge tout court, not least by consigning the critical resources of feminism to a chronologically and politically exhausted moment.

Most pressing now, as we proliferate histories of our present, is the need to unsettle rather than confirm what appear to be increasingly sedimented narratives. Genealogical analysis is particularly helpful for doing this. In one sense, there is a family resemblance between genealogy and generational thinking, at least when kin-

Mutations in Citizenship and Sovereignty (Durham, N.C., 2006); Lisa Rofel, Desiring China: Experiments in Neoliberalism, Sexuality, and Public Culture (Durham, N.C., 2007).

⁹³ Elizabeth A. Povinelli, Economies of Abandonment: Social Belonging and Endurance in Late Liberalism (Durham, N.C., 2011)

⁹⁴ Indeed, the proliferation of new turns recalls Walter Benjamin’s ironic assessment of ever new aesthetic movements in Weimar Germany, such as Expressionism and New Objectivity. In his view, they ended up reproducing the very commercial logics that they supposedly critiqued: “Expressionism exhibited the revolutionary gesture, the raised arm, the clenched fist in papier-mâché. After this advertising campaign, the New Objectivity . . . was added to the catalogue.” Walter Benjamin, “Left-Wing Melancholy,” in Benjamin, Selected Writings, vol. 2: 1927–1934, ed. Marcus Paul Bullock, Michael William Jennings, and Gary Smith (Cambridge, Mass., 1996), 423–427, here 424.

⁹⁵ Judith Roof, “Generational Difficulties; or, The Fear of a Barren History,” in Devoney Looser and E. Ann Kaplan, eds., Generations: Academic Feminists in Dialogue (Minneapolis, 1997), 69–87, here 86. See also Robyn Wiegman, “Feminism’s Apocalyptic Futures,” New Literary History 31, no. 4 (2000): 805–825.

ship relations are naturalized and universalized.⁹⁶ But when viewed as a critical technique for mapping relations (and non-relations), genealogy reveals the construction and constriction of generational ideas. While overtly engaged in and by questions of the present, it does not seek to discipline thinking toward a singular historiographical future.

In reading the entrails of recent debates, we can see the composite character of the centaur known as the “linguistic turn.” Following Paul Veyne’s proposition, one cannot make true or erroneous statements about such animals.⁹⁷ Rather than seeking to uncover the beast’s hidden nature, we have seen how it came into being—as both myth and fetish. The linguistic turn—and other purported “turns”—might be better understood not as historically inevitable disciplinary trajectories, but as specifically located, imaginatively cast, at once multiple, overlapping, and dynamic constellations. In this astrological rendering, there is also space for “untimely thinking,” or what Walter Benjamin, citing Friedrich Nietzsche, called a “star without atmosphere.”⁹⁸

⁹⁶ See, for example, David Schneider’s pathbreaking and controversial critique of the genealogical presumption in anthropology in Schneider, A Critique of the Study of Kinship (Ann Arbor, Mich., 1984).

⁹⁷ Paul Veyne, “Foucault Revolutionizes History,” in Arnold I. Davidson, ed., Foucault and His Interlocutors (Chicago, 1997), 146–182, here 176. For Veyne’s discussion of the ambivalent status of centaurs in Greek and Roman mythology, see Veyne, Did the Greeks Believe in Their Myths? An Essay on the Constitutive Imagination, trans. Paula Wissing (Chicago, 1988), 54–57.

⁹⁸ This was Benjamin’s characterization of Charles Baudelaire’s relationship to the Second Empire; Walter Benjamin, “On Some Motifs in Baudelaire,” in Benjamin, Illuminations: Essays and Reflections, ed. Hannah Arendt (New York, 1968), 155–200, here 194. The citation was of Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche, “On the Uses and Disadvantages of History for Life,” in Nietzsche, Untimely Meditations, ed. Daniel Breazeale (Cambridge, 1983), 57–123, here 97. And, with reference to Heraclitus, see Nietzsche, Philosophy in the Tragic Age of the Greeks (Chicago, 1962), 67. For a recent discussion of the political possibilities of “untimely thinking,” see Gary Wilder, “Untimely Vision: Aimé Césaire, Decolonization, Utopia,” Public Culture 21, no. 1 (2009): 101–140.

Judith Surkis is currently Visiting Associate Professor of History at Columbia University and a Visitor in the School of Social Science at the Institute for Advanced Study. In Fall 2012 she will be Associate Professor of History at Rutgers University. Her current book project, Scandalous Subjects: Intimacy and Indecency in France and French Algeria, 1830–1930, explores the role of law and gender in Algerian colonization. She is also the author of Sexing the Citizen: Morality and Masculinity in France, 1870–1920 (Cornell University Press, 2006).

From Optic to Topic: The Foreclosure Effect of Historiographic Turns

GARY WILDER

IN THE FIELD OF HISTORY, we are now witnessing the untimely return of elements of the “doctrinal realism” that Hayden White identified with the legacy of Leopold von Ranke: documentary evidence, descriptive particularism, and “explanation by narration” in the service of a reconstructive history of “what actually happened.”¹ Most striking about this development is that a return to descriptive realism and archival objectivism has actually followed what were supposed to be the epistemological breaks initiated by the so-called linguistic and cultural turns in historiography. Given that academic history in the United States has always been built upon a realist foundation and that empiricism is entrenched as the disciplinary default, a professional backlash against the theoretical challenges associated with them is not surprising.² But insofar as conventional historical practices were indeed challenged by them, we might ask if there exists a connection between history’s current retrenchment and the turns themselves. Has the discourse of discrete and completed turns functioned to foreclose certain kinds of questions from being posed or debates from taking place? The real historical significance of the linguistic and cultural turns may thus lie less in specific instances of historiographic innovation to which they are supposed to refer than in their persistent and pernicious afterlives.³

In retrospect, we can see that the analytic openings that were created by the linguistic and cultural turns have been foreclosed through a process of domestication whereby new optics were transformed into routine research topics that reaffirmed traditional historiographic assumptions. Even some proponents of these turns con-

For reading earlier versions of this essay, I am grateful to Herman Bennett, John Collins, Fernando Coronil, Laurent Dubois, Durba Ghosh, Rachel Lindheim, Judith Surkis, and the graduate students in the CUNY Production of History workshop.

¹ Hayden White, Metahistory: The Historical Imagination in Nineteenth-Century Europe (Baltimore, 1973), 163–190.

² Georg G. Iggers, New Directions in European Historiography, rev. ed. (Middletown, Conn., 1984); Peter Novick, That Noble Dream: The “Objectivity Question” and the American Historical Profession (Cambridge, 1988); Donald R. Kelley, Frontiers of History: Historical Inquiry in the Twentieth Century (New Haven, Conn., 2006); Martin Bunzl, Real History: Reflections on Historical Practice (London, 1997). Even the new social history, of course, sought to establish objective historiography on an even firmer realist, because positivist, foundation. See François Furet, “From Narrative History to Problem-Oriented History,” in Furet, In the Workshop of History (Chicago, 1984), 54–67.

³ Cf. the story that Kristin Ross tells about how 68ers in France later disavowed, by rewriting, their past and those events. Ross, May ’68 and Its Afterlives (Chicago, 2002).

tributed to such foreclosure effects through discourses about completed turns, a new methodological consensus, and professional reconciliation. Moreover, because the linguistic turn conflated positivist social history with structural analysis more generally, and because it tended to restrict “theory” to poststructuralism, its advocates often marginalized history informed by critical social theory. Against these developments, critical historians should reclaim both the linguistic turn’s demand that historians confront fundamental epistemological questions self-reflexively and Marxism’s longstanding concern with systemic, long-term, and macrosocial analysis.

This is not meant to be a comprehensive overview of the state of history today. Most of the examples are drawn from my own field of French history. The aim is not to indict individuals but to draw attention to embedded assumptions and tendencies within history as a professional space and a disciplinary formation that encourages certain habits and choices among its practitioners. The fact that counterexamples of innovative and insightful work can be invoked for any of those tendencies does not mean that such tendencies do not exist. Rather than defend or condemn a specific historiographic turn, the task is to explore the intellectual and institutional work that the idiom and narrative of “turns” often performs.

A NUMBER OF HISTORIANS WHO participated in the linguistic and cultural “turns” have written about their experiences.⁴ From their accounts emerges a familiar narrative of the historiographic turns that begins with the development in the 1960s of the “new social history,” which challenged a traditional historiography that sanctified official sources, political elites, short-term events, and descriptive narrative. This triumphant social history was then gradually challenged by a constellation of critics associated in different ways with what became known retrospectively as the linguistic turn. By the 1980s, social history was largely displaced institutionally by various strands of work collected under the rubric of cultural history.⁵ During this period, debates across the disciplines unfolded over fundamental epistemological questions regarding the relationship between the world we confront, the categories with which we attempt to think that world, and the worldly forces in relation to which these categories emerged. Critics in numerous fields sought to counter the limitations of realism, positivism, and functionalism. Various linguistic turns, cultural turns, and ⁴ The original panel was “Historiographic ‘Turns’ in Critical Perspective,” American Historical Association Annual Meeting, January 2010. Recent reflections on experiences of the turns include Victoria E. Bonnell and Lynn Hunt, eds., Beyond the Cultural Turn: New Directions in the Study of Society and Culture (Berkeley, Calif., 1999); Dominick LaCapra, “Tropisms of Intellectual History,” Rethinking History 8, no. 4 (2004): 499–529; Gabrielle Spiegel, “Introduction,” in Spiegel, ed., Practicing History: New Directions in Historical Writing after the Linguistic Turn, new ed. (New York, 2005), 1–31; Spiegel, “The Task of the Historian,” 2008 AHA Presidential Address, American Historical Review 114, no. 1 (February 2009): 1–15; Geoff Eley, A Crooked Line: From Cultural History to the History of Society (Ann Arbor, Mich., 2005); William H. Sewell, Jr., Logics of History: Social Theory and Social Transformation (Chicago, 2005); and Joan W. Scott, “History-Writing as Critique,” in Keith Jenkins, Sue Morgan, and Alun Munslow, eds., Manifestos for History (New York, 2007), 19–38.

⁵ See Eley, A Crooked Line; Sewell, Logics of History, 1–80; and Furet, “From Narrative History to Problem-Oriented History.” For the sake of this argument, I often lump together the linguistic and cultural turns, fully realizing that more space would be required to do justice to their many differences.

historical turns unfolded in different ways, at different rates, and with different implications across the human sciences.⁶

My own graduate education in the 1990s was shaped directly by innovative research that was associated with the linguistic turn in history, the historical turn in anthropology, the cultural turn in colonial studies, and the postcolonial turn in the humanities. Nevertheless, the talk of turns then circulating in the academy was confusing. This was partly a function of the time lag that attended the cross-disciplinary borrowing that fueled many of these turns.⁷ Precisely when many historians were turning to Clifford Geertz's symbolic anthropology in order to elucidate deep mental structures underlying supposedly coherent cultural systems, many anthropologists were developing a radical critique of their discipline's holistic concept of culture. And just as many anthropologists were discovering Marc Bloch's and Lucien Febvre's mentalités, Fernand Braudel's historical structures, Eric Hobsbawm's primitive rebels, and E. P. Thompson's working-class communities, many historians had already rejected structural history, reclaimed "the event," challenged the conception of agency underlying resistance theory, or criticized the voluntarism and determinism underwriting the tendency to essentialize idealized communities. Moreover, a sector of cultural anthropology embraced archival research just when many historians associated with the linguistic and cultural turns questioned the possibility and desirability of conventional historical reconstruction. If the cultural turn in history and the historical turn in anthropology roughly coincided, each implicitly raised critical questions about the other.

Such competing tendencies also existed among historians who turned away from social history. At a certain general level, those who identified with the "turns" became increasingly mindful about the non-transparent relationship between thought and being and began to reorient historical research away from facts and explanation to meaning and interpretation. But "linguistic turn" and "cultural turn" were terms of convenience that often conflated incompatible intellectual currents. Insights about the constitutive power of language or the ways that discourses mediate sub-

⁶ Richard Rorty, ed., The Linguistic Turn: Essays in Philosophical Method (Chicago, 1967); Richard Macksey and Eugenio Donato, eds., The Structuralist Controversy: The Languages of Criticism and the Sciences of Man (Baltimore, 1970); White, Metahistory; Dominick LaCapra and Steven L. Kaplan, eds., Modern European Intellectual History: Reappraisals and New Perspectives (Ithaca, N.Y., 1982); Eric Hobsbawm and Terence Ranger, eds., The Invention of Tradition (Cambridge, 1983); George E. Marcus and Michael M. J. Fischer, Anthropology as Cultural Critique: An Experimental Moment in the Human Sciences (Chicago, 1986); James Clifford and George E. Marcus, eds., Writing Culture: The Poetics and Politics of Ethnography (Berkeley, Calif., 1986); Paul Rabinow and William M. Sullivan, eds., Interpretive Social Science: A Second Look (Berkeley, Calif., 1988); Lynn Hunt, ed., The New Cultural History (Berkeley, Calif., 1989); Margaret R. Somers, Does Social Theory Need History? Reflections on Epistemological Encounters in the Social Sciences (Ann Arbor, Mich., 1989); Nicholas B. Dirks, ed., Colonialism and Culture (Ann Arbor, Mich., 1992); Nicholas B. Dirks, Geoff Eley, and Sherry B. Ortner, eds., Culture/Power/History: A Reader in Contemporary Social Theory (Princeton, N.J., 1994); Geoff Eley and Ronald Grigor Suny, eds., Becoming National: A Reader (New York, 1996); Terrence J. McDonald, ed., The Historic Turn in the Human Sciences (Ann Arbor, Mich., 1996); Frederick Cooper and Ann Laura Stoler, eds., Tensions of Empire: Colonial Cultures in a Bourgeois World (Berkeley, Calif., 1997); George Steinmetz, ed., State/Culture: State-Formation after the Cultural Turn (Ithaca, N.Y., 1999).

⁷ On the "contemporaneity of the non-contemporaneous," see Reinhart Koselleck, "History, Histories, and Formal Time Structures," in Koselleck, Futures Past: On the Semantics of Historical Time (New York, 2004), 93–104, here 95, 99; Koselleck, "Neuzeit: Remarks on the Semantics of Modern Concepts of Movement," ibid., 222–254, here 232, 239, 246; and Koselleck, "'Space of Experience' and 'Horizon of Expectation': Two Historical Categories," ibid., 255–275.

jectivity and shape social life led some historians to overturn the conventional notions of individuality, intentionality, agency, and causality upon which traditional historiography depended. But they led others to reaffirm these very concepts, often through histories of marginalized actors whose subjectivity was purportedly reconstructed and experience valorized.⁸

In sum, “linguistic turn” and “cultural turn” are ambiguous analytic categories that have often obscured and excluded much of what they sought to clarify or embrace. But the problem goes beyond semantics or the poor referential fit between the term “turn” and what it purported to describe or understand. What the talk of turns missed or meant is less important than what it did and does. The question we need to ask is whether the discourse and logic of “turns” helps or hinders us in the crucial task of writing critical history that is at once empirically grounded and theoretically self-reflexive.⁹

IF THE TROPE OF “TURNS” WAS often analytically incoherent, it was nevertheless historically intelligible. The diverse currents and interests assembled under their rubric were motivated by a shared desire to rethink the methods and assumptions of social history. Yet this set of potentially radical interventions seems to have left us a legacy of historiography that now often embraces uncritical aspects of narrative event history, empiricist social history, and depoliticized cultural history. Is there a relationship between this analytic regression and the very logic of the turns?

Recollections by our senior colleagues tend to invoke “the turn” as something they took or made in a coherent and decisive gesture that distinguished between unambiguous alternatives and that demarcated a before and an after.¹⁰ William Sewell, with disarming honesty, confesses that “making the cultural turn was . . . an exciting but also profoundly troubling step for an adept of the new social history . . . taking this step amounted to a sort of conversion experience—a sudden and exhilarating reshaping of one’s intellectual and moral world.”¹¹ These quasi-mythic nar-

⁸ See, for example, the debates about discourse, experience, subjectivity, and agency in LaCapra and Kaplan, Modern European Intellectual History; John E. Toews, “Intellectual History after the Linguistic Turn: The Autonomy of Meaning and the Irreducibility of Experience,” American Historical Review 92, no. 4 (October 1987): 879–907; Joan Wallach Scott, Gender and the Politics of History (New York, 1988); Gabrielle M. Spiegel, “History, Historicism, and the Social Logic of the Text in the Middle Ages,” Speculum 65, no. 1 (January 1990): 59–86; Joan W. Scott, “The Evidence of Experience,” Critical Inquiry 17, no. 4 (Summer 1991): 773–797; Laura Lee Downs, “If ‘Woman’ Is Just an Empty Category, Then Why Am I Afraid to Walk Alone at Night? Identity Politics Meets the Postmodern Subject,” Comparative Studies in Society and History 35, no. 2 (April 1993): 414–437; Joan W. Scott, “The Tip of the Volcano,” ibid., 438–443; the dialogue among Sonya O. Rose, Kathleen Canning, Anna Clark, Mariana Valverde, and Marcia R. Sawyer published as Rose, “Gender History/Women’s History: Is Feminist Scholarship Losing Its Critical Edge?,” Journal of Women’s History 5, no. 1 (Spring 1993): 89–128, here 115–120; Kathleen Canning, “Feminist History after the Linguistic Turn: Historicizing Discourse and Experience,” Signs 19, no. 2 (Winter 1994): 368–404; Geoff Eley, “Is All the World a Text? From Social History to the History of Society Two Decades Later,” in McDonald, The Historic Turn in the Human Sciences, 193–243.

⁹ Throughout this essay, I use “self-reflexive” to refer to arguments that attempt to account for their own conditions of epistemological possibility; it does not refer to writing that is autobiographical or self-referential.

¹⁰ See the contribution to this forum by Judith Surkis.

¹¹ William H. Sewell, Jr., “The Political Unconscious of Social and Cultural History; or, Confessions of a Former Quantitative Historian,” in Sewell, Logics of History, 22–80, here 42.

ratives implicitly invoke a process of collective effervescence. For Émile Durkheim, we might recall, such heightened ritual states signal ruptures with the everyday, when profane practices turn into sacred experience and create openings for revolutionary systemic change. Conversely, in Durkheim's account, this effervescent sociality simultaneously functions to reaffirm group solidarity and demarcate boundaries—precisely by obscuring rather than illuminating the underlying social forces that constitute these heightened experiences.¹² We might say, then, that however contentious they might have seemed, these effervescent turns ultimately functioned to integrate diverse historians within a more coherent professional community.

Because the talk of turns objectified “social history” as a singular package, the turn away from it was often wholesale. The positions associated with one generation of historians at a particular time and place thus came to stand for social history as such. Critics tended to equate social history, social science, social theory, and Marxism. They often conflated positivism, social determinism, vulgar materialism, and structural explanation.¹³ Because any of these terms were seen to imply all the others, to challenge one often meant rejecting the whole package. This led many proponents of the linguistic and cultural turns who opposed the positivism of social history to turn away from supposedly outmoded social scientific frameworks that focused on social logics, enduring forms, and deep structures. Historians who accepted the critique of foundationalist metanarratives, realist epistemology, and empiricist methodology were often also led to discount the study of long-term and large-scale historical processes. In the name of contingency, particularity, and difference, structural analysis and societal explanation were increasingly discouraged.¹⁴

An understandable fear of reductionism led many anti-positivist historians then aligned with the turns to accept a reductive understanding of Marxism as a vulgar form of economic determinism and teleological historicism.¹⁵ Whether sympathetic to or critical of the turns, historians during this period often came to associate critical theory exclusively with poststructuralism.¹⁶ This despite the fact that dialectical

¹² Émile Durkheim, The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life (New York, 1965), 236–255.

¹³ See Patrick Joyce and Catriona Kelly, “History and Post-Modernism,” Past and Present, no. 133 (November 1991): 204–213; Bonnie Smith, The Gender of History: Men, Women, and Historical Practice (Cambridge, Mass., 1998); and Smith, review of Sewell, Logics of History, H-France Review 7, no. 91 (August 2007): 372–374.

¹⁴ For example, Lynn Hunt, “Introduction: History, Culture, and Text,” in Hunt, The New Cultural History, 1–22; and Joyce and Kelly, “History and Post-Modernism.” On the inability of cultural history to address adequately issues of material and spatial inequality, see Barbara Weinstein, “Developing Inequality,” 2007 AHA Presidential Address, American Historical Review 113, no. 1 (February 2008): 1–18. This difficulty is exemplified in the AHR Roundtable that was inspired by that essay, “Historians and the Question of ‘Modernity,’” American Historical Review 116, no. 3 (June 2011): 631–751.

¹⁵ See François Furet, Interpreting the French Revolution (Cambridge, 1978); Lynn Hunt, Politics, Culture, and Class in the French Revolution (Berkeley, Calif., 1984); Keith Michael Baker, Inventing the French Revolution: Essays on French Political Culture in the Eighteenth Century (Cambridge, 1990). For examples of historical studies that engage productively with Marxism on questions of culture and consciousness, see William H. Sewell, Jr., Work and Revolution in France: The Language of Labor from the Old Regime to 1848 (Cambridge, 1980); Jacques Rancière, The Nights of Labor: The Workers’ Dream in Nineteenth-Century France (Philadelphia, 1991); and Patrick Joyce, Visions of the People: Industrial England and the Question of Class, 1848–1914 (Cambridge, 1991).

¹⁶ The reduction of “theory” to poststructuralism and the bracketing of both social theory and Marxism are exemplified by the otherwise important journal History and Theory. See the essays collected in Brian Fay, Philip Pomper, and Richard T. Vann, eds., History and Theory: Contemporary Readings (Oxford, 1998).

Marxism challenged any attempt to think contingency and systematicity apart from one another; it provided a framework for analyzing historically specific structures, forms, and logics that at the same time attended to contradictions, crises, and processes of transformation. From the Marxian perspective, the dominant schema of turns seemed to offer a false choice between either doing work that was anti-positivist and self-reflexive or doing work that was concerned with the deep structures and logics that characterize distinct social formations.¹⁷

Since the late 1990s, the discourse of decisive turns has been joined by what we might call an “after-turn” discourse. Both sets of stories figure the linguistic turn as punctual, past, and complete, as if the kinds of epistemological debates about producing history that were provoked by the turns could actually be resolved.¹⁸ Since theory as such was often reduced to “poststructuralist linguistic turn,” the purported end of the linguistic turn also signaled to many that the need for theoretical debates among historians was obsolete. Historians, we were told, could now return to their proper historical task of reconstructing, narrating, and interpreting the past.¹⁹ They could integrate the useful or unavoidable cultural and linguistic innovations or insights into a more nuanced and technically accomplished history that would be able to represent more fully the multiple dimensions of social life and historical experience.²⁰ Especially troubling has been a tendency among some former “turners” and their sympathizers to concur in consigning these turns to the past in order to invoke a new methodological synthesis. One effect of this after-turn discourse has been to reorient debate away from epistemological disputes about the production of historical knowledge in general, and toward particular empirical disagreements about topics among specialists.²¹

Somewhere between the making and the ending of turns, a disciplinary consensus emerged as certain elements of recent innovations were selectively domesticated and others forgotten. It is remarkable that even as professional history has turned away from many of the insights of these turns, there are few historians who would reject

¹⁷ For important non-economistic readings of Marx, see Shlomo Avineri, The Social and Political Thought of Karl Marx (Cambridge, 1968); Bertell Ollman, Alienation: Marx's Conception of Man in Capitalist Society (Cambridge, 1971); David Harvey, The Limits to Capital, new and updated ed. (New York, 2007); Derek Sayer, The Violence of Abstraction: The Analytic Foundations of Historical Materialism (London, 1987); Moishe Postone, Time, Labor, and Social Domination: A Reinterpretation of Marx's Critical Theory (Cambridge, 1993); and Etienne Balibar, The Philosophy of Marx (New York, 1995).

¹⁸ See Surkis, this forum.

¹⁹ Joyce Appleby, Lynn Hunt, and Margaret Jacob, Telling the Truth about History (New York, 1994).

²⁰ See Joyce Appleby, “The Power of History,” American Historical Review 103, no. 1 (February 1998): 1–14; Victoria E. Bonnell and Lynn Hunt, “Introduction,” in Bonnell and Hunt, Beyond the Cultural Turn, 1–32, here 9–10, 25; Lynn Hunt, “Where Have All the Theories Gone?,” Perspectives on History, March 2002, 5; Spiegel, “The Task of the Historian”; Michael Roth, “Ebb Tide,” History and Theory 46, no. 1 (February 2007): 66–73; Spiegel, “Introduction”; William H. Sewell, Jr., “The Concept(s) of Culture,” in Sewell, Logics of History, 152–174; and Eley, A Crooked Line, 200–201.

²¹ This is evident in a recent online forum in which Laura Lee Downs, Herrick Chapman, Olivier Wieviorka, and Richard Kuisel comment on Philip Nord, France's New Deal: From the Thirties to the Postwar Era (Princeton, N.J., 2010), H-France Forum 6, no. 1 (Winter 2011). The participants debate how it was that the former Vichy officials could have played such an important role in the creation of the postwar welfare society, but none of them discuss in structural terms either Fordist capitalism or statist planning as transnational phenomena that cannot be grasped in terms of the political interests or ideological dispositions of French bureaucrats in the 1930s and 1940s. A framework that focuses on phases of capitalism and forms of state would immediately recognize underlying links among the statist and welfarist projects advocated by interwar social democrats, wartime proponents of the National Revolution, and postwar technocrats.

the turns outright. On the contrary, the mainstream of the discipline claims to endorse certain aspects of the linguistic and cultural turns (usually in the form of methodological techniques or research topics). A critique of historical realism has thus been recuperated for a neo-realist project of historical reconstruction that now promises to do a better job of getting things right by attending to multiple dimensions of social experience at the same time. The aim of traditional history, which Dominick LaCapra has incisively referred to as “the translation of archives into narratives,” resumes its privileged position.²² Joan Scott describes how historians’ “resistance [to theory] takes the form of superficial acceptance of the vocabulary of theory in the service of its domestication.”²³ She recounts that “even gender” quickly became “a handy label whose application reassured rather than disturbed us, turning questions into answers before they had even been asked.”²⁴ In precisely this way, historians employed the historiographic turns to expand the types of evidence and objects that could now be collected and interpreted without feeling compelled to question their frames and forms of historical analysis.

In general, history after the turns has paid more attention to the discursive dimensions of social life and to the power relations encoded in and enabled by them. But the shibboleth of determinism, which cultural historians had previously leveled against the old social history, was then turned against the newer semiotic sensibility; this allowed historiography to drift back to its perennial interest in rational actors, individual intentions, immediate causality, short time spans, and small-scale units of analysis. A populist impulse, retained from social history, often sanctifies ordinary people and everyday experience. Referential readings of texts are again valorized, and contextualization is treated as a technical rather than an epistemological problem.²⁵

Through a process that LaCapra has called “methodological scapegoating,” historical arguments that are not based on concretely observable evidence and that do not seek to answer questions in an empirical, reconstructive, or narrative manner are typically regarded as speculative, undisciplined, and outside the domain of recognizable and acceptable historiography.²⁶ If the assumption is that historians by definition analyze archival documents, then historians must be able to answer their questions with archival evidence. Such an equation often implies a certain understanding of actors, agency, and causality. Conversely, it means that questions that ²² Dominick LaCapra, History and Its Limits: Human, Animal, Violence (Ithaca, N.Y., 2009), 36.

²³ Scott, “History-Writing as Critique,” 22.

²⁴ Ibid., 21.

²⁵ See, for example, Barbara D. Metcalf, “Islam and Power in Colonial India: The Making and Unmaking of ■ Muslim Princess,” 2010 AHA Presidential Address, American Historical Review 116, no. 1 (February 2011): 1–30; and Laurel Thatcher Ulrich, “An American Album, 1857,” 2009 AHA Presidential Address, American Historical Review 115, no. 1 (February 2010): 1–30; as well as “AHR Roundtable: Historians and Biography,” American Historical Review 114, no. 3 (June 2009): 573–661.

²⁶ Dominick LaCapra, “Is Everyone a Mentalité Case? Transference and the ‘Culture’ Concept,” in LaCapra, History and Criticism (Ithaca, N.Y., 1985), 71–94, here 73. A classic example of such scapegoating is Richard Kuisel’s AHR review of Kristin Ross, Fast Cars, Clean Bodies: Decolonization and the Reordering of French Culture (Cambridge, Mass., 1995), which has been enormously influential for French historians concerned with the postwar period. Because Ross uses novels and film scripts as evidence for her argument, Kuisel declares that “historians can skip this book.” American Historical Review 101, no. 3 (June 1996): 859–860.

cannot be answered archivally are not worth asking, or that historians who operate in different registers are not doing legitimate history.

Once again, “theory” is objectified and relegated to introductions and so-called “think pieces” or segregated as a specialized object of study by intellectual historians. Historians are not expected to ask questions about the conditions of possibility of the historical knowledge that they are producing—about the genealogy of their categories and their embeddedness in the social worlds they purport to explain, about their own implication in their objects of study, and the relation between those pasts and the historian’s present.²⁷ Although historians often criticize theory for being overly abstract, they tend to abstract theory from its worldly entailments, as if it stands apart from history as something that can be used or applied.²⁸ As a result, scholars are often rewarded for presenting expert performances of archival methods in the service of foregone conclusions (for example, actual historical phenomena are more complex than theoretical abstractions often make them out to be; contingent events play important roles in historical processes; historical change is the effect of many determinants and not a single cause; ideology is never wholly convincing to everybody; state power is not absolute; plans are not fully implemented; discourses and practices do not always align; actions often have unintended consequences; actors do not always know what they are doing; historical phenomena and processes are often contradictory). Descriptive empiricism thereby masquerades as theoretical insight.

Ironically, another legacy of the turns is that empiricist historians (ever ready to denounce abstraction as ahistorical) and historians influenced by poststructuralism (ever ready to denounce systemic accounts as scientific explanation) share an allergy to structural explanation.²⁹ The former invoke historical complexity, and the latter

²⁷ Recent examples of histories that seek to relate past to present in a critical manner include Harry Harootunian, History’s Disquiet: Modernity, Cultural Practice, and the Question of Everyday Life (New York, 2000); Dipesh Chakrabarty, Provincializing Europe: Postcolonial Thought and Historical Difference (Princeton, N.J., 2000); Walter Johnson, “Time and Revolution in African America: Temporality and the History of Atlantic Slavery,” in Thomas Bender, ed., Rethinking American History in a Global Age (Berkeley, Calif., 2002), 148–167; Ross, May ’68 and Its Afterlives; Carolyn J. Dean, The Fragility of Empathy after the Holocaust (Ithaca, N.Y., 2004); Herman Lebovics, Bringing the Empire Back Home: France in the Global Age (Durham, N.C., 2004); Joan Wallach Scott, Parité! Sexual Equality and the Crisis of French Universalism (Chicago, 2005); Rashid Khalidi, Resurrecting Empire: Western Footprints and America’s Perilous Path in the Middle East (Boston, 2005); Greg Grandin, Empire’s Workshop: Latin America, the United States, and the Rise of the New Imperialism (New York, 2006); Joan Wallach Scott, The Politics of the Veil (Princeton, N.J., 2007); Mark Mazower, No Enchanted Palace: The End of Empire and the Ideological Origins of the United Nations (Princeton, N.J., 2009); Laurent Dubois, Soccer Empire: The World Cup and the Future of France (Berkeley, Calif., 2010); Samuel Moyn, The Last Utopia: Human Rights in History (Cambridge, 2010).

²⁸ Consider the “theory for historians” genre of writing, such as Jeffrey Weeks, “Foucault for Historians,” History Workshop Journal 14, no. 1 (1982): 106–119; Peter Gay, Freud for Historians (New York, 1985); Vanessa R. Schwartz, “Walter Benjamin for Historians,” American Historical Review 106, no. 5 (December 2001): 1721–1743; Callum G. Brown, Postmodernism for Historians (Harlow, 2005).

²⁹ See the critique of explanation and defense of description in the name of anti-positivist theory in Allan Megill, “Recounting the Past: ‘Description,’ Explanation, and Narrative in Historiography,” American Historical Review 94, no. 3 (June 1989): 627–653. Some notable exceptions that attempt to relate history’s concern with contingent events to critical social theory’s concern with deep structures include Thomas C. Holt, The Problem of Freedom: Race, Labor, and Politics in Jamaica and Britain, 1832–1938 (Baltimore, 1992); Fernando Coronil, The Magical State: Nature, Money, and Modernity in Venezuela (Chicago, 1997); Harry Harootunian, Overcome by Modernity: History, Culture, and Community in Interwar Japan (Princeton, N.J., 2001); Neil Smith, American Empire: Roosevelt’s Geographer and the Prelude to Globalization (Berkeley, Calif., 2004); Manu Goswami, Producing India: From Colonial Economy respect for difference; both can ignore social theory, discount Marxism, and revert to a new nominalism that similarly emphasizes description over explanation.³⁰ However unintentionally, the after-turn discourse creates the impression, which threatens to become a self-fulfilling prophecy, that we inhabit a post-ideological world of academic consensus.³¹ Such an orientation promotes the idea that the analytic dilemmas, theoretical debates, and institutional conflicts associated with the turns have been resolved. Underlying such claims about synthesis is the assumption that the purpose of theory is essentially technical: a means for refining research methods in order to reconstruct the past more accurately.

In sum, antipathy to theory, an allergy to intellectual discord, and a will to professional reconciliation often reinforce one another. It is not surprising that the proliferation of historiographic “turns” has corresponded to a decline in debates within history about fundamental epistemological questions. This is partly because once optics are reduced to topics, new turns can multiply without cost or stakes. These successive turns often enact on a smaller scale the drama of opening and foreclosure that occurred with the linguistic and cultural turns more generally.

Consider the trajectories of recent turns toward new international, transnational, and imperial histories. Cold War diplomatic historians have ambitiously reconstituted their field by internationalizing their inquiries. Work that had previously focused on bilateral relations among foreign ministers began to consider a wider range of agents on a broader political terrain that included non-state actors and international organizations. But by typically explaining macrohistorical shifts through policy decisions by individuals and organizations, this new international history has retained conventional methodological assumptions about evidence, agency, and causality.³² Other historians have rightly recognized the importance of producing what Christopher Bayly has called a “transnational history of ideas.”³³ But this urgent to National Space (Chicago, 2004); Sewell, Logics of History; George Steinmetz, The Devil's Handwriting: Precoloniality and the German Colonial State in Qingdao, Samoa, and Southwest Africa (Chicago, 2007); Andrew Sartori, Bengal in Global Concept History: Culturalism in the Age of Capital (Chicago, 2008).

³⁰ For an implicit affirmation of nominalism under the rubric of historical specificity, contingency, and complexity, see Frederick Cooper, Colonialism in Question: Theory, Knowledge, History (Berkeley, Calif., 2005). For a theoretically rigorous history that celebrates particularity and incommensurability, see Chakrabarty's theoretically rigorous Provincializing Europe.

³¹ Cf. the recuperation of French radical politics discussed in Ross, May '68 and Its Afterlives; as well as Daniel Bell, The End of Ideology: On the Exhaustion of Political Ideas in the Fifties (Glencoe, Ill., 1960); Francis Fukuyama, The End of History and the Last Man (New York, 1992); and, from a different perspective, Samir Amin, The Liberal Virus: Permanent War and the Americanization of the World, trans. James H. Membrez (New York, 2005).

³² Matthew James Connelly, A Diplomatic Revolution: Algeria's Fight for Independence and the Origins of the Post-Cold War Era (Oxford, 2002); Mark Atwood Lawrence, Assuming the Burden: Europe and the American Commitment to War in Vietnam (Berkeley, Calif., 2005); Odd Arne Westad, The Global Cold War: Third World Interventions and the Making of Our Times (Cambridge, 2005); Jeremi Suri, Power and Protest: Global Revolution and the Rise of Detente (Cambridge, Mass., 2005).

³³ “AHR Conversation: On Transnational History,” American Historical Review 111, no. 5 (December 2006): 1441–1464, here 1452. For examples of transnational intellectual history, see C. A. Bayly, The Birth of the Modern World, 1780–1914: Global Connections and Comparisons (Malden, Mass., 2004); Benedict Anderson, Under Three Flags: Anarchism and the Anti-Colonial Imagination (London, 2005); Laurent Dubois, “An Enslaved Enlightenment: Rethinking the Intellectual History of the French Atlantic,” Social History 31, no. 1 (February 2006): 1–14; Cemil Aydin, The Politics of Anti-Westernism in Asia: Visions of World Order in Pan-Islamic and Pan-Asian Thought (New York, 2007); Sartori, Bengal in Global Concept History; Christopher L. Hill, National History and the World of Nations: Capital, State, and the Rhetoric interest in reframing the networks and fields through which modern ideas have been produced, a move that could de-center Europe as the presumptive source of modern ideas, has also cleared the way for historians to reproduce, in this new transnational idiom, stories about a unidirectional flow of concepts from the West to the rest of the world.³⁴

A new transnational sensibility has led many place-based historians to resituate traditional objects of national historiography in global political-economic or geopolitical frameworks.³⁵ By analyzing what had been national topics through transnational optics, such work reminds us that an attempt to move beyond the limitations of national history paradigms has less to do with what one studies or where than with how one frames and treats an object of study. But the call for transnational history has also led historians to study international organizations, an important area of research, to be sure, but with existing methods that effectively confirm national historical frameworks.³⁶ Or, as Durba Ghosh argues in her contribution to this forum, paradigm-shifting work in black Atlantic and British imperial history has allowed a more traditional British history to reaffirm its global importance just as it was being of History in Japan, France, and the United States (Durham, N.C., 2008); C. A. Bayly and Eugenio F. Biagini, eds., Giuseppe Mazzini and the Globalisation of Democratic Nationalism, 1830–1920 (Oxford, 2008); Federico Finchelstein, Transatlantic Fascism: Ideology, Violence, and the Sacred in Argentina and Italy, 1919–1945 (Durham, N.C., 2009); Yoav Di-Capua, Gatekeepers of the Arab Past: Historians and History Writing in Twentieth-Century Egypt (Berkeley, Calif., 2009).

³⁴ For example, David Armitage, The Declaration of Independence: A Global History (Cambridge, Mass., 2008); Elizabeth Borgwardt, A New Deal for the World: America's Vision for Human Rights (Cambridge, Mass., 2005); Erez Manela, The Wilsonian Moment: Self-Determination and the International Origins of Anticolonial Nationalism (Oxford, 2007).

³⁵ See, for example, Bender, Rethinking American History in a Global Age; Sven Beckert, "From Tuskegee to Togo: The Problem of Freedom in the Empire of Cotton," Journal of American History 92, no. 2 (September 2005): 498–526; Beckert, "Emancipation and Empire: Reconstructing the Worldwide Web of Cotton Production in the Age of the American Civil War," American Historical Review 109, no. 5 (December 2004): 1405–1438; Walter Johnson, ed., The Chattel Principle: Internal Slave Trades in the Americas (New Haven, Conn., 2004). The AHR has supported this interest in transnational history by publishing and sponsoring fora such as "Transnational Sexualities," American Historical Review 114, no. 5 (December 2009); "The International 1968, Part II," American Historical Review 114, no. 2 (April 2009); "The International 1968, Part I," American Historical Review 114, no. 1 (February 2009); "Entangled Empires in the Atlantic World," American Historical Review 112, no. 3 (June 2007); "On Transnational History," American Historical Review 111, no. 5 (December 2006); and "Oceans of History," American Historical Review 111, no. 3 (June 2006). Writing this essay introduced me to innovative work published recently in the AHR, including Benjamin Lazier, "Earthrise; or, The Globalization of the World Picture," American Historical Review 116, no. 3 (June 2011): 602–630; Cyrus Schayegh, "The Many Worlds of 'Abud Yasin; or, What Narcotics Trafficking in the Interwar Middle East Can Tell Us about Territorialization," American Historical Review 116, no. 2 (April 2011): 273–306; Sarah Abrevaya Stein, "Protected Persons? The Baghdadi Jewish Diaspora, the British State, and the Persistence of Empire," American Historical Review 116, no. 1 (February 2011): 80–108; Sunil S. Amrith, "Tamil Diasporas across the Bay of Bengal," American Historical Review 114, no. 3 (June 2009): 547–572; Alison Frank, "The Petroleum War of 1910: Standard Oil, Austria, and the Limits of the Multinational Corporation," American Historical Review 114, no. 1 (February 2009): 16–41; Francine Hirsch, "The Soviets at Nuremberg: International Law, Propaganda, and the Making of the Postwar Order," American Historical Review 113, no. 3 (June 2008): 701–730.

³⁶ For example, the renewed interest in the League of Nations. Keith David Watenpaugh, "The League of Nations' Rescue of Armenian Genocide Survivors and the Making of Modern Humanitarianism, 1920–1927," American Historical Review 115, no. 5 (December 2010): 1315–1339; Susan Pedersen, "Getting Out of Iraq—in 1932: The League of Nations and the Road to Normative Statehood," American Historical Review 115, no. 4 (October 2010): 975–1000; Pedersen, "Back to the League of Nations," American Historical Review 112, no. 4 (October 2007): 1091–1117.

eclipsed by histories of colonial societies.³⁷ On another front, scholars have traced non-national networks of circulation and sociability through histories of empires, regions, or oceans. Part of their value is to challenge nationalist assumptions about the normal units through which to understand modern history.³⁸ But this critical impulse is undermined if one a priori form (the national state) is replaced by another (empire) as the presumptive historiographic unit.³⁹

THE PROCESS OF DOMESTICATION and recuperation of historical turns has been especially pronounced in French history, which played such an important role in wider theoretical debates across the human sciences during the period of the turns, and particularly in French colonial history, which has enjoyed a recent surge in overdue interest. But if the imperial optic has created an opportunity to unsettle received interpretations of or approaches to French history, the turn to colonial topics, which are often treated in accordance with existing methods, frameworks, units, and periods, has also worked to reaffirm the territorial national history in relation to which these protocols were developed.⁴⁰

The language of analytic synthesis and professional reconciliation was employed in a special issue of French Historical Studies in 2009 commemorating the twentieth ³⁷ For Atlantic and imperial histories that challenge the priority of national units and invite us to rethink "Britain" from an imperial perspective, see Frederick Cooper, Decolonization and African Society: The Labor Question in French and British Africa (Cambridge, 1996); C. A. Bayly, Imperial Meridian: The British Empire and the World, 1780–1830 (Edinburgh, 1997); Antoinette Burton, "Who Needs the Nation? Interrogating 'British' History," Journal of Historical Sociology 10, no. 3 (September 1997): 227–248; Catherine Hall, Civilising Subjects: Colony and Metropole in the English Imagination, 1830–1867 (Chicago, 2002); Kathleen Wilson, ed., A New Imperial History: Culture, Identity, and Modernity in Britain and the Empire, 1660–1840 (Cambridge, 2006); Catherine Hall and Sonya Rose, eds., At Home with the Empire: Metropolitan Culture and the Imperial World (Cambridge, 2006); Durba Ghosh, Sex and the Family in Colonial India: The Making of Empire (Cambridge, 2006); Mrinalini Sinha, Specters of Mother India: The Global Restructuring of an Empire (Durham, N.C., 2006); Antoinette Burton, "Not Even Remotely Global? Method and Scale in World History," History Workshop Journal 64, no. 1 (2007): 323–328; Burton, Empire in Question: Reading, Writing, and Teaching British Imperialism (Durham, N.C., 2011). For work that employs empire to re-center Britain as an object and British history as a field, see Linda Colley, The Ordeal of Elizabeth Marsh: A Woman in World History (New York, 2007); Bernard Porter, The Absent-Minded Imperialists: Empire, Society, and Culture in Britain (New York, 2006); Maya Jasanoff, Edge of Empire: Lives, Culture, and Conquest in the East, 1750–1850 (New York, 2006); Linda Colley, Britons: Forging the Nation, 1707–1837, 2nd ed. (New Haven, Conn., 2005); Colley, Captives: Britain, Empire and the World, 1600–1850 (New York, 2004); David Cannadine, Ornamentalism: How the British Saw Their Empire (New York, 2002).

³⁸ For example, Kenneth Pomeranz, The Great Divergence: China, Europe, and the Making of the Modern World Economy (Princeton, N.J., 2001); Bayly, The Birth of the Modern World; Sugata Bose, A Hundred Horizons: The Indian Ocean in the Age of Global Empire (Cambridge, Mass., 2006); Engseng Ho, The Graves of Tarim: Genealogy and Mobility across the Indian Ocean (Berkeley, Calif., 2006); Thomas R. Metcalf, Imperial Connections: India in the Indian Ocean Arena, 1860–1920 (Berkeley, Calif., 2008).

³⁹ See, for example, Jane Burbank and Frederick Cooper, Empires in World History: Power and the Politics of Difference (Princeton, N.J., 2010); Niall Ferguson, Empire: The Rise and Demise of the British World Order and the Lessons for Global Power (New York, 2004).

⁴⁰ For an earlier and fuller treatment of some of these themes, see Gary Wilder, "'Impenser' l'histoire de France: Les études coloniales hors de la perspective de l'identité nationale," Cahiers d'histoire: Revue d'histoire critique 96–97 (October–December 2005): 91–119, which is an expanded translation of Wilder, "Unthinking French History: Colonial Studies beyond National Identity," in Antoinette Burton, ed., After the Imperial Turn: Thinking with and through the Nation (Durham, N.C., 2003), 125–143.

anniversary of the bicentennial of the French Revolution.⁴¹ The editor's introduction affirms historiographic "eclecticism, pluralism, and . . . pragmatism" against interpretations based on "singular structural imperatives." The implication is that all structural arguments are necessarily singular and "monolithic."⁴² This implicit criticism of the mechanical materialism that once dominated Revolutionary scholarship is made explicit by Lynn Hunt in her contribution to the issue.⁴³ Against what she calls "Marxist" and "semiotic" interpretations of the Revolution, she calls for the study of "individual experience based on perspectives derived from recent research in neuroscience."⁴⁴ Beyond presenting liberal commonsense (about primordial conflict existing in the absence of constitutional states) as self-evident truth, Hunt thereby seeks to reestablish history as a study of biological selves possessing an empathic human nature and to reestablish immediate individual experience as the subject of history.⁴⁵ Despite her celebration of microhistorical analysis, she also cites the scholarship of Laurent Dubois and invokes "new research on . . . colonies" that allows us to reexamine "the French Revolution in a global context" as a supranational event.⁴⁶ But it is not at all clear how she would reconcile Dubois's concerns with global history, macroanalysis, the Atlantic world, and France as empire with the traditional method and framework that she advocates.⁴⁷

A piece by Dubois appears in that same special issue. With one simple opening sentence, he calls into question the assumptions, units, and frameworks upon which the whole field of French Revolutionary history depends: "The French Revolution was an Atlantic Revolution."⁴⁸ In his brief contribution, Dubois suggests some of the implications of this move to resituate and reconfigure the event that has served as the single most important source of collective identification and professional self-affirmation for historians of France. He argues that the "tendrils" of the revolution in Saint-Domingue "transformed life and thought, not to mention animated juridical struggles and cultural transformations" across the "circum-Caribbean," reaching from northern South America to the eastern United States.⁴⁹ And he writes: "the mass insurrection of the enslaved in Saint-Domingue transformed warfare, politics, ⁴¹ '89 Then and Now, Special Issue, French Historical Studies 32, no. 4 (Fall 2009). Rebecca Spang observes that the very idea of an issue on an anniversary of the anniversary is an example of French history's obsessive need to commemorate and mythologize the Revolution and its ideological need to pronounce the death of Marxism again and again. Spang, "Self, Field, Myth: What We Will Have Been," H-France Salon 1, issue 1, no. 3 (2009): 24–32.

⁴² J. B. Shank, "Is It Really Over? The French Revolution Twenty Years after the Bicentennial," French Historical Studies 32, no. 4 (Fall 2009): 527–530, here 529.

⁴³ Lynn Hunt, "The Experience of Revolution," French Historical Studies 32, no. 4 (Fall 2009): 671–678, here 671–673.

⁴⁴ Ibid., 672.

⁴⁵ Ibid., 673.

⁴⁶ Ibid., 671–672.

⁴⁷ Hunt also uses Dubois's attempt to overturn conventional French historiography for her own project to re-center French history in Lynn Hunt, Inventing Human Rights: A History (New York, 2008), 160–167. See the critique of this book by Samuel Moyn, "On the Genealogy of Morals," The Nation, April 16, 2007.

⁴⁸ Laurent Dubois, "An Atlantic Revolution," French Historical Studies 32, no. 4 (Fall 2009): 655–661, here 655. My point is not that Dubois inaugurated the field of Atlantic history, which had already been well developed by innovative historians of the early modern Anglo-American world, but that his Atlanticist approach to the French Revolution presented a profound challenge to conventional French historiography.

⁴⁹ Ibid., 658, 659.

and philosophical possibility when it led to emancipation in the colony in 1793.”⁵⁰ This is not simply a claim that studies of the French Revolution should also take account of events in Saint-Domingue. Nor is it even a statement about how these revolutions influenced one another. Rather, Dubois is refiguring and thus displacing the very distinction between them so that each “revolution” can be understood as a moment in a much broader, deeper, and integrated process of macrohistorical transformation. He argues that because “the Atlantic economy and the transformation of social and economic life that it propelled in some ways actually drove the Revolution,” everyday social and economic life in cities such as Orléans, Bordeaux, Nantes, and La Rochelle, as well as the intellectual history and political perspectives (thought circulating among salons, shops, and ports) of the Revolutionary period, can be adequately understood only through an Atlantic framework that attends directly to plantation slavery in the French Antilles. In short, he redefines the very meaning of “revolution,” “France,” and “Enlightenment” from the standpoints of empire, Atlantic political economy, and mass slave insurrection. He thereby identifies “an opportunity” to write a new kind of history that is “at once local and Atlantic, at once French and Caribbean.”⁵¹ From this perspective, it is not possible to agree with Dubois without fundamentally reconceptualizing French Revolutionary history, or even the history of France itself; his intervention requires a wholesale revision of research methods, topics, categories, contexts, and periods. Yet his contribution was included in this special issue of French Historical Studies alongside a group of essays that, as Rebecca Spang incisively observes, reaffirm the mythic founding event of a hexagonal national history.⁵²

Despite its potentially destabilizing intervention, Dubois’s work has been quickly embraced by the field of French history. We might wonder whether this is because of the analytic challenges that it poses to the national object or because it might help renew French Revolutionary studies by providing new terrain for an existing historiography. Historians can easily treat Dubois’s argument about the French Revolution as a global or Atlantic event as proof that the (continental) French Revolution did in fact inaugurate political modernity, internationalize human rights, and spread universal ideas around the world. Of course, such an interpretation misunderstands how his work demonstrates that the Revolution, politics, and ideas were not simply French. Or if they were, then “France” must mean something else altogether.

Consider the favorable review of Dubois’s work provided by the historian Jeremy Popkin, who clearly sympathizes with the call to reconsider the French Revolution in relation to the colonial Antilles. He does not seem to grasp Dubois’s argument that revolutionary republicanism and republican universalism must be dissociated from French metropolitan territory or ethnicity, that the former were forged on an ⁵⁰ Ibid., 659.

⁵¹ Ibid., 660.

⁵² Spang, “Self, Field, Myth.” Included in this issue is Philippe R. Girard’s carefully researched essay on Napoleon’s colonial policy toward Saint-Domingue after emancipation: “Napoléon Bonaparte and the Emancipation Issue in Saint-Domingue, 1799–1803,” French Historical Studies 32, no. 4 (Fall 2009): 587–618. However insightful, this “turn” to colonial history re-centers continental France as the subject of (even colonial) history and reaffirms conventional historical methodology: territorial national categories, narrative political history, methodological individualism, and archival fetishism.

imperial scale within an Atlantic system, that enslaved and colonized black actors actually elaborated their substance and significance, and that we can understand these processes only if we recognize republican France as an imperial formation rather than a national state. Instead, he mischaracterizes Dubois's central question as "did the French Revolution truly have a universalist message . . . or did the realization of freedom for those of African descent require separation from the metropole?"⁵³ Most tellingly, he writes: "One may also wonder whether the black soldiers who fought for the French in the 1790s did so out of a real sense of identification with a metropole most of them had never seen . . . one may wonder how fully committed the emancipated slaves in the Caribbean were to the notion of themselves as French citizens."⁵⁴ Dubois's central point, however, is not that these black revolutionaries were French-identified, but that they were real republicans enacting their rightful citizenship. When Popkin assumes that the pursuit of republican citizenship and political universalism requires an identification with metropolitan France, he reaffirms the idea that republican politics are isomorphic with French society or culture, which is the very equation that Dubois's work calls into question.

In Popkin's own illuminating study of the Haitian Revolution, a resistance to structural thinking leads him to discount an Atlantic approach to the eighteenth-century revolutions, to re-center France as their proper source, and to reaffirm narrative description based on archival evidence as the rightful task of the historian. He prefaces his book by explaining how George W. Bush's war in Iraq challenged his belief that "the great events of history were to be explained in terms of large impersonal forces . . . and that 'traditional' political history, with its emphasis on individuals, short time frames, and contingent events, was inevitably superficial." Proceeding from this belief that the existence of historical contingency is antithetical to macrostructural analysis and requires historians to focus on individual motives and immediate events, he decided to assume the role of a "pure" historian and write a "narrative political history." He thus undertook "the reconstruction of events" based on "certain assumptions about human psychology and on the dynamics of political conflict" in order to demonstrate that the abolition of slavery in 1793 was not "wholly explainable in terms of structural factors."⁵⁵ Once again we can see the assumption that structural analysis must imply mechanical determinism. A traditional narrative history of slave emancipation can certainly offer useful insights about contingent events, political motives, and individual psychology. But we should note here how empiricism is presented as theoretical insight: since structural factors cannot "wholly" account for abolition, we are instructed to turn away from the study of impersonal forces.⁵⁶ In this way, the real opening provided by an imperial optic is reduced to a conventional topic that can be treated in accordance with methods that discount the analytic framework that that optic offers.

⁵³ Jeremy D. Popkin, "Revolution in the Colonies and the French Republican Tradition," French Politics, Culture, and Society 25, no. 1 (Spring 2007): 95–107, here 97.

⁵⁴ Ibid., 105.

⁵⁵ Jeremy D. Popkin, You Are All Free: The Haitian Revolution and the Abolition of Slavery (Cambridge, 2010), x.

⁵⁶ We can also see how assumptions about politics and change in the present—if the start of a war is contingent, its real significance cannot be grasped structurally—inform assumptions about politics and change in the past, and vice versa.

Consider also the reception of Todd Shepard's The Invention of Decolonization, which many reviewers rightly praised as a carefully researched account of a crucial turning point in postwar French history whereby the loss of French Algeria defined the shape of the Fifth Republic.⁵⁷ But more fundamentally, it overturns the methodological nationalism that generally subtends French history by demonstrating how Algerian national liberation led France to "forget" and disavow its long imperial existence and reconstitute itself as a national state. This work takes as its starting point the actual existence of empire; French Algeria is treated as a juridico-politically integral part of the republic rather than as pure myth or ideology. The book thus invites us to reconsider in potentially far-reaching ways what we mean by the terms "French republic" and "republican France." It thereby challenges, however implicitly, deeply held assumptions among both liberal democrats with an enduring faith in republican universalism and anti-imperial proponents of revolutionary nationalism. It is remarkable that this study has been so broadly embraced without any corresponding debate. It certainly merits the attention of historians, but perhaps we need to wonder about the reasons for this uncritical acceptance. It seems likely that Shepard's work, which could easily be misread as using republican legality to call for a benevolent imperialism or to challenge the legitimacy of the Algerian national liberation struggle, will be as vulnerable to recuperation as Dubois's work has been.⁵⁸ In both cases, what should be an occasion for urgent contestation over fundamental categories has barely troubled the post-turn consensus.

The recent embrace of French imperial history has often been paired with a reluctance to treat empire as a category of analysis that would impel us to reconceptualize republican France in some fundamental way. Some historians who are understandably concerned that imperial history risks focusing too much on continental sources and actors have called for more local studies of colonial events and societies.⁵⁹ But they have often felt the need to do so by celebrating archive-based description, shying away from making bolder analytic claims, and treating France as a national state that possessed overseas colonies rather than as an integrated republican empire or imperial nation-state.⁶⁰ Others have undertaken ambitious studies of multiple sites across the French Empire. These have greatly increased our understanding of particular French initiatives by state and non-state actors over a ⁵⁷ Todd Shepard, The Invention of Decolonization: The Algerian War and the Remaking of France (Ithaca, N.Y., 2006).

⁵⁸ One review that does grasp the implications of this work is Joshua Cole's review of Shepard, The Invention of Decolonization, French Politics, Culture, and Society 26, no. 1 (Spring 2008): 137–139.

⁵⁹ Gregory Mann, "Locating Colonial Histories: Between France and West Africa," American Historical Review 110, no. 2 (April 2005): 409–434.

⁶⁰ Mann argues forcefully for colonial historians to focus on local archives and to be suspicious of empire as an analytic category; ibid. Yet his incisive work on colonial Africa challenges the assumptions of methodological nationalism in deep ways. Gregory Mann, Native Sons: West African Veterans and France in the Twentieth Century (Durham, N.C., 2006). Examples of insightful "local" colonial histories that, however, do not thematize their own motivating categories (e.g., violence, empire, France) include Julia A. Clancy-Smith, Rebel and Saint: Muslim Notables, Populist Protest, Colonial Encounters (Algeria and Tunisia, 1800–1904) (Berkeley, Calif., 1997); and Benjamin Claude Brower, A Desert Named Peace: The Violence of France's Empire in the Algerian Sahara, 1844–1902 (New York, 2009). Detailed "local" studies that illuminate rather than elide the question of empire include Cooper, Decolonization and African Society; Elizabeth Thompson, Colonial Citizens: Republican Rights, Paternal Privilege, and Gender in French Syria and Lebanon (New York, 2000); Laurent Dubois, A Colony of Citizens: Revolution and Slave Emancipation in the French Caribbean, 1787–1804 (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2004).

broader colonial field. But methodological nationalism—the assumption that the national state is the primary unit of historical analysis and the privileged explanatory matrix for historical phenomena—cannot be overcome through a process of addition or aggregation; starting with the empire as an analytic category is not the same as studying French national actors in the many places they happen to be.⁶¹ Alternatively, detailed studies of municipal policies toward colonial immigrants often clearly demonstrate the fundamentally imperial character of the French Third Republic. But works that treat these policies within a national history paradigm tend to understand administrative diversity, the existence of multiple legal types of French nationals, and bureaucratic governance as practical violations of republican universalism (how rights and laws are applied by individual bureaucrats) rather than as structural expressions of republican racism within an imperial political formation organized around multiple administrative regimes, legal pluralism, and bureaucratic governance.⁶²

Post-Revolutionary French history has been characterized by a contradiction between France as an actually existing imperial formation, on the one hand, and the territorial national categories that formed French self-understanding through the colonial period, on the other. Historians who continue to treat empire with those national categories risk reenacting that which requires historical explanation. Works that reconsider the category “France” from the standpoint of empire, including those by Dubois and Shepard, invite us to rethink a series of assumptions about the territorial national paradigm, such as the isomorphism among territory, people, and state; the symmetry between nationality and citizenship; the national state as a unitary juridical and administrative space; and the scale and composition of political terrains, public spheres, discursive communities, and intellectual fields.⁶³ Refiguring

⁶¹ On methodological nationalism, see Andreas Wimmer and Nina Glick Schiller, “Methodological Nationalism and Beyond: Nation-State Building, Migration and the Social Sciences,” Global Networks 2, no. 4 (October 2002): 301–334; and Goswami, Producing India. For national historical approaches to the French Empire, see Alice L. Conklin, A Mission to Civilize: The Republican Idea of Empire in France and West Africa, 1895–1930 (Stanford, Calif., 1997); Eric T. Jennings, Vichy in the Tropics: Pétain’s National Revolution in Madagascar, Guadeloupe, and Indochina, 1940–1944 (Stanford, Calif., 2004); J. P. Daughton, An Empire Divided: Religion, Republicanism, and the Making of French Colonialism, 1880–1914 (New York, 2006); Edward Berenson, Heroes of Empire: Five Charismatic Men and the Conquest of Africa (Berkeley, Calif., 2010).

⁶² Clifford D. Rosenberg, Policing Paris: The Origins of Modern Immigration Control between the Wars (Ithaca, N.Y., 2006); Mary Dewhurst Lewis, The Boundaries of the Republic: Migrant Rights and the Limits of Universalism in France, 1918–1940 (Stanford, Calif., 2007). For accounts of immigration that begin with race and empire, see Maxime Silverman, Deconstructing the Nation: Immigration, Racism, and Citizenship in Modern France (London, 1992); Tyler Stovall, “The Color Line behind the Lines: Racial Violence in France during the Great War,” American Historical Review 103, no. 3 (June 1998): 737–769; Stovall, “Love, Labor and Race: Colonial Men and White Women in France during the Great War,” in Tyler Stovall and Georges Van Den Abbeele, eds., French Civilization and Its Discontents: Nationalism, Colonialism, Race (Lanham, Md., 2003), 297–321; Stovall, “Race and the Making of the Nation: Blacks in Modern France,” in Michael A. Gomez, ed., Diasporic Africa: A Reader (New York, 2006), 200–218; Elisa Camiscioli, Reproducing the French Race: Immigration, Intimacy, and Embodiment in the Early Twentieth Century (Durham, N.C., 2009). I have proposed a way of thinking about this problem in Gary Wilder, “Thinking through Race, Confronting Republican Racism” (paper presented at the Racing the Republic Conference, Center on Institutions and Governance, University of California, Berkeley, September 7–8, 2007).

⁶³ Examples of work that treats empire as an analytic optic and starting point rather than an empirical place or topic include Alice Bullard, Exile to Paradise: Savagery and Civilization in Paris and the South Pacific, 1790–1900 (Stanford, Calif., 2000); Sue Peabody, There Are No Slaves in France: The Political Culture of Race and Slavery in the Ancien Régime (New York, 2002); Lebovics, Bringing the Empire Back

France as an imperial nation-state confounds conventional distinctions among national, transnational, and international phenomena.⁶⁴ And it overturns standard narratives about colonial vs. postcolonial periods by revealing that the challenge of cultural multiplicity for a democratic republic was an imperial problem that did not begin with decolonization and postwar immigration. The imperial republic was a cosmopolitan, if also heteronomous, space in which legal pluralism and disaggregated sovereignty were institutionalized in ways that can illuminate current debates over plural democracy in the French postcolony.⁶⁵

If research on the French Empire is to constitute a significant analytic “turn,” it needs to be focused less on the familiar fact that the republican nation-state exercised autocratic rule over colonized peoples than on how imperial history transformed the republican nation into a plural polity composed of multiple cultural formations, administrative regimes, and legal systems. It follows that the crucial question is not how France behaved overseas or how its subject populations experienced colonial rule, but how the fact of empire, including ways that colonial subjects reflected upon it, invites us to rethink, or to unthink, France itself as well as the global imperial order within which it has been embedded.⁶⁶ A genuine imperial turn among historians would not simply entail research on colonial topics but would mean turning the very category “France” inside out. But because a “turn” to French colonialism is long overdue and is agreed to be self-evidently important, the fact of turning supersedes the method of proceeding, and work on colonial topics is often uncritically endorsed.

This drift in French history to use empire to re-center a threatened national Home; Dubois, A Colony of Citizens; Dubois, Soccer Empire; Frederick Cooper, “States, Empires, and Political Imagination,” in Cooper, Colonialism in Question, 153–203; Cooper, “Labor, Politics, and the End of Empire in French Africa,” ibid., 204–230; Emmanuelle Saada, Les enfants de la colonie: Les métiers de l’Empire français entre sujétion et citoyenneté (Paris, 2007); Camiscioli, Reproducing the French Race; George R. Trumbull IV, An Empire of Facts: Colonial Power, Cultural Knowledge, and Islam in Algeria, 1871–1914 (Cambridge, 2009); Spencer D. Segalla, The Moroccan Soul: French Education, Colonial Ethnology, and Muslim Resistance, 1912–1956 (Lincoln, Neb., 2009); Jennifer Anne Boittin, Colonial Metropolis: The Urban Grounds of Anti-Imperialism and Feminism in Interwar Paris (Lincoln, Neb., 2010); and Miranda Frances Spieler, Empire and Underworld: Captivity in French Guiana (Cambridge, Mass., 2012).

⁶⁴ This is something I have tried to do in my own work as well; Gary Wilder, The French Imperial Nation-State: Negritude and Colonial Humanism between the Two World Wars (Chicago, 2005).

⁶⁵ I am developing arguments along these lines in my current book project, preliminarily titled Freedom Time: Negritude, Decolonization, Utopia. See also Wilder, “Eurafrrique as the Future Past of Black France: Sarkozy’s Temporal Confusion and Senghor’s Postwar Vision,” in Trica Danielle Keaton, T. Deneane Sharpley-Whiting, and Tyler Stovall, eds., Black France/France Noire: The History and Politics of Blackness (Durham, N.C., 2012), 57–87; Wilder, “Untimely Vision: Aimé Césaire, Decolonization, Utopia,” Public Culture 21, no. 1 (Winter 2009): 101–140; Wilder, “Response Essay,” H-France Forum 1, issue 3, no. 5 (Summer 2006), <http://www.h-france.net/forum/forumvol1/Wilder1%20Response.html>. Important work on contemporary France that questions the territorial national presuppositions of French studies includes Paul A. Silverstein, Algeria in France: Transpolitics, Race, and Nation (Bloomington, Ind., 2004); Scott, The Politics of the Veil; Charles Forsdick and David Murphy, eds., Postcolonial Thought in the French-Speaking World (Liverpool, 2009); Mayanthi L. Fernando, “Reconfiguring Freedom: Muslim Piety and the Limits of Secular Law and Public Discourse in France,” American Ethnologist 37, no. 1 (February 2010): 19–35; and Yarimar Bonilla, “Guadeloupe Is Ours: The Prefigurative Politics of the Mass Strike in the French Antilles,” Interventions: International Journal of Postcolonial Studies 12, no. 1 (2010): 125–137.

⁶⁶ See Immanuel Wallerstein, Unthinking Social Science: The Limits of Nineteenth-Century Paradigms (Cambridge, 1991).

object is occurring at a moment of professional uncertainty and anxiety. The geographer David Harvey has identified a tendency under capitalism to neutralize crises of overproduction through a short-term “spatial fix.” Rather than such crises’ being resolved by restructuring production, old methods of production are simply extended over a wider geographic area. But spatial fixes cannot overcome internal contradictions because they do not transform the system that produced them; they merely defer necessary restructuring and reproduce the same contradictions on a larger geographical scale.⁶⁷ We might wonder whether the turn to colonial topics by French historians operates like a spatial fix for the discipline.

There has been much concern in recent years about a crisis in French history (and literature) departments as they face declining enrollments, diminishing enthusiasm, and administrative hostility. This decline is variously attributed to globalization, to students’ interest in transnational topics and their suspicions of Eurocentrism, to France’s own declining world status and significance, or to the fact that the locus of political dynamism and cultural creativity in the French-speaking world has shifted either to immigrant communities within continental France or to francophone communities outside of France.⁶⁸ Among some historians, this shift has generated anxiety, resentment, and nostalgia for a time when French history occupied a more prominent position in the academy.⁶⁹ Others have responded by turning directly to France’s overseas colonies as a topic of study. This superficial “turn” thus often functions to forestall a feared crisis in French history. We know that after the 1873 economic depression and following each of the two world wars, the prospect of national decline led policymakers in France to turn to its overseas colonies. Do scholars today risk making the same kind of gesture—scrambling for colonies to save the nation in the face of the declining fortunes of European history?

These examples are presented not to argue that more historians should turn to imperial or post-national history, but to illustrate the more general tendency among historians to foreclose analytic openings through a domesticating embrace that preserves traditional history.⁷⁰ The point is neither to exhort historians to be theorists or Marxists nor to suggest that there is no value in descriptive, narrative, or national ⁶⁷ David Harvey, “The Spatial Fix: Hegel, Von Thünen, and Marx,” in Harvey, Spaces of Capital: Towards a Critical Geography (New York, 2001), 284–311; and Harvey, “The Geopolitics of Capitalism,” ibid., 312–344.

⁶⁸ For a diagnosis of this situation, see Tyler Stovall and Georges Van Den Abbeele, “Introduction,” in Stovall and Van Den Abbeele, eds., French Civilization and Its Discontents, 1–16. For a symptom of it, see Jan Goldstein, “The Future of French History in the United States: Unapocalyptic Thoughts for the New Millennium,” French Historical Studies 24, no. 1 (Winter 2001): 1–10.

⁶⁹ On the rise of colonial nostalgia in France today, see Achille Mbembe, “Provincializing France?,” Public Culture 23, no. 1 (2011): 85–119; Mbembe, Sortir de la grande nuit: Essai sur l’Afrique décolonisée (Paris, 2010); Mbembe, “L’Afrique de Nicolas Sarkozy,” Le Messenger, August 1, 2007; Mbembe, “France-Afrique: Ces sottises qui divisent,” Le Messenger, August 10, 2007. On American historians’ affective attachment to France as an object of study, see Laura Lee Downs and Stéphane Gerson, eds., Why France? American Historians Reflect on an Enduring Fascination (Ithaca, N.Y., 2009). On “historical transference,” whereby historians reproduce, or act out, in their work the tendencies about which they are writing, see LaCapra, “Is Everyone a Mentalité Case?,” 72–73.

⁷⁰ It is also important to note the analytic strengths of different subfields in which such general criticism does not apply. For example, Latin American history still frequently foregrounds political economy, Atlantic history typically focuses on regional scales and transnational formations, South Asian history often attends to the colonial genealogies of analytic categories and feminist history to processes of subject formation, etc.

history, but rather to challenge the common assumption that historians operating in different registers are not doing proper history.

WE MIGHT ALSO ASK WHETHER this conservative shift is related to professional anxiety about an academic crisis. The precarious state of national history cannot be separated from the precarious history of national states. One does not need to be a professional historian to recognize that we are living through a historical epoch marked by a convergence of large-scale structural transformations. These include the collapse of the Fordist compromise in the West, state socialism in Eastern Europe, and the Bandung development project in the South. This process of global capitalist restructuring and the consolidation of a neoliberal consensus has also corresponded to new imperialisms, resurgent religiosity, looming environmental catastrophe, and emergent forms of political identification, association, and governance on a planetary scale. This current round of globalization has revealed that the territorial national state flourished under particular historical conditions that are undergoing a decisive shift. It has also reminded us that the discipline of history, whose genesis was bound up with that national object, developed under those same conditions.

These momentous developments create enormous challenges and opportunities for thinkers who want to grasp an emergent future that is already now but, as Ernst Bloch would have said, is “not yet conscious.”⁷¹ This therefore should be a moment of great ferment for historians, supposed experts in epochal transitions who are especially well prepared to bring historical insight to bear on contemporary developments even as we can now rethink conventional historical narratives and conceptions of time in light of these profound changes. Within the discipline, the burgeoning interest in imperial, transnational, comparative, and global history is surely linked to these epochal developments. Yet our field has not been seized by the spirit of innovation, experimentation, and debate that such extraordinary times seem to invite and require. On the contrary, this appears to be a period of disciplinary retrenchment.⁷²

Joan Scott has diagnosed this troubling trend as an anti-theoretical “yearning for security and stability” among historians whose focus has turned back to “the objective empirical.”⁷³ She explains this recent “return to traditional disciplinarity” as a reaction to the radical challenge that poststructuralist theory posed to the very foundation of conventional historical scholarship.⁷⁴ While this certainly seems to be the case, we may also relate this conservative turn to our current upheaval. Instead of regarding these times as an opportunity for historiographic renewal, many in the field have responded defensively to the prospect of a general crisis within and beyond the academy that may threaten not only their paradigms and worldviews but their profession and positions.⁷⁵ As scholars who often study collective responses to rupture and upheaval, we historians should recognize this corporate retreat into a guild ⁷¹ Ernst Bloch, The Principle of Hope, trans. Neville Plaice, Stephen Plaice, and Paul Knight, 3 vols. (Cambridge, Mass., 1986), 1: 114–178.

⁷² On “archival fetishism,” see LaCapra, History and Criticism, 92.

⁷³ Scott, “History-Writing as Critique.”

⁷⁴ Ibid., 19.

⁷⁵ See, for example, Gordon Wood, “In Defense of Academic History Writing,” Perspectives on His- mentality as a common response by social actors to an unstable present and an uncertain future. But we are not used to thinking reflexively about the historical developments that condition our own historiographic practices.

As the gap between experience and expectation widens, to use Reinhart Koselleck's formulation, it becomes at once imperative and difficult to grasp present shifts historically.⁷⁶ Doing so requires us to write histories of the present that attempt to understand these transformations genealogically, in relation to long-term historical processes of which they are a part, and proleptically, as if we were analyzing past history from a future standpoint.⁷⁷ Moreover, current transformations are not simply occurring in time, as if it were a neutral medium within which history unfolds; they are operating on time itself. An adequate history of the present must therefore also attend to the historicity of historical temporality—not just to change over time, but to changes in the sociohistorical constitution of time itself. This means that histories for and of our times cannot simply explain or interpret the past or the present; they must also directly examine the historically specific and dynamic relationship between past and present.

In his book Conscripts of Modernity, the anthropologist David Scott suggests that “morally and politically what ought to be at stake in historical inquiry is a critical appraisal of the present itself, not the mere reconstruction of the past.”⁷⁸ Speaking about the unexamined persistence of certain anticolonial research questions that were formulated by C. L. R. James in a previous era for a future that is no longer available today, Scott offers what we might read as a general warning for all historians: “the task before us is not one of merely finding better answers . . . to existing questions—as though [they] were timeless ones” but of reflecting on “whether the questions we have been asking the past to answer continue to be questions worth having answers to.”⁷⁹ He thus raises precisely the kinds of self-reflexive questions about writing history (today) that have been foreclosed by the post-turn consensus. If historical scholarship is to have any currency, he suggests, it must reflect critically on the aims of history, on the implication and investment of historians in objects of study, and on the complex, and ever-changing, relation between past and present.⁸⁰

While Scott presents a persuasive argument for rethinking historiographic practices in relation to the demands of our present, he does not say much about what a history for our actual present might in fact demand. In Logics of History, William Sewall relates recent trends in history-writing directly to contemporary social transformations. This is an exemplary work of self-reflexive and transdisciplinary history tory, April 2010. Wood calls on academic historians to shift from analytic to narrative history addressed to a popular audience.

⁷⁶ Koselleck, “‘Space of Experience’ and ‘Horizon of Expectation.’”

⁷⁷ Fernand Braudel writes: “what would the explorer of the present-day not give to have this perspective (or this sort of ability to go forward in time), making it possible to unmask and simplify our present life, in all its confusion—hardly comprehensible now because so overburdened with trivial acts and portents?” Braudel, On History, trans. Sarah Matthews (Chicago, 1980), 36.

⁷⁸ David Scott, Conscripts of Modernity: The Tragedy of Colonial Enlightenment (Durham, N.C., 2004), 41.

⁷⁹ Ibid., 56, 209.

⁸⁰ Dominick LaCapra also calls for a “dialogic history” that explicitly addresses the relations between past and present as well as scholar and object of study. LaCapra, “History, Language, and Reading: Waiting for Crillon,” American Historical Review 100, no. 3 (June 1995): 799–828.

that uses Marxist social theory to link history's insights about events, meaning, and narrative to social science's insights about deeper structures and longer-term processes. Sewell tries to understand the rapid shift from social history to cultural history in the 1980s in relation to two deeper contradictions within social history. First, many social historians in the 1960s were oriented toward anti-establishment politics yet pursued populist histories of ordinary people with positivist methodologies borrowed from big science, which was itself implicated in the establishment order that these histories sought to contest. Second, politically committed social historians' interest in ordinary people's everyday experience used quantitative methods and structural frameworks that often ignored or erased the individuality, subjectivity, consciousness, and history-shaping agency that their work sought to reveal. At a certain point, Sewell explains, many of these historians attempted to overcome these contradictions by turning to a cultural history that substituted meanings, mentalities, and interpretations for facts, structures, and explanations.⁸¹

Sewell also asks how a hegemonic social history could crumble so quickly after the advent of cultural history with only minimal debate and resistance. He turns to political economy to explain why historians were so willing to abandon the methodological innovations and analytic insights associated with the study of society, social relations, and social structures. He writes: "the cultural turn was also fueled . . . by a secret affinity with an emergent logic of capitalist development" and notes that "the shift from Fordism to flexible accumulation lies behind the great wave of academic cultural turns in the 1980s and 1990s."⁸² For Sewell, the "potential complicities between contemporary forms of capitalism and a purely cultural history" are revealed by the fact that both have been equally invested in ignoring the role of structural determination in social life.⁸³ It follows for Sewell that "existing cultural or linguistic models have so far proved inadequate to the intellectual challenges posed by worldwide capitalist structural transformation."⁸⁴ He observes that "at the very time when particularly powerful changes in social and economic structures are manifested ever more insistently in our daily lives, we cultural historians have ceased not only to grapple with such structures but even to admit their ontological reality."⁸⁵ He warns that if historians hope to participate in "attempting to reclaim effective political and social agency from the juggernaut of world capitalism . . . I think we need to understand our own epistemological and political entanglements in world capitalism's recent social history."⁸⁶

We do not have to accept the particulars of Sewell's account to appreciate his ambitious attempt to demonstrate what a self-reflexive history might look like—one ⁸¹ Sewell, Logics of History, 1–80. Sewell observes that historians were turning against Fordism precisely when that order was already unraveling.

⁸² Ibid., 62, 59.

⁸³ Ibid., 62.

⁸⁴ Ibid., 80.

⁸⁵ Ibid., 52.

⁸⁶ Ibid., 53. In an incisive commentary on Geoff Eley's A Crooked Line, Manu Goswami argues persuasively that "cultural history cannot account for the conditions of its own global emergence and resonance without recourse to the forms of historical totalization that it rejected in the reaction formation against social history." Goswami, "Remembering the Future," American Historical Review 113, no. 2 (April 2008): 417–424, here 422.

that historicizes historiographic practices in relation to our historical present.⁸⁷ Likewise, we may emulate his deep commitment to transdisciplinary inquiry that is at once historical, social scientific, and theoretical.⁸⁸ Nor can we afford to ignore his insistence that we address the analytic and political costs of a wholesale turn away from structural analysis, societal explanation, long-term processes and large-scale transformations, theoretical inquiry, dialogue with the social sciences, and engagement with Marxian social theory.⁸⁹

Crafting a history for and of our times will require us to move beyond the insidious logic of turns in order to reclaim the analytic space where history, social science, and critical theory once converged around large and pressing sociohistorical questions. That convergence often occurred through specific circles of intellectuals who inhabited what the historian Lucien Febvre called “that unexplored no-man’s land where the historian feels that he has no business, while the philosopher or sociologist thinks that it is up to the historian to venture there alone.”⁹⁰

The Annales project provides one important precedent. The work of Febvre, Marc Bloch, and Fernand Braudel has been associated with both the social history that was turned against and the cultural history that was turned to. These thinkers recognized that because society was an integrated totality, history would have to overcome arbitrary and obstructive divisions within and across disciplines. They insisted on a self-reflexive and anti-positivist problem-oriented history that refused to fetishize facts, appearances, and description. They directed historians’ attention to the production of space and posed fundamental historiographic questions about geographic scale. They also attended to both the temporal complexity of history and the historical production of time. Recognizing the interpenetration of past and present, they argued that present concerns had to inform historical inquiry at the same time that historical knowledge should engage present debates. Above all, they raised critical questions that resonated productively across the human sciences and that spoke to their conjuncture.⁹¹ In contrast, disciplinary history today is distinguished by a ⁸⁷ For non-Marxian approaches to historical self-reflexivity, see Koselleck, Futures Past; Dominick LaCapra, “History, Reading, and Critical Theory,” in LaCapra, History and Reading: Tocqueville, Foucault, French Studies (Ithaca, N.Y., 2000), 21–72, here 64–72; Gabrielle Spiegel, “Revising the Past/ Revisiting the Present: How Change Happens in Historiography,” History and Theory, Theme Issue 46, no. 4 (December 2007): 1–19.

⁸⁸ This work thus calls to mind Immanuel Wallerstein’s program for historical social science. Wallerstein, World Systems Analysis: An Introduction (Durham, N.C., 2004), 1–22.

⁸⁹ See also the related call for a reconstituted “history of society” in Eley, A Crooked Line, 187–202; as well as Eric J. Hobsbawm, “From Social History to the History of Society,” Daedalus 100, no. 1 (Winter 1971): 20–45; and Goswami, “Remembering the Future.” Note that the critique of the linguistic and cultural turns from the standpoint of “society” developed by Sewell, Eley, and Goswami differs fundamentally from the call by Bonnell and Hunt for a renewed social history and historical sociology “beyond the cultural turn” that challenges the straw man of “reducing everything to its social determinants” and advocates “re-disciplinizing” the human sciences, which could return to their real task of producing “objective—that is, verifiable—comparable results.” Bonnell and Hunt, “Introduction,” 11, 26, 14.

⁹⁰ Lucien Febvre, A New Kind of History: From the Writings of Febvre, ed. Peter Burke, trans. K. Folca (New York, 1973), 39.

⁹¹ See Marc Bloch, The Historian’s Craft (New York, 1953); Febvre, A New Kind of History; Braudel, On History; as well as Iggers, New Directions in European Historiography, 43–79; Peter Burke, The French Historical Revolution: The Annales School, 1929–89 (Stanford, Calif., 1990); François Dosse, New History in France: The Triumph of the Annales (Urbana, Ill., 1994); André Burguière, The Annales School: An Intellectual History, trans. Jane Marie Todd (Ithaca, N.Y., 2009).

proliferation of topical turns and a poverty of timely questions. Rather than celebrate methodological consensus, we need to seek an analytic synthesis that relates the epistemological challenge of the linguistic turn to the social structural concerns of the Marxian tradition. In this way, historians might produce work that is at once self-reflexive critical history and historically situated critical theory. Such commitments cannot be relegated to the past as discrete and completed events. They were not lessons to be learned but promises to be pursued through an ongoing process in which we question our questions, debate the stakes, and reflect upon the conditions of possibility of what we can know and why it might be worth knowing at this particular historical conjuncture as we craft histories of the present for the future that is already at hand as well as the one that we might want to create.

Gary Wilder is Associate Professor in the Ph.D. Program in Anthropology and Director of the Mellon Committee on Globalization and Social Change at the Graduate Center of the City University of New York.

The Kids Are All Right:
On the “Turning” of Cultural History

JAMES W. COOK

To situate this introduction, it will be useful to focus briefly on just what constituted the cultural turn.

Victoria E. Bonnell and Lynn Hunt

RUN A FEW WEB SEARCHES FOR the term “cultural turn,” and you will begin to grasp the scope of an increasingly viral concept. In Google Books alone, you will find more than 100,000 citations, the bibliographic traces of the concept’s extended wandering.¹ Switch to the search engine at OCLC WorldCat, ArticleFirst, or ECO, and the numbers become less daunting, somewhere on the order of a few hundred hits. In these more specialized databases, however, the searchable content is limited to titles and abstracts. So what you are really seeing is the initial layers of a much larger conversation: the figurative tip of the bibliographic iceberg.²

What might the iceberg tell us? Most of all, perhaps, it provides a wide-angle view of the concept’s current ubiquity. In addition to Victoria Bonnell and Lynn Hunt’s 1999 volume Beyond the Cultural Turn, you will find thousands of recent books invoking “cultural turns” in a wide variety of scholarly contexts—from sociology to

My first thanks go to my fellow authors in this forum, especially Judith Surkis and Julia Adeney Thomas, as well as Konstantin Dierks, Sarah Knott, and Robert Schneider, who laid the groundwork for this project. For helpful ideas, readings, criticisms, and encouragements, I am grateful to Eric Slauter, Meredith McGill, Ann Fabian, Jackson Lears, Gina Morantz-Sanchez, Mark Hewitson, Marni Sandweiss, Andy Rotter, Tanya Erzen, Rachel St. John, Alison Isenberg, Howie Brick, Dan Rodgers, the anonymous reviewers for the AHR, and, above all, Geoff Eley and Rita Chin. This article was strengthened by four talented cohorts of History 686, “Graduate Seminar in U.S. Cultural History”—all of whom helped me to think through these questions over the past decade. Thanks, too, to Joan Scott for sharing her perspectives and hosting me at the Institute for Advanced Study, where this essay was largely written.

¹ Accessed March 9, 2012.

² Other useful benchmarks can be found in JSTOR and Project Muse: On March 9, 2012, a keyword search among history journals in JSTOR for the phrase “cultural turn” generated more than 600 hits. In Project Muse, which archives a shorter span of time, the same procedure on the same day generated more than 500 hits. At first glance, my approach here may appear contradictory: the application of older social historical methods (e.g., counting) to track the very mode that is often said to have supplanted those methods (“the cultural turn”). As we shall see, however, such hard-and-fast distinctions between the “social” and the “cultural” have often relied on misleading conceptual inventories. From Robert Darnton’s The Business of Enlightenment (Cambridge, Mass., 1979) and Janice Radway’s Reading the Romance (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1984) to Richard Ohmann’s Selling Culture (New York, 1996) and Franco Moretti’s Graphs, Maps, Trees (London, 2005), there have always been major currents within the cultural turn that traversed the conceptual zero sums. I return to these currents below.

geography, Marxist theory to translation studies.³ You will also confirm the impact of this concept on our patterns of historical discourse. Since the early 2000s, it has figured prominently in hundreds of historical monographs, articles, and reviews; two AHA presidential addresses; at least three previous AHR Forums; and various fora in the Hispanic American Historical Review (1999), the Journal of American History (2003), Cultural and Social History (2004), and Social Science History (2008).⁴

Dig a bit deeper, though, and additional wrinkles begin to emerge. One involves the long list of seminal cultural histories in which the concept never appeared: from Natalie Davis's Society and Culture in Early Modern France (1975), Lawrence Levine's Black Culture and Black Consciousness (1977), and Carlo Ginzburg's The Cheese and the Worms (1982) to Robert Darnton's The Great Cat Massacre (1984), Jonathan Spence's The Memory Palace of Matteo Ricci (1984), and Joan Wallach Scott's Gender and the Politics of History (1988).⁵ Nor did the concept achieve much currency anywhere in our discipline before the end of the last century—the very moment, paradoxically, when growing numbers of commentators began announcing our transition to something else, something now figured as subsequent to or “beyond” the cultural turn.⁶

What is at issue here, then, is not a ground-level concept, first developed in the process of doing cultural history, so much as a genealogical master trope, now increasingly used to stand in for cultural history. Defining the turn in this way does nothing to diminish its significance. In fact, the trope's recent arrival has been entangled with at least two major trends. Above all, it has signaled a growing desire to track the shifting contours of cultural history—and survey the larger whole. It has also suggested a willingness to step back and take stock, to begin a broader conversation about what “the turn” actually accomplished. Regardless of how we answer

³ Victoria E. Bonnell and Lynn Hunt, eds., Beyond the Cultural Turn: New Directions in the Study of Society and Culture (Berkeley, Calif., 1999).

⁴ Barbara Weinstein, “Developing Inequality,” AHA Presidential Address, American Historical Review 113, no. 1 (February 2008): 1–18; Gabrielle M. Spiegel, “The Task of the Historian,” AHA Presidential Address, American Historical Review 114, no. 1 (February 2009): 1–15; “AHR Forum: Geoff Eley's A Crooked Line,” American Historical Review 113, no. 2 (April 2008): 391–437; “AHR Forum: Revisiting ‘Gender: A Useful Category of Historical Analysis,’” American Historical Review 113, no. 5 (December 2008): 1344–1430; “AHR Roundtable: Historians and Biography,” American Historical Review 114, no. 3 (June 2009): 573–661; “AHR Conversation: Historians and the Study of Material Culture,” American Historical Review 114, no. 5 (December 2009): 1355–1404; “AHR Forum: The State in South Asian History,” American Historical Review 115, no. 2 (April 2010): 405–483; Mexico's New Cultural History: ¿Una Lucha Libre?, Special Issue, Hispanic American Historical Review 79, no. 2 (May 1999); Journal of American History 90, no. 2 (September 2003): 576–611; Cultural and Social History 1, no. 1 (January 2004): 94–117, and 1, no. 2 (May 2004): 201–224; Social Science History 32, no. 4 (Winter 2008): 535–593. I myself invoked the concept on multiple occasions in James W. Cook, Lawrence B. Glickman, and Michael O'Malley, eds., The Cultural Turn in U.S. History: Past, Present and Future (Chicago, 2008).

⁵ Natalie Zemon Davis, Society and Culture in Early Modern France (Stanford, Calif., 1975); Lawrence W. Levine, Black Culture and Black Consciousness: Afro-American Folk Thought from Slavery to Freedom (New York, 1977); Carlo Ginzburg, The Cheese and the Worms: The Cosmos of a Sixteenth-Century Miller (Baltimore, 1982); Robert Darnton, The Great Cat Massacre: And Other Episodes in French Cultural History (New York, 1984); Jonathan D. Spence, The Memory Palace of Matteo Ricci (New York, 1984); Joan Wallach Scott, Gender and the Politics of History (New York, 1988).

⁶ One good way to track this pattern is by running a JSTOR search for “cultural turn” in the American Historical Review. Interestingly, the very first hits are from 1999, the same year in which Bonnell and Hunt published Beyond the Cultural Turn. Three years later, the AHR editors were already using the phrase as an unexplained touchstone. See, for example, the introduction to “What's beyond the Cultural Turn?,” American Historical Review 107, no. 5 (December 2002): 1475.

Google Labs Ngram for the Phrase "Cultural Turn"

1930-2008, Books in English

© 2010 Google

FIGURE 1: Google Labs "Ngram" for the phrase "cultural turn," 1930 to 2008. The larger data pool encompasses texts in English that were digitized by Google through 2011.

these questions, the very act of posing them has marked an important epistemological shift. Since the late 1930s, at least, cultural historians have positioned themselves as paradigm-busters: always challenging conventional assumptions, always pushing toward something new. The recent talk of turns, by contrast, has directed attention backward, toward more comprehensive conceptual inventories, new waves of self-critiques.⁷

One useful response is to track this burgeoning turn talk—its dominant narratives, assumptions, and insights. At this late date, however, it seems important to do more than simply rehearse the prevailing narratives or fill them with additional content. Indeed, what we increasingly lack is a clear and critical sense of how this trope has shaped conventional wisdom, and to what larger effects. For all the recent efforts at genealogical precision, much of the best work has assumed a metonymic equivalence between the trope itself (cultural turn) and the multi-decade phenomenon it is now meant to reference (cultural history). Yet this assumption is shot through with potential problems. One is that it often produces a moving target: each new narrative tracks a somewhat different set of concepts. Another is the turn's propensity for semantic dodginess: sometimes standing in for entire spectrums of cultural approaches, at other moments referencing one particular approach within a larger spectrum.⁸ A third basic problem is the tendency to compress periodization, such that "turning" becomes synonymous with a generational rite of passage—most typically, from the new social history of the 1970s to the new cultural history of the 1980s.⁹

⁷ In recent years, this literature has become voluminous. In addition to the citations in fn. 4, see especially Joyce Appleby, Lynn Hunt, and Margaret Jacob, Telling the Truth about History (New York, 1994); Bonnell and Hunt, Beyond the Cultural Turn; Richard Biernacki, "Method and Metaphor after the New Cultural History," ibid., 62–94; Biernacki, "Language and the Shift from Signs to Practices in Cultural Inquiry," History and Theory 39, no. 3 (October 2000): 289–310; Miri Rubin, "What Is Cultural History Now?," in David Cannadine, ed., What Is History Now? (New York, 2002), 80–94; Peter Burke, What Is Cultural History? (London, 2004); Miguel A. Cabrera, Postsocial History: An Introduction (Lanham, Md., 2004); Dale B. Martin and Patricia Cox Miller, eds., The Cultural Turn in Late Ancient Studies: Gender, Asceticism, and Historiography (Durham, N.C., 2005); William H. Sewell, Jr., Logics of History: Social Theory and Transformation (Chicago, 2005); Geoff Eley, A Crooked Line: From Cultural History to the History of Society (Ann Arbor, Mich., 2005); Robert M. Burns, ed., Historiography: Critical Concepts in Historical Studies, vol. 4: Culture (London, 2006); Daniel Wickberg, "What Is the History of Sensibilities? On Cultural Histories, Old and New," American Historical Review 112, no. 3 (June 2007): 661–684; Karen Halttunen, ed., A Companion to American Cultural History (Malden, Mass., 2008); Daniel T. Rodgers, Age of Fracture (Cambridge, Mass., 2011).

In this latter vein, especially, much of the work has produced unmarked forms of synecdoche, simultaneously compressing, flattening, and occluding a much longer conceptual history. On the U.S. side alone, it compresses at least four or five distinctive modes: from Depression-era advocates of a "cultural approach" such as Caroline Ware and Merle Curti; to Cold War-era champions of myth and symbol historiography like Henry Nash Smith, Leo Marx, and John William Ward; to key innovators of the 1960s and 1970s, including David Brion Davis, Warren Susman, Neil Harris, Herbert Gutman, Ann Douglas, Lawrence Levine, Carroll Smith-Rosenberg, and Nathan Huggins; to more recent waves of culturalists, for whom the new cultural history of the 1980s was already a conceptual artifact.¹⁰

Curiously, some of the most prominent recent commentators have ignored these longer trajectories, producing the rather odd and misleading impression that cultural history simply rose and fell—stopped turning—in the course of a single generation.¹¹ In so doing, they have also consolidated a new declension story: ambitious early

⁸ This distinction has typically played out as a series of semantic slippages between "a turn" (that is, of a single practitioner, or within a particular subfield) and "the turn" (encompassing an entire discipline). Yet these slippages carry very different methodological assumptions. By its very formulation, "a turn" pushes in the direction of multiplicity, with each practitioner (or subfield) "turning" in a variety of ways. "The turn," by contrast, conjures a broader epistemic shift, as well as a more normative set of assumptions about what the shift encompassed. My thinking here is indebted to Michael Warner's discussion of "a" versus "the" public in Publics and Counterpublics (Cambridge, Mass., 2002), 65–124.

⁹ This pattern is especially strong in the works cited above by Bonnell, Hunt, Eley, Sewell, and Spiegel—all "cultural turners" of the late 1970s and early 1980s who began their careers working in other subfields.

¹⁰ For a fuller portrait of this occluded history, see James W. Cook and Lawrence B. Glickman, "Twelve Propositions for a History of U.S. Cultural History," in Cook, Glickman, and O'Malley, The Cultural Turn in U.S. History, 3–57. See also Caroline F. Ware, ed., The Cultural Approach to History (New York, 1940); Henry Nash Smith, Virgin Land: The American West as Symbol and Myth (1950; repr., Cambridge, Mass., 1970); Joseph J. Kwiatt and Mary C. Turpie, eds., Studies in American Culture (Minneapolis, 1960); David Brion Davis, "Some Recent Directions in American Cultural History," American Historical Review 73, no. 3 (February 1968): 696–707; Leo Marx, "American Studies: A Defense of an Unscientific Method," New Literary History 1, no. 1 (October 1969): 75–90; Robert F. Berkhofer, "Clio and the Culture Concept: Some Impressions of a Changing Relationship in American Historiography," in Louis Schneider and Charles Bonjean, eds., The Idea of Culture in the Social Sciences (Cambridge, 1973), 77–100; Alan Trachtenberg, "Myth and Symbol," Massachusetts Review 25, no. 4 (Winter 1984): 667–673; Michael Denning, "The Special American Conditions," American Quarterly 38, no. 3 (1986): 356–380; Ellen Fitzpatrick, "Caroline F. Ware and the Cultural Approach to History," American Quarterly 43, no. 2 (June 1991): 173–198; Donald R. Kelley, "The Old Cultural History," History of the Human Sciences 9, no. 3 (1996): 101–126; Barry Shank, "The Continuing Embarrassment of Culture: From the Culture Concept to Cultural Studies," American Studies 38, no. 2 (Summer 1997): 95–116; and Lucy Maddox, ed., Locating American Studies: The Evolution of a Discipline (Baltimore, 1999).

¹¹ See, for example, Appleby, Hunt, and Jacob, Telling the Truth about History; Bonnell and Hunt, Beyond the Cultural Turn; Sewell, Logics of History; Peter Mandler, "The Problem with Cultural History," Cultural and Social History 1, no. 1 (2004): 94–117. Eley and Spiegel have adopted similar narratives of generational supersession, but with fewer declensionist overtones. See, for example, Eley, A Crooked agendas later chastened by disappointments; mid-career conversion experiences subsequently tempered by disillusionment.¹² But what actually happened to all of those latter-day culturalists, those fourth- and fifth-wave practitioners for whom the cock-fights, carnivals, and cat massacres were part of their basic historical training?¹³ At the very least, it seems important to write these younger scholars into the family romance. In the process, however, we may discover something crucial: namely, that the much-debated “beyond” has been steadily unfolding all around us. One turn’s “future” is another turn’s “now.”

WHEN DID WE BEGIN TO SPEAK in “turns”? Interestingly, before the 1980s, the more specific figure of a “cultural turn” appeared precisely nowhere in the vast history archives of JSTOR. And over the next decade, it appeared only twice: first in a 1982 Daedalus essay by Martin Marty, and then again in a 1990 essay by Adelheid von Saldern in International Labor and Working-Class History.¹⁴ The scarcity of the phrase is intriguing: two lonely hits in roughly half a million pages, and this during the very period often described as “the turn’s” conceptual apex. Another key lesson involves the particular ways in which Marty and von Saldern formulated their turns. Neither author, that is to say, used the phrase as genealogical shorthand, to stand in for the history of cultural history. Nor did they employ it historiographically, to conjure the shifting methods of a particular group. At this point, rather, the turns in question referenced much broader shifts in twentieth-century religious practices (Marty) and mass politics (von Saldern). In both instances, the authors’ uses of the phrase seem almost accidental—as if they might just as easily have said “cultural watershed” or “cultural transformation.”

Extend the search another year or two, however, and the patterns begin to change. The very next hit from 1991 is an essay in the Journal of American Ethnic History by Kathleen Neils Conzen, in which she describes large numbers of “immigration historians” making the same “cultural turn” so evident “in many other areas of our discipline.”¹⁵ Within JSTOR, at least, this was the first published reference with clear historiographical overtones. Yet it pointed to a longer process: a turn now figured as fully active. In a 1993 review essay for Labour/Le Travail, Elizabeth Blackmar similarly referenced a “cultural turn in social history” familiar enough to be

Line, 200–203; and Gabrielle M. Spiegel, “Comment on A Crooked Line,” American Historical Review 113, no. 2 (2008): 411–413.

¹² Bonnell and Hunt, “Introduction,” in Bonnell and Hunt, Beyond the Cultural Turn, 11; Sewell, Logics of History, 23. See also William H. Sewell, Jr., “Crooked Lines,” American Historical Review 113, no. 2 (April 2008): 393–405, in which he laments “the shapeless bazaar” (403) of cultural histories produced in the turn’s wake.

¹³ My use of these terms is meant to reference some of the most widely influential studies of the 1970s and early 1980s: Clifford Geertz, The Interpretation of Cultures (New York, 1973); Davis, Society and Culture in Early Modern France; Darnton, The Great Cat Massacre.

¹⁴ Martin E. Marty, “Religion in America since Mid-Century,” Daedalus 111, no. 1 (1982): 149–163, quotation from 154; Adelheid von Saldern, “The Hidden History of Mass Culture,” International Labor and Working-Class History 37 (Spring 1990): 32–40, quotation from 32.

¹⁵ Kathleen Neils Conzen, “Mainstreams and Side Channels: The Localization of Immigrant Cultures,” Journal of American Ethnic History 11, no. 1 (Fall 1991): 9. This essay was a revised version of Conzen’s presidential address delivered at the April 1991 meeting of the Immigration History Society.

contrasted with previous modes of New Left scholarship, charged by its critics with evading politics, and finally defended by Blackmar herself as essential for understanding the broader dimensions of capitalist power.¹⁶ One year later, the British sociologist David Chaney stretched the concept further, describing a “cultural turn” irreducible to any particular topic, subfield, or discipline. Chaney’s point, in fact, was to cast this turn as a major development in late-twentieth-century social thought, one in which scores of new “culture concepts” were said to be rising and falling, competing and commingling.¹⁷

The point of rehearsing this lineage is not to suggest some longer teleology, each new hit pushing ever closer to common currency. Rather, what the hits begin to show us is the inevitably messy etymological process by which the trope first entered historical discourse. In her 1991 essay, Conzen put the term in quotation marks and cited the introduction to Lynn Hunt’s important collection The New Cultural History (1989). At this stage, though, Hunt had never actually used the phrase “cultural turn,” opting instead to frame her story as a series of localized debates within British Marxism, the French Annales group, and certain corners of U.S. intellectual and gender history. To the extent that Hunt even spoke of “turns” or “turning” in 1989, it was always to reference innovations figured as just prior to her target: the new cultural history. Thus, the “interest in language” exhibited by growing numbers of Marxists marked them as “turning” to something else—something other than the default “materialism” of an older “Marxist agenda.” But when such “interest” grew into something larger, something closer to a core concern, the same conceptual exemplars resurfaced (transformed) as new cultural historians.¹⁸

Early on, then, Hunt conjured methodological rites of passage: new routes into cultural history rather than a metonym for cultural history. Chaney, by contrast, presented his 1994 title The Cultural Turn as a self-conscious play on words. This figure, he explained, referenced no preexisting master trope, no widely employed catch phrase. Its specific intent, rather, was to pun on the somewhat earlier figure of a “linguistic turn,” here expanded to include a broader range of culture concepts (i.e., no longer confined to words and texts).¹⁹ When, exactly, this second turn emerged—or how it might have intersected its linguistic predecessor—remained unresolved in Chaney’s admittedly “provisional” framework. In the book’s opening pages, he simply noted that “it would not be difficult to put forward a thesis that the . . . recent focus on culture” was a further development of earlier work on “the nature and forms of language.”²⁰

¹⁶ Betsy Blackmar, “Building the History of Working-Class America,” Labour/Le Travail 31 (Spring 1993): 327. The impetus for Blackmar’s review was the publication of Who Built America? Working People and the Nation’s Economy, Politics, Culture, and Society (New York, 1989, 1992), a landmark two-volume collection written under the auspices of the American Social History Project. Her more specific reference to a “cultural turn in social history” (my emphasis) was not entirely unprecedented. See, for example, Raphael Samuel’s use of the same phrase in “Reading the Signs, II: Fact-Grubbers and Mind-Readers,” History Workshop Journal 33 (Spring 1992): 220–251, quotation from 226.

¹⁷ David Chaney, The Cultural Turn: Scene-Setting Essays on Contemporary Cultural History (London, 1994), 2.

¹⁸ Lynn Hunt, “Introduction: History, Culture, and Text,” in Hunt, ed., The New Cultural History (Berkeley, Calif., 1989), 1–22. For the references to “turns” and “turning,” see 4, 5, 7.

¹⁹ Chaney, The Cultural Turn, 2.

²⁰ One key reference point for Chaney was John E. Toews, “Intellectual History after the Linguistic Turn: The Autonomy of Meaning and the Irreducibility of Experience,” American Historical Review 92,

Even at this juncture, however, there were growing indications of a more rigorous and expansive story. Key titles in this regard were Geoff Eley's "Is All the World a Text?" (1990) and Raphael Samuel's "Reading the Signs" (1991) and "Reading the Signs, II" (1992), all of which sought, quite explicitly, to push beyond the brief conceptual lineages of Hunt's volume.²¹ The point here is not simply that Eley and Samuel expanded Hunt's story with a number of additional seedbeds (such as the work of Antonio Gramsci), or that they tracked key innovations more systematically from high-level concepts to ground-level practices (such as the shifting editorial policies at History Workshop Journal, Social History, and the Radical History Review).²² Nor is it that their inventories of defining concepts issued from a much broader range of thinkers: Raymond Williams as well as Clifford Geertz; Philippe Ariès as well as Michel Foucault; Edward Said as well as Roger Chartier; Catherine Hall as well as Joan Scott.

It is also, more fundamentally, that Eley and Samuel engaged the concepts themselves with greater depth and comprehensiveness. On the central question of "discourse," for instance, Eley did not simply gesture toward Foucault. More ambitiously, he tracked the transatlantic reception of Foucault's work, explicated the "dispersed and decentered conception of power" that made the "discursive move" possible, and then argued for its broader utility as an "extraordinarily fruitful" way of "theorizing both the internal rules and regularities of particular fields of knowledge (their 'regimes of truth') and the more general structures of ideas and assumptions that delimit what can and cannot be thought and said." A few pages later, he returned to the concept, but this time to consider its broader effects on historiography. After Foucault, Eley cautioned, bedrock categories such as "class," "citizenship," and "society" could no longer be "assumed" or posited "objectively"—in "some unproblematic social-science sense." The more pressing issue, rather, was how each of these categories had emerged as "an object of theory-knowledge" or "a target of policy." What, in other words, were "the historically located methods, tech-no. 4 (October 1987): 879–907. For a much fuller treatment of the concept's origins and shifting currency, see Judith Surkis's essay in this forum.

²¹ Geoff Eley, "Is All the World a Text? From Social History to the History of Society Two Decades Later" (CSST Working Paper #55, October 1990); Raphael Samuel, "Reading the Signs," History Workshop Journal 32 (Autumn 1991): 88–109; Samuel, "Reading the Signs, II." The original context for Eley's essay was the Working Paper Series sponsored by the Program in Comparative Study of Social Transformations (CSST) at the University of Michigan. The essay was then reprinted with minor revisions in a subsequent conference volume: Terrence J. McDonald, ed., The Historic Turn in the Human Sciences (Ann Arbor, Mich., 1996), 193–243. Samuel's essays first took shape as an editorial for History Workshop Journal 31 (1991). This seems to have provoked substantial disagreements among the editors, however, which led Samuel to revise and expand the essay into the much longer, two-part series. According to the notes for "Reading the Signs, II," Samuel intended two additional essays in future issues. By 1992, though, the larger plan seems to have shifted. As he explained in "Reading the Signs, II": "In order not to trespass further on readers' patience, or History Workshop Journal space, the third of these articles, which is about history and post-modernism, will be placed elsewhere" (246). As far as I am aware, the third and fourth parts never appeared, although some of these ideas can be tracked to Samuel's subsequent two-volume Theatres of Memory (London, 1994, 1998).

²² Despite the prominent position of turn-prone Marxists in Hunt's 1989 narrative, Gramsci was surprisingly absent. Nor did she cite many of the central figures in twentieth-century Marxist theory who were widely discussed on the British side, such as Georg Lukacs or Valentin Voloshinov. I note these patterns not to argue for or against any particular cast of characters, but to point out some of the surprising gaps that were built into the turn talk from the very beginning.

niques, and practices that allowed such . . . categor[ies] to be constructed in the first place"?²³

Samuel, too, had quite a bit to say about "discourse." But in his telling, the genealogical branches extended even further: first backward to the structural linguist Emile Benveniste, who had developed the concept of "discourse" during the 1930s; then forward a bit, to Foucault's Birth of the Clinic (1963), which "vastly expanded" Benveniste's concept by applying it "to all those classificatory and naming devices by which science and authority produce order out of chaos"; then laterally, to extended comparisons with morphology, deconstruction, semiotics, and hermeneutics (each of which, Samuel insisted, came with its own distinctive theories about how signs actually work); and then laterally once again, to a second round of comparisons with Marx, Gramsci, and Althusser (Foucault's "discursive formations" now functioning as "base and superstructure, theory and practice rolled into one"). Even here, however, Samuel was just warming up. With remarkable erudition (and over more than sixty printed pages), he quickly performed similar maneuvers on Ferdinand Saussure and semiotics; on Roland Barthes and mythology; on Jacques Derrida and deconstruction; on Clifford Geertz and symbolic anthropology; on E. P. Thompson and class; on Pierre Nora and sites of memory; on Carlo Ginzburg and microhistory—and on many, many others.²⁴

In retrospect, though, much of the fascination of these essays stems not simply from their breadth, depth, and clarity, but also from their lingering open-endedness. In both cases, to be sure, Eley and Samuel referenced a dizzying assortment of turns: some of them linguistic, some of them historic, some of them deconstructive or antireductionist, some of them situated more narrowly within intellectual, social, or gender history. "Important things," Eley noted, "were clearly at stake."²⁵ At the end of the day, however, both Eley and Samuel chose to represent these "things" with the capacious metaphors of "readings" and "signs," "worlds" and "texts." And in this sense, at least, their targets were always much larger than cultural history itself—new, old, or otherwise. More than origin stories for any particular field, these were conceptual inventories that spoke of turns (not turn), disciplines (not discipline), modes (not mode), unresolved possibilities (rather than consolidating agendas). Although clearly committed to the work of critical genealogy, both authors embraced multitudes and confessed the provisional status of their still-unfolding stories. Neither author, significantly, gave the slightest indication that the stories themselves might be coming to an end.

HOW, THEN, CAN WE EXPLAIN the very different sort of story first ventured in Beyond the Cultural Turn, a story now thick with overtones of obsolescence, specters of supersession? Why, in other words, this dramatic refashioning of the story itself: from the live and bracing debates of Eley and Samuel to the fixed and finished turn of ²³ Eley, "Is All the World a Text?," in McDonald, The Historic Turn in the Human Sciences, 203–204, 217–222.

²⁴ Samuel, "Reading the Signs" and "Reading the Signs, II." Quotations from "Reading the Signs," 101, 106.

²⁵ Eley, "Is All the World a Text?," in McDonald, The Historic Turn in the Human Sciences, 198.

Bonnell and Hunt? One obvious complication here is the frequent narrative overlaps. In an opening footnote, Bonnell and Hunt pointed to Eley as their principal touchstone.²⁶ They also made it clear that they were plowing much the same basic terrain. Back once again were Hayden White's Metahistory, Clifford Geertz's The Interpretation of Cultures, and Michel Foucault's Discipline and Punish; French post-structuralism and British cultural studies; those turn-prone Marxists and the fourth-generation Annalists.²⁷

Much the same can be said about the narrative trajectories. Following Eley and Samuel, Bonnell and Hunt built their story around the "declining power" of "social explanation," more specifically the "tried-and-true materialist metaphors" central to much postwar historiography. Like Eley and Samuel, too, Bonnell and Hunt presented the 1980s as a critical tipping point, the watershed moment in which "growing numbers" of historians came to reject the very notion of culture as "reflective" or "epiphenomenal." Fundamental categories (such as class or political affiliation) now came to be understood "not as preceding consciousness or culture or language, but as depending upon them." The most basic forms of social life, they noted, "only came into being through their expressions or representations."²⁸

But whereas Eley and Samuel had presented these ideas as part of a rapidly unfolding story—still alive with "possibilities"—Bonnell and Hunt now recast them as a form of prior practice, a singular turn of "the last decades."²⁹ In the process, they also consolidated the larger narrative: first, by squeezing its complex history into roughly half a dozen pages; second, by distilling a heterodox range of cultural approaches into a core proposition (namely, that language and culture "shape" the social, that there is no social being "outside" of culture and language); third, by organizing the story around a rising and falling episteme ("the cultural turn"); and finally, by articulating "disappointment" with the more "radical" manifestations of this turn.³⁰ In one bold stroke, that is to say, Bonnell and Hunt simultaneously traced the turn's origins and regretted some of its impacts, assembled the family romance and declared the romance over.

There is more to be said about this narrative template: a fast-forming declension story in which the "cultural turn" arrives just in time to deliver its own eulogy.³¹ First, ²⁶ Bonnell and Hunt, "Introduction," 27 n. 4. This despite the fact that Eley did not actually use the phrase "cultural turn" in his 1990 essay.

²⁷ Ibid., 1–32, 27 n. 4; Hayden White, Metahistory: The Historical Imagination in Nineteenth-Century Europe (Baltimore, 1973); Geertz, The Interpretation of Cultures; Michel Foucault, Discipline and Punish: The Birth of the Prison (New York, 1977).

²⁸ Ibid., 9.

²⁹ Ibid., 5.

³⁰ Ibid., 11. The contrast here with Hunt's earlier formulations was particularly striking. Consider, for example, the closing lines of her 1989 introduction to The New Cultural History: "For the moment, as this volume shows, the accent in cultural history is on close examination—of texts, of pictures, and of actions—and on open-mindedness to what those examinations will reveal, rather than on elaboration of new master narratives or social theories to replace the materialist reductionism of Marxism and the Annales school . . . Historians working in the cultural mode should not be discouraged by theoretical diversity, for we are just entering a remarkable new phase when the other human sciences (including especially literary studies but also anthropology and sociology) are discovering us anew . . . Someday soon, presumably, another E. H. Carr will announce that the more cultural historical studies become and the more historical cultural studies become, the better for both" (22).

³¹ Hunt's first published reference to "the cultural turn" came in her co-authored book with Joyce Appleby and Margaret Jacob, Telling the Truth about History, 221. The specific context was a passage though, it is worth noting the expanding turn talk. Consider JSTOR once again. In the years immediately following Eley's and Samuel's essays, public invocations of the cultural turn remained quite rare. In 1993, there was a grand total of one explicit reference. And over the next half-decade, the aggregate curve remained relatively flat, ranging from no hits in 1994 to seven in 1998. In the years following Bonnell and Hunt, by contrast, the numbers began to spike quite notably, climbing from twenty-four references in 2000 to fifty-eight in 2003.³² These references, moreover, began to appear in a much broader range of journals, from Renaissance Quarterly, Geschichte und Gesellschaft, the William and Mary Quarterly, and the Journal of Modern History to the Journal of African History, the Catholic Historical Review, the Journal of Military History, and Historia Mexicana.

It was at this point, too, that scores of historians began to poach Bonnell and Hunt's title figure, invoking cultural turns in political history and diplomatic history, urban history and environmental history, Cold War studies and histories of consumerism.³³ To some extent, of course, such appropriations served to popularize the concept, transforming a previously marginal catch phrase into a ubiquitous touchstone. With each passing reference, however, the concept took on additional semantic baggage. Much of the new turn talk, in fact, pushed in very different directions: sometimes emphasizing the "vast dispersion" of cultural history said to be reshaping the larger discipline; sometimes complaining about the "contemporary devoted to conceptual retrenchments, with E. P. Thompson once again serving as bellwether. In this case, though, the focus was not on Thompson's having "turned away" from socioeconomic "reductionism" during the early 1960s, but rather on the fact that he later "drew back from the more extreme post-modernist positions associated with the cultural turn" (here exemplified by his 1978 polemic, The Poverty of Theory). In five short years (1989–1994), that is to say, Hunt's broader framework for talking about cultural history had shifted quite dramatically: from public calls for theoretical "diversity" to a growing emphasis on theoretical zero sums; from a forward-looking process of conceptual "discovery" to backward-looking critiques of methodological "extremism."

³² One major source of this groundswell can be traced to the large numbers of reviews of Bonnell and Hunt. In 2002, for example, the editors of this journal commissioned not one, but three review essays, by Ronald Suny, Patrick Brantlinger, and Richard Handler, for a special feature titled "What's beyond the Cultural Turn?," American Historical Review 107, no. 5 (December 2002): 1475–1520. It is important to be clear, though, that Bonnell and Hunt were not solely responsible for expanding the trope's currency. In 1999, the trope also surfaced in at least four different articles: Craig Clunas, "Modernity Global and Local: Consumption and the Rise of the West," American Historical Review 104, no. 5 (December 1999): 1497–1511; Claudio Lomnitz, "Barbarians at the Gate? A Few Remarks on the Politics of the 'New Cultural History of Mexico,'" Hispanic American Historical Review 79, no. 2 (May 1999): 367–385; Christopher Sellers, "Thoreau's Body: Towards an Embodied Environmental History," Environmental History 4, no. 4 (October 1999): 486–514; and Shirley Wilton, "Class Struggles: Teaching History in the Post-modern Age," History Teacher 33, no. 1 (November 1999): 25–32. Other prominent invocations can be found in David F. Crew, "Who's Afraid of Cultural Studies? Taking a 'Cultural Turn' in German History," in Scott Denham, Irene Kacandes, and Jonathan Petropoulos, eds., A User's Guide to German Cultural Studies (Ann Arbor, Mich., 1997), 45–61; Thomas Bender, "Politics, Intellect, and the American University, 1945–1995," Daedalus 126, no. 1 (Winter 1997): 1–38; and George Steinmetz, ed., State/Culture: State-Formation after the Cultural Turn (Ithaca, N.Y., 1999).

³³ See, for example, Ronald P. Formisano, "The Concept of Political Culture," Journal of Interdisciplinary History 31, no. 3 (Winter 2001): 393–426; Karina Urbach, "Diplomatic History since the Cultural Turn," Historical Journal 46, no. 4 (December 2003): 991–997; James Connolly, "Bringing the City Back In: Space and Place in the Urban History of the Gilded Age and Progressive Era," Journal of the Gilded Age and Progressive Era 1, no. 3 (July 2002): 258–278; Richard White, "Afterword: Environmental History: Watching a Historical Field Mature," Pacific Historical Review 70, no. 1 (February 2001): 103–111; Robert Griffith, "The Cultural Turn in Cold War Studies," Reviews in American History 29, no. 1 (March 2001): 150–157; and Frank Mort, review of Matthew Hilton, Smoking in British Popular Culture, 1800–2000: Perfect Pleasures, American Historical Review 108, no. 1 (February 2003): 262–263.

dominion of cultural history” over this or that subfield; sometimes concluding, by extension, that cultural history constituted a methodological “imperialism.”³⁴ As Drew Gilpin Faust argued in one of the more eloquent variations on this latter theme, “What I have found so compelling about cultural history during my three decades in the profession is its emphasis on how historical actors construe their experience—how they see, define, and respond to their world. Thus for me the lens of culture or meaning filters every other dimension of experience, and cultural history takes on a kind of natural historical imperialism: Whatever else might be happening—politics, economics, technological change—happens to people who use their cultural assumptions and predispositions to interpret it.”³⁵

Ultimately, though, the most dramatic effect of Bonnell and Hunt’s volume was to spark new and competing master narratives from some of the discipline’s leading turners.³⁶ These narratives deserve more careful consideration. In virtually every case, they have generated broad and prominent review attention. In most cases, too, they have been fortified by the weight of personal experience. William Sewell’s Logics of History (2005), for example, is equal parts critical genealogy and intellectual autobiography, an often brilliant explication of the same methods that Sewell was centrally involved in developing.³⁷ Similarly, Gabrielle Spiegel’s eloquent 2008 AHA presidential address provides an unusually rich synthesis of the multiple currents of poststructuralism in historical practice—a synthesis bolstered by the fact that Spiegel was among the very first historians to deploy these challenging ideas as they migrated across the Atlantic.³⁸

Instructive, too, are the varying points of emphasis that have sometimes set these stories apart. Whereas some authors have run their turns through literary criticism, British cultural studies, or anthropology, others have focused on key developments in gender theory or subaltern studies. Whereas some have marked their debts to Geertz, Foucault, Williams, or Derrida, others have emphasized the epistemological overlaps that produced common modes of questioning. Whereas some have described their turns as sparked by a growing crisis (e.g., within the quantitative social history of the 1960s and 1970s), others have insisted that the crises themselves need to be understood in relation to much larger “macrosocial forces” (e.g., the global rise ³⁴ I am referring here to broader patterns of historiographical usage. For specific examples and quotations, see the remarks by David Hollinger and Drew Gilpin Faust in “Interchange: The Practice of History,” Journal of American History 90, no. 2 (September 2003): 589–590, 587, respectively; and Formisano, “The Concept of Political Culture,” 394.

³⁵ Faust, in “Interchange: The Practice of History,” 587.

³⁶ Important contributions here include Mandler, “The Problem with Cultural History”; Sewell, Logics of History; Eley, A Crooked Line; and Spiegel, “The Task of the Historian.” The larger cycle extends, as well, to a number of published reviews and commentaries commissioned in response to Bonnell and Hunt, Mandler, Eley, and Sewell. See, for example, the review essays by Suny, Brantlinger, and Handler in “What’s beyond the Cultural Turn?”; the responses to Mandler’s essay by Carla Hesse, Colin Jones, and Carol Watts in Cultural and Social History (April 2004); the reviews of A Crooked Line by Sewell, Spiegel, and Manu Goswami in the American Historical Review (April 2008); and the reviews of Logics of History by George Steinmetz, Dylan Riley, and David Pedersen in Social Science History (December 2008).

³⁷ Sewell, Logics of History, 22–80. See also Sewell, “Crooked Lines.” It is worth noting that Sewell’s generative role in this process was not limited to his own published writings. As some of the recent genealogies note, he was also a key participant in landmark theoretical seminars at Princeton (with Clifford Geertz), Paris (with Joan Scott), and Ann Arbor (with Geoff Eley).

³⁸ Spiegel, “The Task of the Historian.” See also Spiegel, “Comment on A Crooked Line.”

of neoliberalism).³⁹ And whereas some have inflected their turns as tales of retrospective disappointment, others have emphasized collective accomplishments, future possibilities.⁴⁰

No two turns, then, have pushed in precisely the same directions. Step back from the larger cycle, however, and certain echoes become apparent. Most striking, perhaps, are the recurring deployments of timeframe (1960s to the 1990s), setting (one or another corner of the European field), narrative arc (rise and fall), and authorial voice (the generational “we”). Striking, too, is the considerable extent to which the narratives have pivoted around mid-career “conversion experiences”—initially pursued with great “profit,” but ultimately passed through en route to something else. The point of noting these patterns is not to dispute their collective resonance. For those who “made the turn” in this way, it was clearly a profound and powerful process. The sheer volume of narrative redundancy, moreover, suggests the outlines of collective memories: a genealogical template in which large numbers of former turners have recognized (at least some of) their own trajectories.

We might wonder here, though, about the shaping power of standpoint. If we were to shift the disciplinary context, would it be possible to alter the plot lines and tell a very different sort of story (e.g., one unallied with a single generation)? How, in other words, has this retrospective template—this growing tendency to speak in an idiom of conversions, turns, and beyonds—shaped our broader sense of cultural history: of when it started, who it included, where it happened, and what it ultimately became? Are there other important turns lurking behind the generational “we”?

CONSIDER WHAT HAPPENS WHEN we shift the narrative frame to the field of U.S. history. At first glance, the broader patterns here are not easily disentangled from their European counterparts.⁴¹ We could point, for example, to the roughly contemporaneous interests in subaltern thought and ritual that informed both Natalie Davis’s Society and Culture in Modern France (1975) and Lawrence Levine’s Black Culture and Black Consciousness (1977). Or the parallel efforts to unpack dominant categories of collective identity in Joan Scott’s Gender and the Politics of History (1988) and David Roediger’s The Wages of Whiteness (1991). Or the shared sensitivity to shifting modes of urban perception that guided Judith Walkowitz’s City of Dreadful Delight (1992) and John Kasson’s Rudeness and Civility (1990). Or the growing emphasis on transnational circulation that began to crystallize in Paul Gilroy’s The Black Atlantic (1993) and George Lipsitz’s Dangerous Crossroads (1994).⁴²

The specific innovations driving these projects, moreover, were never confined ³⁹ The term “macrosocial forces” comes from Sewell, Logics of History, 22–80.

⁴⁰ On the whole, Bonnell, Hunt, Sewell, and Mandler have fallen more squarely into the disappointment camp. Eley and Spiegel, by contrast, have emphasized greater accomplishments and possibilities in recent scholarship.

⁴¹ Cook and Glickman, “Twelve Propositions for a History of U.S. Cultural History.” The next few paragraphs build upon portions of that essay.

⁴² Davis, Society and Culture in Modern France; Levine, Black Culture and Black Consciousness; Scott, Gender and the Politics of History; David R. Roediger, The Wages of Whiteness: Race and the Making of the American Working Class (London, 1991); Judith Walkowitz, City of Dreadful Delight: Narratives of Sexual Danger in Late-Victorian London (Chicago, 1992); John F. Kasson, Rudeness and Civility: Manners in Nineteenth-Century Urban America (New York, 1990); Paul Gilroy, The Black Atlantic: Modernity and to a single quadrant. A case in point is Geertz's landmark essay "Thick Description: Toward an Interpretive Theory of Culture" (1973), which appeared in dozens of subsequent studies by Europeanists and Americanists alike: from Sewell's Work and Revolution in France (1980), Darnton's The Great Cat Massacre (1984), and Hunt's Politics, Culture, and Class in the French Revolution (1984) to Rhys Isaac's The Transformation of Virginia (1982), Roy Rosenzweig's Eight Hours for What We Will (1983), and Susan Davis's Parades and Power (1986).⁴³ But Geertz was hardly exceptional in this regard. Indeed, one could easily track similar patterns of cross-talk via Foucault on discourse, Gramsci on hegemony, Said on Orientalism, Theodor Adorno on the culture industry, Mikhail Bakhtin on carnival, Walter Benjamin on the flâneur, Benedict Anderson on imagined communities, and Judith Butler on gender-as-performance—all key concepts that regularly traversed the U.S. and European fields.⁴⁴

This does not mean, however, that the turns in question simply mirrored one another. On the European side, for instance, there was a much earlier set of engagements with the cultural dimensions of "empire," a pattern deriving at least in part from the pathbreaking scholarship of postcolonial intellectuals such as Frantz Fanon, Léopold Senghor, Aimé Césaire, C. L. R. James, and Stuart Hall.⁴⁵ On the U.S. side, by contrast, we can trace a much wider range of research around "market

Double Consciousness (New York, 1993); George Lipsitz, Dangerous Crossroads: Popular Music, Postmodernism, and the Poetics of Place (London, 1994).

⁴³ William H. Sewell, Jr., Work and Revolution in France: The Language of Labor from the Old Regime to 1848 (Cambridge, 1980); Darnton, The Great Cat Massacre; Lynn Hunt, Politics, Culture, and Class in the French Revolution (Berkeley, Calif., 1984); Rhys Isaac, The Transformation of Virginia, 1740–1790 (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1982); Roy Rosenzweig, Eight Hours for What We Will: Workers and Leisure in an Industrial City, 1870–1920 (Cambridge, 1983); Susan G. Davis, Parades and Power: Street Theatre in Nineteenth-Century Philadelphia (Berkeley, Calif., 1986). As early as 1980, Ronald G. Walters noted this trend in "Signs of the Times: Clifford Geertz and Historians," Theory and Social History 47, no. 3 (Autumn 1980): 537–556. Four years later, Daniel Joseph Singal jokingly described Geertz as cited "so often . . . it has become something of a professional embarrassment"; "Beyond Consensus: Richard Hofstadter and American Historiography," American Historical Review 89, no. 4 (October 1984): 998. This does not mean, however, that cultural historians absorbed Geertz in precisely the same ways. See, for example, Roger Chartier's and Robert Darnton's heated debates from the same period: Chartier, "Texts, Symbols, and Frenchness," Journal of Modern History 57, no. 4 (December 1985): 682–695; Darnton, "The Symbolic Element in History," Journal of Modern History 58, no. 1 (March 1986): 218–234.

⁴⁴ In 1989, for example, Hunt described the resonance of Foucault's work among her fellow Europeanists as "undeniably tremendous"; The New Cultural History, 9. Yet the pattern was hardly restricted to Hunt's own field. Indeed, for much of the next decade, Foucault was a regular presence in scores of U.S. histories, including Michael O'Malley's Keeping Watch: A History of American Time (New York, 1990); Eric Lott's Love and Theft: Blackface Minstrelsy and the American Working Class (New York, 1993); Elizabeth Lunbeck's The Psychiatric Persuasion: Knowledge, Gender, and Power in Modern America (Princeton, N.J., 1994); Gail Bederman's Manliness and Civilization: A Cultural History of Gender and Race in the United States, 1880–1917 (Chicago, 1995); George Chauncey's Gay New York: Gender, Urban Culture, and the Making of the Gay Male World, 1890–1940 (New York, 1994); Michael Meranze's Laboratories of Virtue: Punishment, Revolution, and Authority in Philadelphia, 1760–1835 (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1996); and Kathleen M. Brown's Good Wives, Nasty Wenches, and Anxious Patriarchs: Gender, Race, and Power in Colonial Virginia (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1996).

⁴⁵ For general introductions to this long-running body of work, see Frederick Cooper and Ann Laura Stoler, eds., Tensions of Empire: Colonial Cultures in a Bourgeois World (Berkeley, Calif., 1997), especially 1–56; and Cooper, Colonialism in Question: Theory, Knowledge, History (Berkeley, Calif., 2005), especially 33–55. Also helpful is Bill Schwarz's interview with Stuart Hall, "Breaking Bread with History: C. L. R. James and The Black Jacobins," History Workshop Journal 46 (1998): 17–32. For much fuller treatments of the recent work on empire, see the contributions to this forum by Durba Ghosh and Gary Wilder.

cultures” and “cultures of consumption”—a genealogy that goes back at least as far as the pioneering scholarship of Warren Susman, Neil Harris, John Kasson, Jackson Lears, Karen Halttunen, Richard Fox, Roland Marchand, Daniel Horowitz, Kathy Peiss, Jean-Christophe Agnew, Michael Denning, and Ann Fabian.⁴⁶ Over time, of course, these field-specific strengths have tended to collapse and cross-pollinate. But in so doing, they have also reflected their local contexts. Thus, much of the foundational work on U.S. empire has positioned itself as an explicit rejoinder to “American exceptionalism.”⁴⁷ And much of the best work on European consumerism has tended to cluster around studies of “Americanization” or the Eastern Bloc—topics that simply are not thinkable in the same ways on the U.S. side.⁴⁸

The most striking contrasts, however, can be found in the respective roles played by “class” and “race” in each context. In the European turn narratives, class has long operated as the central category of analysis. In most cases, Europeanist accounts single out the Marxist historiography of Eric Hobsbawm, E. P. Thompson, Christopher Hill, and Raymond Williams as foundational. They draw intellectual lineages from the political revolts of the late 1960s to the renewed interest in “history from below” during the 1970s. Above all, they trace the origins of a new cultural history to the pivotal moment when many social and labor historians began to doubt the deterministic power of structures and conditions.

On the U.S. side, by contrast, it is simply impossible to tell this story apart from race.⁴⁹ Here again, Levine’s Black Culture and Black Consciousness is instructive.

⁴⁶ Warren Susman, Culture as History: The Transformation of American Society in the Twentieth Century (New York, 1984); Neil Harris, Humbug: The Art of P. T. Barnum (Boston, 1973); John F. Kasson, Amusing the Million: Coney Island at the Turn of the Century (New York, 1978); T. J. Jackson Lears, No Place of Grace: Antimodernism and the Transformation of American Culture, 1880–1920 (New York, 1981); Karen Halttunen, Confidence Men and Painted Women: A Study of Middle-Class Culture in America, 1830–1870 (New Haven, Conn., 1982); Richard Wightman Fox and T. J. Jackson Lears, The Culture of Consumption: Critical Essays in American History, 1880–1980 (New York, 1983); Roland Marchand, Advertising the American Dream: Making Way for Modernity, 1920–1940 (Berkeley, Calif., 1985); Daniel Horowitz, The Morality of Spending: Attitudes toward the Consumer Society in America, 1875–1940 (Baltimore, 1985); Kathy Peiss, Cheap Amusements: Working Women and Leisure in Turn-of-the-Century New York (Philadelphia, 1986); Jean-Christophe Agnew, Worlds Apart: The Market and the Theater in Anglo-American Thought, 1550–1750 (Cambridge, 1986); Michael Denning, Mechanic Accents: Dime Novels and Working-Class Culture in America (London, 1987); Ann Fabian, Card Sharps, Dream Books, and Bucket Shops: Gambling in 19th-Century America (Ithaca, N.Y., 1990).

⁴⁷ Amy Kaplan and Donald E. Pease, eds., Cultures of United States Imperialism (Durham, N.C., 1993); Penny M. Von Eschen, Race against Empire: Black Americans and Anticolonialism, 1937–1957 (Ithaca, N.Y., 1997); Mary A. Renda, Taking Haiti: Military Occupation and the Culture of U.S. Imperialism, 1915–1940 (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2001); Amy Kaplan, The Anarchy of Empire in the Making of U.S. Culture (Cambridge, Mass., 2002); Paul A. Kramer, The Blood of Government: Race, Empire, the United States, and the Philippines (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2006).

